The Duke with his Wife and Children, &c. goes to K. Henry his Father in Law, who receives 'em all very kindly.

I shall say no more of this Duke Henry, who for the Greatness of his Spirit, was Sirnam'd the Lion; but that being thus deprived of his Dominions, he could never obtain an entire Restitution of them, having been Lord of all Saxony and Bavaria, and, as some Authors relate, his Territories extended from the Adriatic to the Baltic Sea; only some years after the Emperor restored unto him that part of his Dominions, containing at this day the Dutchies of Hanover, Zell, and Wolfenbottle, and the present Dukes are lineally descended from that Duke Henry by Mathilda, Daughter to Henry King of England.

[3.] In Eccleſiaſtical Affairs nothing happen'd conſiderable this year, only that Geoffrey the King's Natural Son, who had been near Eight years before Elected Biſhop of Lincoln, though he had never yet received Conſecration, was now preſſed by the Pope to receive it, but being unwilling to accept it (finding himſelf unfit for ſo great a Charge) He, by the Advice of the King his Father, freely reſign'd it again into His hands, who not long after made him his Chancellor, and conferr'd alſo upon him Five Hundred Marks per Annum Penſion: R. Hoveden places this under the laſt Year, but ſince Radulphus de Diceto, Matt. Paris, and Matt. Weſtminſter do all agree to put it under this, I rather chuſe to follow them, becauſe I take them to be in the Right, according to our Account, who begin the Year about Chriſtmaſs: and this Reſignation was made at Marlburgh at the Feaſt of Epiphany.

[3] R. D. Geoffrey, the K's. Natural Son, reſigns the Biſhoprick of Lincoln into his Father's hands, who ſometime after made him his Chancellor.

Anno Dom. MCLXXXIII.

[4] This Year the King kept his Chriſtmaſs at Caën, having all his Three Sons with him, the Dutcheſs of Saxony his Daughter, and the Duke her Husband; as alſo the Archbiſhops of Canterbury and Dublin, and divers other Biſhops and Barons: After the Solemnity was over, the Old King Commanded Henry his Son to take Homage of Richard Earl of Poictou, and Geoffrey Earl of Bretaigne his Brothers; upon which he received the Homage of Geoffrey, but Richard refuſed to pay it to him; but afterwards He offer'd it, and then his Brother would not receive it; whereupon the Earl of Poictou grew very angry, and retiring from Court went to his own Country, where he built new Caſtles and fortified the old; Young King Henry follow'd him, and with the Earls and Barons of that Country that adhered to him, very much preſſed and ſtraitned Earl Richard; but when he ſaw Earl Geoffrey come alſo with an Army to the Young King's aſſiſtance, and found he was not able to reſiſt them, (both his Brother's declaring againſt him) he was forced to reconcile himſelf to his Father, and ſent for his Aſſiſtance, who raiſing a great Army, march'd with all ſpeed and beſieg'd the Caſtle of Limoges, which but a little before had been deliver'd to his Son King Henry by the Governor of it: and This was the Cauſe of a freſh Quarrel, which yet needs ſome farther Explanation.

[4] R. H p. 352. b. The Young K. receives the Homage of Geoffrey his Brother, but Earl Richard refuſes, and goes to Poictou.

His Brother K. Henry follows, and preſſes him very hard, and Geoffrey comes in to the Young K's Aſſiſtance.

Richard reconciles himſelf to his Father, and prays his Aſſiſtance.

[5] Radulphus de Diceto tells this Story ſomewhat otherwiſe than our Author, and is alſo more particular in the Relation of it, and tells us that King Henry would have had his Son Geoffrey Earl of Bretaigne do Homage to the Young King his Brother for that Country, becauſe the Kings of France, as Supreme Lords thereof, had antiently granted the Homage of it to the Dukes of Normandy, which was perform'd accordingly by Earl Geoffrey at Angiers; but Henry the Father having alſo granted the Dutchy of Aquitain to his Son Richard and his Heirs; the Young King thereupon declared to his Father, that he was for all that bound to aſſiſt the Barons of Aquitain, then in Arms againſt his Brother Richard by divers ſtrict Confederacies, for it ſeems they were Diſcontented with Earl Richard for his over-great Severity: But the true Reaſon why the Young King ſaid he he had done this, was, becauſe his Brother had ſeized upon and fortified the Caſtle of Clerevalle, which had always been under the Government of the Earls of Anjou; yet that he might not incur his Father's diſpleaſure, he promiſed to let him enjoy that Caſtle, provided Richard would do him Homage, and ſwear Fealty to him for it: At which words Earl Richard grew very angry, ſaying, "It was "very unfit, that he himſelf, being come from the ſame Father and "Mother, ſhould acknowledge his Elder Brother for his Superior "by any badge of Subjection; but as his Father's Eſtate was due to "him by the Right of Primogeniture, ſo he himſelf challeng'd an "equal ſhare in the Succeſſion, to what came by his Mother's ſide: Which put the Old King into ſuch a Paſſion, that he was reſolv'd to bring down his haughty Spirit; and ſo not only gave the King his Son leave to make War againſt him, but likewiſe Commanded Earl Geoffrey to aſſiſt his Brother in that War as his Liege Lord; ſo the Young King at firſt took up Arms, not as againſt his Father, but in Aſſiſtance of the Poictovin Barons, who were then weary of the ſevere Government of Earl Richard.

Anno Dom. MCLXXXIII.

The true Reaſon why young K. Henry made War upon Richard.

But to go on with this War, according to the Relation of our firſt Author [1.] R. Hoveden; who ſays, That after the delivery of the Caſtle of Clerevalle by Earl Richard, thereby to obtain a Peace; the King's Three Sons above-mention'd came all to Anjou to meet their Father, and to make a laſting Agreement between themſelves, and there they All ſwore perpetual Fidelity to the King, and to yield him conſtant Honour and Service, and alſo to maintain a firm and durable Peace among themſelves according to his Order; and He appointed Mirabel for the Place where they were to make this Confirmation. But ſince the Barons of Aquitain (to whom the Young King had ſworn) were not yet come, the Father ſent his Son Geoffrey to Summon them to be preſent at this Agreement, and commanded them in the mean time to abſtain from all Hoſtilities; but Earl Geoffrey being wholly unmindful of his Duty to his Father, as alſo of the Oath of Fidelity he had ſo lately taken to him, made a private League with his Father's Enemies, and hired the Brabanters to invade and ſpoil his Territories.

The K's three Sons come to Anjou to meet their Father, and there are all reconciled to him.

Duke Geoffrey makes afterwards a private League with his Father's Enemies.

[2.] When the Young King heard this, he beſeeched his Father, that he would immediately make Peace between Earl Richard his Brother, and the Barons of Aquitain, that ſo he might have Aſſiſtance againſt his Rebellious Brother: Whereupon the King at his Intreaty promiſed his Endeavours to preſerve Peace, according as it was ordain'd the laſt Summer, and that all Wrongs done by either Party ſhould be ſatisfied; or if this did not pleaſe thoſe Barons, that he would do them Juſtice according to the Judgment of his * Court, with which the Young King ſeemed then well enough pleaſed, yet the Caſtle of Clerevalle was ſtill to remain in his Father's hands. And thus having at length obtain'd what he deſired of him, he went with his leave to Limoges, to bring (as he pretended) Earl Geoffrey his Brother, and the Barons of Aquitain to ſome terms of Agreement; but in the mean time he ſent his Queen privately to her Brother the King of France, [3.] for it ſeems Earl Geoffrey had been formerly too cunning for his Father, and having before made a ſecret Confederacy with the Young King his Brother, they had both together enter'd the Caſtle

Their ill treatment of their Father when he came to the Gates of the Caſtle.

Caſtle of Limoges, by the Conſent and Advice of the Viſcount of that place; and then ſhutting up the Gates, they fortified themſelves within it. The News of which coming to Old K. Henry's Ears, he immediately went thither with a deſign to make Peace; yet having but a few Followers in his Train, he was not only kept out, but alſo ſhot at by ſome from within; inſomuch that ſome of the Arrows pierced the Coat he wore over his Armour, and wounded a certain Knight before his face, and both He and his Son Richard (who was now reconciled to him) were forced for that time to remove their Quarters to another place; but ſoon after, when King Henry the Father had made himſelf Maſter of the City of Limoges, [4.] and went out to parley with his Sons, who were then lodged in the Caſtle, the Guards that were with them did let fly their Arrows even before their faces againſt the King's Perſon, and one of them had ſhot him directly in the Breaſt, had not his Horſe by a lucky toſſing up of his head juſt at that time received it in his Forehead; and yet this Inſolence his Sons never thought fit to puniſh, but ſtill underhand held Correſpondence with the Rebellious Barons of Poictou.

The Old K. narrowly eſcapes being ſhot with an Arrow.

[5.] At length notwithſtanding this, King Henry the Younger came to his Father, and ſolemnly proteſted, That unleſs thoſe Barons would yield and throw themſelves at the King's Feet, he would utterly renounce them: So (upon his Fathers promiſe of Pardon) he went and treated with them again; but finding them (as he affirm'd) ſtill Refractory, and that they would not comply, he ſeemingly pretended to forſake their Party, and return to his Father, laying all the blame of theſe Actions upon his Brother Geoffrey, and with great Submiſſion deliver'd up unto him his Horſe and Armour in aſſurance thereof.

[5.] Id. ib. Young K. Henry comes to his Father, and promiſes him to renounce the rebellious Barons, and lays all the blame on his Brother Geoffrey.

[1.] But it was not many days ere that either from an apprehenſion of his Father's being reſolv'd to revenge himſelf upon thoſe Barons, whom (as their Protector) he thought himſelf in Honour obliged to defend, or elſe through the Inſinuations of ſome Turbulent Spirits that were near him, whoſe Element was not Peace, he ſuddenly withdrew from the King, and enter'd into freſh Confederacies with thoſe very Barons; but finding his Power ſhort of his Will, and deſpairing of Succeſs, he quickly return'd, and breaking out into an extreme Paſſion in the preſence of his Father, fell proſtrate before the Shrine of St. Martial, and there in a fit of Devotion ſwore preſently to take upon him the Croſs, and moreover to give over all worldly buſineſs.

[1] Id. ib. b. Yet again withdraws from the K. his Father, and enters into freſh Confederacies with thoſe Barons.

But ſoon returns again to him, & ſwears to take the Croſs.

[2.] This ſtrange and ſudden Paſſion melted his Father to ſuch a tenderneſs, that he beſought his Son with Tears to alter thoſe precipitate and headſtrong Reſolutions, and to tell him truly what induced him thereunto, whither Indignation or Religion? To which the Son proteſted, That it was meerly for the Remiſſion of the Sins he had committed againſt his Perſon, and that unleſs he would give him now his permiſſion, (without which he could not go) he would there immediately kill himſelf in his preſence. The Father having uſed all poſſible Endeavours to diſſwade him, to no purpoſe, ſpake thus to him, "Son, God's Will be done, and Yours; as for your ſetting out, ſince You "are reſolved upon it, I will take ſuch Order as ſhall befit your Dignity, nay,

His Father diſſwades him from it, but all to no purpoſe.

"nay, in your Equipage You ſhall exceed the Preparations of any who hath "hitherto undertaken that Service.

[3.] Then the Son (whilſt he found his Father in this tender humour) again beſought him, to deal favourably with thoſe in the Caſtle of Limoges, and with the Barons of Aquitain, and to vouchſafe them his Pardon; to which at laſt (though very unwillingly) He yielded, provided they would give Hoſtages for ſecuring their future Fidelity to him, which they ſeem'd at firſt contented to do; But when the King ſent ſome of his Men to receive thoſe Pledges, they were kill'd upon the Spot by thoſe that were to have deliver'd them; which the Young King (being now again joyn'd with thoſe Rebellious Barons) took no care to revenge, but, on the contrary, ſlighting the Vow he had made of undertaking the Cruſado, ſtill became more inveterate againſt his Father: Yet after this he ſeem'd again inclinable to Peace, and ſent for one Maurice de Croun and ſome other Barons to treat about it; but when they came to the place of meeting, ſome of their Retinue were murthered in the Young King's preſence, by thoſe that were as much Enemies to Peace as they were to the King his Father.

But they kill'd thoſe were ſent to receive them.

The Young K. becomes more inveterate againſt his Father.

[4.] Neither was Duke Geoffrey any whit better, for upon his deſire of Two Commiſſioners to be ſent him to treat of Peace, the one of theſe at the Enterview received a Wound, though indeed it proved not very dangerous; whilſt the Other was flung from off the Bridge into the Water, the Duke himſelf looking on.

[4] Id. ib. And E. Geoffrey was no better to him.

After this, he deſired by all means to ſpeak with his Father, and was accordingly admitted to his preſence, and then deceitfully, (under colour of Peace) he begg'd his leave to go into the Caſtle of Limoges to the King his Brother, that ſo he might prevail with him and the reſt of the King's Enemies to ſubmit; yet no ſooner was he got in, but he pillag'd the rich Shrine of St. Martial which was in that Caſtle, and alſo carried away all the Gold and Silver Plate (which was of great Value) that belonged to that Monaſtery; after which a Truce was granted him, but ſo ſoon as ever he had got over the Bridge, he renounced it, and having payed his Souldiers with the Spoils of St. Martial's Shrine, he marched off in Triumph.

A Truce granted him, but he ſtrait renounces it.

[5.] In the mean time Richard Archbiſhop of Canterbury with ſeveral Biſhops of England and Normandy came to Caën, and there in the publick Audience of all the People pronounced Sentence of Excommunication againſt all thoſe who any ways hindered the Peace between the King and his Sons, but excepted the perſon of the Young King, who now wanting Money, went to the Church of St. Mary of the Rock, and there ſtripped the Shrine of St. Adamator of its Gold Cover, and carried away all the Treaſures of that Church; but ſome days after, when he found he was not able to do his Father any great hurt, being at the Caſtle of Martel near Limoges, he fell ſick out of pure ſpite and Indignation, firſt of a Fever, and then a Bloody-flux, which never left him till he died.

Young K. Henry's Character.

in token of his Pardon, which having received, [2.] he called to him the Biſhops and other Religious Men that were by, and firſt in private and then in publick confeſſed his Great Sin in rebelling againſt ſo indulgent a Father; and then after Abſolution, putting on Sack-cloth, and cauſing a Rope to be tied about his Neck, with very penitent expreſſions he intreated the Biſhops and other Religious Men there preſent to pull him out of the Bed to a Couch or Pallat hard by, which he had ordered to be made of Aſhes, and being laid down thereon, and having received the Euchariſt, he expired: When his Servants had embalmed his Body, and wrapt it in Bull-hides, they put it in a Leaden Coffin, and buried his Brain and Bowels at Caſtle Martel where he died: then they carried the Corps towards the City of Roüen to be there enterred according to his laſt Will.

[2.] But whilſt they by the way reſted at the City of Mans, and placed the Corps in the Cathedral Church of St. Julian, and would have the next morning removed it, the Biſhops, Clergy and People of that City would not ſuffer it to go, but to ſhew their great affection to the deceaſed Prince, there honourably buried it; but when the People of Roüen heard of it, they were very much incenſed, and threatned, that unleſs the Body was ſpeedily delivered to them, they would come and take it away by Force; of which when the King was inform'd, he commanded the Corps to be taken up again, and delivered to the People of Roüen to be there buried, according to his Son's laſt Will, which was accordingly done, and the body again buried in the Church of St. Mary.

I cannot diſmiſs this melancholly Subject, without giving you a Character of this unfortunate young Prince, whoſe Inconſtancy and Diſobedience to his Father after ſo many Promiſes and Oaths to the contrary, were ſuch very great faults, that without doubt they tended to the ſhortening of his days; yet had he alſo Noble Vertues and Endowments: As to his Perſon, he was very tall, and of a lovely Preſence, which gained him the good will and Reſpect of all that ſaw him; and as he was valiant, ſo he was alſo merciful and ready to forgive, good natur'd, but too eaſy to be led away by Flatterers from his duty: in ſhort, what one ſays of him is very true, that as he was at firſt ſpoiled by his Father's over Indulgence, ſo he was afterward ruined by his too great Severity; for whilſt he ſaw both his younger Brothers Inveſted with large Dutchies in which they themſelves Commanded, it was a great Mortification to him to ſee himſelf (now paſt his Nonage) to have no more than the bare Title of a King, without any real Power or Authority; which his Father, (Jealous of a correſpondence with his Enemies) would never allow him; ſo that the Coronation which his Father propoſed for the greateſt ſecurity of his Son's Title, and his own Happineſs, proved one cauſe of the greateſt miſchief and diſturbance that happen'd in his whole Reign.

This Example may teach all ſucceeding Kings, that as the Power, ſo neither the Title of a King can well be communicated to more than one at a time; and therefore the Prince (though ſolemnly Crown'd, yet ſince He never actually Reign'd,) his Name is not inſerted at this day in the Catalogue of our Engliſh Kings.

So

Anno Dom. MCLXXXIII.

[4.] So ſoon as King Henry heard of the Death of this Young Prince, he was extremely afflicted, and bewailed his Loſs more than ſo undutiful a Son could well deſerve; and indeed the Father was the greateſt Mourner, all thoſe about him thinking it a very fortunate Accident.

[4.] Id ib. Old K. Henry bewails his Death exceedingly.

Not long after his Death moſt of thoſe that had taken his part againſt the King, made their Peace, and were reconciled to him, only Earl Geoffrey the Third Son ſtill ſtood out: yet did not the King's grief hinder him from minding his buſineſs, for he vigorouſly carried on the Siege of the Caſtle of Limoges, till at laſt it was deliver'd to him upon Conditions; and not long after, all the Caſtles held by his Enemies in that Country, were ſurrendered; Some whereof he Gariſoned with his own Men, Others he Demoliſhed, not leaving one Stone upon another.

Moſt of thoſe that had taken the Young K's part, now make their peace with the Father.

The K. vigorouſly carries on the Siege of Limoges, which with ſeveral Other Places was deliver'd to him, and which he either Gariſon'd or Demoliſh'd.

[5.] Not long after the Young King's Death, the King of France demanded of King Henry for the Dower of his Siſter the Young King's Widow, the whole Country of Veuxin François, together with the Caſtles and ſtrong Places which his Father King Lewis had given in Mariage with her; upon which Demands coming to a Conference between Giſors and Trie, they thus at laſt agreed; That the Widow, for releaſing her Right in all the before-demanded Premiſes, ſhould receive every Year of the King of England at Paris One Thouſand Seven Hundred and Fifty Pounds of Anjou Money, as alſo the like from his Heirs ſo long as She lived: But this ſeems but a very ſmall Joynture for a Princeſs, and therefore I ſhould rather chuſe to read it (as * Daniel in his Hiſtorical Collections has made it, who inſtead of 1750 l. puts) 17050 Anjouin Pounds.

But to ſay ſomewhat of Eccleſiaſtical Affairs; [2.] Pope Lucius being hard put to it by the Romans, who had now taken up Arms againſt him, (in defence of ſome Privileges they claim'd,) he ſent his Legates to all Kings and Princes as well Eccleſiaſtical as Secular, for an Aid to defend St. Peter (that is, Himſelf) againſt his Enemies; and among Others they came to King Henry and requir'd Aid of him and the Clergy of England: the King hereupon conſulting with his Biſhops and Clergy concerning his Requeſt, they adviſed him to give an Aid ſuitable to his own Honour and good Will, both for him and themſelves; for it was more tolerable, and pleaſed them better, that he ſhould be again reimburſed from them, than that the Pope's Legates ſhould be permitted to come into England to take it, by which means there might ariſe a Cuſtom to the detriment of the Kingdom; ſo the King upon their Advice, gave the Pope a great Aid in Money, with which, and what he received from other Princes, he made a Peace with the Romans, which was very neceſſary for Himſelf and his Church.

They come to London, and are ſplendidly entertain'd at Weſtminſter.

I find little elſe Conſiderable to have happen'd this Year, unleſs it were that [2.] Philip Archbiſhop of Cologne, accompanied by Philip Earl of Flanders, came over into England on Pilgrimage to the Tomb of Thomas Becket; from whence they went to London, and were there received with a Solemn Proceſſion at St. Paul's Church, and moſt magnificently entertain'd at the King's Palace at Weſtminſter, during the the Five days they ſtayed there; in which time the Archbiſhop, by the King's Mediation, was reconciled to Henry Duke of Saxony, who ſuffer'd Exile upon occaſion of the War, which had been begun upon that Archbiſhop's Account; [3.] and not long after King Henry ſent Ambaſſadors to the Pope, to deſire him to intercede with the Emperor on the behalf of the ſaid Duke his Son-in-Law: theſe going into Italy, found the Pope at Verona, whither after ſome time the Emperor alſo arrived; at laſt his Holineſs obtained of him, that the Duke of Saxony might return home before the time aſſign'd for his Baniſhment was expired, and then the Emperor releaſed the Duke of Saxony of the Oath he had before taken to the contrary.

Anno Dom. MCLXXXIV.

The A. Bp. is reconciled to the Duke of Saxony.

[3.] R. H. p. 355. b.

The Pope obtains of the Emperor, that the Duke may return from his Baniſhment, and releaſes him of his Oath to the contrary.

[4] Id. ib.

In Eccleſiaſtical Matters what happen'd moſt conſiderable, was, the Death of [4.] Richard Archbiſhop of Canterbury; who though he was a Good and a Pious Man, yet could not avoid the Stories the Monks made of his Death, as being foretold him by a terrible Man in a Viſion, who, he thought, ſaid to him, Thou haſt deſtroyed the Goods of the Church, and therefore I will deſtroy Thee from the face of the Earth: But the true Reaſon of theſe Relations, was, becauſe he was no friend to the Monks.

The A. Bp. of Canterbury dies.

[5.] C. G.

Sometime after the Archbiſhop's deceaſe, [5.] the Biſhops of England and the Prior, and ſome of the Monks of Canterbury Aſſembled at London, by the King's Command, to chuſe a new Archbiſhop; where the Biſhops differing with the Prior and his Monks about the Election, the Former choſe Baldwin Biſhop of Worceſter: but this being done without the privity of the Monks, and they looking upon it as a Breach of their Privilege, (who alone claim'd the Right of Election) declared againſt it, and Appealed to the Pope; but the King himſelf going down to Canterbury, with much Intreaty prevail'd with them to ſend Alan their Prior with the better part of their Convent again to London; ſo they, meeting at the Chapter-houſe at Weſtminſter, declared the former Election void; yet, for quietneſs-ſake, they alſo agreed to Elect the ſaid Biſhop of Worceſter for their Archbiſhop, and he was Conſecrated accordingly. This is the Sum and Iſſue of this great Controverſy, of which Gervaſe of Canterbury hath given us ſo long and particular a Relation.

The Bps. of England and the Prior and Monks of Canterbury, meet at London to chuſe a new A. Bp.

The Bps. without the Other's privity, chuſe Baldwin Bp. of Worceſter.

Upon this Difference between them the Monks appeal to the Pope.

The Prior and Monks at a ſecond Meeting declare the Election void, yet for quietneſs-ſake they chuſe the ſame perſon.

Anno Dom. MCLXXXV.

[1] This Year the King kept his Chriſtmaſs at Windſor, and ſome time after (though the Month is not mention'd) Heraclius, Patriarch of Jeruſalem, with the Great Maſters of the Knights Templars, and Hoſpitallers came as Ambaſſadors from Baldwin (Sirnam'd the Leper) King of Jeruſalem, whom King Henry met at Reading, where they preſented him with the Royal Banner, the Keys of the Sepulchre, and thoſe of the Tower of David, and City of Jeruſalem; together with Pope Lucius's Letter, in which he very earneſtly excited the King to undertake the Relief and Protection of the Holy-Land, being then in great diſtreſs by the Invaſion of Saladine, King of the Turks, or Saracens.

Heraclius the Patriarch of Jeruſalem and Others come to ſollicit the K. to ſend Relief to the Holy-Land.

[2] Id. ib.

A Great Council of both the Engliſh and Scotiſh Nation meet to conſider what Anſwer to return.

[2] The King promiſed to return them an Anſwer on the Firſt Sunday in Lent; at which day He, with the Patriarch, the Biſhops, Abbots, Earls and Barons of England, and William King of Scots, Earl David his Brother, with the Earls and Barons of that Kingdom, all all met at London, and there deliberating and adviſing about this great Affair, they unanimouſly agreed, the King ſhould firſt conſult the King of France about it, and ſo the Council was diſſolved; yet the King gave leave to all his Subjects, as well Clerks as Laicks, to take the Croſs; and thereupon Baldwin, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, Ranulph Juſticiary of England, Walter Archbiſhop of Roüen, Hugh Biſhop of Durham, and divers other Biſhops in England and beyond Sea, with very many Earls, Barons, and Knights of England, as alſo of all the reſt of the King's Dominions beyond Sea, undertook the Cruſado.

Anno Dom. MCLXXXV.

The K. gives all his Subjects leave to take upon them the Croſs. Abundance of both Clergy and Laiety undertake the Cruſado.

But the Council adviſe the K. not to go himſelf thither.

But Radulphus de Diceto and Bromton's Chronicle give us a more particular Account of this Tranſaction, telling us, That the Common-Council of the Kingdom being Aſſembled at Clerkenwell, and the King with great Adjurations commanding them to counſel him what they thought beſt he ſhould do; Whither go in Perſon to the Succour of Jeruſalem, or elſe not to quit the Government of England, which by his Coronation-Oath he was in the firſt place bound to protect and defend: Upon mature deliberation it ſeem'd to them All to be much more for the Good of the King's Soul, that he ſhould govern his own Kingdom at home, than to go away and make War in the Eaſt.

[3.] Col. 1145.

[3.] Bromton's Chronicle further adds, "That when the King gave "the Patriarch this Anſwer, That though he could not deſert his "Territories for fear of the Invaſion of the French, yet however he "would grant very large Supplies in Money towards the Recovery of "the Holy-Land: The Patriarch not being at all pleas'd with "this Offer, told Him plainly, That it ſignified next to nothing, for "every part of Europe ſent Money, but none of them an experienc'd "Commander; and that he had much rather have ſuch a Man without "the Money, than the Money without ſuch a Man. So the Patriarch departed fruſtrated of his deſign: but when the King went with him to the Sea-ſide to take his leave of him, the Patriarch gave him very harſh words, which I ſhall here forbear to repeat; and upon the King's ſtill excuſing himſelf from going to the Holy-Land, becauſe if he did, he ſaid, His Sons would rebell againſt him in his abſence; the Patriarch in great Anger reply'd, And no wonder, for from the Devil they came, and to the Devil they would go. This he ſpoke, reflecting upon an old [4.] Story of a certain Counteſs of Anjou, the King's great Grandmother, who being accounted a Sorcereſs, was ſaid to have flown out of a Window while ſhe was at Maſs againſt her will, and was never ſeen afterwards.

The K. promiſes the Patriarch large Supplies of Money, but that does not pleaſe him.

The K. goes with the Patriarch to the Sea-ſide, who there gives him very harſh words.

[4.] Id. ib. The Patriarch goes into France.

So the Patriarch finding nothing like to be done in his Affair, took Shipping, and paſſed over into France. [5.] But the King himſelf preſently follow'd him, and ſo ſoon as he arriv'd in Normandy, held a Conference with the French King about the Relief of the Holy-Land, and then they both engaged to give very good Aſſiſtance in Men and Money: But this pleaſed not the Patriarch neither, for he hoped he ſhould have carried back with him for the defence of it either the King of England, or One of his Sons, or ſome other Man of great Conduct and Authority; but becauſe he could not do this, he return'd much diſſatisfied. Indeed it ſeems ſtrange, that the King being ſo much afraid of his two Eldeſt Sons, did not Command either one or both of of them to undertake this Expedition, by which means he had not only prevented all the future Troubles they gave him, but alſo the going of his Son Richard into Paleſtine after he was King, which happened mightily to his own prejudice, as well as to that of the Kingdom. Anno Dom. MCLXXXV.

If the K. had ſent One of his Sons, he had prevented their future troubling of him.

[1.] King Henry not long after his arrival in France gather'd together a great Army, and ſent word to his Son Earl Richard (who had lately fortified Poictou againſt him, and alſo vanquiſh'd Earl Geoffrey his Brother,) that unleſs he would ſurrender that Province to Queen Eleanor his Mother free, and in Peace, he would march againſt him Himſelf, and ſubdue him with all his Power: with which Meſſage Earl Richard being terrified, render'd Poictou to his Mother, and quietly return'd to his Father's Obedience; and ſo the Quarrel ended for that time.

[1.] Id. ib. K. Henry raiſes an Army to ſubdue his Son Richard, who had fortified Poictou againſt him.

Upon which Richard ſubmits to his Father.

We ſhall conclude this Year with ſome Account of the Affairs of Ireland.

Sometime this Year [2.] King Henry ſent his Ambaſſadors to Pope Lucius, of whom he deſired many Requeſts; all which the Pope denied except one, to wit, That he might Crown which of his Sons he pleas'd King of Ireland; and He did not only confirm it by his Bull, but, as a Token of his Confirmation thereof, ſent the King a Crown of Peacock's Feathers interwoven with Gold: And in the End of March, before the King went into Normandy, he Knighted his Son John at Windſor in order to ſend him over into Ireland to Govern there as King or Vice-Roy, being then near Twenty years old.

[2.] Id. p. 359. a. Pope Lucius gives K. Henry leave to Crown which of his Sons he would, K. of Ireland.

The K. Knights his Son Earl John at Windſor.

[3.] And having now prepared all things ready for his Voyage, he ſent him away accompanied by Ranulph de Glanville (then Juſticiary of the Kingdom,) who conducted him to his Ship, which he enter'd at Milford-Haven on Wedneſday in Eaſter-week about Evening, and arriv'd with the reſt of the Fleet at Waterford next day about Noon with Four Hundred Knights or Men at Arms, and many other ordinary Horſemen and Archers. Several Clerks or Chaplains were alſo ſent along with him, and among the reſt, our Author Giraldus Cambrenſis was by King Henry appointed his Chief Director.

[3.] G. C. l. 1. c. 31. Who goes into Ireland.

[4.] At the very firſt Arrival of Earl John there met him at Waterford all the conſiderable Iriſh of thoſe parts, who had been faithful to the Engliſh, and lived peaceably under them, who were notwithſtanding derided and deſpiſed by theſe new Comers and the Normans that went over with him: for the Iriſh wore very long Beards, with which theſe giddy-headed young Men play'd many Tricks and otherwiſe abuſed them; whereupon theſe men got themſelves out of Town, and repaired to their own home, from whence they departed with their Families and all they had, ſome to the King of Limeric, others to the King of Cork, and ſome to Roderic King of Connaught, to all whom they declared how baſely they had been abuſed and ill treated; and told them what a raw Youth their new Governour the King's Son was, and that he was accompanied and Govern'd by parcel of vain young Gentlemen like Himſelf, who wanted that Gravity and common prudence which was requiſite and neceſſary to protect and ſecure the Countrey.

[4.] Ibid. c. 35. The Iriſh coming to compliment Earl John, are deſpiſed by his Norman Followers.

They fly to the Ks. of Limeric, Cork, and Connaught, & make their Complaints to them.

[5.] Here-

Anno Dom. MCLXXXVI.

[5] Hereupon theſe Three Princes, who were at firſt reſolved to have come and waited upon Earl John, to acknowledge his Submiſſions and pay their Duties to him, ſuſpecting what might be the end of ſuch beginnings, concluded to Joyn together againſt the Engliſh, and enter into a League Offenſive and Defenſive to preſerve their Liberties and Country, and now became Friends, though they were before Enemies.

[5.] Id. ib. They were at firſt reſolv'd to come and pay their Submiſſion to him; but are diverted by the ill uſage thoſe others met with.

And enter into a League Offenſive and Defenſive to preſerve their Liberties.

[1.] Upon the news of theſe Diſturbances, King Henry remov'd all theſe Young People, who underſtood not the temper of the Nation, and put in Others of more experience, who had been formerly imployed in the Conqueſt of it; and recalling his Son, made John de Curcie Lieutenant of Ireland, who with the Army under his Command ſcowred the Countries of Cork, Limerick and Connaught, and made them quiet. To which R. Hoveden alſo adds, (very much to the diſhonour of Earl John,) That one main reaſon why Affairs went ſo ill in Ireland, was, becauſe the Earl neglecting to pay his Souldiers put the Money into his own Pocket, and yet loſt the greateſt part of his Army in petty Skirmiſhes againſt the Iriſh; ſo that he was at laſt reduced to great want of men, none being willing to undertake the ſervice: wherefore leaving Juſtices in his room to Govern the Country, and putting thoſe Souldiers he had left in fit Gariſons to defend it, he paſſed over into England, after about Nine months ſtay in Ireland.

[1.] Id. ib. K. Henry removes theſe Young men, and puts in others of more Experience.

Recalls his Son, & makes John de Curcy Lieutenant of Ireland.

The main Reaſon why Affairs went ſo ill in Ireland under E. John's Government.

He comes over into England after Nine Month's time.

[2.] But before I diſmiſs this Subject, I ſhall give you the ſame Author's account of the State of Affairs there during Earl John's ſhort Government, (viz.) that there were then in the Kingdom Three different Intereſts or Parties, One of the Normans, a ſecond of the Engliſh, and a Third of the Welſh; the Firſt were in a Great favour, the Second in leſs, and the Third in none at all; the Normans were Luxurious, much given to Wine, and being inſeparable companions to Earl John, refuſed to be ſent to the Marches or Borders againſt the Enemies, or placed in Caſtles far from the Sea; they were alſo great Talkers, Boaſters, and Swearers, very Proud and Contemners of all others; greedy of places of Honour and Profit, but very backward in undertaking any dangerous ſervice that might deſerve them; and for theſe reaſons, the old Militia, that firſt conquer'd that part of Ireland, ſeeing themſelves ſlighted, and the new men only carreſs'd, ſat ſtill and acted not at all, ſo that Earl John made a ſmall progreſs in the further ſubduing of that Country. After his return into England, we find nothing worth mentioning to have been acted in Ireland for ſeveral years, either for want of matter, or elſe of an Hiſtorian to relate it; for after Giraldus, (to whom we are beholding for this Relation, and who here puts a period to his Hiſtory,) Ireland only affords us ſome dry Annaliſts for divers Centuries.

[2.] Id. ib. Three different Intereſts in Ireland.

Earl John did nothing conſiderable in that Nation.

There happen'd nothing remarkable this Year in England, [3.] except that upon the late death of Simon Earl of Huntington, Son to Simon Earl of Northampton, the King reſtored that Earldom to William King of Scots, of which he had been deprived ever ſince the late War, but as ſoon as he had it, he reſigned it up to his Brother Earl David.

[3.] R. D. C. M. K. reſtores the Earldom of Huntington to William K. of Scots, who reſigns it to his Brother David.

There

[4.] There alſo happen'd this year ſo great an Earth-quake in England, as overthrew divers Churches and Houſes, and there was not long after almoſt a total Eclipſe of the Sun.

In Eccleſiaſtical matters, all that happen'd this year was the death of Pope Lucius III. in whoſe room Hubert, Archbiſhop of Milain, was elected Pope, who ſucceeded him by the name of Urban the Third.

King [5.] Henry continuing ſtill in Normandy, after having kept his Chriſtmaſs at Damfront, went from thence to a Conference with King Philip at Giſors, where he again renewed his Oath to him that he would give Alice the King's Siſter in mariage to his Son Richard and thereupon the King of France granted to Earl Richard with his Siſter, Giſors, and all that his Father Lewis had granted with his Daughter Margaret to the late King Henry, and alſo ſwore, he would never lay farther claim to thoſe Territories; then after this Conference the King went over into England, but never performed this Agreement, which was the cauſe of the great Troubles that afterwards enſued.

[1.] Soon after his Arrival there, he raiſed a great Army, and marched with it as far as Carliſle, intending to have paſſed into Scotland, to correct the inſolence of Roland, Son of Uctred Lord of Gallway, who taking advantage of the death of Gilbert his Uncle, and of the abſence of Duncan the Son (at that time a Hoſtage with King Henry) had then taken Arms: But when it came to the puſh, he prevented the King's marching againſt him, by coming to him to Carliſle where he made his Peace, and thereby kept what he had already got.

[2.] Not long after the King's return, William King of Scots came into England, and married Ermengarda the King's Coſen, Daughter of Richard Viſcount Beaumont, who was Son to a Daughter of King Henry the Firſt; this mariage was ſolemnized in the Chappel of the Mannor of Woodſtock, and King Henry kept a Great-Wedding for them for four days, and then reſtored to the King of Scots the Caſtle of Maidens (i.e. that of Edinburgh) which He beſtowed upon his Queen as an Augmentation of her Dower, and added to it an Hundred pounds a year Rent, and the ſervice of Forty Knights, which was counted a great Revenue in thoſe Times.

Nothing remarkable happen'd further in England this year; [3.] but in France, Geoffrey Earl of Bretaign being engag'd in a Tourneament at Paris, was unluckily flung from his Horſe, and before he could be taken up again, was trampled under the Horſes feet, and ſo miſerably bruiſed thereby, that he dyed in a few days after, being little more then Twenty Eight Years of Age. But the French Hiſtorians (who ought to know this matter beſt) ſay, he died of a Feaver notwithſtanding all the Phyſicians could do to prevent it; but all agree that his Death was a great affliction to King Philip, who order'd him to be buried at Paris in Noſtredame Church; thus King Henry laſt Two of his moſt undutiful Sons in the ſpace of Two years.

This Prince is alſo noted for a man of a handſome perſonage and of a fair Tongue, but of little or no Truth, or Sincerity, as appears by his carriage to his Father.

[4.] As ſoon as the Earl was dead, the Nobility of Bretaign took Arms, and Some of them joyned with the King of France, and Others of them with the King of England, whilſt a Third Party ſtood Neuter, ſo that there was like to have been a freſh War begun; [5.] for the King of France claimed the Guardianſhip of Margaret, the then only Iſſue to the late Earl, together with the Government of the Country, as Supreme Lord of the Fee: but the King of England would by no means conſent to it, and ſent over Walter Archbiſhop of Roüen, William de Mandevill Earl of Albemarle, and Ranulph de Glanville Juſticiary of England, as his Ambaſſadors, to mitigate that Young Prince's diſpleaſure, and at their requeſt the King of France granted a Truce until the Feaſt of St. Hillary; but in the mean time the Counteſs Conſtance, the Widow of Earl Geoffrey, whom he had left great with Child, brought forth a Son, whoſe Name was Arthur; of whom we ſhall ſpeak more in due time, when he ſhall come to lay claim to the Crown of England.

[1.] Id. ib. A new War between the Ks. of England and France ready to break out upon a ſlight occaſion.

[1.] Yet the War between the Kings of England and France was again like to be renewed upon a very ſlight occaſion, which was this: One Richard de Valls, a Knight belonging to the King of France, fortifying his Caſtle of Valls, lying between Giſors and Trye, and Henry de Ver Conſtable of Giſors much reſenting it, he was reſolved to oppoſe him, and therefore came againſt it with a good Force; whereupon Richard de Vall's Men ſallied out of the Caſtle to meet him, being led on by Rader his Son, who was kill'd in this Skirmiſh, and many of his Men ſo wounded, that they fled into the Caſtle; but Henry de Ver not daring to return again to Giſors, retir'd to Richard Earl of Poictou; which when the King of France heard, he Commanded all the Subjects of the King of England, both Clerks and Laicks, who were then in his Territories, to be ſeiz'd, together with their Effects, which was done accordingly; then the King of England's Officers beyond the Seas did the like to the Subjects of the King of France: upon which, being ſometime after better adviſ'd by thoſe about him, he Commanded the King of England's Subjects to be releaſed, and ſo things continued in the ſame ſtate they were all the reſt of the Year.

Anno Dom. MCLXXXVII.

[2] Id. ib. b. Pope Urban ſends two Cardinals to go as Legates into Ireland to Crown Earl John.

[2.] King Henry continuing ſtill in England, kept his Chriſtmaſs at Guildford; not long after which Feſtival, the new Pope Urban ſent over Cardinal Octavian, together with Hugh de Nunant, whom he had appointed to go as Legates into Ireland, in order to Crown Earl John; but the King thought fit for the preſent to defer it.

[3] Id. ib. b. But K. Henry carries them over into France, to be preſent at a Treaty between that K. and Him.

[3.] And to give the better colour to this delay; He alledged the weighty Affairs that required his Preſence beyond Sea; ſo carrying the Legates along with him, he paſſed over into Flanders in order to a Treaty, which he was ſuddenly to have with the King of France, at a Place called the Ford of of St. Remy, where they met; but at that Conference the French King made ſuch high demands, that they parted without any hopes of Peace. [4.] Gervaſe of Canterbury tells us what thoſe Demands were, viz. The Reſtitution of the Territories that were given in Mariage with Queen Margaret his Siſter, as alſo that his Siſter Alice ſhould be ſent home, ſince he did not marry her to Earl Richard, as he had ſo often promiſed.

[5.] But

Anno Dom. MCLXXXVII

[5.] But when the King of France could not obtain what he desir'd by Fair means, he resolv'd to do it by Force; and therefore raising a great Army, march'd to besiege Gisors; but King Henry hearing of it, sent William Earl of Albemarle against him with as strong a Force, and he hinder'd that design. This Action our Author places before King Henry's last going over; but let it have been then or afterwards, the next Action we hear of the King of France, is, That not long after Whitsontide He having gather'd another great Army, besieg'd the Earls Richard and John, King Henry's Sons, in Castle-Radulf, or Raoul; which their Father hearing of, came thither with a mighty Power to their Relief; then the French King drawing out his Forces also, they both stood against each other in Battle-Array; But through the Command of Pope Urban (by his Legates) and also through the Intercession of the Bishops and other Great Men of both Kingdoms, there was a Truce agreed on for Two years, upon condition, that the King of France should keep Issodune and another place during that time; whereupon they disbanded their Armies, and return'd home.

The King of France with a great Army marches to besiege Gisors, but the E. of Albemarle hinders that design

He besieging K. Henry's two Sons in Castle-Radulph, their Father comes to their Relief; and tho both Armies are drawn up in Battle-Array, a Truce is agreed upon for two Years.

[1.] As after the Peace was thus made, Earl Richard (against his Father's will) remain'd with the King of France; and such a great Intimacy grew between them, that they not only did often eat, but lay in the same Bed together: whereupon his Father (not without reason) grew very Jealous of him, and several times sent for him to return out of France; but he, making a shew as if he would Obey and return to his Father, went directly to Chinon, where his Treasure was, and seized and carried away the greatest part of it whither the Keeper of it would or no, and therewith fortified his Castles in Poicton, and would not come near his Father: Yet at length he once more return'd and did Homage to him before many of the Clergy and Laiety, and swore Fealty against all Men upon the Holy Gospels, and that he would never recede from his Advice and Obedience: But he was not much a Slave to this Oath neither; for not long after he undertook the Crusado among other Noblemen of France, without his Father's knowledge or consent; after this King Henry went into Bretaign, and there took the Castle of Mountrelais which Hervy de Liuns had seiz'd after the Death of Earl Geoffrey.

E. Richard goes to Chinon, and carries away the greatest part of his Father's treasure, which was lodg'd there.

And therewith fortifies his Castles, but at last returns, and does Homage and swears Fealty to his Father.

K. Henry takes the Castle of Mountrelais.

But as Earl Richard was much to blame for his undutiful Proceedings towards his Father, so neither was the King to be excused for breaking the Agreement with the King of France concerning his Sister, and also the Engagement to his Son Richard, whereby he gave him Leave to betroth her in order to Mariage; and then notwithstanding all this, to keep him so long from enjoying her, which can be imputed to nothing else but the King's extravagant Lust, being not without good ground suspected to have debauch'd her himself, after the death of his old Mrs. Rosamund Clifford; or else Self-interest, as being loth to give up those Castles and Territories which his Son was to have with her, upon the Consummation of the Mariage.

The Father & Son both to blame; the One for his undutiful Carriage, and the Other for withholding his betrothed Wife from him.

This is all that happen'd this Year in Civil Affairs; but in Ecclesiastical Matters Baldwin Archbishop of Canterbury, having in his Company [2.] Giraldus Cambrensis (i. e. Girald of Wales) Arch-Deacon

A. Bp. of Canterbury, as the Pope's Legate, makes a Viſitation into Wales, whom the Clergy there at firſt reſiſt, but at laſt ſubmit to him.

of Landaffe, (to whoſe Hiſtory of the Conqueſt of Ireland we are ſo much beholding) made his Viſitation into that Country as Legate to the Pope, being the Firſt Archbiſhop of Canterbury that ever viſited thoſe Parts: At firſt the Clergy of Wales began to reſiſt him, alledging the antient Liberties and Privileges of their Metropolitical Church of St. David's; but they were forced for all that to ſubmit to him in this Viſitation, and the Archbiſhop perſwaded as many as he could to undertake the Cruſado, and prevail'd upon divers of the Noblemen of Wales, as appears by that Author's Account in his Welſh Itinerary above cited.

The A. Bp. perſwades divers of the Nobility to undertake the Cruſado.

[3.] In Foreign Parts nothing happen'd conſiderable, but the Death of Pope Urban; who, falling ſick with Grief for the great Loſs the Chriſtians had receiv'd in the Holy Land, deceas'd at Ferrara, [4.] to whom ſucceeded Albert his Chancellor, by the name of Gregory the Eighth: But he ſate but Two months, and then deceaſing, Paulus, Biſhop of Præneſte, took the Papal Chair, being call'd Clement the Third.

[4] Id. Col. 1513. He dies two Months after, and Paulus, Bp. of Præneſte, is made Pope, and call'd Clement the Third.

[5.] On Chriſtmaſs-day King Henry was at Caën in Normandy, from whence he went to Barfleur, and ſo paſſed over into England; but ſo ſoon as the King of France heard he was gone, he gather'd a great Army, and threatened to lay Normandy waſte with Fire and Sword, if he did not reſtore Giſors with the Appurtenances belonging to it, or elſe marry his Son Earl Richard to his Siſter Alice. Upon notice of this, the King preſently return'd again into Normandy, and on the Twenty-firſt of January there was a Conference between them at the old Place, between Giſors and Trie, where were convened the Archbiſhops, Biſhops, Earls and Barons of both their Dominions. There was alſo at this Great Convention, the Archbiſhop of Trie, who preach'd ſo effectually to them, that all who were Enemies one to another ſeem'd now heartily reconcil'd, and receiv'd the Croſs from his hands. This Ceremony conſiſted in the faſtening of the Figure of the Croſs upon their Shoulders or Breaſt, with certain Prayers, and other Religious Rites; whereupon the King reſolved to go in Perſon to the Holy-War, and the King of France's Men were to wear Red Croſſes, the King of England's White, and the Earl of Flanders Green ones, for notes of diſtinction on their Cloaths and Armour.

Anno Dom. Mclxxxviii.

[1.] After this Reſolution for an Expedition to recover the Holy-Land, the Council preſently debated on the manner and way of making and maintaining it; and in a very ſhort Space they agreed upon ſeveral Articles which would have carried on the War to good purpoſe, had they been proſecuted effectually. Hoveden recites them confuſedly, and hath ſeveral ſuperfluous Heads, which are not in L'abbé, or Gervaſe of Canterbury: But ſince this Conſtitution for raiſing an Aid for the recovery of the Holy-Land is expreſs'd more at large in L'abbé's Collection of Councils, then it is any where elſe, I ſhall therefore from thence give you the Heads of it, that ſo the Reader may the better compare this Tranſaction (which was one of the greateſt that was known in that Age) with thoſe of our Times. The Title of this Conſtitution runs thus:

[1.] Id. ib. They agree upon Articles how to carry on and maintain the War.

The Heads of the Articles.

This

Anno Dom. MClxxxviii.

[2.] This is the Eſtabliſhment for the Relief of the Land of Jeruſalem, made by Philip King of France and Henry King of England, and approved by the Common-Council of the Biſhops, Earls and Barons of their Dominions; That is to ſay,

[2] Vid. Labbei Concil. Tom. 10. Col. 1740.

I. Every one, both Clerk and Laick, that is not worth above One Hundred Shillings, for every Houſe he hath, where there is a conſtant Fire kept, ſhall pay Two Pence every year for Three years enſuing.

II. If he have more than One Hundred Shillings in Moveables, of every Pound he poſſeſſes in all the King of France his Dominions, he ſhall pay Two Pence of Provence-Money; and in the Dominions of the King of England on that ſide the Sea, Two Pence of Anjou-Money; and in England One * Shilling Sterling for the ſame Term.

* Where note, that the Engliſh Shilling was then of the ſame Value with 2d of Anjou Money.

III. He that hath One Hundred Pounds in Lands or Rents, or above, ſhall pay yearly Twenty Shillings.

IV. He that hath leſs than One Hundred Pounds in Rents, out of every Twenty Pounds ſhall pay Four Shillings, and out of every Forty Pounds Eight Shillings; Thoſe that have Moveables beyond One Hundred Shillings, ſhall ſwear, that out of every Twenty Shillings they will faithfully give Two Pence.

V. Is very little to the purpoſe.

VI. The Tenth of all Livings ſhall be due for the defence of the Land of Jeruſalem, from Midſummer 1184, for Ten years, ſaving the Right of the Lords of the Churches.

Out of this Eſtimation are excepted, for all Clerks, the Treaſure and Ornaments of their Churches, their Books, Horſes, Utenſils, Veſtments, &c. which are neceſſary for their daily Uſe; and for Knights or Souldiers, their Horſes, Arms, Veſſels and Cloaths for their Common uſe.

* Note, This Tax (tho' here call'd an Alms) was ſo grievous, that it was call'd in France, la Saladine, as being raiſed to make War upon that Prince.

For the Collecting of this * Alms, there ſhall be appointed in every Biſhoprick Two Brothers, one of the Temple, another of the Hoſpital; and in every Pariſh, they Two, with the Lord and the Prieſt of the Town (and Two of the beſt of the Pariſh) ſhall collect and keep this Alms.

Theſe Articles obliged not K. Henry's Territories in France, till he had the Conſent of his own Bps. and Nobility there for the Levying of this Tax.

Notwithſtanding which Agreement between the Two Kings and the Biſhops or Great Men of both Kingdoms at the General Council above-mention'd, yet did not this Conſtitution oblige King Henry's Territories in France, [3.] till he had by the Conſent of a Council of his own Biſhops and Nobility of Anjou, Tourain, and Main aſſembled at Mans, ordained the ſaid Tax to be levied in all his Dominions on that ſide the Sea, according to the above-recited Articles;

[3] R. H. p. 366.

Anno Dom. Mclxxxviii. and then the King appointed Two Clerks and Two Laymen as his Officers to collect theſe Tenths through all his ſaid Territories.

[4] Id. ib. K. Henry comes into England, and in a Great Council held at Gaitington had theſe Articles confirmed.

[5] Col. 1522.

[4.] All this being thus order'd, the King paſſed over into England, and arrived at Wincheſter by the end of January, and immediately after he aſſembled a Great Council of Biſhops, Abbots, Earls, Barons, and many other of the Clergy at Gaitington, where he cauſed to be recited and confirmed all thoſe Articles above-mention'd, which had been agreed on beyond Sea, about undertaking the Croſs. [5.] But Gervaſe of Canterbury is more particular in this affair, ann ſays, that the Biſhops and Great Men met at Gaitington, now Gayton, (ſome Eight or Ten Miles from Northampton) to treat about the Defence of the Holy-Land; and after much Debate, at length ſeveral other Articles, concerning ſuch as had taken, or would undertake the Cruſado, were agreed upon and publiſh'd: which ſince they differ from thoſe already concluded on in France, I ſhall here ſet down ſome of them.

All that take the Croſs, to be Abſolved from their Sins.

I. Every Clerk or Layman that ſhall take upon him the Croſs ſhall be freed and abſolv'd from all his Sins (of which he had been confeſſed and had repented) by the Authority of God, the Bleſſed Apoſtles St. Peter and St. Paul, and the Pope's Holineſs.

* Servientes. And to have the Tenths of their own Lands, and of their Tenents.

* Hominum.

II. It is alſo ordain'd, that Clerks, Knights, and * Eſquires, who ſhall undertake this Pilgrimage, ſhall have the Tithes of their own Lands, and of thoſe of their * Tenants, and alſo ſhall pay none themſelves.

There were likewiſe ſeveral other Articles then ordain'd, as againſt wearing rich Furs, or imbroidered Garments; as alſo againſt Second Courſes at Meals, and againſt Swearing, and playing at Dice during this Expedition, which I only mention; nor ſhould I perhaps have taken any notice of theſe Articles, but only to let the Reader obſerve, that they were not made by the King's ſole Authority, but were ordain'd by the Common-Council of the Kingdom, and that after a great deal of debate, though Roger Hoveden ſuppoſes them to have been only recited or publiſh'd there.

Theſe Articles not made by the K's ſole Authority.

[1.] R. H. ib. The K. ſends out his Officers to collect theſe Tenths.

[1.] When the above-mention'd Conſtitutions were thus agreed on, the King ſent certain of his Officers, both Clerks and Laicks, into all the Counties of England to Collect theſe Alms, (or rather forced Charity) and that in all Cities he cauſed all the Richeſt Men to be pick'd out, viz. in London Two Hundred, in York One Hundred, and ſo in all others proportionably, and made them all to appear before him at certain days and places; of whom he took the Tenth of their Moveables, according to the Eſtimation of Honeſt Men who underſtood them; and thoſe whom he found Obſtinate or Refractory, he preſently committed to Priſon, and there kept them until they had paid the utmoſt Farthing; The Jews alſo that were in England paid after the ſame Rate.

Thoſe that refuſed to pay, were impriſon'd till payment.

But

Anno Dom. MClxxxviii.

But [2.] Gervaſe of Canterbury is more particular concerning this Taxation, and ſays, That all England was moſt grievouſly oppreſs'd in the raiſing of theſe Tenths, and that from the Chriſtians were raiſed Seventy Thouſand pounds, and yet were they ſtill to pay more Money; but from the Jews alone were raiſed Sixty Thouſand pounds; nor would they grant to any man Time for the payment, further than till Good-Friday following, unleſs it were to thoſe who were to pay Two Marks, or more; with whom the King deſired to ſpeak in private at London preſently after Eaſter, to try (as I ſuppoſe) whither he could wring more Money out of them.

[2.] Col. 1529, 1530. All England grievouſly oppreſs'd by this Tax.

But notwithſtanding theſe great Sums now raiſed, yet were they all diſſipated upon a War nearer home, which hinder'd thoſe Princes from going to the Holy-Land, though they had ſo ſolemnly ſworn it; for a new Quarrel happened between them upon a very ſlight occaſion, and it was this.

This Money all ſpent on another War nearer home, with the Occaſion of it.

[3.] About two or three Months after the making of this Peace, Geoffrey of Luſignan, a great Lord of Poictou, cauſed a certain Favourite of Earl Richard's to be treacherouſly murther'd, but for what cauſe I do not find, only that this Injury ſo far incens'd the ſaid Earl, that in Revenge, he immediately made War upon him, and entering Geoffrey's Territories, took many of his Caſtles, and kill'd his Vaſſals; but he being ſupported by King Henry's Money, tranſmitted (as it was ſaid) to him under-hand, guarded himſelf ſo well, that the Earl could not ſubdue him; and the better to defend himſelf, he joyn'd with the Count of Tholouſe, who was then alſo in Arms againſt Earl Richard.

[3] R. D. Col. 639. Earl Richard makes War upon Geoffrey de Luſignan, a Lord of Poitou, takes his Caſtles and kills his Vaſſals. He alſo falls upon the E. of Tholouſe, and takes 17 of his Caſtles.

But He being not long after highly provok'd by certain other Injuries lately receiv'd, fell upon that Count's Dominions, took no leſs than Seventeen of his Caſtles about Tholouſe; of which the Count complaining to the King France, he preſently reſented this Violence to his Vaſſal as done to himſelf, and without ever giving Earl Richard any notice, enter'd his Territories and ſurpriz'd his Caſtles and Towns, forcing all the Inhabitants to ſwear Allegiance to himſelf; which raſh Action (my Author ſays) ſeem'd very unworthy ſo great a Prince, who ought to have better obſerv'd that Truſt, which King Henry at his departure for England had repoſed in him, of protecting his Dominions in France during his abſence; nor was King Philip contented with this, but ſoon after, either by Threats or Rewards, he drew over ſeveral Governors of Earl Richard's Caſtles to his Party.

The King of France reſenting it, ſurprizes the Caſtle and Town of Raoul & makes the People ſwear Allegiance to Him.

He draws off ſeveral of E. Richard's Governors of Caſtles.

All this is likewiſe confirm'd by the French Hiſtorians, with this difference only, That King Philip, before he fell upon Earl Richard, admoniſh'd him of his duty, and forbad him (as Supreme Lord of both him and the Count of Tholouſe) to carry on the War any farther againſt that Prince.

[4] R. H. p. 366. b. Roger Hoveden's Relation of this Matter ſomewhat different from the former.

[4.] But Roger Hoveden gives us ſomewhat another and larger Account of the Occaſion of this War, which is to this effect: That about this time Raymond Earl of St. Giles, Aimer Earl of Engoleſme, Geoffrey de Rancune, and Geoffrey de Luſignan, and almoſt all the Great Men of Poictou confederating together, made War upon Earl Richard; who being too hard for them all in ſeveral Rancounters, took divers Priſoners, and among the reſt one Peter Seillan, who Raymond, E of St. Giles, &c. makes War upon the K's Son, but is conquered.

Anno Dom. Mclxxxviii.

who lately had adviſed the Earl of St. Giles to ſeize upon certain Merchants or Tradeſmen that were Earl Richard's Subjects, and to treat them very ſeverely. So the Earl (in return) kept this Peter cloſe Priſoner; and when the Earl of St. Giles found he could not redeem him, he gave Order to his Caſtellans and Souldiers to waylay and apprehend any of the King of England's, or his Son Earl Richard's Subjects: Within a little while after they ſeiz'd upon Robert Poer and Ralph his Brother, Two Knights of the King's Family, that had gone in Pilgrimage to St. James's in Spain, (and were returning home,) and deliver'd them to Earl Raymond, who kept them in Priſon until his Servant ſhould be ſet free; yet Earl Richard would make no Exchange, for he ſaid the Reverence of the Pilgrimage they had undertaken was ſufficient to diſcharge them; but at laſt the King of France Commanded that they ſhould be ſet free, though it was neither out of reſpect to the King of England nor his Son Richard, but for the Reverence he bare to St. James the Apoſtle. However, the Earl of St. Giles did not releaſe them ſo much by the King of France his Order, as for the great Ranſom he had of them.

Robert Poer and Ralph his Brother, returning from Pilgrimage, taken Priſoners by the E. of St. Giles.

A great Diſpute about the Priſoners being Exchanged for Peter Scillun, St. Giles's Servant.

At laſt they are releaſed for the Ranſom he had of them.

[5.] Earl Richard being thus incens'd, enter'd the Earl's Country with a powerful Army, waſting it with Fire and Sword, and beſieg'd and took ſome of his Caſtles near Tholouſe; whereupon the King of France hearing the Complaints of the Earl and People of that Country, ſent into England to King Henry to know whither the Damages that were done in his Dominions by his Son Richard were done by his Order; and if ſo, he demanded Reſtitution: King Henry return'd anſwer, That his Son had done nothing by his Directions, and that Earl Richard had acquainted him by John Archbiſhop of Dublin, that he had done nothing but with the conſent of the King of France.

[5.] Id. ib. Earl Richard enters the E. of St. Giles's Country, and waſtes it.

The King of France complains to the K. of England of it.

[1.] But He in the mean time, without any notice, had raiſed a great Army and enter'd the County of Berry, and taken Caſtle-Raoul, which the Burgeſſes treacherouſly deliver'd to him, and proceeding forward got almoſt all Berry, except Loches and ſome other Caſtles of the King of England's own Demeſnes: But when King Henry demanded a Reaſon of theſe Proceedings, it was told him, that they were done in revenge of thoſe Injuries Earl Richard his Son had done to the King of France, and Earl of St. Giles; thereupon the King of England adviſing with his Counſellors, ſent Baldwin Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and Hugh Biſhop of Lincoln, to the King of France, to perſwade him to terms of Peace: but when they could not prevail, King Henry went into Normandy, and Landing at Barfleur on the Eleventh of July, gather'd together from thence, and his other Territories, a great Army: In the mean time Earl Richard, to be even with the French, enter'd Berry, and deſtroy'd the Lands of the Earls and Barons that adhered to the King of France, and took ſome of them Priſoners.

[1.] Id. p. 367. a. The King of France with an Army enters the County of Berry, & takes Raoul-Caſtle by Treachery, and gets almoſt all Berry.

K. Henry ſends to the King of France, to perſwade him to Peace, but He refuſes.

K. Henry goes into Normandy, and raiſes a great Army.

E. Richard enters Berry, waſtes the Lands, and takes ſome of the Nobility Priſoners.

[2.] But that King upon the Earl's coming had left Caſtle Raoul to William de Barres to defend it, and return'd home; and knowing that King Henry was now arriv'd, he would not leave France, only ſent his Forces, under the Command of the Biſhop of Beauvois to waſte the King's Territories, and burn his Caſtles and Towns, which which was return'd by Earl Richard's taking Le Roches, a ſtrong place near Vendoſme; then King Henry ſent Walter Archbiſhop of Roüen, John Biſhop of Eureux and William the Mareſchal to King Philip to demand Reſtitution for theſe Wrongs, who told him, That unleſs he made ſatisfaction, their Maſter defi'd him: the King of France thereupon anſwer'd, He would never deſiſt untill all Berry and the Norman Veuxine were deliver'd up to him; ſo much had this King's late ſucceſs tranſported him beyond the Bounds of Juſtice and Moderation. Anno Dom. Mclxxxviij.

K. Henry ſends to defy him unleſs he would make Reſtitution.

Yet the French Hiſtorians lay all the fault of this War at King Henry's door, of whom they ſay King Philip demanded Satisfaction for the Injuries and Damage Earl Richard had done his Subjects; but that King Henry denying it, the King of France only did himſelf Right: But this does not ſeem probable, ſince Henry did not then deſire War, but Peace: Yet this is certain, that the King of England being provok'd by theſe Injuries, enter'd the French King's Dominions, and burning divers Towns, march'd very near Mante, where King Philip himſelf was then ſaid to be; near which Place Earl Richard and ſome of his Fathers Domeſtics skirmiſh'd with William de Barres and others of King Philip's Men, and routed them, taking this William at firſt Priſoner; but being kept only upon his parole, he eſcap'd upon a little Nag belonging to his Lacquey.

The French Hiſtorians lay all the blame of this War upon K. Henry, but unjuſtly.

[3.] Then upon Earl Richard's invading Berry, and that King Henry's Forces had again march'd into the Territories of the French King, and there burnt and deſtroy'd ſeveral Caſtles and Towns; he thereupon ſent Meſſengers to King Henry, deſiring Peace, and offer'd to part with what he had taken in Berry.

[3.] Id. ib. The Two Ks. meet at Giſors to Treat of Peace, but can't agree.

The Two Kings came to a Conference at Giſors, and when they could not agree upon any Terms, the King of France in a great Rage cut down a well ſpread, flouriſhing Elm, between Giſors and Trie, where the Treaties of Peace uſed to be held between the Kings of France and Dukes of Normandy, and ſwore there ſhould never be any more held in that place.

The King of France cuts down the Tree, and ſwears there never ſhould be any more Treaties in that place.

[4.] When Theobald Earl of Flanders and the Other Earls and Barons of France ſaw this obſtinate humour of King Philip, they generouſly deſiſted from all further Hoſtility, and ſaid, They would never fight more againſt Chriſtians, until they return'd from their Pilgrimage to the Holy Land. Then the King of France ſeeing himſelf deſerted by his Friends and Confederates, deſir'd another Conference with King Henry, which he conſented to; and on the Morrow, being the Sixth of October, they met at a place called Les Chaſteaux, where the Terms propounded were, That the King of France ſhould reſign what he had taken ſince the Truce, and that Earl Richard likewiſe ſhould give up what he had taken from the Earl of St. Giles; but the King of France demanded of his Brother of England, that the Caſtle of Paſſy ſhould, for the farther ſecurity thereof, remain in his hands as a Pledge: But upon King Henry's refuſing to grant this, they parted as great Enemies as they came: Whereupon the King of France in his Return took the Caſtle of Palud, and paſſing on to Caſtle-Raoul, he led the Plundering Brabanters from thence to Bourges, promiſing them their Pay; but ſeizing on them there, he took away their Horſes, Arms, and all their Baggage, and ſo left them to ſhift for themſelves.

[4.] Id. ib. Several French Lords lay down their Arms.

The Treaty of Peace renew'd, but without effect.

The King of France in his Return takes Palud-Caſtle.

He ſtrips the Brabanters of their Horſes, Arms, and all their Goods.

[5.] Then

Anno Dom. Mclxxxviii.

[5.] Id. ib. Richard offers to ſtand to a Tryal in the French King's Court.

[5.] Then Earl Richard offer'd to come to King of France his Court and ſtand to the Law there, for what had been done between Him and the Earl of St. Giles, that ſo he might make Peace between the Two Kings; which Propoſition much diſpleaſed his Father, that he ſhould condeſcend ſo far without asking his Advice or Leave.

[1.] *Id.p.*370.a. Another Treaty between the Two Ks. where the K. of France makes very fair Propoſals, but K. Henry would not accept of them.

[1.] After this on the 19th of October they had another Conference between Bon-Molines, and Suleinni, where the King of France offer'd King Henry apparently very fair Conditions, as to render back whatſoever he had taken by War, if he would give his Siſter Alice to Earl Richard his Son, that ſhe might at laſt become his Wife, and that he would permit him as his Heir, to receive the Homages and Fealties of the Subjects of all his Dominions: But King Henry being ſenſible of the ill conſequences of that, and the great Injuries and Miſchiefs he had received, by exalting his Son Henry to that Honour, utterly refuſed it; at which Earl Richard was exceedingly diſpleaſed, and therefore without the conſent or ſo much as knowledge of his Father, He did Homage to the King of France for all his Father's Territories in that Kingdom, and ſwore Fealty to him againſt all men; and then King Philip in conſideration thereof, gave him Caſtle-Raoul and that of Iſſoudun, with the whole Honour or Juriſdiction belonging to them.

E. Richard does Homage, and ſwears Fealty to the K. of France.

[2.] Col. 641. R. de Diceto's larger Account of this Tranſaction.

[2.] But Rad. de Diceto gives us a ſomewhat different but larger account of this Tranſaction, and ſays, that at this Enterview, when the King of France propoſed to reſtore thoſe Places he had taken, ſince their ingaging in the Cruſado, and that all things ſhould remain in the ſame ſtate, as they were before that time, the King of England made Anſwer that he thought it more Reaſonable to have a firm Peace made and eſtabliſhed by the Advice of their Biſhops and Barons, than to protract ſo dangerous a Controverſy any longer; which fair propoſal was oppoſed by Earl Richard his Son under this pretence, that if this Condition were agreed to, it would prove diſadvantageous to himſelf; for then he muſt give up Cahors and all that Country, with many other parts of his Dominion, which were worth above a Thouſand Marks a year, meerly for the Fee of Caſtle-Raoul, and the Caſtles of Iſſoudun and Craſſay, which were not his own Demeſnes neither, but only held of King Philip; whereupon the Earl paſſed off to another matter, deſiring of his Father (by the mouth of the King of France) that the Lady Alice might be given him to Wife, and alſo that he would ſettle his Kingdom upon him, as being his Right Heir, which the King imprudently refuſed, ſaying, If ever he did this, it ſhould be done voluntarily and not by compulſion; upon this his Son left him and went over to the King of France: Yet this Author ſays, he did Homage to that King for thoſe Territories, ſaving the Fealty he owed to his Father, and reſerving to him the Intereſt he had in them, ſo long as he lived.

[3.] But if Gervaſe of Canterbury may be credited, he ſays, that the reaſon why Earl Richard was ſo urgent with his Father to be declared his Succeſſor, was, becauſe the common Report was, that the King deſign'd to defraud him of the Kingdom, and ſettle the Crown upon Earl John his younger Brother; which, whither true or falſe, I will not affirm; but this is certain, that Earl Richard upon his his Father's denying to ſecure his Suceeſſion to the Throne, preſently fell into a great Paſſion, and ſaid, Well, That now ſeems to me very likely, which before was incredible. What he meant by this, I will not take upon me to interpret; but our Author farther ſays, That immediately flinging away his Sword, he fell down on his Knees before the King of France, and did him Homage, imploring his Aſſiſtance, that he might not be defrauded of his Juſt Right: upon which all there preſent ſtood amaz'd, to ſee the Father and the Son parting from each other as utter Enemies; and the King himſelf was aſtoniſh'd at this Accident, as juſtly fearing the fatal Conſequences of it; and indeed He had too much cauſe to repent his thus provoking his Son and Heir without any juſt occaſion.

Anno Dom. MCLXXXVIII.

He implores the King of France's Aſſiſtance to preſerve his juſt Right.

[4.] All that could be procured at this Meeting, was, That the Two Kings concluded a Truce until the Feaſt of St. Hillary; and not long after Cardinal Henry Biſhop of Alba, whom the Pope had ſent to reconcile the Differences between the Two Kings, Anathematiz'd Earl Richard as a Diſturber of the Peace, which (to ſay truth) he ſeems to have juſtly deſerved, for thus contradicting his Father's reaſonable Propoſals only upon the Account of his own private Intereſt: whereby He quite broke off a Treaty, that was very near being concluded; though why King Henry ſhould deny him the Lady Alice for his Wife, there appears no reaſon, unleſs that were true which [5.] Bromton's Chronicle relates to be generally believed, that the King had then debauched her and kept her for his Miſtreſs; which, if ſo, muſt needs raiſe a great heart-burning in Earl Richard againſt his Father, and perhaps might be one of the chief Cauſes of his taking part with the King of France againſt him. But whatever was the reaſon of it, 'tis certain King Philip gain'd a great advantage by thus ſetting the Son at odds againſt his Father, for otherwiſe he could never have been too hard for him: Thus all things continued quiet till the concluſion of the Truce.

[5.] Col. 1151. Lady Alice ſuppoſed to be debauch'd by K. Henry.

K. Philip takes advantage of the Difference between K. Henry and his Son.

This [1.] being the laſt Year of King Henry's Reign, he kept his Chriſtmaſs at Saumur with but a very ſlender Company; for many of his French Earls and Barons had left him, and were gone with Earl Richard to the King of France, who both joyning together with the Bretaigns (to whom theſe Princes had given their Charters never to make a ſeparate Peace without them,) they all in a hoſtile manner entered King Henry's Dominions, waſting and deſtroying them on every ſide.

Anno Dom. MCLXXXIX.

[1] R. H. p. 371 b.

The King of France and E. Richard waſte the K. of England's Dominions.

[2.] During theſe Devaſtations, John, Cardinal of Anagnia, came as Legate from the Pope to the Two Kings to exhort them to Peace; and partly by Perſwaſions, and partly by Threats, obtain'd of them to ſtand to the Judgment and Determination of himſelf, and the Archbiſhops of Canterbury, Rheimes, Roüen and Bourges, and he appointed the day of meeting near Fertè Bernard to be Eight days after Whitſontide. Then the Cardinal and Four Archbiſhops pronounced Sentence of Excommunication againſt all Men, as well Clerks as Others, that ſhould hinder the concluding of this Peace, except the Perſons of the Kings themſelves; who both met again at the Time and Place appointed, with the Earls and Barons of both Kingdoms. At this Conference the King of France again demanded of his Brother of

[2.] Id. ib. All are to be Excommunicated that ſhould do any thing to hinder the Peace, except the two Kings.

A freſh Treaty between them.

England, that his Siſter Alice might be given in Mariage to Richard Earl of Poictou, [3.] and that the Homages and Fealties ſhould be made him as in the laſt Treaty; and that Earl John his Brother ſhould receive the Croſs, and go to Jeruſalem.

[3.] Id. p. 372 a. Which again breaks off without Succeſs.

But the King of England ſaid, he would never conſent to it; yet he offer'd the King of France, that, if he would pleaſe, his Siſter Alice ſhould be given in Mariage to his Son John, and that all other things ſhould be perform'd more fully than he deſir'd: but the King of France would not yield to this, and ſo the Treaty by the unreaſonable ſtiffneſs of both Kings, broke up, without the wiſh'd-for ſucceſs.

[4.] Id. ib. The King of France values not the Threats of an Interdict.

[4] Then the Cardinal threatened the King of France, That if he made not Peace with the King of England upon thoſe Terms, he would Interdict his Dominions: whereupon King Philip boldly told him, he valued it not, and ſaid it belonged not to the Church of Rome to pronounce Sentence againſt the Kingdom of France, when only the King chaſtiſed his Vaſſals for their Contumacy and Rebellion, and the Injuries done to his Crown, and added, That ſure the Cardinal had felt ſome of the King of England's Sterlings, i. e. Pieces of Money ſo call'd; and ſo they parted greater Enemies than before.

[5.] Id. ib. The King of France takes divers ſtrong Caſtles and Towns from the King of England.

[5.] Whereupon the War breaking out afreſh, the King of France immediately after laid Siege to, and took Fertè Bernard, Montfort, Beaumont, and divers other ſtrong Caſtles and Towns, for at that time nothing ſtood before him; but the King of England being then in the City of Mans, and underſtanding that the King of France and Earl Richard his Son were marching that way, as if they would beſiege that City, he was much allarum'd at it, and durſt not ſtay and run the hazard of a Battle; but contrary to the Advice of his Biſhops and Barons quitted the City, though it was well ſtored with all manner of Proviſions: and leſt the French ſhould take the Subburbs, Stephen de Tours ſet them on fire, which getting over the Walls burnt down the City likewiſe.

K. Henry quits the City of Mans tho' well ſtored with all ſorts of Proviſions.

Stephen de Tours ſets the Subburbs on Fire, which likewiſe burnt the City.

[1.] Id. ib. The King of France defeats K. Henry's Army.

The K of England with a few Followers gets into the Caſtle of Chinon.

That of Mans ſurrender'd to the King of France.

K. Philip takes in his March divers other Caſtles.

In the midſt of this Confuſion, the King of France approach'd the Bridge, which Geoffrey de Burillun, with many of King Henry's Engliſh Souldiers endeavouring to break down, ſeveral of them were taken Priſoners, and Geoffrey himſelf in the Aſſault was wounded: but whilſt the reſt were trying to get back over the Bridge, the French enter'd the City along with them; [1.] King Henry perceiving this, (being not far off) though he had promiſed the Citizens Relief, yet preſently fled with Seven Hundred Horſe, the King of France purſuing him for Three Miles together; in which flight many of the Welſh Foot were ſlain, and if it had not been for the deepneſs of a Ford, which the French could not readily paſs, many more had periſhed: the King with a few got into the Caſtle of Chinon, and there fortified Himſelf, the reſt of his Followers returning back to the Caſtle of Mans, which ſtill held out; but the King of France and Earl Richard were immediately after received into the City with ſolemn Proceſſion, and then they fell to beſieging the Caſtle, which by means of their Warlike Engines and their Mineing, they got deliver'd to them in Three days, together with Thirty Knights, and Threeſcore Servants. After this the King of France in his March took the Caſtles of Tron, Montore, Caſtle Chaumont and Ambois, with divers others.

[2.] Then

Anno Dom. MCLXXXIX.

[2.] Then the day after the Feaſt of St. Peter and St. Paul, the King of France came and ſate down before Tours; and in a little time the River Loyre being then very low by reaſon of a great Drouth, the French got over, and clapping Scaling-Ladders to the Walls, took the Town by Storm, and in it Fourſcore Knights and a Hundred Servants. And thus by the Treachery of the Poictovins, and Rebellion of the Bretaigns, the King of France had now Conquer'd all Touraine and Main.

[2.] Id. ib. He takes the City of Tours by Storm.

The Treachery of the Poictovins, and Rebellion of the Bretaigns.

[3.] But whilſt he was imploy'd in this Siege, Philip Earl of Flanders, William Archbiſhop of Rheimes, and Hugh Duke of Burgundy, came in an amicable way to the King of England, who was then at Saumur, to make a Peace between Him and King Philip; which King Henry finding himſelf in a great ſtreight, was fain to conclude upon the French King's own Terms.

[3.] Id. ib. The K. of England forced to conclude a Peace with K. Philip upon hard terms.

Immediately after the [4.] Two Kings and Earl Richard with their Archbiſhops, Biſhops, Earls and Barons of both Kingdoms met on the day appointed between Tours and Araſie, where the King of England entirely ſubmitted himſelf to the King of France his Will, and then renew'd his Homage to him, becauſe in the beginning of the War he had defied him, and renounced his Dominions, as held of him; and the King of France had alſo diſclaimed his Homage.

[4.] Id. ib. &. K. Henry does Homage to the King of France.

[5.] Theſe were the Terms of Peace which the King of France preſcribed, and King Henry at laſt agreed to.

[5.] Id. ib. The Articles of Peace between the Two Kings.

I. That his Siſter Alice, whom the King of England had ſtill in his Cuſtody, ſhould be deliver'd to one perſon of Five, whom Earl Richard ſhould chuſe, and that ſhe ſhould be married to him at his return from Jeruſalem.

II. That Earl Richard ſhould receive the Fealties of all Subjects within his Father's Dominions; and that no Baron or Knight, that left his Father to follow him, ſhould return to him again, unleſs within one Month before they went toward Jeruſalem.

III. The time of that motion ſhould be in the middle of Lent next enſuing, when both the Kings and Earl Richard ſhould be at Vezelay at that Seaſon.

IV. All Citizens and Burghers of the King of England's own Towns, ſhould be free all over France, paying only their old Cuſtoms; nor ſhould be impleaded for any thing, unleſs for forfeiture in Felony.

V. The King of England ſhould pay to the King of France Twenty Thouſand Marks of Silver.

VI. All the Barons of the King of England ſhould ſwear, That if the King of England doth not keep this Agreement, they would aſſiſt the King of France and Earl Richard againſt him.

Anno Dom. MCLXXXIX.

VII. The Cities of Mans and Tours, the Caſtles of Ligdi and Trou, were to remain in the hands of the King of France and Earl Richard, until all theſe things were perform'd.

Theſe Terms were very hard, and highly to King Henry's diſadvantage; yet being now ſufficiently humbled, he was forc'd to ſubmit to them.

[1.] But it is very remarkable what this Author further relates, that during this Enterview, there happen'd a great Thunder, and a Flaſh of Lightening falling between the Two Kings, though without hurting any body, yet ſo affrightned them, that they drew back from each other for ſome conſiderable time; but then meeting together again, after a ſmall Interval, it thunder'd again more terribly than it had done before, the Weather continuing ſtill Fair; which ſo aſtoniſh'd poor Old King Henry, that he had fallen from his Horſe, had he not been kept up by thoſe that ſtood about him; and that he then wholly ſurrender'd himſelf to the King of France's Will, and ſign'd the above-written Peace; at the Concluſion of which he deſir'd to have a Liſt or written Catalogue of the Names of all ſuch as had privately deſerted him, and adhered to the King of France and his Son Richard; which when he had receiv'd, and found his Son John the Firſt man in it, he was ſtrangely ſurpriz'd, as very well He might, ſince of all his Sons He had the leaſt reaſon to complain of his Severity.

K. Henry deſires a Liſt of the Names of thoſe that had deſerted him.

He finds his Son John the firſt Man there.

[2.] Id. ib. He Curſes his Sons, & would never releaſe them.

[2.] So the King in extreme Grief and Diſcontent departed to his Caſtle of Chinon, curſing the day in which He was born, and gave God's Curſe and his Own to his Sons, which he would never releaſe, though the Biſhops and other Religious Men had often perſwaded and admoniſhed him to it. This grief and perturbation of Mind put him into a violent Fever, and ſoon finding that he was ſick unto death, he cauſed himſelf to be carried into the Church, before the Altar, and there receiv'd the Communion of the Body and Blood of Chriſt, and then gave up the Ghoſt on the Sixth of July, after he had reign'd Thirty-four years, Seven months, and Four days; and was then in the Fifty-ſeventh Year of his Age.

The K. falls ſick of a violent Fever, and dies in a few days.

[4.] C. B. Col. 1150.

It is buried at the Nunnery of Font-Everard in what State the ſhortneſs of time would allow.

But to return to the matter: Some of his moſt faithful Servants being at laſt mindful of their Duty, return'd again to the Corps, and without ſtaying for the Embalming it, prepar'd all things for the Burial, and the next day convey'd it to the Nunnery of Font-Everard, (not far off) which he himſelf had founded with deſign to be buried there.

Then

Then the Body being bare-fac'd, and dreſs'd in Royal Robes with a Crown on the Head, and a Scepter in the Hand (according to the Mode of thoſe Times) was carried on Men's Shoulders with as much State, as the ſhortneſs of the time would allow: but as it was on the way, Earl Richard hearing of his Father's Death, made haſte to meet it, and bewailing his too ſudden Fate, waited on it to the Church, where it was interr'd in the Choir, and * in which a ſtately Tomb hath been ſince erected for him and Eleanor his Queen, as alſo for his Son King Richard and his Queen, at the Charge of the late Lady Abbeſs Jeane Baptiſte de Bourbon, natural Daughter to King Henry the Fourth of France; their Effigies in Braſs (which before lay in other parts of the Church) being remov'd, and placed together in one Monument.

E. Richard on the News of his Father's death, made haſte, and attended at his Funeral Solemnity.

* Vid. Sandford's Genealogical Hiſtory of the Ks. of England, p. 64, 65.

A ſtately Tomb erected there for him, & his Queen, & for his Son Richard and his Queen, by the Lady Abbeſs Jeane Baptiſte de Bourbon.

I cannot yet leave this Great King (the moſt Powerful that ever hitherto ſwayed the Engliſh Scepter) without giving a Character of his Perſon and Qualities from Giraldus Cambrenſis, Petrus Bleſenſis, and other Authors of that Age.

A Deſcription of his Perſon.

As to his Complexion, it was fair, his Hair ſomewhat inclining to reddiſh yellow; his Eyes grey, ſparkling when angry, but otherwiſe ſweet and mild; his Head and Breaſt large.

His Complexion.

He was of a moderate Stature, but ſtrong and well ſhaped, though a little inclining to Corpulency; but he did what he could by the conſtant Exerciſes of Walking, Hunting, and Hawking, to keep it down, loving theſe Recreations above all others; and when he was not abroad in the Field, he imploy'd his Time in Reading of good Books, or in Converſing with Learned Men, by which means he became more Knowing than moſt Princes of that Age.

His Stature.

His Exerciſes.

As for the Endowments of his Mind, he was naturally Eloquent, Valiant in War, and Prudent in Peace, ſtill providing againſt the worſt, yet valued his Souldiers moſt when he ſtood moſt in need of them, though he rewarded them well when they had ſerved him faithfully; complying with their Humours in Time of Danger, but when that was over, was rigidly ſevere in his Diſcipline. Though he lov'd Peace, yet he did not abhor War, when it could not be avoided; He was extreme Severe to thoſe that oppos'd him, but gentle to ſuch as ſubmitted; Courteous, nay often Profuſe to Strangers, but hard to his own Servants and Subjects. Magnificent in Publick, Frugal in private, and Difficult to be reconciled to thoſe he once throughly hated; no Slave to his Word, if it were to his diſadvantage, yet knowing very well (when preſſed) how to give doubtful and dilatory Anſwers, to what he did not care to grant; He was alſo a Depreſſor of the antient Nobility, rather chuſing to imploy ſuch Men, whom he had raiſed himſelf, as finding them moſt ſubſervient to his own humour: He was likewiſe a Delayer, and ſuſpected for a Seller of Juſtice, of a vaſt and immeaſurable Ambition, ſaying, when he was proſperous, that the whole World was but ſufficient for one Great Man. He encourag'd Diſcord among his Sons, hoping by that means to enjoy peace himſelf, till at laſt they, ſeeing his Policy, joyned together againſt him. He was alſo very Devout, at leaſt by fits, as appears by his great Devotion to Thomas Becket, whom from an Enemy he worſhipped as a Saint.

The Endowments of his Mind.

A Depreſſor of the antient Nobility.

Of a vaſt Ambition.

Encouraged Diſcord among his Children.

Very devout, at leaſt by fits.

One

His Amours.

One of the greateſt Blots of his Life was the many Amours he had, eſpecially after his declared Averſion to his Queen, either for the natural croſsneſs of her diſpoſition, or that She being ſome years older than himſelf, thoſe Charms he firſt found in her ſoon decayed: but this is certain, that after She had openly ſtirr'd up her Sons againſt him, he never forgave her, but kept her always after like a Priſoner in ſome Caſtle or Palace: And indeed this Prince (however great in other things) knew not how to ſet bounds either to his Reſentments, or his Luſt, having divers Miſtreſſes; of whom Roſamond, the moſt beautiful Daughter of Walter Lord Clifford, was the moſt Celebrated: but of her and her Sons I ſhall ſpeak more by and by.

His diſlike of his Queen.

Fair Roſamond his moſt Beloved Miſtreſs.

His vitiating the K. of France his Siſter, notwithſtanding his Promiſe to marry her to his Son Richard.

But the greateſt Demonſtration of his Laſciviouſneſs and want of Faith, was, the vitiating the Siſter of the King of France, notwithſtanding he had ſolemnly ſworn to give her in Mariage to his Son Richard, and yet kept her in England Two and Twenty years without ever giving her to him, or ſending her home to her Friends; which Amour, though it was kept ſecret during his Life, yet there was ſufficient pooof afterwards made of it by King Richard, as you will find in his Reign.

Not very Cruel.

But this may be ſaid in his Commendation, That though he was Voluptuous, yet was he not Cruel, unleſs when very much provok'd; as when he put out the Eyes of the young Welſh Noblemen, whom the Prince of North Wales had deliver'd to him as Pledges of his Fidelity; yet was he much more Merciful than his Grandfather King Henry towards Offenders that hunted in his Foreſts; for whereas the Former put them to death without Mercy, this King never exceeded Fines and Impriſonment, which Puniſhments were afterwards continued by his Succeſſors: He was alſo very Covetous in hoarding up Money, as you may obſerve by the vaſt Sums he left behind him, yet we do not find that he often oppreſs'd his Subjects with immoderate Taxes; to avoid which, he kept divers vacant Biſhopricks and Abbies in his hands, whereby he highly incurr'd the ill-will of the Clergy, though he ſtrove to defend himſelf (as William of Newburgh informs us) by arguing thus: Is it not better that this Money ſhould be beſtow'd on the neceſſary Occaſions of the Kingdom, than on the Pleaſures of theſe Prelates, who do not at all imitate the Examples of Primitive Biſhops, but being voluptuous and remiſs in their Duty, embrace the World with open Arms? Thus he endeavour'd to put the beſt Gloſs he could upon his Faults; yet we do not find he ever ſold either Biſhopricks or Abbies, like ſome of his Predeceſſors, though he was not very zealous, ſince no Prince of his Family built fewer Monaſteries than he did, of which I find no more than the Abbey of Waltham, which he rather alter'd and augmented than founded anew, as you will find more at large in his Reign.

Covetous, but not often oppreſſing his Subjects with immoderate Taxes.

Kept ſeveral Biſhopricks and Abbies vacant in his own hands.

Let us now reflect upon the whole Courſe of this King's Life, and ſee what an equal diſtribution of bad and good Fortune he met with.

His good and bad Fortune.

He had ſo well Eſtabliſh'd his Family, in all humane probability, by the Number of his Sons, and advantageous Alliances made by Mariages with his Three Daughters, that ſo long as the Affection and good Union continued between Him, his Queen, and Sons, he was one of the Happieſt, as well as Greateſt Kings upon Earth.

But

But alas! how little Certainty is there in all things here below, and how uncapable is Sovereignty, even in its moſt exalted State, to lay a good Foundation upon which its long-liv'd Happineſs may be built! So many Territories ſtirr'd up the joint-Envy of his Neighbours round about him; and that ſame flouriſhing Family, which was look'd upon as the Support of his Throne, undermin'd it, and became the Inſtruments of its Ruine.

In his latter Years he ſaw the Reverſe of his Fortune, and how every thing turn'd againſt him with as much Conſtancy, as before they had contributed to his Succeſſes. His Lawrels wither'd on a Sudden, and his Glory fail'd, like a Torch that is burnt out: and this remarkable Ingratitude and Undutifulneſs of his Sons ſeems one great Reaſon of their Misfortunes, all of them coming to untimely Ends before they came to Grey-hairs: A good Leſſon, that high Diſobedience to Parents ſeldom attended either with Worldly Proſperity, or Long-life.

But to conclude the Re-capitulation of this Prince's Reign: He ſaw his Subject, mad with falſe Zeal, prove a Traytor to his King, that (as he thought) he might do Right to his Church; his Children turn Rebels, that they might Reign before he Died; And the K. of France (making uſe of theſe Confuſions) endeavour to recover by Fraud, what he had loſt by Folly: And at laſt his own Amours and his Queen's Reſentments proved the worſt and chiefeſt Cauſe of all theſe Miſchiefs; ſo that giving up every thing to her Anger and Reſentments, ſhe thought ſhe could never enough puniſh the Diſloyalty of a Husband, to whom ſhe had ſacrific'd ſo much. A ſtrange Effect of the Depravity of our Natures, who love others only from Motives of our own Pride and Self love; which is the reaſon, that ſo ſoon as we find we are ſlighted, we fly with Haſte and Fury to be Reveng'd.

He was a Valiant and Magnanimous King, but an unfaithful Huſband, an unkind Brother, and a Father too jealous of his Power; And if he had not ſtain'd his own Houſe with Adulteries, and perhaps with Inceſts; if he had puniſh'd with leſs Severity the Jealouſy of the Queen, whereof he himſelf was the Cauſe; and if he had treated with more Mildneſs and Equity his Brother and his Children, he had been an Excellent Man, and an Incomparable Prince.

Upon the whole matter; after ſo many Intrigues and croſs Accidents, one may well doubt whether his Life was more illuſtrious, or more unhappy; ſince we find, that neither the Number of his Children, nor the Greatneſs of his Dominions, nor ſo many Eminent qualities as he was Maſter of, could make his Proſperity ſtable and laſting; ſo that for want of being able to conquer his Paſſions, and to rule over himſelf, he loſt that Empire he had obtain'd over others.

The

The Iſſue of King HENRY the Second.

I Shall conclude this King's Reign with an account of the Iſſue he had either by Eleanor Dutcheſs of Aquitain, his Queen, or by his Concubines. King Henry had Five Sons lawfully begotten.

I. William. [1.] C. N.

[1.] I. William the Eldeſt died an Infant in the Second Year of his Reign.

II. Henry. [2] M. W.

[2.] II. Henry his Second Son by the ſame Eleanor, was born the 28th of February 1154. at London; and was, when but a Child, married to Margaret, Daughter to the King of France, by Conſtance his Second Wife; but he deceaſed without leaving any Iſſue by her, though ſhe bore a Son, who only liv'd to be Chriſten'd, and dy'd preſently after he was born; after King Henry's deceaſe ſhe was married to Bela King of Hungary.

III. Richard. [3.] R. D.

[3.] III. Richard, his Third Son, by the ſame Lady, was born at Oxford (in the Palace call'd Beaumont 1157.) and ſucceeded his Father in the Throne.

IV. Geoffrey. [4] M. W.

[4.] IV. Geoffrey, his Fourth Son, was born the Year following, and was, in Right of Conſtance his Wife, Earl of Bretaigne and Richmond; by her he had a Daughter call'd Eleanor, who dy'd unmarried in Priſon, in the 28th Year of the Reign of King Henry the Third, as you will find more at large hereafter; and a poſthumous Son (nam'd Arthur) of whom we ſhall ſay more when we come to the Reign of King

V. Jhn. [5.] M. P. p. 127.

[5.] V. John, who was the Fifth and youngeſt Son of King Henry, and alſo born at Oxford 1166. and ſucceeded his Brother King Richard in the Throne, though unfortunately for himſelf, as well as the whole Nation, as you will ſee at large in his Reign.

Their Daughters.

I. Maud. [1.] R. D.

[1.] King Henry had likewiſe Three Daughters; Maud the Eldeſt, born Anno Dom. 1156. who was married to Henry Duke of Saxony in 1167. But She died immediately after the King her Father.

II. Eleanor. [2.] Id.

[2.] The Second, nam'd Eleanor, was born in the Year 1162. and, as Rad. de Diceto and Others relate, was married to Alphonſo King of Caſtile A. D. 1169. though R. Hoveden places this Mariage in 1176. But which of them is in the right, is hard to determine at this diſtance of time, though this latter Account ſeems the more probable of the two, ſhe being then about Fourteen years of Age.

III. Joan. [2] Id. 1176.

[3.] Joan, the Third Daughter, was born in the Year 1165. and was married to William King of Sicily A. D. 1176.

His Baſe Iſſue.

[4] Vid. Dug. Baron. T. 1. p. 175.

This King's baſe Iſſue (by Fair Roſamund above-mention'd) were theſe; [4.] William Longeſpee, or Long-ſword (ſo call'd from the Sword he uſually wore,) on whom King Richard his half Brother beſtow'd in Mariage, Ela, the Daughter and Heir of William Earl of Saliſbury, and with her that Earldom. [5.] Geoffrey

[5.] Geoffrey his Brother by the ſame Lady; He was firſt made Biſhop Elect of Lincolne, and ſo continued from the Year 1174, to the Year 1181, and then he renounc'd his Election, as you have already heard; but ſome years after he was better reconcil'd to the Epiſcopal Function, when he was in his Brother King Richard's Reign elected Archbiſhop of York, notwithſtanding all the oppoſition that was made againſt it; of which you will find enough hereafter.

But to ſay ſomewhat more of the Lady Roſamond Clifford their Mother, and what become of her. [1.] Bromton's Chronicle relates, that King Henry kept this his beloved Miſtreſs in an Apartment at Woodſtock Mannour, built like a Labyrinth, leſt his jealous Queen ſhould come at her and do her ſome miſchief; which that ſhe ever did, our Authors are wholly ſilent; ſo that the old ſtory of her being made to drink Poyſon by Queen Eleanor is a meer Fable, fit for the Ballad made upon it: Only this much is certain, that ſhe did not live long, though the time of her Death is not mention'd, only that ſhe deceas'd and was bury'd in the Chapter-houſe of the Nunnery of Godſtow near Oxford, where her Epitaph Reſides (which he there gives you) was to be ſeen in his time.

Beſides theſe King Henry had, by another Concubine, the Daughter of Sir Ralph Blewet a Knight, one Son nam'd Morgan, who was by his Half Brother, the Archbiſhop of York, made Provoſt of Beverley; and being to be elected Biſhop of Durham went to Rome for a Diſpenſation, becauſe as a Baſtard he was by that means uncapable; but the Pope refuſing to grant it, unleſs he would paſs for the Son of Blewet, he plainly told him he would never deny his Father, and ſo choſe rather to looſe the Profit and Dignity of that rich Biſhoprick, than that of his Blood, though but the Natural Son of a King.

K. Henry, by another Woman had Morgan, Provoſt of Beverly [5.] R. H. ſub anno 1202.

The LAWS of King Henry the Second.

I Shall now give you the Laws that were made in this King's Reign, and begin with

The Aſſizes or Statutes of King Henry made at Clarendon, Anno Dom. 1164. and renew'd at Northampton 1176.

Vid. R. Hoveden Sub. Anno 1176.

If any One ſhall be accus'd before the King's Juſtices of Murther, Theft, or Robbery, or for receiving any ſuch Malefactors, or of Forgery or malicious Burning of Houſes, he ſhall be try'd by the Oaths of Twelve Knights of the Hundred; and if there be not Knights preſent, then by the Oaths of Twelve Lawful Freemen, or by the Oaths of Four Men of every Town of the Hundred, or ſhall go to the Judgment or Tryal of hot Water, (i.e. Water-Ordeal) and if he appears guilty, One Foot ſhall be cut off: And at Northampton it was added for the greater rigour of Juſtice, that he ſhould beſides his Foot have his Right Hand cut off, and alſo abjure the Realm, and leave it within Four days; but if he were found innocent, then to find Pledges and Sureties, and ſtay in the Kingdom, unleſs he be accus'd of Murther or any hainous Felony by common fame, or report of Legal Knights of the Country, than though he be acquitted by the Tryal of Water, he ſhall depart the Kingdom within Forty days, and carry his Goods along with him, (ſtill ſaving the Right of his Lords) yet to be at the King's pleaſure as to the abjuring the Kingdom: This Statute ſhall take place from the day of the making of the Aſſize at Clarendon, until this preſent time, and as much longer as the King pleaſeth in Murther, Treaſon and malicious Burning, and in all things aforeſaid, except in ſmall Theſts and Robberies (committed in the time of War) as of Horſes, Oxen and leſſer things.

II. It ſhall not be lawful for any Man in a Borough or Town to Lodge a Stranger above one Night in his Houſe, without bringing him to Examination, unleſs he hath a reaſonable Excuſe, which the Hoſt is to make known to his Neighbours; and when he goes from his Houſe, he is to do it openly, and in the Day-time.

III. If any one be apprehended for Murther, Theft, Robbery or Forgery, or any other Felony he hath committed, and confeſſeth it before the * Provoſt of the Hundred or Borough, and before Lawful men, he ſhall not deny it afterwards before the Juſtices; and if any one without being apprehended, ſhall confeſs or acknowledge any ſuch crimes, before ſuch perſons, he ſhall not deny it before the Juſtices.

* Præpoſitus, the ſame with our High Conſtable at this day, but was then of much greater Authority.

IV. If any Frank Tenant dye, his Heirs ſhall remain in ſuch poſſeſſion, as their Father had of his Fee (or Eſtate) in his life-time, and they ſhall have his Chattles or Goods to ſatisfie the Deviſe, or Legacies of the Deceaſed; and afterwards they ſhall repair to the Lord and ſatisfie him for his Relief, and do all other things as they ought concerning their Fee; and if the Heir be under Age, the Lord of the Fee may receive his Homage, and have the wardſhip of him, ſo long as he ought, and his other Lords (if he have any) may alſo receive Homage of him, and he ſhall yield them what he ought. The Relict of the deceas'd ſhall have her Dower (which by the Law in thoſe days was a Third part, if the Dead left Iſſue, but a Moiety, if he were without Children) and part of the Goods, that belonged to her: If the Lord of the Fee denies the Seiſin, or poſſeſſion to the Heirs of the Deceaſed, which they claim, then the King's Juſtices may order or appoint the ſame, by the Inquiſition of Twelve Legal men, and what ſort of Seiſin or poſſeſſion the deceas'd had in his life time, ſhall according to the verdict be reſtored to his Heirs; and if any one ſhall act contrary to this Statute and be thereof convicted, he ſhall remain in the Kng's Mercy.

V. The King's Juſtices ſhall cauſe Recognition or Enquiry to be made of Diſſeiſins, from the preciſe time the King came laſt into England, after the Peace made between Him and the King his Son.

VI. The Juſtices ſhall adminiſter the Oath of Fealty to the King by the Cloſe of Eight days after Eaſter, or at fartheſt Eight days after Witſunday, to all Earles, Barons, Knights, Free Tenants, and alſo to to Rusticks or Husbandmen, who will stay in the Kingdom; and he that will not take the Oath of Fealty, shall be taken as the King's Enemy, and the Justices to have power to Command all such, as have not done Homage and Allegiance to the King, to come at a time appointed by them, and perform them as to their Leige Lord.

VII. The Justices shall execute all manner of Law and Right belonging to the King and his Crown by his Writ or the Writ of his chief Justitiaries in his absence, concerning half a Knight's Fee or under, unless the controversy be so weighty, as it cannot be ended without the King; or of such a nature, that the Justices ought to report it to him for his Satisfaction, or to his Chief Justitiaries, and they shall according to the best of their skill and power do what is for the advantage of the King.

VIII. The Justices also shall inflict such punishment upon Thieves and wicked Malefactors in those Counties they pass through, as is set and appointed by direction of the King, &c.

IX. The Justices shall also take care, that the Castles which are demolish'd be throughly ruined, and that such as are to be destroyed be levell'd with the ground; and unless they do this, the King will have them judg'd in his Court, as Contemners of his Precepts.

X. The Justices shall enquire of Escheats of Churches, Lands, and Women that are in the King's Donation, or wardship.

XI. The King's Bayliffs shall answer at the Exchequer, as well for the Perquisites, as the set Rents in their Bayliwicks, except such as belong to the Sheriff and his Office.

XII. The Justices shall enquire of Castle-Guards, and from whom, and how much, and where they are due, and shall inform the King thereof.

XIII. A Thief when he is taken is to be committed to the Sheriff, if the Sheriff be not near, he is to be carried to the next Castellan, or Constable of a Castle, and he is to keep him until he delivers him to the Sheriff.

XIV. The Justices shall cause Enquiry to be made by the custom or Law of the Land, for such as are fled or gone out of the Kingdom, and unless they will return within an appointed time, and stand to Right in the King's Court, they shall be out lawed, and their names return'd into the Exchequer at Easter and Michaelmass, and from thence sent to the King.

I shall here also superadd the rest of the Constitutions made at Clarendon; And though they chiefly relate to Ecclesiastical Affairs, yet since they give great Light to the History of those times as well in Ecclesiastical as Civil matters, and have never been by any one put into English, as I know of, but are to be found in the Life of Thomas Becket, I will translate them from Quadrilogus, whose Copy of these Conſtitutions, as being more exact than that in Gervaſe of Canterbury, and Matt. Paris, I rather chuſe to follow: They begin thus.

In the Year 1164 of our Lord's Incarnation, and the 4*th* of the Papacy of Pope Alexander, and the Tenth Year of the Reign of the moſt Illuſtrious King Henry, in the preſence of the ſaid King there was a Remembrance, and Recognition made of ſome part of the Cuſtoms, and Liberties, and Prerogatives of his Anceſtors, (viz.) of King Henry his Grandfather and others, which ought to be obſerv'd and maintain'd in his Kingdom; and becauſe of the diſſentions and diſcords, which have riſen between the Clergy and our Lord the King's Juſtices, and the Barons of the Kingdom, concerning the ſaid Cuſtoms and Prerogatives, this Recognition was made before the Archbiſhops, Biſhops and Clergy, as alſo before the Earls, Barons and * Chief Men of the Kingdom; and the ſame Cuſtoms being acknowledged by the ſaid Archbiſhops, Biſhops, Earls, Barons, and others of the more noble and † antient Men of the Kingdom, Thomas Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and Roger Archbiſhop of York, &c. (where alſo follow the Names of all the reſt of the Biſhops which need not be recited here) who have all granted, and in the word of Truth, & viva voce, have firmly promiſed ſhall be held and obſerved to our Lord the King and his Heirs bona fide, and without any evil meaning, in the preſence of Robert Earl of Leiceſter, Reginald Earl of Cornwall, Conan Earl of Bretaign, &c.

* Proceres.

Then follow the Names of all the reſt of the Earls and Chief Barons of the Kingdom (which I omit,) with many other Chief and Noblemen of the Kingdom, both Clerks and Laicks; which Cuſtoms and * Prerogatives of the Kingdom, being ſo recognized, ſome part of them is contained in the preſent Writing, of which theſe are the Heads.

* Dignitatum

This Article the Roman Church under Pope Alexander the Third, firſt of all condemned.

I. The firſt is concerning the Advouſon and Preſentation of Churches, ſo that, if any controverſy ſhould ariſe between Laicks, or between Clerks and Laicks, it ſhall be handled and determined in the King's * Court, [1.]

* Curia Regis.

This Article the Pope alſo condemned.

II. The Churches belonging to the King's Fee cannot be granted for ever without his Aſſent and Conſent.

This the Pope tolerated.

III. Clerks arraign'd or accus'd of any matter being ſummon'd by the King's Juſtice ſhall come to his Courts, there to anſwer concerning what ever ſhall ſeem fit to the ſaid Court for them to make anſwer to, and alſo in the Eccleſiaſtical Court, to what it ſhall there ſeem fit to be anſwer'd; ſo that the King's Juſtice may ſend into the Court of Holy Church to ſee after what manner the matter is there handled, and if a Clerk ſhall be convicted, or confeſs his Crime, the Church for the future ought not to defend him.

This he condemned.

IV. It ſhall not be Lawful for the Archbiſhops, Biſhops, or any other perſons of the Kingdom to depart from the ſame, without the conſent of our Lord the King, and if they ſo depart they ſhall give ſecurity, that they will not, either in going, ſtaying, or returning back, procure any evil or dammage to the King, or Kingdom.

This he condemned.

V. Perſons

V. Perſons excommunicated ought not to give any vadium ad Remanens, i.e. Money or ſome other Pledge depoſited in the Biſhop's Court, but only Sureties and Pledges of ſtanding to the Judgment of the Church, that they may be abſolved. This he condemned.

VI. Laicks ought not to be accuſed, unleſs there be certain and legal Accuſers, and that in preſence of the Biſhop, yet ſo that the Arch-Deacon may not looſe his Right, nor any thing, which he may have from thence; and if they are ſuch who are culpable, and that none either will, or dare accuſe them, the Sheriff being required by the Biſhop, ſhall cauſe Twelve Lawful Men of the Vicinage or Town to be ſworn before the Biſhop, that they will declare the truth according to their conſcience. This he tolerated.

VII. No man who holds of the King in Capite, nor any of his chief Officers, ſhall be excommunicated; nor ſhall the Lands of any ſuch Perſons be put under an Interdict, unleſs our Lord the King (if he be then in the Land) be firſt made acquainted with it, or elſe his Juſtice, if he ſhall be out of the Kingdom; that he may do Right concerning ſuch a perſon, ſo that what ſhall belong to the King's Court ſhall be there determin'd, and that which belongs to the Eccleſiaſtical Court, ſhall be ſent to the ſame to be there diſpatched. (i.e. Divine Service forbidden to be celebrated in thoſe places. This he condemned.

VIII. Is concerning Appeals; which, when they ariſe, they ſhall proceed from the Arch-deacon to the Biſhop, from the Biſhop to the Archbiſhop, and if the Archbiſhop ſhall be wanting in doing Juſtice, it ſhall at laſt come before our Lord the King; that by his precept the Controverſy may be determined in the Archbiſhop's Court, ſo that it ought not to proceed further, without the conſent of our Lord the King. This he condemned.

IX. If any difference ſhall happen between a Clergy-man and a Lay-man concerning any Tenement, which a Clergyman would make to be an Almes, and the Lay-man to be Lay-Fee, it ſhall be determined by the Verdict of Twelve Lawful Men according to the Cuſtom or manner of the King's chief Juſtice, and that before him, whither the Tenement belong to Frank Almoign or the Lay Fee; and if it be found to belong to the Former, the Plea ſhall be held in the Eccleſiaſtical Court; but if to the latter, the Plea ſhall be in the King's Court, unleſs both of them ſhall * claim to hold of the ſame Biſhop, or Baron; and if each of them ſhall claim to hold of the ſame Lord [either Eccleſiaſtical or Temporal] the Plea ſhall be in his Court, yet ſo, that he who was firſt ſeized may not looſe his Seiſin, becauſe of the Recognition ſo made to the other. * Advocaverint This he condemned.

X. Whoſoever is an Inhabitant of any City, Caſtle, Borough, or any Demeſne or Mannor of our Lord the King, if he ſhall be cited by the Archdeacon or Biſhop concerning any fault, of which he ought to anſwer them, and will not obey their Citations, it ſhall be Lawful to put him under an Interdict; but he ought not to be Excommunicated, before the King's chief Officer of that Town be made made acquainted with it, that ſo he may cauſe him to give ſatisfaction, and if ſuch an Officer ſhall fail therein, he ſhall be in the mercy of our Lord the King, and then the Biſhop may compel the party accuſed by Eccleſiaſtical Proceſs.

This he condemned.

XI. That all Archbiſhops, Biſhops, and other Eccleſiaſtical perſons of the Kingdom who hold of the King in Capite, may enjoy their Poſſeſſions of our Lord the King, as a Barony, and out of them anſwer the King's Juſtices and Officers, and that they * may perſue and perform all Royal Rights and Cuſtoms; and as Barons they ought to be preſent at the Judgments of the † King's Court with the lay Barons, till they come to Judgment or ſentence of Death or loſs of Members.

* Sequuntur.

This he tolerated.

XII. When an Archbiſhoprick, Biſhoprick, Abbey, or Priory held of our Lord the King ſhall be void, it ought to remain in his hands, and he to receive the Rents and Iſſues thereof, as of his Demeſnes; and when he pleaſes to provide for that Church, our Lord the King ought to ſend for the chief Perſons of that Church, and the Election ought to be made in the King's Chappel, with the Aſſent of our Lord the King, and by the Advice of ſuch perſons whom he ſhall call to perform it, and the perſon Elect ſhall there do Homage to our Lord the King, as his Liegeman of Life and Members, and worldly honours, ſaving his Order before he was conſecrated.

This he condemned.

XIII. If any of the * Noblemen of the Kingdom ſhall † deny the Archbiſhop's, Biſhop's, or Arch-deacon's Juriſdiction, concerning himſelf or * his Goods, the King ſhall do him Juſtice; or if any one ſhould happen ſo to † deny the * Juriſdiction of our Lord the King, the Archbiſhops, Biſhops and Archdeacons ſhall do Juſtice on him, that he may make ſatisfaction to our Lord the King.

* Proceribus.

* Rectitudinem.

This he tolerated.

XIV. That the Chattels of ſuch as are under the King's Forfeitures may not be detain'd either in the Church, or Church-yard, againſt the King's Juſtice, becauſe they belong to the King, whither they are within the bounds of Churches, or without.

This he tolerated.

XV. Pleas concerning Debts, which are owing upon Naked promiſe or without promiſe, ſhall be within the Juſtice of our Lord the King.

This he condemned.

XVI. That the Sons of Country Clowns (or Villains) ought not to be ordained Clerks without the Aſſent of the Lord, in whoſe Lands they are known to be born.

This he tolerated.

Theſe Ordinances or Statutes of Clarendon were ſent to Pope Alexander the Third to be confirmed, but notwithſtanding the great Importunity the King uſed to perſwade him to it, he damn'd moſt, and only tolerated ſome of them, as we find in Labbé's Tenth Tome of Councils, Col. 1431, &c. and according to that Addition, to every Article we have (in the margin) put his Conſent to, or condemnation of them.

Yet

Yet not withſtanding the Pope's Prohibitions, the King's Court did not ſtick to proceed upon divers of thoſe Articles, which are ſo condemned, particularly in the Firſt, Fourth, Ninth, Twelfth and Fifteenth Articles, as may appear to any one that will take the pains to conſult our Hiſtories and Law-books concerning thoſe matters.

Articles of Enquiry by the King's Commiſſioners Concerning the Extorſion and Abuſes of Sheriffs and their Officers, &c made Anno Dom. 1170.

1. AS Firſt, They were to enquire of all Sheriffs and their Bayliffs, what and how much they had received of every Hundred and Townſhip, and of every particular Man ſince the King went laſt into Normandy, by reaſon whereof the Nation or any particular Men might be aggrieved, and what they had taken by Judgment of the Country or Hundred, and what without it, (that is unlawfully;) each of which was to be written, and noted by it ſelf, &c. R. H.

2. Alſo they were to enquire what Lands the Sheriffs had bought, or received by way of mortgage.

Whence we may obſerve, what a vaſt power Sheriffs had in thoſe days, and what a great opportunity was given them of enriching themſelves; and therefore how neceſſary it was in after-times to reſtrain them by divers Statutes both as to the time of their Continuance in their Office, and in the manner of their Adminiſtration.

3. Alſo they were to enquire of the Archbiſhops, Biſhops, Abbots, Priors, Earls, Barons, Vavaſors, Knights, Citizens, Burgeſſes, and their Seneſcals or Stewards, Bayliffs, or Miniſters, what, and how much they had received in their Lands after the term aforeſaid, or of every of their Hundreds, Townſhips, or of their particular Tenents, by Judgment, or without it: and likewiſe the prizes or takings, the cauſes and occaſions of them were to be written, and noted diſtinctly.

4. They were alſo to enquire of all thoſe, who had been Bayliffs under the King concerning any Archbiſhoprick, Biſhoprick, Abbey, Baronie, Honour, or Eſcheate, what, and how much they had gained in that employment.

5. Alſo they were to enquire of the King's Bayliffs and Officers, who managed the buſineſs, and what in any place had been given them.

6. They were to enquire concerning the Goods of ſuch as fled by reaſon of the Aſſize of Clarendon, and what was received of every Hundred, Townſhip, or Man upon that account; and likewiſe when any one was juſtly accuſed in that Aſſize, for hatred, or any other unjuſt means, &c. They were moreover to enquire concerning the late Aid to marry the King's Daughter, what was received in every Hundred and Townſhip, and by whom. That is, the Archbiſhop and his Friends.

7. They were to enquire, what all Foreſters and their Bayliffs or Servants had taken after the time aforeſaid, or if by connivance they they omitted taking what was due to the King for rewards, promiſes, friendſhip, &c. and alſo concerning ſuch as forfeited in the Foreſts, about Hinds, Harts, or any other wild Beaſts.

8. All that were accuſed of any Fault, were to give Security and Pledges to appear before the King on the day he ſhould appoint, to do ſuch Right to the King and his Subjects, as they ought, and ſuch as had no Pledges were to be impriſon'd.

9. They were to enquire, whither the Sheriffs, or any of their Bayliffs, or Lords of Towns, or their Bayliffs, had returned any thing they had unjuſtly taken, or had made their Peace with their Tenants or Vaſſals, to ſtop their complaints from coming before the King.

10. They were to enquire, who had been amerced, and if any one had been excuſed, or abated any thing of what he was firſt amerced, and by whom it was done.

11. Alſo they were to enquire in every Biſhoprick, what, and how much, and for what cauſe, the Arch-deacon, or Deans (i.e. Rural Deans) took of any one, and the whole was to be written down, and noted; and they were alſo to enquire who owed Homage to the King, and had not done it to him, or his Son, and there was a Roll to be made of them.

The Aſſize or Law of Arms appointed by King Henry the Second, made in the Twenty-ſeventh Year of his Reign, Anno Dom. 1181.

Vid. R. Hoveden Sub hoc, Anno p. 350 a.

I. WHoſoever hath a whole Knight's Fee, ſhall have a Coat of Mail, an Helmet, a Shield, and a Lance; and every Knight ſhall have ſo many Coats of Mail, Helmets, Shields, and Lances, as he hath Knight's Fees.

II. Every Free Lay-man who hath Goods or Rent to the value of Sixteen marks ſhall have a Coat of Mail, an Helmet, a Shield and a Lance.

III. Every Free Lay-man who hath in Goods to the value of Ten marks ſhall have an Iron Gorget, an Iron Cap, and a Lance.

IV. All Burgeſſes (that is, Inhabitants or Freemen of Burghs,) and the whole Community of Freemen, ſhall have a Wambais, (i.e. a thick Jacket quilted with Towe, or Wool, or ſuch other materials) a Cap of Iron, and a Lance.

Every One to have Arms, and to keep them for the Defence of the K. and Kingdom.

And every one of them ſhall ſwear, that before the Feaſt of St. Hilary he will provide theſe Arms, and be faithful to King Henry, the Son of Maud the Empreſs, and that he will keep theſe Arms for his Service according to his Command, for the defence of the King and Kingdom: And no Man when he hath theſe Arms ſhall ſell, pawn, lend, or any way put them out of his Cuſtody; neither ſhall his Lord take them from his Tenent * or Vaſſal by Forfeiture, Gift, Pawn, or Security for any thing, nor any other way; and when the poſſeſſor of theſe Arms dyeth, they ſhall remain to his Heir; and if his Heir be not of ſuch age, as he can uſe Arms, his Guardian ſhall have the Cuſtody of his Arms, as well as of his Body, and ſhall find a man to uſe them in the Service of the King, till the Heir is of ſufficient age. If any Burgeſs had more Armes than he ought to have by this Aſſize, he may ſell, or give them to any man that will uſe them in the King's Service; but no man may have and keep by him more Arms than he ought to have by this Aſſize.

None to have more Arms, than the Aſſize alloweth.

Alſo no Jew may have a Coat of Mail, or a Jerkin of Mail in his Cuſtody; yet he may ſell, or give, or part with it, ſo that it may be for the Service of the King.

No Jew to to have a Coat of Mail in his Cuſtody.

Alſo no Man ſhall carry Arms out of England, unleſs by the King's Command, nor ſell Arms to any Man that ſhall carry them out of the Realm; neither ſhall a Merchant or other perſon carry them out of England; and the Juſtices ſhall ſwear as many Knights, or other Free and Legal-Men in the Hundreds and Burghs of every County, as they think fit, whither they have Goods to ſuch a value as that they ought to have a Coat of Mail, an Helmet, a Shield, and a Lance; and that they ſhall diſtinctly name all thoſe in their Hundreds, Neighbourhoods, or Burghs, that have Sixteen Marks in Goods, or Rents; and then the Juſtices ſhall cauſe the Names of the Jurors, and all others who are to find theſe Arms, to be written in a Roll with the true value of their Goods or Rents; and then they ſhall cauſe this Aſſize to be read before all ſuch as are to find Arms, and cauſe them to ſwear, that they will provide thoſe Arms according to the value of their Goods, and Rents, and the Direction of this Aſſize; and that they will keep them for the Defence of King Henry, Son to Maud the Empreſs, and his Kingdom, according to his command: And if it happen, that any one that is to find Arms, be not in the County, when the Juſtices are there, they are to appoint him a time to appear before them in another County, and if they come not to them in any County through which they paſs, they muſt then come to Weſtminſter within Eight days after Michaelmaſs, and there take the Oath, as he loves himſelf and all that he hath; and then he ſhall be charg'd, that he have ſuch Arms as he ought, before the Feaſt of St. Hillary aforeſaid.

All that have ſixteen Marks in Goods or Rents, to have of their own, a Coat of Mail, an Helmet, a Shield, and a Lance.

Alſo the Juſtices ſhall cauſe it to be publiſh'd in all Counties through which they go, that all may take notice, that the King will not puniſh ſuch as make default in their Lands or Goods, but in their Limbs or Members; and that none ſhall be upon the Jury, but ſuch as are worth Sixteen, or Ten Marks at the leaſt.

All that make Default to be puniſh'd in their Limbs or Members.

Alſo the Juſtices ſhall forbid in all Counties through which they paſs, any Man, as he loves himſelf, and all that he hath, to buy or ſell any Ship to be ſent out of England, or to carry or cauſe to be carried any Timber out of England; and the King Commands that none be received to take the Oath of Arms, but a Freeman.

No Ship to be ſold, or Timber carryed out of England.

None but a Freeman to take the Oath of Arms.

Theſe are all the Laws and Conſtitutions that we can now find to have been made by this King; not but that there might be divers others which are now loſt, for in an antient Manuſcript in the Cottonian Library, I find all Glanville's Treatiſe written under the Title of the Laws of King Henry, as having receiv'd their Sanction from him.

VOL. II. BOOK VI.

Containing the Reign of King Richard I.

SO [1.] ſoon as the Funeral-Solemnities of King Henry were over, the Firſt Action of Duke Richard his Son and Succeſſor ſeems very ſevere, and the more ſo, becauſe none of the Authors of that time have given us the reaſon of it, which leaves us ſtill in the dark, but doubtleſs he had very ſufficient ground to juſtify him in it. It was his cloſe impriſoning of Stephen de Turons (i. e. of Tours) Seneſchal of Anjou, (Chief Miniſter under his Father,) and loading him with Irons, not ſuffering him to be releaſed, until he had delivered up the Caſtles and Treaſures of the late King which were in his Cuſtody: neither was this all, for he ſqueezed him to the utmoſt farthing, and (as Richard of the Deviſes in his Manuſcript Hiſtory tells us) kept him in Priſon at Wincheſter in Fetters of Thirty Pound weight, till he would conſent to pay down Thirty Thouſand Pound of Anjovin Money, and engage for Fifteen Thouſand Pounds more of the ſame Coin, which was to be the purchaſe of his Liberty. But to let you ſee that the Anger, as well as the Favour of Princes, is not of any certain long continuance; this very Man was not only pardon'd, but truſted again in the management of the King's Treaſure, and by him left one of the Governors of Cyprus, after it was conquer'd, as you will find hereafter.

Adverſity the beſt School to learn Virtue in.

[3.] While he remain'd thus in Normandy, his Mother Queen Eleanor (then a Priſoner in England) being ſet free by his command, went preſently from City to City, and from Caſtle to Caſtle as ſhe pleas'd; and alſo ſent Commiſſioners into divers Counties with orders to releaſe all Priſoners for the Good of the Soul of her late Husband King Henry, and having through her Husband's Severity ſuffer'd many Year's Impriſonment, ſhe thereby learnt the better how to pity others in the like condition; which ſhews us, that Adverſity is the beſt School to learn the Practice of vertue in, which ſhe now exerciſed with that Generoſity, that we do not find She troubled thoſe who had been the unhappy Inſtruments of her Troubles: Yet her Son, not only ſet her at Liberty, but alſo gave her full power to direct and govern the Nation, as ſhe thought fit in his Abſence, and ſo by his Command (or at leaſt Allowance) ſhe perform'd many Acts of Mercy.

[4.] Ib. id. Her Acts of Mercy.

And what ſort of Priſoners ſhe releaſed.

[4.] "She likewiſe (having obtain'd his Orders for it,) commanded, that all who were taken up for Treſpaſſes in Foreſts, "ſhould be ſet at Liberty, and all that were Outlaw'd for any Miſdemeanors therein might return home free and acquitted from all "Forfeitures.

[5.] After this was done, the Queen Commanded every Freeman of the whole Kingdom or Government to ſwear, that he would bear Faith to his Lord Richard, King of England, Son of King Henry and Queen Eleanor, for the preſervation of his Life, Limbs, and Terrene Honour, as to his Liege-Lord againſt all perſons living; and that he would be obedient to his Laws, and would Aſſiſt him in all things for the conſervation of his Peace and Juſtice. [5.] Id. ib. She commands every Freeman to ſwear Allegiance to K. Richard, &c.

This is the more remarkable, becauſe it is the Firſt Example we can find of any Oath of Fealty or Allegiance, that ever had been hitherto taken to a Prince, by the Title of King of England, before he was Crowned; and therefore, I very much doubt, whither or no there is not ſome miſtake committed by this Author in the wording of this Oath, becauſe it ſtiles him King, when within Four Lines after, he calls him no more than Duke: and in the Oath of Fealty, which this very Author relates to have been ſworn to John, this King's Brother, it is there only recited to be made to John Duke of Normandy, Son to King Henry; but of this, I have ſpoken more in another place. This Oath much doubted to be taken by the title of K. before he was crown'd.

[1.] Much about this time the Duke reſtored to Robert Earl of Leiceſter all his Lands which King Henry his Father had taken from him, and to all thoſe who had been diſinherited unjuſtly in the laſt Reign, he reſtor'd their former Rights; but he ſhew'd his diſlike of thoſe Clerks and Laicks that forſook King Henry, though they adhered to Him, and turned them out of their Offices; but thoſe who had ſerved his Father faithfully, he retain'd and enrich'd by his Bounty; ſo true is that old Maxim, that Princes often love the Treaſon, yet hate the Traytor. [1.] Id. ib. The E. of Leiceſter and others reſtor'd to their Lands.

[2.] Then he went to Barfleur, and having firſt ſent over Baldwin Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and Walter Archbiſhop of Roüen, with other Biſhops of England and Normandy, he immediately took Shipping and landed at Southampton, (Bromton's Chronicle ſays at Portſmouth) where he was receiv'd with great Joy by the Clergy, and Nobility of the Kingdom, who all hop'd (as men commonly do at the beginning of a new Reign) for a great Reformation, and a more eaſy Government; Yet how much they found themſelves miſtaken in their Account, the Event will ſhew: but Earl John came over in another Ship, and landed at Dover. [2.] Id. ib. Duke Richard returns to England. And is Joyfully receiv'd by both Clergy and Laiety.

Then the Duke went to Wincheſter, where he, to ſhew his Affection to his only ſurviving Brother Earl John, [3.] immediately inveſted him with the Earldom of Mortain in Normandy, and in England with thoſe of Nottingham, Derby and Lancaſter; He alſo gave him the Caſtles of Marleburgh, and Ludgerſhal, Pec, and Bolſover, and the Honours [3.] W. N. What Honours he beſtow'd on his Brother Earl John.

Anno Dom. MCLXXXIX.

Honours of Wallingford and Tickhill with their Appurtenances, but yet the Duke kept in each of thoſe Counties ſome Caſtles, and Places of Strength in his own Power: He likewiſe not long after beſtow'd Aviſe, the Daughter and Co-heir of the Earl of Glouceſter upon his Brother in Mariage, together with that Earldom; but afterwards he found he had cauſe enough to repent his making him too great for a Subject, as you will ſee by the ſequel of this Hiſtory. He likewiſe gave to William Mareſchal, the Daughter and Heir of Richard late Earl of Striguil in Mariage, together with that Earldom.

What he did for William Mareſchal.

[4.] Whilſt the Duke continued at Wincheſter, Geoffrey Riddle that Rich and Pompous Biſhop of Ely dy'd there Inteſtate, on the 21ſt of September, whereupon he ſeiz'd his Eſtate, which amounted to Three Thouſand Marks in ready Money (a vaſt Sum in thoſe days) Two Hundred Marks whereof were beſtow'd toward the King's Coronation, and the reſt was divided among his Courtiers: At the ſame time alſo he cauſed ſome of his Biſhops, Earls and Barons to look into his Father's Treaſury, where they found great Sums, which according to Tale and Weight exceeded One Hundred Thouſand Marks.

His Father's Treaſure wondrous great.

[5.] Matt. Paris ſays there were found above Ninety Thouſand pounds in Gold and Silver, beſides Utenſils, Jewels, and Precious Stones, which would be a vaſt Treaſure even in theſe days, and might be reckon'd then at Four times as much at leaſt.

[1.] Having thus taken an Account of his Father's Treaſure, he ſent his Officers to all the Sea-Ports in England, Normandy, Poictou, and his other Dominions, to make choice of Ships of the greateſt Burthen, and cauſed them to be well victualled, arm'd and equipp'd for his expedition to the Holy-Land, according to his Agreement with the King of France: (for you may remember, that Earl Richard had undertaken the Croſs, and vow'd to go to the Holy Land, before the King his Father's deceaſe.)

[1.] R. H. 373. b. What Shipping he provides for his Expedition to the Holy-Land.

[2.] From Wincheſter he came to London, where being met by the Archbiſhops, Biſhops, Earls, Barons, and a great multitude of Knights, &c. He was by their Advice and Conſent ſolemnly Crown'd at Weſtminſter on the Third of September; the Ceremonies of which, ſince R. Hoveden, and Rad. de Diceto, (who were then alive) have ſet them down at large, I ſhall not omit giving you here, becauſe it affords us an exact Account of the whole Form of an antient Coronation: and it was thus.

[2.] Id. ib. His Coronation at Weſtminſter with great Magnificence.

[3.] First the Archbiſhops of Canterbury, Roüen, * Trier, and Dublin with the other Biſhops, Abbots and Clergy, apparell'd in Rich Copes, and having the Croſs, Holy-water, and Cenſers carry'd before them, came to fetch the Duke at the Door of his Privy Chamber, and having there receiv'd him, they led him to the Abbey-Church of Weſtminſter with a ſolemn Proceſſion: in the middle of the Biſhops and Clergy went Four Barons, each carrying a Golden Candleſtick with a Taper; after whom came Geoffrey de Lucy bearing the Royal Cap, and John the Mareſchal next to him, bearing a maſſy pair of Spurs of Gold; then followed William Earl of Striguil (and Pembroke) who bore the Royal Scepter, at the end whereof was a Croſs of Gold; William Fitz-Patrick Earl of Salisbury went next to him, bearing the Golden Rod, having a Dove on the Top; then came four other Earls, viz, David, Brother to the King of Scots, as Earl of of Huntington; John the Duke's Brother, as Earl of Lancaſter and Derby, with Robert Earl of Leiceſter, each of them bearing a Sword upright in their hands, the Scabbards richly adorn'd with Gold, Earl John going in the middle, as in the moſt worthy place; after them went Six Earls and Barons bearing a * Checker'd Table, upon which were laid the King's Robes and ſome other Regalia to be uſed at the Coronation; then followed William Mandevil Earl of Albemarle, bearing a large Crown of Gold ſet with Precious Stones; after him Duke Richard himſelf (having the Biſhop of Durham on his Right hand, and Reginald Biſhop of Bathe on his left) over whom a Canopy of State was born by Four Barons; Then followed a Great Train of Earls, Barons, Knights and others as well of the Clergy as Laiety: In this Order he came into the Church at Weſtminſter, where before the High-Altar in the preſence of the Clergy and People, laying his hand upon the Holy Evangeliſts and Reliques of divers Saints, he took a Solemn Oath, that he would obſerve Peace, Honour, and Reverence to Almighty God, his Church, and her † Miniſters, all the days of his Life; that he would exerciſe upright Juſtice, and Equity towards the People committed to his charge; and that he would abrogate and diſanull all Evil Laws and wrongfull cuſtoms (if any were introduced within this Realm) and make, keep, and ſincerely maintain thoſe that were Good and Laudable.

This being over, they put off all his Garments from his Middle upwards, leaving him only his Shirt, which was open on the Shoulders, that ſo he might be anointed; then the Archbiſhop of Canterbury anointed him in Three Places, viz. on the Head, the Breaſt and the Arms, which Unctions ſignify Glory, Fortitude, and Wiſdom: Then he cover'd his Head with a fine Linnen Cloath, and ſet the Cap thereon, which Geoffrey de Lucy carry'd, and then when he had put on his Surcoat, (viz. his upper Garment) call'd the Dalmatica, the Archbiſhop delivered to him the Sword of the Kingdom, to ſubdue the Enemies of the Church; which done, two Earls put Shoes upon his Feet, then having the Royal Mantle hung on him, He was led to the Altar, where the Archbiſhop charg'd him on God's behalf, not to preſume to take upon him this Dignity, except he reſolved inviolably too keep thoſe Vows and Oaths, he had juſt then made, to which the King anſwer'd, that by God's Grace he would faithfully perform them all; then the Crown was taken from beſide the Altar, and given to the Archbiſhop, who ſet it upon the King's Head, delivering the Scepter into his Right Hand, and the Rod-Royal into his Left; and being thus Crown'd, he was brought back to his Throne by the Biſhops and Barons with the ſame ſolemnity as before; then began High Maſs, and when they came to the Offertory, the King offer'd a Mark of pure Gold, as his Predeceſſors uſed to do at their Coronations; then the Archbiſhop lead him back to his Throne, and Maſs being ended, the Biſhops and Clergy attended him thus Royally array'd from the Church to a Chamber adjoining in like ſolemn Proceſſion as before; whence (after repoſing himſelf a while) he with the ſame Proceſſion return'd into the Choir, and having put off his heavy Crown and Robes, and taken others more light and portable, he went to Dinner.

The A. Bp. anoints him.

Puts the Cap on his Head.

Delivers him the Sword of the Kingdom, to ſubdue the Enemies of the Church.

And forbids him to take upon him this Dignity unleſs he meant to keep his Oath.

[4.] Col. 647. Ralph de Diceto his Account of it ſomewhat different.

[4.] Ralph de Diceto, than Dean of St. Paul's, who (as himſelf relates) in the vacancy of the Biſhoprick of London aſſiſted at this Coronation, and delivered the Hallowed Oyl or Chriſme with which the King was anointed, to the Archbiſhop, ſomewhat differs from the Precedent Account, for he only gives us ſome ſhort Heads of the Coronation-Oath; that he would do his utmoſt, Firſt, That the Church of God and Chriſtian People might enjoy Peace. Secondly, That he would prohibit all Rapine or Violence. Thirdly, That he would Command Juſt Judgments to be given with Equity and Mercy. And though he ſays nothing of the before-mention'd Archbiſhop's Prohibition, yet that he did ſuppoſe this Prince was not compleatly King till he was actually Crown'd, appears by thoſe words immediately forgoing, viz. Richard Earl of Poictou, being by Hereditary Right to be * made King, after a Solemn and due Election by the Clergy and Laiety, took a Threefold Oath, &c. which words are ſo plain that they need no Comment.

Says nothing of the A. Bp's Prohibition.

But ſuppoſes he was no K. till ſworn, and actually crown'd.

[5.] R. H. p. 374. b. † De Pincernariâ. * De Coquinâ. The Coronation Feaſt.

[5.] At this Coronation-Feaſt which was kept in Weſtminſter-Hall, the Citizens of London ſerv'd him as † his Butlers with Drink, and thoſe of Wincheſter brought up his Meat from the * Kitchin; then the Archbiſhops and Biſhops ſate down with the King at the Table, every one according to his Order, whilſt the Earls and Barons ſerved in the King's Pallace, as their Places or Dignities required.

[1.] Id. ib. Upon what Account the Jews happen'd to be murthered at it by the Rabble.

[1.] This Feaſt would have been every way Glorious, had it not been ſtain'd with Blood and Rapine, which it ſeems happen'd thus: The Jews had been particularly forbidden the day before to appear at the Coronation, but yet they could not forbear coming thither under a Pretence of bringing ſome Preſents, but whither they were mov'd to it from Reſpect or Curioſity is uncertain; however the Common People were therewith ſo much incens'd, that they fell upon them, pillag'd them, and with blows drove them out of the Court, in which Tumult many of the Jews were hurt, and ſome kill'd; Nor were the Rabble contented with this,

[2.] but there being a Rumour nois'd about, that the King had Commanded all the Jews to be exterminated, they not only kill'd all they could meet with, but fell upon their Houſes and pillag'd them, and where they were too Strong, or too well defended to be broken into, they ſet them on Fire; nor did they ſtop there, but burnt the Houſes of many Chriſtians, ſo that this Diſorder laſted all that day and the night following; and though the King ſent Ranulph de Glanvil his chief Juſtitiary to appeaſe them, yet their Fury at that time was too great to be reſtrain'd by him.

The Ring-leaders taken up next day, and hang'd.

The next day the King ſent divers of his Officers into the City, who ſeizing upon the chief Ring-Leaders, caus'd them to be hang'd up immediately as they well deſerved; but it is ſtrange to obſerve the prepoſterous zeal of ſome of our Monkiſh-writers, who do not only excuſe, but applaud this wicked fact, becauſe (ſay they) it ſerved to deſtroy the Enemies of the Chriſtian Faith.

[3.] R. H. Ib. The K. receives the Homages and Fealties of his Nobles.

[3.] The day after the Coronation King Richard receiv'd the Homages and Fealties of all the Biſhops, Abbots, Earls and Barons; which I take notice of here, becauſe it hath been ſince the cuſtom of the Biſhops and Nobility to do their Homage ſo ſoon as ever the King is Crown'd.

[4.] Then

[4.] Then the King being in great want of Money for his intended Voyage to the Holy Land, ſold many of his Mannors and Caſtles to divers perſons; as to Hugh Biſhop of Durham his Mannor of Sadbery with the Wapentac belonging thereunto for Six Hundred Marks; and preſently after he ſold him the Earldom of Northumberland to be held with the ſaid Biſhoprick; [5.] with this Jeſt upon it, That He had made a Young Earl of an old Biſhop: Nor was the Biſhop content with this, but he gave the King beſides, One Thouſand Marks more to be one of his chief Juſtitiaries in his Abſence, ſo exceſſively ambitious was this Prelate of Secular Power: But with theſe payments the Biſhop's Treaſure was ſo much exhauſted, that he had not Money enough to undertake his Voyage to the Holy Land, as he had vow'd; and therefore excuſing himſelf becauſe of his old Age, declin'd the Journey. Nor did the King empty the Biſhop's Bags only, but ſold many other Mannors and Lands to ſuch Biſhops and Abbots as would buy them of him, they being then the only mony'd Men of England, by which means he raiſed a vaſt Sum of Money towards his Intended Expedition.

* Richard of the Deviſes further adds, That the King was now in ſuch want of Money, that even William Longchamp (his Favourite) pay'd no leſs than Three Thouſand Pound to have the Great Seal continued in his Cuſtody during the King's Abſence, and that when he had ſold his Mannors to thoſe that would bid moſt for them, and was queſtion'd by one about him why he did ſo; his Anſwer was, That he would ſell London it ſelf if he could find a good Chapman; ſo mightily was he ſet upon this needleſs Expedition. And further, all the Sheriffs of England having incurr'd his diſpleaſure for Abuſes in their Office, were upon very ſlight Accuſations depriv'd of their Places, and made to purchaſe the King's Pardon with a great Sum of Money.

* M. S. in Bib. Cotton. Julius. A.

The K. offers to ſell London, if he could get a Chapman, ſo bent was He for the Holy Land.

[1.] On the Sixteenth of September the King went to the Abbey of Pipewel in Northamptonſhire, where he held a Great Council, or Synod of all the Biſhops, Abbots and Priors of the Kingdom, to conſider how to fill up the vacant Sees and Abbies; and by the Advice of his Biſhops and other Great Men he conferr'd on his Brother Geoffrey the Archbiſhoprick of York; on Godfrey de Lucy the Biſhoprick of Winchester; to Richard Arch-deacon of Ely, he gave the Biſhoprick of London; to Hubert Walter then Dean of York, the Biſhoprick of Saliſbury; and to William Longchamp his Chancellor, the Biſhoprick of Ely; all which is thus to be underſtood, that though the Perſons were nominated by the King, with the Advice of this Council, yet they were notwithſtanding elected by the Repreſentatives of the Particular Chapters and Convents according to the Canons: and when this was done, they were ſtill to be confirm'd by the King; for William of Newburgh tells us, that King Richard would not agree to confirm the Election of his Brother Geoffrey, (though made by the Dean and Chanons of York,) till he had pay'd a good round Sum of Money towards his intended Expedition; which, if ſo, was very hard uſage to ſo near a Relation.

all the Clergy and Laiety there preſent, the Charter of King William the Baſtard; wherein it was ſpecified, That Thomas, then Archbiſhop of York, had receiv'd his Conſecration at the hands of Lanfranc Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and Primate of all England; and had then promiſed him Canonical Obedience together with all his Suffragan Biſhops, as to their Primate; this Charter alſo teſtified, that theſe things were done at London according to the definitive Sentence of Pope Alexander the Second.

Ranulph de Glanvil reſigns his Office, and for what Reaſon.

Richard of the Deviſes's particular Account of his not only being diſplaced, but ſent to Priſon, and he paid 15000*l.* for his Liberty.

But Richard of the Deviſes gives us a more particular Account of this Ranulph de Glanville, that being a Man of great Eloquence and Eſtate, the King was ſo diſpleaſed with him for ſome things that he had done in his Father's Reign, that he not only turn'd him out of his Place, but committed him to Priſon, and he could not be diſcharged before he had actually paid Fifteen Thouſand Pound for his Liberty; a vaſt Ranſom in thoſe days for a private Man to pay.

[4.] R. H. p. 376. a. Ambaſſadors arrive from France, and what they did.

[4.] In the Month of November, Rotrod Earl of Perche, and other Ambaſſadors of the King of France, came into England and acquainted King Richard, that in a Great Council at Paris, their King and all the Great Men of his Kingdom who had undertaken the Cruſado, had ſworn (God willing) to be at Vezely in Burgundy in the cloſe of Eaſter to go forwards towards Jeruſalem, and to ſatisfy him of the reality of this Oath, they brought him the Charter, deſiring that he with his Earls and Barons would give the like Security to be there at the ſame time: whereupon King Richard and thoſe Earls and Barons who had undertaken that Service, in a Great Council at Weſtminſter, did all Swear, That by the help of God, they would be there alſo at the ſtated time, ready to undertake that Voyage as King Philip had deſired; then Rotrod Earl of Perche and the reſt of that King's Ambaſſadors ſwore the ſame thing on their Maſter's behalf before the Council, as did alſo William Earl Mareſchal and others for the King of England, in the Preſence of the French King's Ambaſſadors; in Teſtimony whereof King Richard alſo ſent him his Charter under his Seal. Which great Caution, though it may ſeem at this diſtance very odd and impertinent, ſince the King himſelf had before Sworn to obſerve it, yet it was according to the Cuſtom of thoſe Times, when the Oaths of Princes were not alone thought ſufficient, without thoſe of certain Fide juſſors, or Sureties, who were alſo to Swear on their behalf, and were often oblig'd to take part with their Maſter's Enemy, in caſe he firſt broke the Agreement.

The K. and Nobility did ſwear to be ready at a Stated time to go to the Holy-Land, in a Great Council at Weſtminſter.

[5.] In the ſame Month Geoffrey Archbiſhop Elect of York, with the Barons of Yorkſhire, and the Sheriff, by the King's Command, went to to the River Twede, and there receiv'd William King of Scots, and conducted him to the King at Canterbury in December, who there did him Homage for the Honours he enjoy'd in England, as his Brother Malcolm had done before; and then King Richard deliver'd up to him the Caſtles of Roxburgh and Berwick, and alſo acquitted Him and his Heirs for ever from all Fealty and Allegiance to Himſelf and Succeſſors, Kings of England, concerning the Subjection of the Kingdom of Scotland: for which Reſtitution of his Caſtles, and Releaſe of the Fealties of his Tenants of the Kingdom of Scotland, he gave him Ten Thouſand Marks Sterling, as appears by the Charter which King Richard then made to the King of Scots, whereby he diſcharg'd him of all thoſe Pacts or Agreements which King Henry his Father had extorted from the ſaid King, after his being taken Priſoner: from all which it plainly appears, That there was no Homage due to the King of England for Scotland before that time, as the Reader may find in the Charter it ſelf, as it is recited at large in R. Hoveden.

Anno Dom. MCLXXXIX.

The K. of Scots conducted to K. Richard at Canterbury, and what Homage was paid him there.

What Caſtles the K. thereupon deliver'd up to him.

No Homage due to the K. of England before that time for Scotland.

[1.] The ſame day alſo Hugh Biſhop of Durham, and Hubert Biſhop of Salisbury appeal'd to the Pope before the Cardinal his Legate, againſt the Election of Geoffrey Archbiſhop of York, as did alſo Bucard Treaſurer of that Church, becauſe the Archbiſhop Elect was not only born of a Concubine, but was alſo an Homicide; yet for all theſe Objections, the Cardinal Legate confirm'd his Election.

[1.] Id. ib. b. The Pope appeal'd to, againſt the Election of Geoffrey A. Bp. of York, and why.

But the Cardinal Legate confirm'd the Election.

Then King Richard farther beſtow'd upon his Brother Earl John, as an additional Augmentation of his Honour, the Earldoms of Devonſhire, Dorſet, and Cornwall. So that he had now the Titles and Revenues of no leſs than Six ſeveral Counties; yet would not all this ſatisfy his unbounded Ambition, nor keep him firm to the King his Brother's Intereſt, but he moſt ungratefully rebell'd againſt him, as you will find hereafter.

The King bestows more Honours on his Brother E. John.

But yet they could not fix him to his Intereſt.

The King alſo at the ſame time beſtow'd upon the Queen his Mother, (beſides what had been ſettled upon Her by the King Her late Husband) the ſame Dower or Joynture which Queen Mathilda Wife to Henry I. had before enjoy'd. Thus, as Queen Eleanor lov'd King Richard above all the reſt of her Children, ſo was he not wanting to her in all Filial Duty and Affection.

What the K. gave to his Mother Q. Eleanor.

[2.] Theſe Great Affairs being thus diſpatch'd, Geoffrey Archbiſhop Elect of York having a little before fallen into the King his Brother's diſpleaſure, he not only refus'd to reſtore him the Temporalties of that Archbiſhoprick, but likewiſe ſeiz'd all the Lay-fees or Eſtate which King Henry his Father had given him either on this ſide, or beyond the Sea. And now finding that without Money he could not obtain the King his Brother's favour, he promiſed him Three Thouſand Pounds Sterling, upon which the King reſtor'd him the Archbiſhoprick (i.e. the Temporalties thereof) together with the reſt of his Eſtate in England, beſides the Earldom of the late Earl Giffard in Normandy, and the Honour of Balangy in Aquitain.

But upon the promiſe of 3000 l. Sterling, he reſtores him the Temporalties, &c.

The King alſo at the ſame time for ever diſcharg'd the ſaid Geoffrey and his ſucceſſors, and all their Lands, with thoſe of the Chapter of York, from all Exactions and Grievances of the Foreſts, and gave them free leave and power to Hunt in all their Lands in Nottingham and Yorkſhire.

Anno Dom. MCLXXXIX.

[3.] Then the King leaving Canterbury embark'd at Dover, and pass'd over to Callais on the Eleventh of December, being accompany'd by John the Cardinal Legate, Walter Archbishop of Roüen, Henry Bishop of Bayeux, and John Bishop of Eureux, and other Great Men; and so soon as he landed, Philip Earl of Flanders met and receiv'd him with great Joy, and conducted him into Normandy.

[3.] Id. ib.

[4.] Sometime before he left England, he appointed Hugh Bishop of Durham, and William Bishop of Ely, his chief Justitiaries, and had associated to them Hugh Bardolf, William Earl Mareschal, Geoffrey Fitz-Peter, and William Briwere; but he deliver'd to the Bishop of Ely his Chancellor his Chief, or Great Seal, by which all his Writs or Precepts were to be made in the Kingdom; he deliver'd to him likewise the Custody of the Tower of London, and to the Bishop of Durham the Castle of Windsor, with the Forest and County: But the King was no sooner gone, than his Two Chief Justitiaries fell into Disputes about their Authority; that which pleas'd the one, displeasing the other, as is usual, when great Power is divided into several hands.

[4.] Id. ib. The Bps of Durham and Ely made the K's Chief Justitiaries in his absence.

They fall into disputes about their Powers.

[5.] So soon as the King had resolv'd on this Voyage to the Holy-Land, he sent to Pope Clement and obtain'd his Bull, That all such as would stay at home for the Guard of his Kingdom upon paying money to the King, should be acquitted from the Service of the Cross; by which means he amass'd very great Sums.

[5.] Id p. 375. b. The King obtains the Pope's Bull to excuse those from the Service of the Cross that would pay to the King so much Money.

I shall conclude this Year with an Account of the rest of the Ecclesiastical Affairs that happen'd in it. [1.] Some time before the King's departure, Hugh Bishop of Durham, and Hubert Bishop of Salisbury appeal'd to the Pope against Geoffrey Elect of York, endeavouring to prove his Election void, because they who were to have had the chief Suffrages were not present; and Bucard, Treasurer of the Church of York, and one Henry, Dean of the same, did also Appeal against him, denying his Election to have been Canonical, for that he was a Manslayer, and One begotten in Adultery, and born of an Harlot; but all this came to nothing, for John Cardinal of Anagnia the Pope's Legate, who was lately arriv'd here, confirm'd his Election; and he afterwards obtain'd the Pope's Bull to the same purpose, though he was not Ordain'd Archbishop till some time after.

[1.] Id p. 377. b. Several Prelates protest against the Election of Geoffrey A. Bp. of York.

But to speak further of this Cardinal's Errand into England; the Reader is to understand, [2.] that there had been for several Years before great Quarrels between Baldwin Archbishop of Canterbury and the Prior and Monks of the Monastery of the Holy Trinity, now call'd Christ Church, about the Archbishop's seizing into his hands the Temporal Revenues belonging to the said Abbey, and his building a Chappel and a House of Chanons in the Subburbs of the said City, near St. Stephen's Church; which the Monks fearing lest it should be made the Chapter of the Archbishop, and so in time should rob them of the Right of their Election, they had some years since Appeal'd to the Pope against those Proceedings: and though he sent over several Bulls to the Archbishop on behalf of the Monks, Commanding him to cease from Building and Endowing the said Chapell, and to restore unto the Monks their Lands; notwithstanding all this, the Archbishop was so far from yielding any Obedience thereunto, that having the late King on his side, he had resolv'd to starve the Monks

[2.] C. G. Col. 1520, 1523, &. dein. Great Quarrels between Baldwin A. Bp. of Canterbury and the Monks of the Holy Trinity, about the former's seizing the Temporal Revenues of that Abbey.

The A. Bishop pays no Obedience to the Pope's Bulls, commanding him to restore the Monks their Lands.

Monks to a compliance, by hindering all Provisions from coming to their House from their Farms in the Country: so that the poor Monks being almost starv'd, were fain'd to live upon Alms; yet did not this at all bring down their stomachs, for knowing they had the Pope for their Friend, to whom they had appeal'd, they still held out stoutly against the Archbishop: and so soon as King Richard came to the Crown, they implor'd his Assistance against these violent Proceedings. This is the sum of a long and tedious Relation which Gervase (a Monk of this Church) has given us concerning these Disputes; to whom I refer the Curious Reader for further satisfaction.

Anno Dom. MCLXXXIX.

Who are forced by his means to live upon Alms, or Starve; but they still vigorously hold out against the A. Bp.

[3.] But in the mean time the Pope had sent over John the Cardinal above-mention'd to compose these Differences, who Landing at Dover, while the King was gone into Suffolk on Pilgrimage to St. Edmund's Shrine, Queen Eleanor his Mother (then at Canterbury) immediately sent a Message to the Legate, forbidding him to proceed any further without the King's License, which was done on purpose that so this difference might be concluded without his Interposition; for the King had before Summon'd a Council of the Bishops, Abbots and Great Men of England, to decide this Controversy: where also William King of Scots and his Brother Earl David were present, so that there was never before seen so great a Concourse of People at Canterbury.

[3] Id. ib. The Pope sends a Cardinal over to determine it; but being at Dover, he is forbid to come any further without the K's Leave. A Council of the Kingdom summon'd to end this Controversy.

[4.] So soon as the King arriv'd, this Council began, in which after a long Debate among the Bishops concerning this matter, at last by the Judgment of the King and Bishops, with the Assent of the Archbishop and Monks, the Difference was determined upon these terms, viz. that Roger de Norreis, whom the Archbishop (against the will of the Monks) had made Prior of that Church, should be depos'd, and the New Chappel demolish'd which the Archbishop had built in the Subburbs of Canterbury; and that the Monks should perform their wonted profession of Obedience to the Archbishop as their Predecessors had done; upon which Accord, the King at the request of the Archbishop made the deposed Prior, Abbot of Evesham.

[4] Id. ib. At last by the Judgment of the K and Bps, &c. the Difference was determin'd.

And upon what Terms.

The next day the Archbishop came into the Chapter-house, and restor'd to the Convent their Farms; saying, That he had dismiss'd the Prior from his Office, and for the future would preserve the due Rights of the Monastery: but instead of the Chappel, which was then demolish'd, the Archbishop built another at Lambet (now Lambeth) and endow'd it with those Revenues, which he had intended for his Chappel at Canterbury; but of this Foundation also, those Monks were so Jealous, that some years after they procured a Bull from the Pope to have it dissolv'd, as you will find in due time.

The A. Bp. restores their Farms, and promises to preserve their due Rights. Another Chappel built at Lambeth.

[5.] After this Reconciliation the King sent for Cardinal John the Legate who came to Canterbury, and was receiv'd with solemn Procession, yet he took it ill, that the Agreement had been made between the Archbishop and Monks without him, and would fain have found some occasion to have revived the difference, that so there might have been work for another Appeal; but perceiving the King and the Archbishop with the rest of the Bishops to be all agreed against him, he was obliged to take his leave and depart, after a very few days stay

The Monks grow jealous of it.

Anno Dom. MCLXXXIX. ſtay in England, having firſt waited on the King to Dover, full ſore againſt his will.

And not being able to get another appeal, he takes his Leave, and departs.

I have been the more particular in this Relation, that ſo the Reader may obſerve, how in thoſe days, if the King and the Archbiſhop of Canterbury held but a good correſpondence, all that the Pope's Bulls could do, ſignified little or nothing; for the Legate durſt not then come into England without the King's Licence.

[1.] Id. ib. The A Biſhop puts all Earl John's Territories under Intetdict, becauſe he married a Coſin in the Second degree. Earl John appeals, the Pope's Legate receives it, & ſo his Lands are diſcharg'd from that Sentence.

To conclude this year; it is worth our obſerving, [1.] that before the late Mariage of Earl John with the Daughter of the Earl of Glouceſter, the Archbiſhop of Canterbury forbad the Mariage, becauſe they were Coſins in the Second Degree; but not finding himſelf herein obey'd, he put all the Territories of Earl John under an Interdict notwithſtanding his Appeal to the Pope; againſt which Sentence the Earl complaining to the Biſhops at the late Council at Canterbury, the Pope's Legate received his Appeal, and ſo the Earl's Lands were diſcharged from that Sentence.

[2.] R. H. p. 378. a. A firm Peace eſtabliſh'd between the Ks. of England and France.

[2.] King Richard being now arriv'd in Normandy, kept his Chriſtmaſs at the Town of Buers with the Great Men of that Dutchy; after which Solemnity, He and Philip King of France met, and eſtabliſh'd a firm Peace between themſelves and their Kingdoms, which was put into Writing, and confirm'd by their Oaths and Charters on the Feaſt of St. Hillary (January Thirteenth) and the Archbiſhops and Biſhops in the Word of Truth, with the Earls and Barons of both Kingdoms ſincerely agreed to it, and the Temporal Lords alſo ſwore that they would faithfully maintain that Peace, which was to this effect.

The Articles of Peace.

"That the Two Kings ſhould preſerve each other's Honour, "and keep Faith to one another in defence of their Lives, Limbs, "and Terene Honours, and not be wanting to each other in the "management of their Affairs; but that the King of France ſhould "help the King of England to defend his Territories as if he were "to defend the City of Paris, if it were beſieged; and that King "Richard ſhould defend the King of France's Dominions, as he "would defend Roüen, if that were beſieged. Then the Earls and "Barons of both Kingdoms ſwore, that they would not depart from "their Fealty to their ſeveral Kings, nor make any War or Diſtur"bances within their Dominions, while they were in their Peregri"nation; and the Archbiſhops firmly promiſed, in the Word of Truth, "that they would Anathematize the Tranſgreſſors of this Peace.

"It was likewiſe agreed further, That if either of the Kings dy'd, "the Survivor ſhould have the Money, and Men of the deceas'd, "to carry on the ſervice of God; but becauſe they could not be ready "by the Cloſe or Octaves of Eaſter, they deferr'd their Voyage un"til Midſummer: But the ſudden death of the Queen of France retard"ed that King's departure for ſome longer time.

[3.] Id. ib. K. Richard ſends for his Mother, Siſter, his A. Bp. Bps. and Brother John to come to him into Normandy.

[3.] After Candlemaſs King Richard ſent for Queen Eleanor his Mother, Alice Siſter to Philip King of France, Baldwin Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and Earl John, together with the Biſhops of Norwich, Durham, Wincheſter, Bathe, Ely, Salisbury, and Cheſter, who all paſſed over into Normandy, to wait on the King; and He by their Advice, conſti-constituted William Biſhop of Ely, then Chancellor, his Chief Juſticiary of England: He alſo made his Brothers, John Earl of Moreton, and Geoffrey Elect of York, to take an Oath, that they would not go into England within three Years next following without his Licenſe; yet ſoon after he releaſed his Brother John from his Oath, and gave him leave to return home upon his taking another Oath, that he would faithfully ſerve him in his Abſence; but he was not ſo favourable to his Brother the Archbiſhop. Anno Dom. MCXC.

His Chancellor the Biſhop of Ely made Chief Juſtitiary of England.

His Brothers Earl John, and Geoffrey ſwear, not to go into England in three years without his Leave.

But he releaſed his Brother John from his Oath.

[4.] From Normandy he ſent the Biſhop of Ely his Chancellor into England, to prepare all things neceſſary for his Expedition; and reſolving to exalt him above all degrees of Men in his Kingdom, he ſent to Pope Clement and prevail'd with him to inveſt him with the Legantine Power over all England * and Wales, with that part of Ireland which was then under the Dominion of Earl John the King's Brother, as appears by the Purport of the Pope's Bull cited by [5.] Rad. de Diceto.

[4] Id. ib. The Bp. of Ely comes into England.

The K. writes to the Pope to make him Legate.

* R. Hoveden here adds Scotland, but that is a miſtake.

Then [1.] the Chancellor at his Return encompaſs'd the Tower of London with a deep Ditch, deſigning to have the Thames flow round about it, and alſo took for the King's uſe of every City of England two Palfreys, or Saddle Horſes, and two Sumpters, as an Aid, and the like of every Abbey, one of each ſort, and though for what uſe theſe Horſes were now taken, unleſs for the Chancellor himſelf, I cannot tell, neither does my Author acquaint us.

[1.] R. Id. ib. The Tower of London encompaſs'd with a deep Ditch.

[2.] Not long after the Chancellor's return, the Common People of divers Towns and Cities of England roſe againſt the Jews, not ſo much (as [3.] William of Newburgh well obſerves) out of a zeal for Chriſtianity, as envy of their Riches, and Covetouſneſs to enjoy them; the firſt Diſturbance began at the Town of Lynne, about a Jew who was turn'd Chriſtian, and being therefore perſued by the reſt of his Nation, had taken refuge in a Church, and being there likewiſe aſſaulted, the foreign Mariners belonging to that Port did not only defend the new Convert by repelling the fury of the Jews, but falling upon their Houſes, pillaged and burnt them, murthering the Owners, and when they had done ſo, they carri'd the plunder to their Ships; ſo that when this Tumult came to be examin'd, the People of the Town caſt all the blame upon thoſe ſtrange Mariners who were gone.

[4.] Some time after, another inſult was made upon the Jews at Stamford Fair, which was held in Lent, when the People that came from divers parts envying the Jews, and thinking they ſhould do God good Service in deſtroying thoſe whoſe Goods they coveted, fell upon them and plunder'd their Houſes, killing as many as they could light on, but ſome of them ſaved themſelves in the Caſtle: and when the Rabble had done this miſchief, (being moſt of them Strangers) they march'd off with their Booty.

[4.] Id. ib. c. 8. The next at Stamford-Fair.

[5.] The People of Lincoln, hearing what had been done to the Jews in other places, alſo roſe againſt them of that City, who being already warn'd by the deſtruction of their Country Men in other Places, retired into the Caſtle with their Goods and Families; ſo that only a Few of the poorer ſort ſuffer'd by their Violence: and though there was not much harm done, yet a ſevere Enquiry was made by the King's Officers after the Offenders.

[5.] Id. ib. c. 9. The Third at Lincoln.

[1.] But

Anno Dom. MCXC.

[1.] Id. ib. c 9. But the greateſt of all was at York.

[1.] But the greateſt fury of the Common People againſt the Jews was exerted at York, where neither the King's late prohibition againſt diſturbing them, nor even Common Humanity could reſtrain them; but falling firſt upon the Houſes of Benedict and Joſeus, two of the great Uſurers in England, and whoſe Magnificence, and too great Riches they chiefly envied, (though Benedict, having been baptized againſt his will after he was cruelly beaten and wounded at the King's Coronation, was lately dead) the Rabble not only pillaged and burnt thoſe Houſes, but alſo thoſe of all the reſt of the Jews in that City, though Owners moſt of them eſcaped their fury by getting into the Caſtle, carrying moſt of their beſt Goods and Money along with them by the Conſtables connivance; and He happening to go out of the Caſtle about ſome buſineſs, was ſhut out by thoſe Jews that were within, fearing leſt by ſome means or other he might be ſet againſt them, and they could not be prevail'd on to re-admit him.

Their Houſes pillaged and burnt, but the Owners of them get into the Caſtle.

[2.] Id. ib. * Præſes Provinciæ

[2.] In the mean time the * High-Sheriff of the County coming thither, was highly incenſed againſt them, for thus detaining the Caſtle, and having demanded it, and they refuſing to deliver it, thereupon the Citizens and Strangers who came to the County-Court, at the Command of the Sheriff, made an Aſſault upon them, which continued Night and Day; ſo that at laſt the Jews offered a great Sum of Money for Liberty to be gone, but the People would not accept it; and therefore when the Jews ſaw their caſe thus deſperate, the greateſt part of them by the perſwaſion of an antient Rabin, (who aſſerted ſelf murther in this caſe to be Lawful) agreed to cut one another's Throats, rather than dye by the hands of the Uncircumcized Chriſtians, which they perform'd with a moſt deſperate Reſolution, having firſt ſet the Caſtle on Fire.

And ſhut themſelves up in it, refuſing to deliver it upon demand of the High-Sheriff.

[3.] Sometime after Eaſter the Biſhop of Ely, now Juſtitiary and Chancellor, came to York with a great and powerful Army, to ſeize thoſe Malefactors who had deſtroyed the Jews, and knowing it was done by the Command (or permiſſion at leſt) of the Sheriff and Conſtable, he diſplaced both of them, and took of the Citizens an Hundred Pledges or Sureties, for their keeping Fidelity and Peace to the King and Kingdom, and for their ſtanding to the Law in the King's Court concerning theſe Offences. And the Knights or Military Tenants of the County (that is, the Suitors that came to the County-Court,) who refuſed to appear to the * Accuſation, he cauſed to be apprehended.

The Chancellor with a great Army comes to York, and diſplaces the Sheriff and Conſtable of the Caſtle.

* Qui ad Reſtum noluerunt venire.

I have have been the more particular in Relating theſe Tumults, that ſo the Reader may ſee, how highly the People were now incenſed againſt the Jews for their Uſury and Extortion, albeit they were maintained and protected by the Government to Peel the People, that ſo they themſelves might be ſqueez'd, and their Riches taken from them whenever the King had occaſion; and likewiſe that he may obſerve how Violent the Common People (or Mob as we now call them) have been in former Ages againſt thoſe whoſe Religion they had in abhorrence, and therefore were reſolutely bent to deſpoil them of their goods.

[4.] Not

[4.] Not long after this Hugh de Puſats or Pudſey, Biſhop of Durham, by the King's permiſſion, returned into England, and meeting the Chancellor at Blithe in Nottinghamſhire, he there delivered to him the King's Letters Patents, by which he had made the ſaid Hugh Juſtitiary from the River Humber unto the Confines of Scotland. The Chancellor told him he was ready to obey the King's Commands, and carried him with him as a Priſoner to Southwell in the ſame County, and kept him there, until he had delivered up Windſor Caſtle and the reſt of the ſtrong Places of which the King had given him the Cuſtody. And he was alſo fain to deliver his Son Henry de Pudſey and Gilbert de Lacy as Pledges for his Faith to the King and Kingdom. So ſoon as the Biſhop was ſet free, he went to his Town of Hovedene, where he had not been many days, before there came Robert Longchamp, Brother to the Chancellor, and William de Stuteville with ſeveral armed Men, and would have carried him away by the Chancellor's Order; but he gave them ſecurity that he would not ſtir from thence without leave either of the King or Chancellor. Upon this the Biſhop preſently ſent Meſſengers to acquaint the King with what the Chancellor had done; but it ſeems they did not overtake him till he came to Marſeilles, and there being inform'd of the Injuries done to the Biſhop by the Chancellor, he ſent a Precept for the delivery and free poſſeſſion of the Earldom of Northumberland, and Mannor of Sadbery, according to the Charter he had lately made him.

Anno Dom. MCXC.

[4] Id. ib. The Biſhop of Durham returns into England, and ſhews the Chancellor that the King had made him his Juſtitiary from Humber to the Confines of Scotland.

He is forced to deliver up Windſor Caſtle, &c. to the chief Juſtitiary.

And give Pledges for his Fidelity to the K. and Kingdom.

Being ſet free, he goes to his Town of Hovedene, but is ill treated there by the Chancellor's Order.

He by Meſſengers informs the K. of it, and is by his Precept reſtor'd to his Poſſeſſions.

Richard of the Deviſes farther adds, That the Chancellor alſo ouſted the Biſhop of Wincheſter of the Cuſtody of that Caſtle, as alſo of the Sheriffdom of Hampſhire; whereupon the whole Kingdom being diſturbed at theſe violent proceedings, the Biſhop of Wincheſter went over to the King to make his complaint, and from him receiv'd Orders to the Chancellor to have Right done him, which were obey'd accordingly upon his Return: and though the Biſhop of Durham had the like for his Earldom, yet the Chancellor pretending he had receiv'd other Inſtructions, refus'd to obey them, which is particularly related by the ſame Author, viz. That the Chancellor meeting the Biſhop at Lincoln, the Biſhop ſhew'd him the King's Letters, and demanded Reſtitution of his Right; upon which the Chancellor deſir'd a week's time to give him a poſitive Anſwer, and appointed him to come to the Caſtle of Tikehill to receive it: when he came thither, and had left his Attendants without the Gates, the Chancellor ſhew'd him ſome Letters from the King of a later date, which contradicted the former; and farther told him, That it was now his turn to ſpeak; and, that the King was alive, and well, and therefore the Biſhop ſhould not go out from thence, before he had given Pledges to deliver up to him all the King's Caſtles which he had then in his keeping: So there being no contradicting or reſiſting ſo great a Power, the Biſhop was forc'd to give Pledges to ſurrender up thoſe Caſtles accordingly.

The Chancellor ouſted the Bp. of Wincheſter of that Caſtle, and the Sheriffdom of Hampſhire.

Who upon Complaint to the King, obtains Orders to have Right done him.

The Chancellor refuſes to obey the Orders in behalf of the Bp. of Durham.

And ſhews Letters from the K. of a later date to countermand the former.

Theſe Tranſactions (though happening ſome time after the King's departure) I have here put together, that I might not break the thread of the Narration concerning the King's paſſage through France.

Maritime Laws made for preventing of Quarrels, and preſerving Peace and Amity in the Fleet.

[1.] Theſe Admirals, or Conſtables (as our Hiſtorian calls them) being thus appointed, the King by the Advice of his Noble and Diſcreet men made divers notable Maritime Laws or Orders to prevent all Quarrels and Miſchiefs, and preſerve Peace and Amity in the Navy, which were to this effect: That if any one kill'd a Man in a Ship, he was to be bound to the Dead Man, and to be flung into the Sea. If any one was convicted by Lawful Witneſſes that he drew his Dagger or Knife to hurt another, or draw Blood, he was to looſe his Hand. If any one ſtruck another with his open Hand without effuſion of Blood, he was to be Duck'd thrice over Head and Ears in the Sea. If any one gave his Companion opprobrious Language, ſo often as he did it, he was to give him ſo many Ounces of Silver. If a Man Stole any thing, his Head was to be ſhaved, and boyling Pitch poured upon it, and Feathers ſtuck in it, that ſo he might be known, and the firſt Land the Ship touch'd at, he was to be thrown out of it. This Edict is by way of Charter, but in another Edict or Writ he Commanded, that all Perſons in his Fleet ſhould obey the Commands and Orders of the Officers he had appointed. Theſe Laws are the more remarkable, as being the moſt antient I can find to have been made by any Engliſh King concerning Maritime Diſcipline.

[2.] Id. ib. King Richard receives the Scrip and Staff of Pilgrimage, and then marches forwards to Lyons, where they part companies.

[2.] From Chinon he went to Tours, and there received his Pilgrim's Staff from the hands of the Archbiſhop of that Place, (a Ceremony then thought neceſſary for ſo Holy an Undertaking) and from thence he paſſed on to Vezely, where he met the King of France; and after two days ſtay there, they both left that Place on the firſt of July, and ſo went forwards to Lyons, and paſſing the Bridg over the River Rhoſne, it brake ſo ſoon as ever both Kings were got over by reaſon of the great number of followers; ſo both Men and Horſes falling down into that rapid ſtream, ſeveral of them were drowned. The two Princes being much concern'd at this ſad Accident, to avoid ſuch diſorders as are often cauſed by vaſt multitudes marching together, they reſolved to part for the preſent; So the King of France travell'd by the way of Genoa, and the King of England by that of Marſeilles; to which Place Baldwin Archbiſhop of Canterbury, Hubert Biſhop of Salisbury, and Ranulph de Glanville, late Juſtitiary of England, attended the King; where preſently going on Shipboard, they had a proſperous Voyage to Acon: but not long before John Biſhop of Norwich, who had alſo undertaken this Cruſado, repenting of his Vow, went to the Pope, and being by him abſolved from it, had leave to return home; But as ſoon as the King had intelligence of it, he demanded a Thouſand Marks of him for his compoſition, to be freed from his promiſe of undertaking the Cruſado, according to the Power the Pope had given him, of receiving the compoſitions of thoſe who deſired to be diſpenſed from it.

Who attended him to Marſeilles to go for the Holy Land.

[3.] The King being now at Marſeilles, ſtay'd there Eight days in expectation of his Fleet, which under the Command of his Admirals, Richard de Camville and William de Forz had been appointed to meet him there, but part of his Fleet having been driven into the River of Lisbon, and the reſt into other Parts of Portugal by a great Storm, they were there for ſome time detained by the Entreaties of King Sancho, who was then hardly beſet by Boiac, the Miramolin or Saracen Emperor of Spain and Morocco: wherefore the King ſent to the Engliſh Ships for their Aſſiſtance, which preſently lending him Five Hundred brave Men, they march'd up into the Country to relieve a Caſtle call'd St. Herena, which was at that time beſieg'd by the Moors; but ſo ſoon as the Engliſh came thither, they received News of the ſudden death of the Mooriſh Emperor, and of the Retreat of his Army: whereupon the Men return'd to their Ships, very well ſatisfied and rewarded for their Pains.

[4.] Id. ib. The whole Fleet ſail to Marſeilles, but miſſing the K. go on for Meſſina.

For the King having ſtay'd in expectation of his Fleet Eight days at Marſeilles, and not knowing what was become of it, began to be out of patience, and ſo hired Ten great Buſſes, and Twenty Galleys, and in them Shipped off as many of his Men as he could, and then ſetting Sail he ſoon arriv'd at Naples, where going on ſhore, and ſending his Ships to Sicily, he went by Land to Salerno, where he ſtayed for ſome time, till he heard of the arrival of his whole Fleet at Meſſina, [1.] (which came thither on the Fourteenth of September) Upon this News he went by Land to the Priory of Labanarie, ſeated on the fartheſt Point of Italy, where he paſſed over the Streight called Faro de Meſſina, and arrived at that City on the Twenty Second of the ſame Month, attended by a great many Ships and Gallies, that were ſent out to receive him; ſo he entred the Port with a Magnificent Naval Pomp. The King of France (who was arrived there ſome time before) and his Nobles with the Chief Men of the City ſtood on the ſhore expecting his Landing, and as ſoon as he arrived, he was congratulated by that King, with whom he had a private Conference, and who that very day went on board his Fleet in order to Sail for the Holy-Land; but the Wind being contrary, forced him to ſtay there for ſome days; during which time the Two Kings often viſited each other with all the outward Demonſtrations of Amity imaginable.

[1.] Id. ib. The K. at Meſſina meets his Fleet, as alſo the King of France.

[2.] Then King Richard ſent and demanded of Tancred King of Sicily, to return him his Siſter Queen Joan, Widow of the late King William, who was then kept like a Priſoner; whereupon Tancred, not daring to refuſe it, ſent her from Palermo to Meſſina by Sea, and King Richard went out in Perſon to meet her at her Landing.

[3] Id. ib. The Citizens of Meſſina Jealous of the K. and why.

[3.] Then the day following the King ſeized the Monaſtery of the Griffons, being a ſtrong place ſeated on a Rock in the midſt of the Streight between Meſſina and Calabria, and driving out the Monks put a Gariſon into it, and made it a Magazine for the Proviſions that he had brought in his Fleet: but when the Citizens ſaw this, and that he had alſo put his Siſter into the ſtrong Caſtle called la Baniare lying on the other ſide of the Faro or Streight of Meſſina with a ſufficient Guard, they grew very ſuſpicious of the King, leſt he ſhould alſo ſeize on the whole Iſland; and this diſcontent was much increaſed the next day, when there aroſe a great Quarrel between the King's Souldiers and the Townſmen, who were a mungrel Race between the Lombards, and Saracens, and are [4.] by Geoffrey Winſaulf called the Griffons; but this Quarrel (as this Author relates) began upon no greater provocation, than the taking of a Loaf by one of the King's Souldiers from a Market-woman, at a leſs Price than ſhe was willing to ſell it for; who thereupon crying out, and calling in the Mob, or vulgar Townſmen, to her Aſſiſtance, they not onely cruelly beat and almoſt killed this Souldier, but falling upon the Reſt of the King's men, began to treat them in the ſame manner: ſo that theſe being forced to defend themſelves, there began a moſt cruel Conflict between them, which came to that Heighth, that the Kings of France and England being then in a Treaty of Peace, the Latter was fain to break off, and draw out his Men, and preſently march to the Aſſiſtance of the Reſt; who being now joyn'd, fell upon the Townſmen, and not only repuls'd them, and routed thoſe that reſiſted them, (though underhand ſupported by the French;) but the King alſo enter'd and took the City, notwithſtanding all the oppoſition could be made againſt his Forces.

[4] Id. ib. Which had like to have occaſion'd a Breach between the Two Kings.

The Taking of this Place had like to have occaſion'd a Breach between the Two Kings; for Philip envying Richard's ſucceſs when he ſaw the City was taken, would have had the Engliſh Banners pull'd down from the Walls, and his own ſet up in their ſteads, eſpecially in that part of the City which he had taken up for his own Quarters; [5.] but King Richard refuſing ſo to do, it produced very angry words between them: Yet at length, through the Mediation of the Great Men on both ſides, the Quarrel was for the preſent made up, and the King of France his Men were to have the Guard of ſome of the Towers, upon which his Enſigns were alſo ſet up, until ſuch time as the Reſolutions of King Tancred could be known.

[5] G. V. It. R. R. But it was made up by the Mediation of ſome Great Men.

[1.] Roger Hoveden differs ſomewhat from Geoffrey Vinſaulf's Account of this Tranſaction, and ſays, That to give the King of France ſome ſatisfaction, King Richard order'd his Enſigns to be taken down from the Walls, and then deliver'd the Cuſtody of the City to the Knights-Hoſpitallers, and Templars, until all things that he requir'd from the King of Sicily were perform'd: But indeed there was ſome Reaſon why the King of France ſhould be diſpleaſed that King Richard ſhould thus mount his Enſigns on the Walls, ſince the Former having a Part of the City aſſign'd to him and his Retinue for their Quarters, it ſeem'd too great an Aſſuming in the Latter to challenge the whole as his own ſingle Dominion.

The Cuſtody of the City deliver'd to the Knights-Hoſpitallers and Templars, till K. Richard's demands were ſatisfied.

[2.] But

Anno Dom. MCXC.

[2] But this Difference being for the preſent made up, on the Eighth of October the Two Kings, in the preſence of their Earls and Barons, with their Clergy and People, again renew'd their former Oaths of Confederacy, that each of them as well in the Pilgrimage as in their Return from thence, ſhould Faithfully defend each other and their Armies; and then all the Earls and Barons ſwore likewiſe, that they would obſerve the ſame Conditions: Upon this the Kings, by the Conſent and Advice of the Commanders and Officers of both Armies, ordain'd certain Rules, or Laws, concerning what Share of their Goods, the Pilgrims who ſhould die in this Expedition might diſpoſe of, for they were to remit nothing home: So at laſt one half of all ſuch Goods were to be deliver'd into the hands of Walter Archbiſhop of Roüen, with the other Biſhops and Noblemen there named; for the Succor of the Holy Land.

[2] Id. ib.

The Two Ks renew their former Oaths of Confederacy.

[3.] After this, by the conſent of both thoſe Princes, Ambaſſadors were ſent to King Tancred, to demand ſatisfaction of him for the Injuries which had been done to their Subjects; and beſides, King Richard had further Demands to make on the behalf of his Siſter Queen Joan; for Tancred, Baſtard-Brother, and Succeſſor to the late King, then with-held her Dower, and detain'd from her the Perſonal Eſtate belonging to her.

[3] Id. ib. G. V. It. R. R. L. 2. c 17, 18.

Ambaſſadors ſent to K Tancred to demand Satisfaction for Injuries done.

At length, after divers Conferences about it, Tancred agreed to pay King Richard Twenty Thouſand Ounces of Gold in Lieu of his Siſter's Dower, and Twenty Thouſand more in conſideration of a Mariage to be contracted between Arthur Duke of Bretaigne, King Richard's Nephew, and Tancred's Daughter: Alſo upon ſealing the Charter of Peace between them, King Tancred paid him Twenty Thouſand Ounces of Gold more, to be free from all other Demands concerning the Plate, and other Rich Moveables belonging to the late King, as appears by King Richard's Charter to Tancred, which is at large in [4.] Roger Hoveden.

What Tancred gave King Richard on Sealing the Charter of Peace.

Then the Earls, Barons and Biſhops of each King ſwore on the behalf of their reſpective Maſters, that they ſhould truly obſerve the Peace now made; and that whoſoever of them firſt broke it, the Great Men belonging to that Prince ſhould immediately deliver themſelves up Priſoners to the other, if they were ſo required.

The Earls and Barons of each King take an Oath on the behalf of their reſpective Maſters.

[5.] And King Richard the better to aſſure Tancred of the Sincerity of his Intentions, as to whatever he had promiſed, then wrote Letters to the Pope, wherein he gave him a full Account of this Agreement, deſiring his Holineſs's Confirmation of the ſaid Contract of Mariage, and that he would be his Guarrantee for the performance of it; in which Letter he alſo declares his Nephew Duke Arthur his Heir, in caſe he himſelf ſhould dye without Iſſue; as may be ſeen in the Epiſtle it ſelf recited at large in the ſame Author.

King Richard gives the Pope an Account of his Agreement with Tancred.

King Richard writes to the Pope to confirm the Contract of Mariage between his Nephew Arthur, and Tancred's Daughter.

[1.] Our Author likewiſe tells us, that King Richard had before demanded of Tancred a Golden Table Twelve Foot long, with a great deal of Plate and other Rich Moveables, all which he claim'd to be due to him as Heir to his Father King Henry, to whom the late King William had bequeath'd them on his Death-bed; he alſo demanded on the behalf of his Siſter a Gold Chair with ſeveral Lands and Territories for her Jointure: but at laſt all theſe Rich moveables were releaſed upon payment of the Sixty Thouſand Ounces of Gold

[2.] Id. ib. p. 390. b. The Deaths of ſeveral Great Perſons in their Pilgrimage to the Holy-Land.

I can find nothing elſe worth noting to have happen'd this Year in Relation to our Engliſh Affairs; [2.] but the Deaths of divers Perſons of great Quality in their Pilgrimage to the Holy-Land; ſuch as were Robert Earl of Leiceſter, who died in Romania in his Journey thither; as likewiſe Ranulph de Glanville the late Juſtitiary, and Baldwin Archbiſhop of Canterbury, who both deceaſed near Acon during the Seige there; beſides a great many other Princes, Biſhops, and Noblemen of Foreign Countries, whoſe Names our Author hath left us, but which are needleſs to be recited here; who all died during the tedious Siege of that Place.

Anno Dom. MCXCI.

[3.] King Richard continuing ſtill at Meſſina, there kept a Magnificent Chriſtmaſs in the wooden Fort or Caſtle called Mate Griffon, (i.e. a Match for the Griffons,) which he had lately built for his own Security; and thither he invited the King of France with all his Nobles to a very ſplendid Entertainment, where he gave the French King many Rich preſents; and our Author relates him to be ſo Liberal, that he gave away more in one month than his Predeceſſors had done in a whole Year. But to return to more ſerious matters.

[3] G. V. b. R R. l. 2. c. 24. He invites the K of France to a ſplendid Entertainment at Meſſina, and makes him mighty Rich Preſents.

[4.] Not long after this Feſtival, there was a ſolemn Enterview between the Kings of England and Sicily at the City of Catanea, where they took their leaves of each other with Extraordinary tokens of Honour and Reſpect; and from that time forward there was a firm Peace maintain'd between the King's Subjects and the Citizens of Meſſina, ſo long as he continued there. Geoffrey Winſaulf makes this Enterview to have been before Chriſtmaſs, though I rather chuſe to follow R. Hoveden, who places it ſometime after.

[4] Id. cap. 22. R. H. p. 391. b. The Kings of England and Sicily at an Enterview ſolemnly take leave of one another.

[5.] But I cannot here omit what the laſt Author alſo relates, concerning the Treachery of Philip King of France, which (if true) would derogate very much from the Honour of that Prince, to whom the French give the Sirname of Auguſtus; it was thus. Tancred, as he brought back King Richard on his way towards Meſſina, before they parted, ſhewed him a Letter, which he ſaid he had received from the King of France by the Duke of Burgundy; in which he declared, That the King of England was a Traytor, and would not keep the Peace he had made with him; and that if he would ſet upon him by Night, he would aſſiſt him with his Forces to deſtroy that Prince with all his Army; To whom King Richard reply'd, "That he "never had been nor would be a Traytor; and for the Agreement "he had made with him, he would obſerve it ſo long as he liv'd, "and that he could not eaſily believe the King of France would "ſend him ſuch a Letter. To whom Tancred anſwer'd, That if the Duke of Burgundy ſhould deny that he gave him thoſe Letters as from the King of France, he was ready to diſprove him by one of his own Dukes; whereupon Richard, at his Return to Meſſina, preſently appeared very ſtrange and reſerved towards the King of France, who enquiring into the Reaſon of it, the King ſent him word by the Earl of of Flanders, that he had receiv'd ſuch a Letter with the contents of it; and gave it to the Earl to peruſe, and then deſired him to ſhew it to King Philip, which he did: whereupon the King of France was ſtruck ſilent for a while; but at laſt recovering himſelf, ſaid, That this Letter was only a Trick of King Richard's to get rid of his Siſter Alice (whom he had ſworn to marry) and then threatned, That if ever he left her and married another Woman, he would be his Enemy as long as he lived.

Anno Dom. MCXCI.

And ſends the E. of Flanders to the King of France to acquaint him with the Contents of the Letter.

How he gets off it, and threatens K. Richard, if he marries not his Siſter Alice.

Yet upon the whole, this I think may be ſaid in behalf of both theſe Princes, that they ſeem to be perſons of too great Honour, the One to write ſuch a Letter, or the Other to forget it; and that the cunning Sicilian uſed this Stratagem to work them up to a hatred and diſtruſt of each other, that ſo they might not combine together to do him any prejudice. But be this as it will.

This was ſuppoſed but a Stratagem of the Sicilian Prince.

[1.] The King of England return'd in anſwer to King Philip's Threats, That he could by no means make that Lady his Wife, becauſe his Father had already layn with, and begotten a Son of her, and offer'd to prove it by good Witneſſes: Whereupon, the matter of Fact appearing to the King of France to be ſo, there was, by the Advice of the Earl of Flanders and Others of his Great Men, a Compoſition made between them on theſe Terms, (viz.) the King of France was to acquit him of the Oath and Agreement he had made concerning his Siſter Alice; and on this conſideration King Richard was to pay him for Five years next enſuing the Sum of Twenty Thouſand Marks, whereof he then paid Two Thouſand in hand, and was beſides to deliver up Giſors and what elſe the King of France had given him on Account of that intended Mariage; and upon this he was at Liberty to marry whom he pleaſed: And the Agreement further was, That by his Charter the King of France granted that the Dutchy of Bretaigne ſhould for ever belong to the Dominion of the Duke of Normandy, and that the Duke of Bretaigne ſhould always be his * Feudatary for it, and ſhould perform all things to him as to his Liege Lord; but that the Duke of Normandy ſhould anſwer to the King of France for both Dukedoms.

[1.] Id. ib. K. Richard offers to prove that ſhe had had a Child by his Father, and therefore he could not make her his Wife.

The Two Ks. come to a Compoſition.

The Dutchy of Bretaigne to belong to the Dominion of the Duke of Normandy.

And the Duke of Normandy to anſwer to the K. of France for both Dukedoms.

And thus for the preſent they were outwardly made friends, and the Agreement was confirm'd by their mutual Oaths and Seals, with the Addition of many Witneſſes. But notwithſtanding all this, King Tancred's late Information bred ſuch a Diſtruſt and Jealouſy between theſe Two Princes, that they were no more to be reconciled; the King of France ever after endeavouring to do King Richard all the miſchief he could, as will be further ſeen in the ſequel of this Hiſtory.

The Agreement confirm'd by their mutual Oaths and Seals, and many Witneſſes to them.

[2.] All things being thus agreed, in the Month of February following, King Richard ſent his Galleys from Meſſina to Naples, to fetch his Mother Queen Eleanor and the Lady Berengera, Daughter to Sanctio King of Navarre, whom he intended to marry: It ſeems they had come through France and Italy to Naples by Land, and had been in all Places received with great Honour by the Subjects of King Tancred.

But

Anno Dom. MCXCI.

But before I conclude the Relation of what had happened at Meſſina, ſhall mention an Accident, which though of no very great moment in it ſelf, yet ſince it gives us ſome clearer knowledge of this King's Temper, methinks deſerves a little of our Obſervation.

[3.] Id. p. 391. a.

[3.] It happened that King Richard having ſpent the Holy-day (by us called Candlemaſs-day) very pleaſantly with ſome of King Philip's Officers, they rode out towards Evening to divert themſelves without the Town, and in their way met a Peaſant driving an Aſs that was loaden with Canes, which they ſoon eaſed the Beaſt of, and began to throw them at each other in ſport, therein imitating the Moors, who mightily uſe this Recreation: but this Jeſting did not end till it came to Earneſt; for King Richard having choſen one William de Barres, a French Knight, of great Valour and Strength, for his Antagoniſt, he ſo roughly encounter'd the King, that he tore his Cloaths; which provok'd him to that degree, that preſently clapping Spurrs to his Horſe, he ran with ſuch Violence againſt him, as made him ſtagger in his Saddle; but he not falling, the King redoubled his Blow, the force of which made the Saddle of his own Horſe to turn round, inſomuch that he was immediately obliged to leap off, and mount a freſh one; but the obſtinate Reſiſtance of De Barres ſtill more and more inflam'd the King, who ſtrove all he could to make him quit his Stirrups, though he was not able to gain his Point, I mean, to diſmount his Antagoniſt, who ought to have had ſo much complaiſance for a King, as to ſuffer himſelf to be diſmounted by him: However he ſhew'd a particular Generoſity in this, that he would not permit the Earl of Leiceſter to meddle in the Fray, though he offer'd to come in to his Aſſiſtance. The King perceiving he was not able to get the better of him, was ſo enraged, that had he not had recourſe to ſome remains of Reaſon left in him, he would certainly in the Heat of his Tranſport have done him ſome miſchief: but to prevent that, he made uſe of his Royal Authority, and all on the ſudden ſaid, Go, retire, and take care never to appear before me, for I will never pardon you, and you and I muſt be eternal Enemies for the future. Whereupon De Barres beginning to recollect, that he with whom he had thus engaged, was not his Equal, but a King, yielded to his Command; and bowing, immediately retir'd to relate this Adventure to his Maſter King Philip; who being very much concern'd at it, went the next day to King Richard to deſire pardon for him, ſuppoſing that by that time the King's Paſſion might be abated; when, contrary to his Expectation, he would not, for all the Entreaties he could uſe, be reconciled to De Barres, or grant him his Pardon, unleſs he would come and caſt himſelf at his Feet, and confeſs his Fault; which the Knight being too ſtout to ſubmit to, the King of France was forced for a time to diſmiſs that gallant Man his Service, becauſe he would not diſpleaſe King Richard.

The brisk Encounter on Horſeback between King Richard and Wm. de Barres a French Kt.

The K. in a paſſion forbids de Barres ever to ſee him more.

The King of France comes and begs pardon for the Raſhneſs of his Knt. but could not obtain it.

K. Philip forced for a time to diſmiſs him his Service.

This Story lets us ſee, that as the King had the Courage, ſo he had likewiſe ſomewhat in him of the fierceneſs of that Beaſt, from whence he afterwards obtain'd the Sirname of Cœur de Lyon.

But

But it is now Time to look back to England, and see what hath been transacted there during the King's Absence; where it seems [4.] had happen'd a great Dissention between the Bishop of Ely, Chief Justitiary and Chancellor, and Earl John the King's Brother, and the other Great Men of the Kingdom, which grew to such an Heighth, that they all wrote to the King concerning the sad State of the Realm, and the Grievances the People sustain'd by the Chancellor's Arbitrary Government; who despising all those whom the King had left to be his Copartners, would allow no Man, no, not so much as the King's Brother, to be his Equal; but oppressed the People of England with cruel Exactions, and took both from the Clergy and Laiety their Churches, Lands, and Possessions as he pleased, challenging to himself all Rights and Prerogatives appertaining to the King.

Anno Dom. MCXCI.

[4] Id. ib. 387. b. W. N.

Great Dissention during the King's absence from England between his Chief Justitiary and Earl John, &c.

The Bp. of Ely rules by an arbitrary Power, not suffering so much as Earl John to be his Equal.

And whenever this Bishop travelled, it was with such Pomp of Attendants, and such a Superfluity of Horses, Dogs, and Hawks, that if in his Progress he happen'd to stay longer than one Night at any Bishop's See, Abbey, or other Religious House, they were not able to recover themselves again in Three Years. Such was the State of Affairs in this Kingdom soon after the King's departure the last Year, and they still grew worse and worse, till he now receiv'd Letters [5.] out of England, which gave him a large and full Account of the lamentable State of his Kingdom, and the great Grievances the People sustain'd by the Chancellor's evil Government; who upon the receipt of these Letters presently sent from Messina, Walter Archbishop of Roüen, and William the Mareschal, Earl of Striguil, Commanding his Chancellor, That all things relating to the Kingdom should be transacted by the Advice and Assistance of the Archbishop of Roüen, and the joynt Advice and Direction of William the Mareschal, Geoffrey Fitz-Peter, Hugh Bardolph and William Briwere.

The extravagant Pomp of his travelling.

King Richard sends Walter A Bp. of Roüen, and Wm. Earl of Striguil with Letters to the Chancellor, that they and others should be joyn'd in the Administration of the Government.

You may find in * Rad. de Diceto, that the King's Order was much more expres; for therein he ordained, that if his Chancellor did not faithfully manage the Affairs of the Kingdom according to the Advice of the Parties above-mention'd, they might then act without him, and dispose of all things relating to publick Affairs, as also to his Castles and Escheats, and that without any delay; and that thereupon Walter Archbishop of Roüen returning into England about the end of April, brought along with him the King's Letters directed to William Bishop of Ely his Chancellor, and Geoffrey Fitz-Peter and the other Noblemen above-mention'd; wherein he orders them to act nothing without the Advice of Walter Archbishop of Roüen, whom he had sent over to them for the better defence of the Kingdom: Therefore what was done afterwards by Earl John and the said Archbishop in rising against, and deposing the Chancellor from his Office, as you will find anon, was not done (as * Dr. Brady would have it) by the fury of a Traiterous Faction, but by the King's own Authority, and in persuance of his Commission against a Man, who (as R. Hoveden tells us) kept the whole Kingdom in such Awe, that when the Archbishop and Earl arrived here, they durst not deliver him the King's Letters, for he despised his Mandates, and would admit of no Equal in the Government of the Kingdom.

But it is time to look back to the Affairs in Sicily, where (as the [1.] French Hiſtorians relate) the Spring being now come, King Philip was eager to ſet Sail for the Holy-Land, and earneſtly preſs'd King Richard to accompany him, who ſtill put it off as long as he could; and the reaſon they aſſign for his ſo doing, is, that he ſtay'd behind to aſſiſt Tancred againſt the Emperor Henry his Competitor: But this is not at all likely, ſince I cannot find the Emperor had at that time begun any War with Tancred: but the Truth is, the King had hitherto ſtay'd in expectation of his Spouſe, who was but juſt then arrived; He was alſo forced to new rig and careen all his Fleet, which was very much worm-eaten in thoſe Seas; beſides, he had built many new ones for his intended Voyage, and thoſe were not yet ready. But to proceed in our Hiſtory.

[1.] Belforeſt, p. 563. a. K. Philip earneſtly preſſes the K. of England to go along with him to the Holy-Land, but he puts it off, and for what Reaſons.

[2.] The King having (as you have heard ſome time before) ſent his Galleys to fetch his Mother and his Spouſe Berengera from Naples, they both ſafely arrived at Meſſina on Saturday after Lady-day, and were received by King Richard with great Joy and Complaiſance; for that young Princeſs being very Beautiful, and of an excellent Diſpoſition, he had been in Love with her before he was King.

[3.] Immediately after their Arrival, the King of France departed from Meſſina, being attended by King Richard to the Sea-ſide, where he embarked with all his Army, and in Two and Twenty days got as far as Acon, a City in Paleſtine, antiently call'd Ptolemais, from Ptolomy King of Egypt, its Founder.

[4] Id. ib. King Richard ſends to the Pope to confirm and conſecrate his Brother Geoffrey A. Bp. of York.

[4.] Within Four days after King Philip's departure, Queen Eleanor alſo took her Leave of the King her Son, in order to go for England, by the way of Rome; and by her the King ſent to the Pope, humbly requeſting of him, that he would confirm the Election of his Brother Geoffrey, and conſecrate him Archbiſhop of York, or permit it to be done by ſome other perſon; the reaſon of which, I ſuppoſe, was, becauſe he would thereby avoid the old Controverſy that was again revived by the Archbiſhop of Canterbury's late Appeal concerning the new Archbiſhop's making profeſſion of Obedience to him.

[5.] After the Departure of Queen Eleanor, the Lady Berengera remain'd in the Company of Queen Joan, Dowager of Sicily; but the Princeſs was not married to King Richard till his Arrival in the Iſle of Cyprus, in the Month of April, as you will find anon. But to proceed to other Affairs.

[1.] Id. 392. b. Pope Clement the Third dies, and Jacinctus ſucceeds him by the Name of Caleſtine III.

Whilſt the King continued at Meſſina, [1.] Pope Clement the Third deceaſed, to whom ſucceeded Jacinctus, Deacon Cardinal of St. Mary in Coſmedim, and in May following he was conſecrated Pope by the name of Caleſtine the Third; the day after whoſe Conſecration, the Emperor Henry the Sixth, with Conſtantine his Empreſs, arrived at Rome, to be there Crowned by the new Pope, which Ceremony he perform'd in Perſon; and the Manner of it being extraordinary, I ſhall here give it you from our Author R. Hoveden.

He Crowns the Emperor Henry and Conſtantine his Wife in perſon.

The Manner of their Coronation.

The Pope being ſeated on high in his Pontifical Throne, the Emperor and the Empreſs kneeled down before him, and he holding the Imperial Crown between his Feet, therewith firſt put it upon the Emperor's Head, and afterwards upon that of the Empreſs: To which which our Author further adds, That ſo ſoon as the Pope had thus Crown'd the Emperor with his Feet, he with one of them ſtruck off the Crown to the ground, to denote, that as he had beſtow'd the Imperial Crown upon him, ſo he had power alſo of Depoſing him if he thought good. By this we ſee to what a Heighth the Pope's Power was then grown? And though his Predeceſſors not many years before could never be ordain'd till the Emperor had confirm'd the Election, yet he then claim'd to make and depoſe Emperors at his pleaſure. But to return to our Hiſtory.

Anno Dom. MCXCI.

The Pope Crowns the Emperor with his Feet, and afterwards kicks it off his Head to the ground.

I can find nothing elſe remarkable to be perform'd by King Richard during his Stay at Meſſina, [2.] but that famous Law he had made there concerning Shipwrecks; which was to this effect:

[2.] Id. p. 386. b.

That for the Good of his own and his Parent's Souls, every perſon that ſuffer'd Shipwreck, and got ſafe on ſhore, ſhould enjoy all his Goods; but if he died on Shipboard, his Children, or other neareſt Relations, were to have the Goods, according as they could make out their being next of Kin; but if they had no Heirs, nor Near Relations, then the King was to have their Goods. This Conceſſion of Wrecks the King made by way of Charter, dated in October, in the Second Year of his Reign, in the preſence of Walter Archbiſhop of Roüen, and divers other Biſhops; which ſhews, That the Law concerning Shipwrecks was very ſevere, if not cruel, before this King's Conceſſion of them to the Sufferers, or their Relations.

K. Richard's Law that he made at Meſſina concerning Shipwrecks.

[3.] Alſo this Year, (but whither it were done at Meſſina or not, our Author does not mention) the King conferr'd upon his Nephew Otto Duke of Saxony, Son to his Siſter Mathilda, the Earldom of York: But though many Tenants had acknowledged him, and done their Homages and Fealties to him, yet ſeveral refuſed it, ſaying, They could not depart from their Fealty to the King, till they had his conſent by word of mouth: wherefore the King gave the ſaid Duke the Earldom of Poictou in Exchange; but that he ever enjoy'd it, I can no where find.

The K. conferrs on his Nephew Otto the Earldom of York.

Several refuſe to pay Homage and Fealty to him for it.

Whereupon the K. gave him the Earldom of Poictou in Exchange.

[4.] King Richard had been now Six Months at Meſſina, and having made all things ready for his departure, at laſt, about the end of April, he Embark'd, and ſet Sail with his whole Fleet, (conſiſting of One Hundred and Fifty great Ships, and Fifty Three Galleys well arm'd.) On Saturday following there happened a great Storm from the South, which ſeparated the Fleet, and the King with part of it was driven into the Iſle of Crete; from thence he ſailed to Rhodes, and ſtayed there Ten days to refreſh himſelf, (being very much diſcompoſed) and alſo to wait for thoſe other Ships and Galleys he had left behind him, and which he expected would follow him thither: But the great Buſs, which had in her the Queen of Sicily, the Lady Berengera, and many of the King's Servants, with Two other Buſſes, were driven upon the Iſle of Cyprus. After the Storm was over, the King ſent out ſome Galleys to ſeek for the Royal Buſs, and at laſt found it without the Port of Limezun in Cyprus; but the other Two periſh'd at the Entrance into the Port, and with them many Knights and Servants of the King. Upon this Iſaac (or, as others call him, Curſac) then King of Cyprus, who alſo ſtiled himſelf Emperor of Greece, ſeiz'd on all the Goods of the Shipwreck'd Veſſels, and thoſe perſons that eſcap'd he rifled and impriſon'd, and would not per-

[5.] Id. ib. The K. of England hearing where the Buſs & other Ships were gone; went after them with his Fleet, & found them expoſed to the Wind and Sea.

[5.] King Richard receiving Intelligence whither the Buſs and the Other Ships were gone, made what haſt he could after them; and coming to their Aſſiſtance with all the reſt of his Fleet, found the Buſs (as I ſaid before) without the Port, expoſed to the Wind and Seas; for the Queen and Princeſs, and thoſe that attended on them, dur'ſt not go on Shore, becauſe of the Emperor's perfidiouſneſs, and the vile Treatment the Iſlanders had ſhewn to thoſe that had been Shipwreck'd: Whereupon the King ſent to the Emperor, and preſſed him with much Earneſtneſs, (and that more than once,) to releaſe the Priſoners, and reſtore them their Goods; but he ſtill return'd haughty Anſwers, and would not comply with ſo juſt and reaſonable a Requeſt.

He ſends to the Emperor to releaſe his Priſoners, but he will not.

[1.] Id. ib. Ex R. H. 2 c. 32.

[1.] The King being provok'd with theſe Barbarities, preſently call'd for his Arms, and leaping into a Boat, Commanded his Soulders to follow his Example; and meeting in the Port with Five Cyprian Galleys, beſides many ſmall Boats, He either took or put them all to Flight, and was himſelf the firſt that leaped on Shore, notwithſtanding all the Reſiſtance the Emperor and his Forces (who were drawn up there) could poſſibly make; He then and part of his Army being Landed, ſoon utterly routed the Enemy, and took the City of Limezun, or Limiſſo, which was antiently call'd Amathus, and put the Emperor and his Army to Flight, having been vanquiſh'd in another Battle, as alſo in a Skirmiſh the Day following, in which King Richard routed a great part of the Cyprian Army with no more than Fifty Horſe, the Emperor himſelf ſhamefully running away to a Caſtle call'd Nicoſſia.

King Richard takes Limezun by Aſſault, and puts the Emperor and his Army to flight.

[2] R. H. 393. b. King Richard enters the City in Triumph.

[2.] Upon which King Richard made a Triumphant Entry into the City of Limezun, and about Three days after, Guy, King of Jeruſalem, arrived there from the Holy Land to implore the King's Aſſiſtance for the Recovery of his loſt Kingdom, being attended by Geoffrey his Brother, Raymond Prince of Antioch, and Boamond Earl of Tripoly, his Son, with divers other Noblemen, who all did Homage to the King, and ſwore Fealty to him againſt all Men.

The Greek Emperor deſires Peace of K. Richard by his Ambaſſadors, and upon what terms.

[3.] The ſame Day the Greek Emperor ſeeing himſelf without any hopes of Aſſiſtance, ſent Ambaſſadors to the King, deſiring Peace, upon theſe Conditions:

Firſt he proffer'd the King Twenty Thouſand Marks of Gold in compenſation of the Damages that he had ſuſtain'd, with all the Priſoners that had been taken, as alſo their Goods, and that he would accompany the King in Perſon in this Expedition to the Holy Land with Five Hundred Horſe, and as many Foot, all well Armed; and that for the performance of theſe Articles, he would deliver his only Daughter as a Pledge of his Fidelity, together with ſeveral ſtrong Caſtles, into the King's hands, and would ſwear Fealty to him, and ever after hold his Empire of him.

He waits upon him in Perſon, and ſwears Fealty to him.

Theſe Conditions, which were very honourable for the King, being by him accepted, the Emperor thereupon waited on him in Perſon, and there before the King of Jeruſalem, the Prince of Antioch, and the reſt of the Great Noblemen, he ſwore Fealty to the King; as alſo, that he would not leave him till he had perform'd whatever had been thus ſolemnly ſolemnly agreed on between them: Upon which the King was ſo well ſatisfied, that he reſtored to the Emperor all his Rich Tents and Plate which had been taken from him in the laſt Battle, and alſo aſſign'd him a Guard for his Perſon; but it ſeems the very ſame day, He repenting of this Agreement, fled away privately, whilſt his Guards (during the Heat of the Day) were gone to ſleep; and then he ſent the King word, that he would not make Peace with him upon any Terms. The King was not much concern'd at this piece of Treachery, but, like a Wiſe General, He preſently gave part of his Army to King Guy, and to the Prince of Antioch, with ſome others, ordering them to perſue the Emperand take him if they could; he likewiſe divided his Galleys into Two Squadrons, and delivered one half of them to Robert de Torneham, commanding him to take all the Ships and Galleys he could meet with, whilſt the King himſelf ſail'd round the other ſide of the Iſland to do the like: But the Governors of the Cities and Caſtles on the Sea-Coaſts preſently ſurrender'd them up either to the King or Robert de Torneham upon their approach; and the Emperor's Subjects flocked in to the King, and ſubmitted themſelves to him, though he himſelf fled away to the City of Famagoſta, where we ſhall leave him for ſome time.

Anno Dom. MCXCI.

But the ſame day he flies privately away, and ſends the K. word he would not ſtand to the Peace.

The K. perſues him with part of his Army.

But he gets to Famagoſta.

[4.] In the mean while King Richard repos'd himſelf ſome days at Limezun, and that he might at laſt enjoy the Fruits of his Labours, was there married to the Lady Berengera on the Twelfth of May, by Nicholas his Chaplain, with as much Solemnity, as the Shortneſs of the time would permit, all the Biſhops and Great Men who attended him, being preſent at the Nuptials. Then, on the ſame day, he made his Bride to be Solemnly Crowned Queen of England, by John Biſhop of Eureux and ſome other Biſhops, who aſſiſted at the performance of that Ceremony.

King Richard is married to the Lady Berengera.

But I muſt here take notice, that I find ſome ſmall difference between Roger Hoveden and [5.] Geoffrey Vinſaulf, concerning the Manner of the late Enterview between the King and the Greek Emperor; the Former making him to have come to the King, whilſt the Latter ſays, That they met in a great Plain near the City of Limezun, lying between the High-way leading to it and the Sea-ſide, which ſeems the more probable of the two; and he alſo gives us a pompous Deſcription of the Magnificence of the King's Habit, and how bravely he was mounted on a Spaniſh Ginnet, with other particulars of this meeting, too long to be here inſerted. I ſhall only obſerve, that the Author laſt mention'd, gives us an Account why the Emperor broke his Word with the King, which was by reaſon of the Villany of a certain Common Souldier, who ſtealing by Night from the King's Quarters to the Emperor's Camp, in hopes of a Reward, made him believe how King Richard intended that Night to ſet upon him by Surprize, and take him Priſoner; the Emperor too eaſily giving credit to him, in a great Fright ſtole away privately, leaving all his Tents and Baggage behind him, and fled to the City of Famagoſta, as has been already related.

[5.] L. 2. c. 36. Some different Relations about the K's Enterview with the Greek Emperor.

The Emperor upon a falſe ſuggeſtion of a Souldier, flies to Famagoſta, and leaves his Tents and Baggage behind him.

But to give you the reſt of this Tranſaction all together; upon news hereof, King Richard after his Mariage followed him thither by Sea, having in the mean time committed the Conduct of his Army to Guy King of Jeruſalem, who was to march with it to Famagoſta; the King

Anno Dom. MCXCI.

King being arrived there, found the City deſerted by the Emperor, and his Souldiers; who, to avoid the Siege, had fled into certain mountainous and woody Places for their greater ſecurity. King Richard being come before that City with his Galleys, ſtaid there Three days, and from thence march'd to take Nicotia, but in his way thither, he was ſet upon by about Seven Hundred Greeks, that lay in Ambuſh to intercept him, and were commanded by their Emperor in perſon; but He finding he could not break the King's Ranks himſelf, ſhot certain poiſoned Arrows at him, which put King Richard into ſuch a paſſion, that he ſpurred his Horſe with a full Career and Reſolution to run the Emperor through with his Lance; [1.] but he perceiving the Danger, preſently fled himſelf away upon a ſwift Courſer to a Caſtle call'd Candayra; his Forces being routed, and many of his Men taken Priſoners, the King came to Nicotia, which voluntarily ſurrender'd it ſelf, and here he ſtaid ſome time for the Recovery of his Health, which was much impair'd by his late fatigues.

K Richard following him, he retires to the Mountains with his Souldiers for their greater Security.

The K. going to take Nicotia, is aſſaulted in the way by the Greek Emperor.

[1] Id. ib. C 39

But the King puts him to flight, and takes many of his Souldiers Priſoners.

Nicotia ſurrenders to him.

[2.] But while He lay thus indiſpoſed, the King of Jeruſalem having divided King Richard's Army into Three parts, march'd to beſiege Three ſtrong Caſtles of the Emperor's, Two of which were preſently taken; and the Third (call'd Cherimes) being ſtronger than the other two, was inveſted both by Sea and Land; but at laſt the Beſieged, finding no hopes of relief, ſurrender'd it together with the Emperor's only Daughter, and a great deal of Treaſure; the news of which made him almoſt deſperate. Upon this King Guy return'd with the Army to Nicotia, from whence Richard, ſo ſoon as he was recovered, went and beſieged, and took another ſtrong Caſtle called Bufferentum, which was till then thought impregnable.

[2] Id. ib. Several of the Emperor's Caſtles taken by K. Richard's Army.

Cherimes ſurrendred, and the Emperor's only Daughter.

[3.] When the Emperor ſaw his Daughter and all his ſtrong places thus ſuddenly taken, and that no hopes were left in Reſiſtance, He, (as proud and inſolent Men, when Conquer'd, being always moſt mean and abject) now reſolved ſpeedily to ſubmit himſelf to King Richard's mercy; and having ſent ſome Meſſengers before to mollify his Anger, he himſelf, from his Caſtle of Candayra, came in a mournful Habit, and caſt himſelf down at the King's Feet; who being moved with a tender Compaſſion, preſently raiſed him up, and ſet him by his ſide; and then ordering his Daughter to be brought forth, the Emperor moſt tenderly embraced and kiſs'd her.

[3] Id. ib. c. 40. The Emperor being diſcouraged by theſe Loſſes, ſubmits to the King's Mercy.

Who receives him kindly, and orders his Daughter to be brought to him.

Thus King Richard took the whole Iſland of Cyprus, together with the King, or Emperor, and a vaſt Treaſure in Jewels, ready-mony, plate, and other precious moveables; which being ſo happily diſpatched, He returned to the City of Limezun, where he had left his Queen, and all his Carriage.

The K having taken all Cyprus, with a vaſt Treaſure, returns to Limezun.

[4.] But his affairs now requiring his ſpeedy departure, (the King of France having ſent Meſſengers to haſten him to the Siege of Acon) he then delivered up the Emperour Iſaac, bound in Silver Fetters to the cuſtody of King Guy, who ſent him Priſoner to Tripoly in Syria; for the King having promiſed him upon his ſurrendring himſelf (and at his earneſt deſire) that he ſhould not be put in Irons, the fooliſh Prince had (it ſeems) forgot, that Chains might be made of any other mettle: but for the Princeſs his Daughter, ſhe was committed to the care of Queen Berengera.

[4] Id. ib. Before his Departure, he ſends the Emperor to Tripoly, bound in Silver Fetters.

And commits his Daughter to the Care of Q. Berengera.

Then

Then the King put the Government of the Iſland of Cyprus into the hands of Richard de Camville and Robert he Torneham, who ſtaying behind, receiv'd one half of the Goods and Riches of all the Inhabitants of the Iſland, on Condition that they ſhould have thoſe Laws and Privileges confirm'd to them which they had enjoyed in the time of Emanuel, late Emperor of Conſtantinople. Anno Dom. MCXCI.

But before I come to King Richard's arrival at Acon, it may not be improper for the Inſtruction, as well as Diverſion of the Reader, to give ſome Account both of the Beginning and Progreſs of thoſe former Expeditions to the Holy Land (commonly ſtiled Cruſadoes) till we bring them to this preſent time, in which this Prince made ſo great a Figure; which in ſhort is thus. A ſhort Account of the Beginning & Progreſs of the Former Expeditions to the Holy-Land.

The ſuperſtitious zeal of this, as well, as of the former Century, being kindled by the Pope, and certain Bigotted Monks, had ſo poſſeſſed all Ranks of Men, both Princes and Subjects, that they believed theſe Warlike Pilgrimages to be the moſt Holy and Meritorious Actions that Chriſtians could poſſibly undertake, ſince they thereby propoſed to reſcue Jeruſalem, and the Sepulchre of Chriſt, out of the hands of Infidels. The ſuperſtitious Zeal of this and the former Century for Cruſadoes.

And they received the name of Cruſadoes from the Figure of the Croſs, which all thoſe that had vow'd this Pilgrimage, wore upon their upper Garments: theſe conſecrated Armies were liſted at divers times, under ſeveral Chriſtian Princes, according as their preſent Zeal excited them; yet the Pope was commonly eſteem'd their Head, and his Legates often preſided in their Camps, and without their Approbation they ſeldom engaged in any Enterpriſe. From whence the Name Cruſado came.

I ſhall therefore a little to refreſh the Reader's memory put him in mind, [5.] that the firſt of theſe Cruſadoes (for I do not make any Account of the unfortunate Expedition under Peter the Hermit) was undertaken A. D. 1096, when all Palæſtine was conquer'd from the Saracens, and Jeruſalem made the Capital City of that Kingdom, under Godfrey of Boloigne. The firſt Cruſado was undertaken A. D. 1096. [5.] Vid. Hiſt. Will. Tyr. l. 1, 2.

The Second Expedition of any note was undertaken by Lewis the Seventh, King of France; to expiate the terrible Slaughter that had been committed by his Orders at the Siege of Vitry, who was alſo aſſiſted by Conrade, Emperor of Germany: But of whom I ſhall ſay no more, than that through the Treachery of the Greek Emperor Emanuel, his whole Army periſh'd by the way, without ever reaching the Holy Land. The 2d Cruſado. A. D. 1146. Id. l. 16.

But as for the Occaſion of this Expedition, we muſt look ſomewhat Higher; [1.] for after Godfrey of Boloigne had been ſucceeded by his Brother Baldwin, and He by his Coſin of the ſame Name, all Three valiant and pious Princes, who kept by their Wiſdom what they had at firſt acquired by their Valour; their Succeſſors not inheriting their vertues, though they did their Crowns, loſt that Kingdom which had been gain'd with the Expence of ſo much Blood and Treaſure; ſince by quarrelling among themſelves, they more eagerly ſought each other's ruine, than how either to defend themſelves, or Conquer their Enemies. The Occaſion of this Expedition. [1.] Id. l. 9, 10, 11, 12.

ſhip of his Two Children, [3.] Baldwin the eldeſt being then but Thirteen years old, in whoſe Minority happen'd thoſe Quarrels, Diſorders and Confuſions, which gave the Saracens a ſafe and eaſy Entrance into Palæſtine: For Sanguin, Sultan of Babylon, had ſome time before ſeized the Principality of Edeſſa, one of the Provinces of the Kingdom of Jeruſalem, and now vigorouſly attaqued the reſt.

[3] Id. l. 16 A. D. 1142. The Inteſtine Quarrels in Baldwin's Minority gave the Saracens an Eaſy entrance into Palæſtine. A. D. 1146.

Upon this news, King Lewis renew'd his Vow for the Cruſade, being highly incouraged to it by the Pope himſelf, excited by St. Bernard, who preach'd up, and propheſied (though falſly) all good ſucceſs to this Expedition. [4.] In ſhort, King Lewis getting with great difficulty and dangers as far as Antioch, he was there joyfully received by Raymond, Prince of that Territory, and Uncle to Queen Eleanor, who accompanied the King her Husband in this Expedition.

But Raymond hoping to make his beſt advantage of the King's Forces, would fain have perſwaded him to have uſed them againſt the Saracens in thoſe parts, which the King refuſed, becauſe he reſolved to perſue his deſign for the Holy Land: This ſo far incenſed Raymond, that of a Friend he became an Enemy, and did the King under hand all the miſchief he could by alienating the Affections of the Queen his Neice from her Husband, who had, or elſe pretended to have, very good cauſe to be jealous of her. This ill treatment ſo much diſobliged the King, that ſending the Queen away before, he himſelf ſtole away by night (his Forces following after) for the Holy Land; where when he arrived, he endeavoured to carry on the War againſt the Infidels, but with very ill ſucceſs; for either by the Diviſions or Falſeneſs of the Chriſtians of thoſe parts, the King's Forces ſucceeded in nothing they undertook; ſo that at laſt being quite tired out and diſcouraged, he with Eleanor his Queen return'd into Europe the Year following; Conrade the Emperor being return'd home the Year before with very ill ſucceſs likewiſe.

Who would fain have had him uſe his Forces againſt the Saracens in thoſe parts, but the K refuſing it he became his Enemy.

The K. ſteals away by night for the Holy-Land, his Forces following after.

But having no good ſucceſs there, he and his Queen return into Europe. A. D 1148.

[5.] Id. ib.

[5.] After their Departure, the Affairs in thoſe parts growing ſtill worſe and worſe, I ſhall relate them as briefly as I can.

[1] Id. l. 17. A D 1162 On Balwin III. Death, Amaury his Brother ſucceeds to the Crown,

[1.] King Baldwin the Third, a Prince of noble Qualities, dying in the Flower of his age, being (as it was ſuppoſed) poiſoned by his Phyſitian, his Brother Amaury (a Prince likewiſe of great Courage) ſucceeded him, and reigned but Eleven Years, and then dying, left only one Son, called Baldwin the Leper; * who being weak both in Body and Mind, died at Twenty Five, and left his Siſter's Son of his own Name his Succeſſor, then but Eight years old. This Child was put under the Guardianſhip of his Mother Sibylla, and Boamund Earl of Tripoly, by whom he was ſoon after poiſon'd, or rather by the procurement of his own Mother, who (as ſome Writers relate) ſacrificed her own Son to the curſed Ambition of reigning her ſelf; [2.] and then She with her Husband Guy of Luſignan took upon them the Title of King and Queen of Jeruſalem: So that after this young King's Deceaſe, there happen'd a great Diviſion among the Princes and Noblemen of that Country, ſome taking part with the new Queen, and her Husband, and others with the Earl of Tripoly; who, not long after, out of a prepoſterous hopes of the Crown of Jeruſalem, joined with Saladin, and helped him to take Acon, and farther permitted him to have a free paſſage through Galilee, which that Earl then poſſeſs'd in Right of his Lady, who was Daughter to the late Prince of of that Province: Yet for all this, I find [3.] that Earl Raymond within a little while left Saladin, and made his Peace with King Guy; and though he was never afterwards much truſted by him, yet it is certain that he had the Command of part of the Chriſtian Army at the Battle of Tiberias (of which more by and by;) but becauſe he eſcap'd from thence ſafe, when the King and all the reſt were taken Priſoners, he was look'd upon as a Traytor, tho' he did not long ſurvive the taking of Jeruſalem, being found dead in his Bed; and (as ſome relate) was privately circumciſed, but that he ever publickly renounced the Chriſtian Religion, and turn'd Mahometan (as ſome will have it) I do not find.

Anno Dom. MCXCI.

[3] Beſold. de Bello ſacro. Earl Raymond Commands part of the Army at Tiberias. Is look'd upon as a Traytor.

But to return to Saladin, [4.] who after this puſh'd on his good Fortune with ſuch great Bravery and Succeſs, that he quickly made himſelf Maſter of Egypt; and joyning with Sultan Noradin, (who about the ſame Time over-ran Paleſtine) took Gaza, and upon the Death of Noradin, eaſily conquer'd Syria.

[4] Ib. Saladin makes himſelf Maſter of Egypt. And upon Noradin's Death conquers Syria.

Then taking advantage of the Quarrels among the Chriſtians, he enter'd Galilee, and ſeiz'd upon all the Places of Strength beyond Jordan. [5] Vid. eund. ſub A.D. 1187.

Some time after this Victory, Saladin took Sydon, Joppa, and divers other ſtrong Places, and then beſieg'd Jeruſalem: At firſt the Beſieg'd being ſummon'd to Surrender, gave a Courageous Anſwer, That they were reſolv'd to defend the City to the laſt Extremity: But when the battering Engines had open'd a Breach in the Walls, on the Fourteenth day they deſired to Capitulate, and then agreed to Surrender on theſe hard Conditions; viz. That the Chriſtians of the Greek Church ſhould have Liberty either to be gone, or to ſtay there; but the Franks or Latines were all to depart, and only to take away with them ſuch Goods as they could carry: whereupon many of the meaner Sort carried away their Children upon their Backs as their chiefeſt Riches.

Moſt of the Great Men that eſcaped his Sword, taken Priſoners. Jeruſalem beſieg'd, and in 14 Days ſurrender'd upon hard Conditions.

[1.] Saladin punctually kept the Articles agreed upon, and uſed his Victory with great Moderation; he enter'd the City Triumphantly amidſt his Victorious Army, bringing along with him the Captive King, and about Twenty Thouſand Priſoners; then he ſtrictly forbad all Injuries and Violence, publickly declaring, that he took the Chriſtians into his Protection; and therefore that they ſhould no ways be moleſted in the Exerciſe of their Religion: An Example which (by the way) may ſerve as a Reproof to ſome Princes of this Age, who aſſume a Sovereignty over men's Conſciences as well as over their Perſons; an Uſurpation, not only contrary to the Spirit of the Goſpel, but ſuch, as a Mahometan Prince thought unworthy the Doctrine of the Alcoran.

[1] Beſold. ib. Saladin uſes his Victory with Moderation. And declares, that the Chriſtians ſhould not be moleſted in the Exerciſe of their Religion.

But though he permitted the Chriſtian Monks to have the Uſe of the Church of the Holy Sepulchre, yet he turn'd that which ſtood in the Place of Solomon's Temple into a Moſque, having firſt cauſed it to be waſh'd all over with Roſe-Water. Not long after this Succeſs, Queen Sibylla, who was got into Aſcalon, ſurrender'd that Place to Saladin, as a Ranſom for her Husband, and the Maſter of the Templars.

Q. Sybilla ſurrenders Aſcalon to Saladin, as a Ranſom for her Huſband, and the Maſter of the Templars.

Anno Dom. MCXCI.

With the loſs of Jeruſalem, that Kingdom expired, after the Chriſtians had enjoyed it 87 years.

It is reported that divers ſtrange Signs and Prodigies were the Forerunners of the taking of Jeruſalem, which I ſhall not take upon me either to relate or confute, ſince I look upon them as Stories made in Imitation of thoſe Prodigies recorded by Joſephus before the Romans took that City. But with the Loſs of Jeruſalem, and all the Inland Places, that Kingdom expired, after its being in the Chriſtian's poſſeſſion Eighty-ſeven years.

The A. Bp. of Tyre comes into Europe to ſollicit the Aſſiſtance of the Chriſtian Princes againſt the Common Enemy.

The Affairs of Paleſtine being in this deſperate Condition, the Archbiſhop of Tyre undertook a Voyage into Europe, to ſollicit the Chriſtian Princes for their Aſſiſtance againſt the Common Enemy; and upon his being ſupported with the Pope's Authority, Philip King of France, Henry King of England, with his Son Earl Richard, and many other Princes and Great Men undertook the Cruſado, (as you have already heard in the laſt Reign:) Which Expedition, when it was almoſt ready to be perform'd, was interrupted, and laid aſide by that unfortunate War that then happened to break out between the Two Kings above-mention'd, which proved fatal to Henry: after whoſe Deceaſe, his Son Richard, and the preſent French King, being for ſome time Friends and Confederates, re-aſſumed their former Deſign, and undertook the preſent Expedition to the Holy-Land, as hath been already related, and to the Hiſtory of which we now return; and I hope the Reader will not think this Digreſſion either tedious, or unneceſſary.

The Kings of France & England, &c. undertake the Cruſado.

But it was put off by the War which then broke out between the two ſaid Kings.

And upon the Death of his Father, King Richard and the French K. anew engage in it.

[2] King Richard having thus ſetled his Affairs at Cyprus, ſet Sail from thence on Thurſday in Whitſon week, and the next day he arriv'd at Tyre; and only touching there, perſued his Voyage to Acon, which was ſtill beſieg'd by the Chriſtian Army. Not far from this Port, the King met with a great Turkiſh Man of War, full of Officers and Souldiers, and well ſtored with all ſorts of Arms and Proviſions, going for the Relief of that City; which Veſſel being ſet upon by ſome of the King's Fleet, made ſuch a Vigorous Reſiſtance, that He, finding he had no other way to take her, was forced to order his Galleys to run againſt her with their ſharp Iron Bow-Sprits, which immediately ſunk her down to Rights, with all her Men and Lading, except Thirty-Five perſons, part of whom were Commanders, and part Engineers: But if this Veſſel had arriv'd at Acon, the City had not been taken at all, or at leaſt not without very great difficulty, for the Siege had been for Two Months laſt paſt carried on but very ſlowly by the King of France, becauſe of King Richard's Abſence.

[2.] G. V. It. R. R. ib. c. 44. King Richard goes to the Siege of Acon. And near the Port meeting with a Turkiſh Man of War, fell upon, and ſunk her.

The Reader is here alſo to take notice, [3.] that when the King arriv'd at Acon, it had been beſieg'd by the Chriſtians near Two years, a great Multitude of whom had periſh'd by the Sword, Famine, and Peſtilence: For though Saladin, King of the Turks, was unable by his own Strength to raiſe the Siege, yet he had ſo poſſeſſed himſelf of all the Avenues to the Chriſtian Camp, that no Proviſions could be brought to it, unleſs it were by Sea; therefore it was no wonder, if there were Great Joy at King Richard's Arrival; ſo that the King of France with his Nobility going out to meet him, they accompanied him from his Landing to his Tents, which he had ordered to be pitched as near the City as he could: here, not long after his Arrival, he fell very ſick of a diſeaſe, call'd by our Authors the Arnoldia, which we cannot now tell what it was, though it is very like to be a ſort of Fever, taken by

by the evil Air of that Country, and of which he languiſh'd for ſome days. Anno Dom. MCXCI.

In the mean while the King of France reſolving no longer to ſpend the time in fruitleſs delays, reſolv'd to make a vigorous Aſſault upon the City, which was executed on the Monday after Midſummer-day with all the Forces they could muſter up: but though the French and other Nations perform'd as much as could be expected from Gallant Men, yet they were not then able to take the Town, becauſe the Gariſon within were very numerous, and made a brave Reſiſtance; as likewiſe becauſe Saladin with Great part of his Army aſſaulted the Chriſtian Camp at the ſame time, endeavouring to fill up their Trenches; ſo that theſe Forces, not being ſufficient at once to Aſſault the City and defend themſelves againſt the Turks, were forced at laſt to Sound a Retreat, that they might repulſe the Turks who lay ſo hard upon them.

The French K. aſſaults the City.

But without any effect.

The Army is forced to retreat.

In the mean time the Turkiſh Gariſon caſt Wildfire upon the King of France's Warlike Engines, and deſtroy'd them; which Accident, with the Diſappointment in the late Aſſault, put that King into ſo great a Conſternation, that he fell very ſick, either through Diſcontent, or elſe by the Infection of the Place, it being much the ſame kind of Diſtemper with King Richard's: wherefore by reaſon of the Sickneſs of both Kings, the Siege was but ſlowly carried on for ſome days.

The French K's Warlike Engines are burnt.

[4.] But the King of France firſt recovering, and being much encouraged by the Arrival of many Noblemen, both of the French and Engliſh Nation, together with their Retinues, he renew'd the Siege, not by Storm, but with other battering Engines of King Richard's, called Petrars, which caſt out Stones with ſuch a Force, and they were of ſo vaſt a weight, that they were able to ſhake, and in ſome time to batter down the ſtrongeſt Walls and Towers; and one of them belonging to King Richard ſhot a Stone with that Force, that it kill'd Twelve Turks at once; Of ſuch Effect were theſe battering Engines before the Invention of Great Guns.

[4] Id. ib.

The King of France renews the Siege with other battering Engines.

It would be tedious to recite all the Particulars of this Remarkable Siege, and the ſeveral Mines, Batteries, and Aſſaults that were then made by the Chriſtians without ſucceſs: But at laſt the Gariſon, by the Sword and by Sickneſs, being reduced to about Six Thouſand Men, and thoſe much impaired by their Wounds and continual Watchings, the Towers and Walls being alſo very much weakened and battered by the Warlike Engines, the Turks found it their beſt way (before it was too late) to think of a Surrender: And ſince Saladin was no longer able to relieve them, they (by his conſent) treated with the Kings, and ſurrender'd the City to them upon theſe Articles, which I have taken from Roger Hoveden.

And at laſt the City was ſurrender'd.

I. That Acon ſhould be deliver'd up ſafe with Five Hundred Chriſtian Captives, that were therein.

II. That the true Croſs of Chriſt ſhould be reſtored, which had been before taken by King Saladin.

Anno Dom. MCXCI.

III. That of all the Chriſtian Captives whom Saladin had taken, Three Thouſand (Vinſaulf ſays but Twenty-five Hundred) choſen by the Two Kings, ſhould be deliver'd.

IV. That the Turks ſhould carry out nothing with them but their Cloaths.

V. That for the Redemption of their Heads, they ſhould pay Two Hundred Thouſand Biſantines, and they themſelves ſhould remain ſtill in Cuſtody. And that if theſe Articles were not made good within the Space of Forty days, they ſhould be wholly in the King's Mercy for their Lives.

100 of the chiefeſt Officees of the Turks kept for Hoſtages.

But Saladin takes no farther care to perform the Articles.

Theſe being agreed upon, and ſworn to on both ſides, the Two Kings ſent their Officers and Souldiers into the City, and chuſing out an Hundred of the chiefeſt and richeſt of the Turks, kept them for Hoſtages in a ſtrong Tower, and ſecured the reſt in ſome Houſes of the City: But when Saladin had heard what Conditions his Men had made with the Chriſtians, he pretended they were not with his Approbation, and therefore took no care to perform the Articles, which coſt the Turkiſh Captives their Heads.

* Hiſtor. Ducum Auſtria.

The Duke of Auſtria ſets up his Banner on a Tower, which being flung down by K. Richard's Order, the Duke quits the Service.

Before I leave this Subject, I muſt not paſs by an Action, which tho' of no great Importance in it ſelf, yet ſince it proved of fatal conſequence to this King whoſe Reign I write, it deſerves our notice; and becauſe it is related divers ways by our own, as well as Foreign Hiſtorians, I will give you that which ſeems moſt likely to be true, which is what * Cuſpinian relates, That upon the Surrender of the City of Acon, Limpold, or Leopold, Duke of Auſtria, having taken poſſeſſion of one of the Towers, order'd his Banner to be there erected, which ſo ſoon as it was eſpied by King Richard, he was very much diſpleaſed at it, and preſently ordered his Men to pull it down, which they not only perform'd, but alſo tore it to pieces, and trampled it in the Dirt; or (as ſome Authors relate) flung into a more naſty Place.

When the Duke heard of this, he demanded ſatisfaction from King Richard; and though at the ſame time he was perſwaded to paſs it by for the Common peace of the Confederate Princes, yet the King refuſing to acknowledge the Affront, the Duke preſently quitted the Service, and return'd into his own Country, together with ſeveral other German Noblemen, who all reſented this Injury as done to themſelves: But the Duke afterwards found a Time ſeverely to revenge this Affront, as you will read hereafter; which may ſerve as a Warning to more Potent Princes, not to inſult over thoſe that are weaker than themſelves, ſince there may ſome unexpected opportunity happen for their Adverſaries to be even with them. But to return to our Hiſtory, from which we have ſomewhat digreſſed.

[5] Id ib. c. 16, 17.

The Kings of France & England divide the Spoil of the City among themſelves.

[5] After the City was ſurrender'd, the Kings of France and England march'd into it with their Forces, and there divided the Captives, and the reſt of the Spoil between themſelves, without diſtributing any part of it to the other Princes, Noblemen, and Officers of the Army, which cauſed a general Diſcontent.

This

This being diſpatch'd, the Two Kings accommodated the Difference between Guy King of Jeruſalem and Conrade Marqueſs of Montferrat concerning that Kingdom, on theſe Terms; viz. That Guy ſhould enjoy it during his Life, and the other ſhould have it after him, as having married the Daughter and Heir of the late King Almaric. Anno Dom. MCXCI.

The Two Ks. accommodate the Difference between the K. of Jeruſalem and the Marqueſs of Montferrat.

[1.] After this Agreement there was nothing conſiderable done by theſe Princes, only King Richard required of the King of France, that they two ſhould each take an Oath to ſtay in the Holy Land for Three years; but he refuſed it, and the reaſon was ſoon diſcover'd; for Two days after he ſent to the King of England the Biſhop of Beauvais and the Duke of Burgundy with other Noblemen, by whom he asked his permiſſion to return into his own Country, alledging his great want of Health, and that he had now perform'd the Vow he had formerly made of going to the Holy-Land. To this King Richard objected the great Diſgrace it would be to the King of France, if he ſhould offer to leave the buſineſs they came for undone: but however, if he found himſelf infirm, or that he was afraid he ſhould dye there, he might do his pleaſure. King Philip hereupon grew very uneaſy, and about a week after ſent again to the King of England for his Conſent to return home; but he could not obtain it, until he had taken an Oath, that he would protect his Dominions and People until his Return, and would do no damage to them, nor ſuffer any to be done by others. This being perform'd, and the King of France having made the Duke of Burgundy his General, and left with him the Greateſt part of his Treaſure to pay his Army, he departed from Acon on the Thirty-firſt of July, and went to Tyre, taking with him the Marqueſs of Conrade, and the Chiefeſt of thoſe Priſoners that fell to his ſhare; and delivering them to the Cuſtody of the Marqueſs, he ſailed from thence for France; where being arriv'd, how well he kept his Oath to King Richard not to diſturb his Territories, will appear hereafter.

[1.] Ib. c. 18. R. H. p. 396.

The King of France deſires leave of King Richard to return into his own Country.

But could not obtain it, till he had ſworn that he would protect K. Ric. Dominions and People till his return.

He goes for France, but does not obſerve his Oath.

As ſoon as the King of France was departed, King Richard took the whole Burthen and Care of the War upon himſelf, being rather hindered than aſſiſted by the Marqueſs of Montferrat, who refuſed to joyn with him, and only minded his private Intereſt.

The King of England takes the whole Burthen of the War upon himſelf.

[2.] The King having well rewarded all the Souldiers that ſerved in the late Siege of Acon, both Thoſe that belong'd to the King of France and other Princes, as well as his Own; and having alſo repair'd the Walls of Acon, and made them ſtronger than they were before the Siege began, reſolv'd to proceed to ſome new Expedition, and only waited to ſee whither Saladin would perform the Articles agreed upon at the Surrender of the City: But at length finding that the ſubtile Saracen had not only let the Day prefix'd for the Delivery of the Croſs and Redemption of the Priſoners ſlip, without performing any thing at all, and that he ſtill put him off with delays, requiring longer time for the performance of his Promiſe; he ſaw plainly that he was deluded, and therefore reſolved to put to death all the Turkiſh Priſoners he had in his Power. But before he did this, he quitted his Camp without the Town, and removed it nearer to that of the Enemy, which ſtill lay in view of him, and there remain'd for ſome days; but on the day of the King's removal, Saladin ſent him a Meſſage, with divers Rich Preſents, deſiring him, that he would defer the day appointed for executing ting the Priſoners to ſome longer time: But King Richard would neither receive his Preſents, nor prolong the Day; when Saladin found this was his peremptory Reſolution, that he might be before-hand with Him, he order'd all the Chriſtian Captives he had then in his Cuſtody to be Beheaded: and on the ſame day King Richard march'd his Army towards Saladin's Camp, and Aſſaulted it, though without any great ſucceſs, for many fell on both ſides.

But upon Saladin's not performing the aboveſaid Articles, King Richard reſolves to put to death all his Turkiſh Priſoners.

K. Richard Beheads all the Turkiſh Priſoners, but ſome few of the Chiefeſt, whom he kept for Ranſom.

But though the King knew of this Maſſacre of the Chriſtians, yet would he not anticipate the time he had appointed for putting the Saracens to death; but on the Twentieth of Auguſt He cauſed all the Turkiſh Priſoners to be Beheaded without the Camp, in the ſight of Saladin, only ſome of the Chief Officers and Commanders were kept alive, and reſerv'd for Ranſom.

A Difference between R. Hoveden and Geof. Vinſaulf concerning the Number of the Priſoners now ſlain, and how it may be reconciled.

But indeed there is ſome difference between R. Hoveden's and Geoffrey Vinſaulf's Relation of this Buſineſs: the former of whom ſays, the Number of thoſe Turks that were then put to death, amounted to Five Thouſand; whereas the latter makes them to be but Twenty-ſeven Hundred in the whole; which yet may be thus reconciled, that the one includes all the Priſoners then ſlain, as well by the Duke of Burgundy, as by King Richard; whereas the other reckons only thoſe that fell by the King's own Orders: But whatever the Number was, it was certainly a piece of great Cruelty to put ſo many innocent Priſoners to death in cold Blood; ſince, though they were not redeemed according to Agreement, yet they might have been ſold for Slaves, which would have been much better than to exerciſe ſuch Barbarity only to ſatisfy that inhuman Paſſion of Revenge; nor did Saladin reap any benefit by his Barbarity, but on the contrary, none of his Gariſons would afterwards venture to hold out a Siege: ſo that he was forced in the End to demoliſh all his Caſtles in thoſe parts.

King Richard reſolves to march from Acon to Joppa.

[4.] After this, King Richard with his own, as well as the French Army, under the Command of the Duke of Burgundy, reſolved to march from Acon to Joppa, and to take in the Country, and Fortify the ſtrong Places by the way: But Saladin, although he durſt not meet and fight the Chriſtians fairly, [5.] yet did all he could to hinder their March by perpetual Skirmiſhes and Ambuſcades, which he laid for ſome part or other of the Army, and in which many Brave and Gallant Men, both French and Engliſh, were deſtroy'd: Notwithſtanding this, King Richard with his Army at laſt reached Joppa; which when Saladin perceiv'd, and that he could no longer hold that part of Paleſtine, he diſmantled Aſcalon and all the other Strong places, except Jeruſalem, Chrac, and Darum.

Saladin by his frequent Skirmiſhes deſtroys a great many of the K's Men.

Yet the King reaches Joppa.

Saladin thereupon diſmantles ſeveral Strong places.

King Richard hereupon ſtay'd Seven weeks at Joppa to refreſh his Forces, and to recruit his Army by the arrival of a Great many Souldiers who were gone to Acon and other Places; whilſt they ſtayed at Joppa, the Chriſtian Souldiers giving themſelves to Idleneſs and Debauchery, and the Diſcipline being relax'd, the Army was thereby very much weakened.

The Chriſtian Army by their Idleneſs and Debauchery, very much weakened.

I cannot here omit a remarkable Deliverance of King Richard from the hands of the Turks, which happened thus: [1.] The King going out one day a Hawking with but few Attendants, and being tired with his Sport, and not in the leaſt ſuſpicious of any Enemy near him, would needs lay himſelf under a Tree to ſleep, which a Party of Turks, who were thereabouts, having notice of, they reſolved to lye in Ambuſh for him, and ſent ſome of their Party to ſet upon the King, and provoke him to Fight; which when they had done, and then fained to fly before him, they drew him into their Ambuſh, and riſing on the ſudden, ſet upon Him and his Company; and he had certainly been taken Priſoner, had not a Gentleman, one of his Attendants, called William de Pratellis, ſaved him by ſuffering himſelf to be taken in his ſtead, by crying out in the Saracen's Tongue, I am Melec (that is, the King;) upon which they all fell upon, and took him, whilſt in the mean time the King, with divers others of his Followers made their Eſcapes; yet notwithſtanding he loſt ſeveral Others who would needs fight it out. But though this was a very Noble Action of this Gentleman thus to deliver his Prince, yet however he was blamed for his ſo raſhly expoſing of himſelf; but his greateſt fault was his too great Courage, being always the firſt in making an Aſſault upon the Enemy, and the laſt that retreated.

Party

Anno Dom. MCXCI.

A noble Action in a Gentleman, who ſuffer'd himſelf to be taken Priſoner to ſave his Prince.

[2.] Some time after King Richard having recruited his Army, and left a ſufficient Gariſon in Joppa, he march'd out into the adjacent Country with part of them; and having routed the Turks in Two Engagements, (in one of which they were Aſſailants, and in the other lay in Ambuſh to ſurprize him) he took and repaired ſeveral Caſtles to ſecure the Country; which made Saladin ſeem inclinable to a Peace, and offer'd to give up the whole Territory of Jeruſalem from the River Jordan to the Weſtern (i. e. the Mediterranean) Sea; though, it ſeems, he did this only to gain time, for ſending his Brother Saphadin to the King with Rich Preſents, he only amuſed him with feigned Treaties of Peace, until he had ruined all thoſe ſtrong Places he had a mind to quit, and well fortified thoſe he intended to keep: but the King at laſt diſcovering their Deceit, broke off the Treaty, and renew'd the War.

[2.] Id ib. c. 29, 30, 31.

The K. afterwards routs the Turks in Two Engagements, and repairs ſeveral Caſtles.

Saladin upon this ſeems inclinable to a Peace, and makes great Offers only to gain time.

The K. diſcovering the Cheat, renews the War.

[3.] But though the Chriſtian Army had many Skirmiſhes with the Turks, and had endured great Hardſhips in their Marches towards Jeruſalem, which the King then intended to beſiege, yet got no farther than a little Caſtle called Betenoble; where after the Army had ſuffer'd very much by the wetneſs of the Seaſon, the King was at laſt diſſwaded by the Knights-Templars, Hoſpitalers and Others from undertaking that Siege, having neither Forces ſufficient to carry it on, nor indeed to keep the City if they ſhould take it.

[3.] Id. ib. c. 34, 35.

But is diſſwaded from undertaking the Siege of Jeruſalem.

But before we conclude this Year, methinks it will be neceſſary to look back, and give you an Account of what happened in England. You have already heard of the great Tyranny and Oppreſſion of the Lord Chancellor, the Biſhop of Ely (above-mention'd) who ruled all things at his own Will and Pleaſure, to the great Diſcontent of Earl John, and the Major part of the Nobility; and he was ſo great a Grievance to them, that they watch'd for an Occaſion to bring down the exorbitant Pride and Power of this Imperious Prelate; and not long after there happened a very fit one, which was thus: [4.] Gerard de Camville, a very Rich Nobleman, had bought of the King juſt before his departure, the Government of the Caſtle of Lincoln, (to which he had alſo ſome pretence in Right of his Wife) as likewiſe the Sheriffdom of the Adjacent County for a certain time: But the Chancellor having at that time all the other ſtrong Places of England in his Cuſtody, demanded this alſo; but Camville refuſing to deliver it to him, the Chan-

Chancellor raiſed Forces out of the Neighbouring Countries, and laid Siege to it: In the mean time Camville, having no other remedy, went, and implored the Aſſiſtance and Protection of Earl John; who thereupon levying a Conſiderable Body of Men, eaſily ſurprized the ſtrong Caſtles of Nottingham and Tikhill, and ſent to the Chancellor, and acquainted him, That unleſs he would immediately Raiſe the Siege, he would force him to do it. He being terrified at this Meſſage, preſently drew off from the Place, and by the Mediation of ſome Biſhops and other Friends, an Agreement was made between them: But this being too long, and not much conducing to the main deſign of this Hiſtory, I ſhall only give you the Heads of it.

But being terrified by Earl John's Meſſage to him, he forthwith raiſes the Siege. And they both come to an Agreement by the Mediation of the Bps.

[5.] Id. ib. The Heads of that Agreement.

[5.] Firſt, The Caſtles of Nottingham and Tikhill were to be kept in Indifferent hands till the King's Return; as alſo all other Caſtles belonging to the Honours which the King had given Earl John were to remain in the Cuſtody of the King's Liegemen; (viz.) Wallingford in the Cuſtody of the Archbiſhop of Roüen; that of Briſtol in the Biſhop of London, &c. and the like was agreed concerning all the reſt of the Caſtles there mention'd, which were to continue in the Cuſtody of thoſe in whoſe hands they then were, who were all ſworn to keep them faithfully for the King's uſe; and if he ſhould in the mean while happen to dye, then the Guardians were to render them to Earl John, and the ſame was alſo provided for the Caſtles of Nottingham and Tikhill.

Secondly, It was alſo agreed, that the Biſhops, Abbots, Earls, Barons, * Vavaſors and Free Tenents ſhould not be diſſeiſed of their Lands or Goods at the pleaſure of the Juſtices or King's Miniſters, but by the Judgment of his Court, according to the Lawful Cuſtoms and Statutes of the Kingdom, or by the King's Mandate; and Earl John ſhould cauſe the like Rule to be obſerved in his Lands and Poſſeſſions; and if any One preſumed to do otherwiſe, upon the Complaint of the Earls and Barons, he was to be puniſhed or fined by the Archbiſhop of Roüen, and the Juſtitiaries, &c.

* i. e. Inferior or Meſne-Tenants.

Thirdly, Thoſe Caſtles which had been built, or begun ſince the King went beyond Sea, were to be demoliſh'd, and no new ones to be erected, unleſs by the King's ſpecial Command, except in ſome particular Caſes there mentioned.

Fourthly, The Sheritfwick of Lincolnſhire was to be re-deliver'd to Gerard de Camville, who was at the ſame time to engage, that he would ſtand to the Judgment of the King's Court concerning the Right he had to it: but the Lord John was not to protect him againſt the ſaid Judgment, nor receive Out Laws, nor any of the King's Enemies, nor permit them to be harbour'd in his Lands, &c.

[1.] Id. ib. And both gave Security for the due Obſervance of this Agreement.

[1.] Then the Earl and Chancellor putting their hands within the hands of the Archbiſhop of Roüen, gave Security for the Obſervation of this Agreement, in good faith and without any Artifice; and Fourteen Barons of both Parties ſwore the ſame, whoſe Names need not be repeated. Note, Theſe things were done, ſaving the King's Authority and Command in all things, &c. and ſo Matters were pieced up for a time.

[2.] But

[2.] But not long after this Agreement there happened a new Cauſe of Diſſention between the Biſhops and the Chancellor through the Latter's violent and haughty Temper; and it was occaſioned thus: Geoffrey, Archbiſhop Elect of York, had been lately conſecrated to that See by the Archbiſhop of Tours, upon the Pope's Command: After this, not regarding the Oath he had taken to the King his Brother, that he would not return into England within Three Years after his departure, he preſently came to Whitſand, and lay there ready for his paſſage; but the Chancellor hearing of it, forbad him to come over: However, He not valuing that Prohibition, landed at Dover in the Month of September, where the Chancellor had before appointed Officers to apprehend him; but he having notice of it, changed his Cloaths, and mounting a ſwift Horſe got to the Monaſtery of St. Martins, adjoining to that Town, and took Sanctuary in the Church: whereupon the Chancellor's Officers guarded the Place ſo ſtrictly, that he could not ſtir out; and not being content with this, they took him while he was ſtanding at the Altar in his Epiſcopal Veſtments, and dragging him out of the Church through the dirty Streets, deliver'd him to Matthew de Clere, Conſtable of Dover Caſtle.

[3.] Earl John hearing of this, ſent Orders to the Chancellor to releaſe him: Upon which Geoffrey coming to London, complained to the Earl, Biſhops, and Great men of the Injury he had receiv'd from the Chancellor; whereupon the Earl commanded that he ſhould anſwer the Law in the King's Court for that, and for the Injury he had done to Hugh Bp of Durham; the Chancellor notwithſtanding deferred his Appearance, yet the Earl with the Archbiſhop of Roüen, as alſo the Biſhops and Chief Men of the Kingdom, appointed him a peremptory Day at Reading, whither Earl John and almoſt all the Biſhops, Earls, and Barons of the Kingdom came in expectation of him, but he neither came himſelf, nor ſent any to appear for him: Then the Earl and the Biſhops that were with him, ſet out toward London, that ſo they might conſult before a great Audience of the Citizens what they ſhould do with the Chancellor that had ſo troubled the Kingdom, and refuſed to ſtand to the Law: He hearing of this, left Windſor, and went up to London, and by the way his and the Earl's Retinue, that is, their Tenants or Knights, met and fought, in which Skirmiſh one of the Earl's Knights, Roger de Plaine was kill'd; yet he had the better, and the Chancellor fled to London, and with his Followers got into the Tower.

A Skirmiſh between the Earl's and the Chancellor's Men.

One of the Earl's Knights kill'd in it.

[4.] On the Tenth of October Earl John and the Archbiſhop of Roüen, with the Biſhops, Earls, Barons, and Citizens of London, met in St. Paul's Church-yard, where they all accuſed the Chancellor of ſeveral Crimes, but eſpecially of the Injuries he had done to the Archbiſhop of York and Biſhop of Durham: thoſe alſo whom the King had aſſociated with him in the Government, accuſed him, ſaying, That he wholly deſpiſed their Advice, and managed all the Buſineſs of the Kingdom by Violence, and according to his own Will. Upon this the Archbiſhop of Roüen and William the Earl-Mareſchal ſhew'd their Letters under the King's own Seal from Meſſina, by which they were aſſociated with the Chancellor in the Government, and whereby he was to do nothing without their Advice; and if he did, and it ſhould prove to the detriment of the Kingdom, he was to be depoſed, and the Archbiſhop of Roüen to be put into his place. So, upon a ſolemn hearing of the whole matter, it was adjudged by all there preſent, that the Biſhop ſhould be thenceforth deprived from having any thing more to do in the Government of the Kingdom.

He is depoſed from his Office.

[5.] The ſame day the Earl John and the Archbiſhop of Roüen, and other the King's Juſtices (that is, the Commiſſioners in the Government) granted to the Citizens of London the free enjoyment of their Community, that is, their Rights and Privileges; and at the ſame time the Earl and Archbiſhop, and almoſt all the Earls and Barons of the Kingdom did ſwear firmly and reſolutely to uphold that Community, ſo long as it ſhould pleaſe the King: And upon this the Citizens of London did ſwear faithful Service to King Richard and his Heirs; and if he ſhould dye without Iſſue, then they would receive Earl John his Brother for their King and Lord, ſwearing Fealty to him againſt all Men, ſaving their Fealty to King Richard his Brother; and the depoſed Chancellor ſwore he would deliver up all the Caſtles of England into his hands, and preſently deliver'd to him the Tower of London, and Windſor-Caſtle, together with ſome others.

[1.] Our Author has likewiſe given us a long Epiſtle of Hugh de Nunant, Biſhop of Coventry, wherein he ſets forth the inſolent and arbitrary Proceedings of the Biſhop of Ely; and [2.] how, after his Depoſition, he went to Canterbury, and there laid down the Croſs of his Legantine Power, and took upon him the Cruſado to go to the Holy-Land; and from thence went to Dover, where ſtaying a few days in the Caſtle with the Conſtable his Kinſman, he reſolv'd to go over beyond Sea; but fearing to be again ſeized if he were known, he diſguiſed himſelf in Women's habit; and taking a Web of Linnen Cloth with an Ell under his Arm, as if he were a Linnen Pedlar, went down and ſate by the Sea-ſide upon a Rock, expecting a Boat to carry him on Shipboard: but whilſt he was there, a Seaman coming that way by chance, and taking him for a Woman, went about to Kiſs him, and then offering at farther Indecencies, thereby diſcover'd that he was a Man, yet ſaid nothing of it: A little while after a Woman coming that way, ſhe began to cheapen the Cloth he had in his hand, but he could make her no tolerable Anſwer, becauſe (being a Frenchman) he underſtood but little Engliſh; more Women alſo coming in, and finding that he would not ſpeak to them, they pull'd up the Hood with which he cover'd his Face, and then preſently ſaw his black Beard (though newly ſhaven:) Upon which crying out to certain Men that were not far off, they came running in, and laying hold of him, and banging him ſoundly with their Fiſts, they dragg'd him through the Dirt, and put him into a dark Cellar, till they had made Earl John acquainted with their Proceedings.

He diſguiſes himſelf in Women's habit to go beyond Sea, but is diſcover'd.

He is ſoundly beaten, drag'd in the Dirt, & then thrown into a Cellar, till Earl John's pleaſure could be known.

[3.] Eight days after this his Impriſonment, Earl John gave Orders for him to be releaſed, and to go beyond Sea: Whereupon he went into Normandy, and there, by the Command of the Archbiſhop of Roüen, he was reputed as an Excommunicated perſon; inſomuch that in all places where-ever he came in that Dioceſe, all Divine Offices ceaſed during his ſtay there; for the Archbiſhop of Roüen, and ſeveral of the Biſhops had taken upon them to Excommunicate him for what he had before done to the Archbiſhop of York: Therefore, not finding any good Reception in Normandy, he went to Paris, and from thence ſent Letters to Pope Caleſtine, therein ſetting forth how ill he had been uſed by Earl John and his Accomplices, who had baniſh'd and drove him out of the Kingdom, and deſired that Reſtitution might be made of what had been thus wrongfully taken from him, and farther offer'd to ſtand to the Law, and anſwer for what he had done amiſs.

He complains to the Pope of the ill Treatment he had receiv'd from Earl John.

And offers to ſtand a Tryal.

But as to what the Pope did on his behalf, I ſhall refer you to the Eccleſiaſtical Affairs at the end of the next Year; then the Biſhop himſelf wrote to the King, repreſenting to him the violent and unjuſt Uſage he had met with, and that Earl John his Brother had uſurped the Royal Power, and thruſt him out of the Kingdom; which Letters he ſent by the Prior of Hereford into the Holy-Land, as you will hear farther.

He complains likewiſe to the K by Letters.

Now the Reader may obſerve from hence the great Power of the Nobility and Common-Council of the Kingdom, as alſo of the City of London, in thoſe days, who thus took upon them to reſiſt and depoſe the King's Chief Juſtitiary and Chancellor for his Tyrannical Government, and Oppreſſion of all ſorts of People; and therefore it is no wonder if he found ſo few Friends to ſtand by him, none that would defend his Cauſe, unleſs it was his Countryman Peter of Blois, Arch-Deacon of Bathe, who, in a [4.] Letter to Hugh Biſhop of Coventry, in anſwer to his former Epiſtle; (wherein the Biſhop had given him the Character "of a haughty and imperious Prelate, profuſe and extravagant beyond "meaſure, a waſter of the King's Revenues, and injurious to all ſorts "of People;) ſets him forth to be a Wiſe, Loving, Generous, and "Mild Man, abounding in all Inſtances of Liberality, and one that "for his great Qualifications and Merits had juſtly obtain'd the chief "Adminiſtration of the Government. But what ſignifies the Opinion of one Man againſt that of the whole Nation, and the Account of all the Hiſtorians of that time, who unanimouſly agree in the Biſhop of Coventry's Character of him? and William of Newburgh (who then liv'd, and not long after wrote his Hiſtory, agreeing with R. Hoveden's Account of this Tranſaction) ſays, That all Men were much diſſatisfied, that the King at his departure ſhould commit the chief Government of the Kingdom to a Stranger of mean Birth, and of no known Fidelity or Abilities, and that without the Conſent or Advice of the Great Men of the Kingdom: And though Peter of Blois by way of Recrimination anſwers the Biſhop in very ſharp terms, yet does he ſay nothing to extenuate the Matters of Fact laid to his Charge; (viz.) his robbing all ſorts of perſons of their Money and Goods; his ſqueezing the Churches by his Legantine Power, and ſquandering the King's Treaſure and Revenues.

But finds none to ſtand by him, but his Countryman, Peter of Blois.

Who gives him clear another Character than that of Hugh de Nunant.

All Hiſtorians agree in the Bp. of Coventry's Character of him.

But his Friend Peter of Blois cannot deny the Facts laid to his Charge.

I had not dwelt ſo long upon this Biſhop's Story, had not a late [5.] Author in his Compleat Hiſtory ſhew'd a ſtrong Inclination to vindicate his violent Proceedings, and that too from the ſingle Teſtimony of Peter of Blois; to repreſent all that had been done by the Great Council of the Kingdom againſt this Biſhop, as the raſh and furious Effects of a Traiterous Faction.

[5.] Dr Brady, P. 434.

Nor can I here omit a very Remarkable Accident which happened this Year, (as the Annals of Morgan and Rad. de Coggeſhal's Chronicle relate it;) The Monks of Glaſtenbury digging deep between two old Pyramids to make a Grave for one of their Brethren, (who deſired to be buried in that place) they found a Coffin, in which were the Bones of of a Woman, whoſe Hair remained unconſumed; under it lay another Coffin, on the top of which was a Croſs of Lead, with this Inſcription: Hic jacet Inclytus Rex Arthurus in Inſula Avelona. The Coffin being opened, there appear'd the Bones of a mighty large Man, which the Monks buried in their Church with very great Honour and Reſpect: but the Croſs was kept in the Monaſtery, and was ſeen by Leland, and is mentioned by *Camden in his Britannia. But it is time to return to King Richard in the Holy Land.

[1.] The King, at the beginning of this Year (finding he was not in a condition to execute the main deſign of his Voyage, viz. the Taking the City of Jeruſalem) did, by the Advice of the Knights Templars and other Great Men (though much to the diſguſt of the reſt of the Army) march from Joppa to Ramula, and from thence towards Aſcalon: But though they at laſt arriv'd there with ſafety, yet they ſuffer'd more by reaſon of the Wet weather, (it being in January) and want of Victuals, than by the coldneſs of the Seaſon; inſomuch that many of the Volunteers (eſpecially the French) quitted the Service, being either diſcontented becauſe no more was done, or elſe tired out with long Marches and conſtant Fatigues: which when Saladine underſtood, and fearing no more danger from the Chriſtians, he ſent his Army into Winter-Quarters.

Several of the Volunteers quitted the Service.

Saladine ſends his Army into Winter-Quarters.

[2] Id. ib. c. 8, 9, 10, 11, 12. The K. and the Marqueſs Conrade meet at a Conference.

[2.] Then King Richard, ſo ſoon as the Seaſon would permit, ſet all hands at work to finiſh the Walls of Aſcalon, which done, he ſent for the Marqueſs Conrade to come and aſſiſt him; but He, out of Ill-will to the King, refuſed it, yet at length they met, and had a Conference at a Town called Tmbric: however he ſtill kept himſelf cloſe within his own Quarters at Tyre, which raiſed no ſmall Jealouſy between King Richard and the Noblemen of France; and they not only took the Marqueſs's part, but the Duke of Burgundy likewiſe, envying the Glory and good Succeſs of King Richard, retreated to the Marqueſs with all his Forces then in the King's Service, and (which was worſe ſtill) he recalled all the French: But notwithſtanding theſe Diſappointments, the King did not ceaſe to fortify Aſcalon, and other Places neceſſary for the ſecurity of the Country.

The French Nobility and D. of Burgundy ſide with the Marqueſs.

But for all that the K. fortifies Aſcalon, &c. to ſecure the Country.

And though theſe Diviſions among the Chriſtians did very much to the fruſtrating the whole Undertaking, and gave great Encouragement to the Turks, [3.] Yet, to aggravate the more the Misfortune, the Prior of Hereford now arrived, bringing the Letters already mention'd from William Biſhop of Ely, the late Chancellor, to give the King an Account, how that himſelf, with all thoſe of his Party, were driven out of England by Earl John his Brother, who had likewiſe taken Oaths of Fealty from the Nobility, as alſo the Cuſtody of the Caſtles into his hands: At which the King being very much troubled, and communicating this ill News to the Great Men and Chief Commanders of his Army, they all agreed, That it was not only neceſſary for him to return into England for the ſafety of his Kingdom, but becauſe of the great difficulty of their ever ſucceeding in this Enterprize, by reaſon of the Diſcord and Diſſention that was now riſen between thoſe who were to carry it on; and that ſince King Guy was too weak to do any thing conſiderable towards regaining his Kingdom; it was requiſite for the King's Affairs to yield to the time, and give his consent, that the Marquess Conrade should be chosen King of Jerusalem, being the fittest person to defend what had been already gained, as well as to make new Conquests, when the King should be obliged to return home. [4.] Upon which consideration King Richard resolving to comply with the Desires of the Major part of the Christian Princes, sent to the Marquess of Montferrat, to let him know, that he freely gave his consent to his Election: Whereupon the Marquess, by the General Votes of the French Princes and those of other Nations, was elected King of Jerusalem, Guy being quite laid aside. Yet to make him amends, [5.] King Richard generously bestow'd on him the Isle of Cyprus, which was much better, to be held of himself by no other Service than Homage; in consideration of which, some Writers relate, that King Guy made over all his Title to the Kingdom of Jerusalem to King Richard; but I do not find it in any Author of that Age, and it is contrary to the Testimony of those, who make the King to have consented to the Election of the Marquess Conrade above-mention'd; which it is not likely he would have done, had he himself designed to lay any Claim to that Kingdom.

Anno Dom. MCXCII.

And to have the Marquess Conrade Chosen K. of Jerusalem.

[5.] Id. ib. p. 37. K. Richard bestows the Isle of Cyprus upon Guy, the deposed Prince.

[1.] But this King elect did not long enjoy his Honour, for before his Coronation he was stabb'd in the Streets of Tyre by Two young Saracens, whom he kept in his Service, and seem'd to be turned Christians, but were indeed downright Assassins, set on to kill him by a Saracen Emir of Masse, commonly call'd the Old man of the Mountain; yet King Richard's Enemies gave out, that it was done by his Instigation; which Calumny proved very much to his prejudice, as you will hear anon.

[1.] Id. ib. c. 26. But before the Marquess's Coronation he was stabb'd by two Saracens.

His Death was laid to the K's charge.

[2.] Not long after the Death of this Prince, Henry, Earl of Champaigne, Nephew to King Richard, married the Widow of the late King, and was in her Right, as well as by that of a new Election, declared King of Jerusalem.

[2.] Id. ib. c. 28. Henry Earl of Champaigne marries the Widow, and is elected K. of Jerusalem.

[3.] In the mean time, before this new King, with the Frenchmen, could arrive to King Richard's Assistance, he marched out, besieged and took (though not without great difficulty) the strong Castle of Darum, which he presently bestow'd upon King Henry, together with the Adjacent Territory. [4.] But though King Richard was again alarum'd with some fresh Reports concerning his Brother Earl John's Proceedings, and thereupon renew'd his Resolutions of returning home as soon as possible; yet he deferr'd putting them in Execution, by the persuasion of some of his Chief Councellors and Chaplains till Easter following, it being then about the beginning of June.

undertake it without very good Advice; and therefore [2.] Twenty perſons elected by Common Conſent, (viz.) Ten Knights-Templars, and Hoſpitallers, and Ten more out of the Chief Men of the French, and others that were Natives of the Country, were all ſworn faithfully to give their Opinions, Whither it was more feaſible to march further and beſiege Babylon, or to go preſently againſt Jeruſalem; whereupon this Great Council of War, after a long Debate, adviſed the former Deſign, which both the Kings comply'd with: Yet nevertheleſs, ſince the Duke of Burgundy and all the reſt of the French Nobility oppoſed that Reſolution, there was nothing done either one way or the other, but all things continued at a Stand.

But the D. of Burgundy and the French Nobility oppoſing it, it came to nothing.

King Richard's Memory Vindicated from the Aſperſions of the French Hiſtorians.

This fair and impartial Account why King Richard did not then undertake the Siege of Jeruſalem may ſerve to Vindicate his Memory from the Malice or Miſinformation of many of the French Hiſtorians, who make him to have put off this Reſolution either out of Favour to Saladine, or elſe out of Envy to the French, who might have reap'd great part of the Glory in taking that City: But ſuppoſe the King did then follow the worſt Advice, yet it was the Advice of a Council, that were accounted the Wiſeſt and moſt Experienced Men of the whole Army, who were then againſt that Enterprize.

[3.] However King Richard could not endure to lye Idle; and therefore hearing of a Rich Turkiſh Caravan, conſiſting of a great Company of Cammels and Dromedaries that were attended by a ſtrong Convoy, he marched with a flying Party to attack them, and ſetting upon their Guard, utterly routed it (though not without a ſharp Reſiſtance,) ſo that the whole Caravan, with all its Rich Cargo, fell into the King's hands; the greateſt part of which he diſtributed among his Souldiers, together with all the Dromedaries and Cammels.

The New K. Henry comes from Acon with his Army to K. Richard at Ramula.

Why they did not attempt Jeruſalem.

[4.] After this the King quitting all Thoughts of taking Jeruſalem, retreated to Bethaven, within Four Miles of Joppa, and from thence went to Ramula, a little Town not far off, and thither the New King Henry came to him from Acon, bringing along with him all his Forces: but though they were not many Miles from Jeruſalem, yet durſt they not attempt that Expedition in the Heat of the Year (it being about Midſummer) for want of Water, Saladine having commanded all the Wells and Ciſterns to be ſtopped up; yet without any conſideration of theſe difficulties, the French Army murmur'd, and were extreamly diſcontented that the Siege was put off: inſomuch that the Duke of Burgundy with his Officers mightily blam'd King Richard's Conduct, and the Duke himſelf made a Lampoon or Ballad upon it, which he cauſed to be Sung in his Army very much to King Richard's diſgrace: which when he heard, it ſo provoked him, that in Revenge he himſelf made another Lampoon upon the Duke and his Frenchman, and likewiſe cauſed That to be Sung in his Camp. This, together with divers other Quarrels, begot ſo great Diſcord among them, that they marched back again toward the Sea-ſide, and ſeparating their Camps, would not aſſociate with each other any longer: Whereupon Saladine taking advantage of theſe Diſſentions, recruited his Army, ſending for Twenty Thouſand freſh Men to Jeruſalem, where he then was.

[5.] In the mean while great Part of the Chriſtian Army deſerted, and ſlipped away, ſome to Joppa, and ſome to other places; which the King perceiving, propoſed a Truce to Saladine for ſome time, till he could go into his own Country and return again; but the crafty Turk would by no means hear of any Truce, unleſs the King would wholly demoliſh Aſcalon; To which He would not conſent, but quite razed the Caſtle of Darum, reinforced the Gariſon of Aſcalon, and ſo without any further delay marched back with his Army to Acon, intending to return home with the firſt Opportunity.

[5.] Id. ib. c. 11. K Richard propoſes a Truce to Saladine. But it was not accepted of, unleſs Aſcalon were demoliſh'd.

The K goes back to Acon.

[1.] So ſoon as Saladine underſtood that King Richard had left Joppa he marched againſt it with a powerful Army, the very ſame day that the King went to Acon, and ſetting down before it, he batter'd it ſo furiouſly with his Engines, that in a few days he made himſelf Maſter of the Town, and put all the Sick and Weak men in it to the Sword; but the reſt fled into the Caſtle, which Saladine had likewiſe certainly taken, had not the Patriarch of Jeruſalem, who was then in the place, treated with him to ſurrender it, unleſs they were relieved the next day by Nine of the Clock; and the Patriarch, together with the Governor of the Caſtle, were given as Hoſtages for the performance of the Conditions: yet he had before hand ſent to King Richard an Account of their deſperate Condition, imploring his Aſſiſtance, telling him, that they hoped for a ſpeedy Relief. The King, ſo ſoon as he heard in what a miſerable ſtreight the Beſieged were, though he had then put a good part of his Men on Ship-board, and deſign'd to go away himſelf the next day, yet now changed his Reſolution, and went immediately to the Relief of the Place; He with his Forces going by Sea, whilſt the Knights-Templars and Hoſpitallers, with many other Valiant Souldiers, march'd by Land; and they came juſt in the nick of time, for the Hour of their Surrendering being paſt, as Saladine was preparing to make a general Aſſault, the King's Gallies were ſeen to enter the Harbour: upon which the Turks found ſomewhat elſe to do; and leaving the Siege ran down to the Sea ſide, to ſee if they could hinder the Chriſtians from Landing: but notwithſtanding all the Oppoſition the Turks could make with Arrows and Stones, they got on ſhore, the King himſelf ſhewing them the way, by leaping into the Water up to the Waſt: then marching with a Croſs bow in one hand, and a Sword in the other at the Head of his Men, he deſtroyed all the Turks that ſtood in this way, putting the reſt to flight, and ſo at laſt by a cover'd winding way entered into the City with ſome of his Men, there killing moſt of the Turks that were got into the outward Caſtle and City; ſo that Saladine with his whole Army being preſently forced to decamp, he retreated with them further up into the Country, and the King durſt not perſue them, both by reaſon of the Smallneſs of his Forces, and becauſe he had no more than three Horſes, and thoſe too he found in the Town; however marching out, He pitched his Tents in the ſame place which Saladine had quitted.

But whilſt they were debating this matter, a certain Genoeſe going out before day, diſcovered theſe Saracens by the noiſe of their Horſe's Feet. Thereupon running back into the Camp, he gave the Alarm, at which the King leaping out of his Bed, preſently dreſſed himſelf, and put on his Armour, and then with but Ten Horſemen (of whom the New King Henry and the Earl of Leiceſter were chief) having firſt drawn up his Forces in Battalia, he preſently march'd againſt the Turks. But now it ſeems Saladine had not only ſent out a ſtrong Body of Men to ſecond and relieve the Conſpirators, but alſo had order'd his Brother Saphadine to follow that Body with a great part of his Army.

[3.] King Richard thus marching out (as I ſaid) at the head of his Forces, (after a ſhort ſpeech to excite their valour) ſtood ſtill to receive the firſt aſſault of the Turks; and though they made a briſk and violent Charge in ſeveral Parties, one after another, yet not being able to break their Enemy's Ranks, they were forced to retreat; the Chriſtian Archers perſuing them with their Arrows, and killing a great many of them. Then the King, with his few Horſe (finding there was no good to be done againſt ſuch a Body as they had, who could either aſſault them, or retire at their pleaſure) immediately rode up briskly to the Turkiſh Horſe, and put them to flight. And indeed it is almoſt incredible what wonderful things he himſelf perform'd that day, killing many of the Turks with his own hands, and delivering the Earl of Leiceſter, who was taken priſoner; inſomuch that Saphadine himſelf was ſo tranſported with his Valour, that he ſent him, even during the Fight, two brave Arabian Horſes, ſince he ſaw the King then ſtood in ſuch need of them.

This handſome Preſent being thankfully accepted, and the bringers of it nobly rewarded, [4.] the Battle was again renewed, and the whole burthen lay upon the King, and thoſe few Landmen he had with him, for the Sea-men were fled to their Galleys; and the Turks to divert the King's Forces had ſent ſome to fetch a Compaſs, and ſurprize the Town; which when the King heard, he preſently retreated thither though but with a very few Men, and not only drove the Turks out, but alſo went and made his own men once more to quit their Galleys, and come on ſhore to his Aſſiſtance; after this he led back his Party to ſuccour his ſmall Army, which were ſtill engaged, and in great pain for his abſence; but as ſoon as he return'd, the Turks ſet all upon him; ſo that if he had not defended himſelf almoſt to admiration, and his Souldiers had not that day ſtoutly maintained their Ranks, both He and they had certainly periſhed.

Anno Dom. MCXCII.

Among other heroick Actions which he then performed, this was one; A certain Admiral or Turkiſh Commander bravely mounted and Armed, ſetting upon King Richard, he received his Charge, and gave him ſuch a terrible ſtroke with his Sword, that he cut off his Head, and part of his Shoulder, at one Blow; ſo that none of the Turks daring to engage any more with him hand to hand, they ſhot at him with their Arrows, till both his Coat of Mail, and the Furniture of his Horſe were ſtuck full of them. And the Turks, finding at laſt that they could not prevail againſt him and his ſmall Army, were forced to retreat, leaving above Seven Hundred dead Bodies upon the place, with the Loſs of a very few Chriſtians.

The Turks deſpairing, retreated, leaving 700 dead Bodies on the place, and but a few Chriſtians loſt.

[5] The King having again retired into the Town, fell very ſick through the great Fatigues he had endured in the late Fight, as alſo through the Corruption of the Air, that was occaſion'd by ſo many dead Carcaſſes, which lay unburied. Hereupon Saladine threatned, That if he would not depart thence, he would quickly come down and take him Priſoner: but he ſent him word, That he would expect his coming, nor ſhould his Threats make him quit the place: However, conſidering that he was much inferior to the Turks in Number, and but in a bad State of health himſelf, he ſent the New King Henry to Ceſarea to deſire the Duke of Burgundy with his Frenchmen to come to his Aſſiſtance, and to defend the Countrey; but they refuſing to give him any Succour, he had no way left, but to provide for his own ſafety as well as he could: Therefore at firſt he reſolved to leave Joppa, and return to Acon for the recovery of his Health; which when King Henry and the Knights-Templars and Hoſpitallers heard, they earneſtly perſuaded him to the Contrary, affirming, That without him they could not maintain any Place; whereupon the King being greatly troubled in Mind what to do, found it could not conſiſt either with his own Honour, or their Safeties, to leave them till he had made a Truce with King Saladine upon the beſt terms he then could, therefore treating with him by the means of Saphadine his Brother (who had always a great Reſpect for King Richard) there was at laſt a Truce concluded between them for the Space of Three years, upon theſe Conditions: Firſt, That Aſcalon ſhould be demoliſhed, and not repaired or fortified by either Party during that time: yet that Joppa might be repaired, and poſſeſſed by the Chriſtians, as alſo all the Countrey then in the Chriſtian's hands, without any hinderance or violence from the Turks; And then, that the Chriſtians ſhould have free Liberty to go on Pilgrimage to the Holy Sepulchre without paying any thing for it, and likewiſe ſhould have free Commerce throughout all Saladine's Dominions.

Saladine's Threats againſt King Richard.

The K's Anſwer to him.

He ſends K. Henry to Ceſarea, to deſire the D. of Burgundy's Aſſiſtance, but was refus'd it.

At laſt a Truce is concluded between them for Three years, upon Conditions.

Theſe Articles King Richard agreed to, being the beſt he could obtain, conſidering the preſent State of Affairs, and He being then in a very ill State of Health, and deſtitute of Forces, and the Enemy with a Great Army lying within two Miles of the Place where he was.

Which tho' diſadvantageous, yet was the beſt King Richard could make at preſent.

Anno Dom. MCXCII.

[1.] Id ib. c. 28, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34.

Why the King desired it for Three years.

Saladine's generous Answer.

[1.] After all things were thus concluded between Saladine and King Richard, he sent Ambassadors to him to let him know, that he only desired this short Truce, that so he might return home for a time; and when he had recruited himself with Men and Money, he would return again, and once more endeavour to recover the Holy-Land from his Dominion. To which Saladine is said to have return'd this generous Answer by the same Messengers; That he called God to witness, that he had so great an Esteem for King Richard's Worth and Valour, that if it must be his Fate to lose that Country, he had rather it should be to Him, than to any other Prince whosoever. And Saladine so far made good his Complements, that he gave to all those who had King Richard's safe Letters of Conduct free liberty to go to the Holy Sepulchre, and return again in safety; which was at that time a very great Favour, for he denied it to all the French, because King Richard had refused them his Letters of Protection: So King Richard's Subjects being divided into three Bands under three several Leaders, (Two whereof were Noblemen, and the Third Hubert Bishop of Salisbury) they all one after another perform'd the Pilgrimage they had Vowed to the Holy Sepulchre: And it is very observable, that Saladine, though he was much pressed to it by the Turkish Commanders to let them go and destroy the first of those Troops that came thither, in revenge of those many Brave Men they had lost; yet He would by no means suffer it, because he knew it would be a great dishonour not only to Himself, but also to his whole Nation, if he should have now broken the Truce so lately made; and therefore he gave the Pilgrims leave (as I said before) to go, and return without the least molestation.

He gives those who had the K's Letters of Safe Conduct liberty to visit the Holy Sepulchre, but denies it to the French.

The K's Subjects thereupon perform'd their Pilgrimage.

[2.] Id ib. c. 35, 36.

After their Vows performed, in return home, great part of them perished by Shipwreck.

300,000 Pilgrims lost their Lives at the Siege of Acon alone.

[2.] The Pilgrimage being thus perform'd, most of the Pilgrims took Shipping in order to return home; but a great part of them perishing by Shipwreck and other Accidents, never again saw their Native Countries: And our Author assures us from very good hands, that there were no less than Three Hundred Thousand Pilgrims who lost their Lives at the Siege of Acon alone, besides those that died afterwards in the City: If this be so, let the Reader judge what a vast Number more must have perish'd in other places.

[3.] Id. ib. c. 37.

King Richard makes Proclamation, to pay all those to whom he owed Moneys, and resolves to return home.

He redeems Will. de Pratellis by Ten Turks.

[3.] But this is certain, that King Richard having now recover'd his Health by retiring to a place called Cayphas, and settled all his Affairs, caused Proclamation to be made, That all those to whom he owed any Money should come and receive it, for he resolved to return home with all speed, because of the various Reports he had heard concerning the King of France his Actions, and the Expulsion of his Chancellor. So having redeemed that stout Knight William de Pratellis (who had lost his own Liberty to save the King's) by Exchanging Ten Turks of Quality for him, and taking that Gentleman with about Twenty Others in his Retinue, [4.] he returned to

Acon

Acon, and there went on Board a great Buſs which was bound for the Iſle of Corfu, about the beginning of October; where arriving within leſs than a Month, he ſail'd partly in a ſmall Ship, and partly in certain Galleys as far as Raguſa, in the Gulph of Venice, and Landing not far from that City, reſolv'd to go by Land through Sclavonia into Auſtria; where when they arriv'd, though He and thoſe that attended him being diſguiſed like Pilgrims, and letting their Hair and Beards grow to a great length, thought they ſhould not be known; yet could he not be long conceal'd, by reaſon of his more than ordinary Expences; which was alſo confirm'd by the Rumours that ran about, of his being ſomewhere in thoſe Parts. Anno Dom. MCXCII.

From thence he went to Raguſa.

When he came to Auſtria, he could not be conceal'd for all his diſguiſe.

Wherefore the King being afraid of the Duke of Auſtria whom he had affronted, as likewiſe becauſe he knew he had a great Grudge againſt him, by reaſon of the League he had made with Tancred King of Sicily, the Emperor's Competitor for that Kingdom; as alſo becauſe of the Murther of the late Marqueſs of Montferrat his Kinſman, in which he ſuſpected King Richard to have had a hand: Wherefore, I ſay, being afraid of his being taken Priſoner, he privately withdrew from his Retinue, the Charge of whom he committed to one of his Principal Gentlemen that waited on him; and ſo taking Horſe with only one Servant, he travelled Day and Night till he arrived near Vienna: But coming to a ſmall Village, and lying down on a Bed to repoſe himſelf, whilſt in the mean time his Servant went out to buy Proviſions, he was known by one belonging to the Duke of Auſtria; and being ſeiz'd and brought before him, after many Enquiries he was forced to reveal where the King was: So the Duke ſending thither, they immediately took him Priſoner as he lay aſleep; of which Prize the Duke was not a little Joyful, having now an Opportunity, not only of revenging himſelf upon the King for the Affront he had put upon him in flinging down his Banner at the Taking of Acon, but alſo of enriching himſelf by a great Ranſom, which he reſolv'd to have for him before he would let him go.

They reſolve to ſeize, and deliver him to the Emperor.

He is taken Priſoner near Vienna by a Servant of his being diſcover'd.

Thus ended this Great Prince's unfortunate Expedition to the Holy-Land, as inglorioufly, as it was at firſt magnanimouſly undertaken.

I have been the more particular in relating the chiefeſt and moſt remarkable Actions that were perform'd by this Valiant Prince in this famous Expedition, becauſe it has never yet been ſo largely told in Engliſh, and becauſe it is ſo much to the Honour of this King's Memory, and may ſerve for a Vindication of One of our Greateſt Monarchs from the falſe and rude Aſperſions of divers of the French Hiſtorians.

But it is now time to look back into England and ſee what has been doing there, ſince the laſt Account we gave you concerning the Biſhop of Ely; [5.] who ſo ſoon as he arriv'd in France, wrote to the Pope long Letters full of Complaints, how ill he had been

[5.] Id. p. 402. a.

Anno Dom. MCXCII. been uſed in Contempt of his Legantine Authority: At which the Pope was ſo much incenſed, that he Commanded the Archbiſhops and Biſhops of England to Excommunicate Earl John and all his Adviſers and Accomplices. Upon this the Biſhop of Ely as Legate, wrote to the Biſhop of Lincoln immediately to put in Execution the Pope's Brief, and ſent him the Names of all ſuch as he would have him to Excommunicate by name, viz. Walter Archbiſhop of Roüen, Godfrey Biſhop of Wincheſter, Hugh Biſhop of Coventry, William Earl Mareſchal, Geoffrey Fitz-Peter, William Briwere, Hugh Bardolf, and many Others; but none of the Biſhops would Execute either the Pope's or his Commands, as not owning him any longer for Legate or Chancellor: and which was more, the Archbiſhop of Roüen and the other Lords Juſtices of England (who had then undertook the Government) diſſeized him of his Biſhoprick, and Collected the Rents to the King's uſe, to make good the Money he had waſted: Aud then the ſaid Juſtices, and all the Biſhops, Earls and Barons of England ſent to the King, and by one Common Letter acquainted him, how that his Chancellor had impoveriſh'd the Nation, and waſted his Treaſure, and for his ſo doing, had been put out of his Office by the Common-Council of the Nation. On the other ſide, the Chancellor wrote to the King, that his Brother Earl John had ſeized the Kingdom, and would make himſelf King, if he did not ſpeedily return home. No wonder therefore if he made what haſte he could to get back into England.

The Pope writes to the A Bps. and Bps of England to Excommunicate Earl John.

The Bps refuſe to do it.

[1] Id. p. 408. [1.] In Lent following, Queen Eleanor, the King's Mother, being now return'd out of Normandy, the Archbiſhops of Roüen and York, and all the Great Men of the Kingdom, met and ſwore Fealty and Faithful Service to King Richard, and his Heirs, againſt all Men: Yet at the ſame time Earl John having promiſed the Biſhop of Ely for Five Hundred Pounds to reſtore him to his Office of Chancellor, had ſent for him privately into England, and endeavour'd to perſuade the Great Men to permit his coming, but they would not; but they ſent him word, That unleſs he forthwith departed the Kingdom, they would impriſon him; Wherefore not daring to ſtay here any longer, he went beyond Sea on Good-Friday following: ſo all the reſt of this Year paſſed quietly under the prudent Government of Walter Archbiſhop of Roüen, and the other Juſtices of the Kingdom.

Earl John endeavours to reſtore the Chancellor, but the Great Men would not conſent to it.

[2] R. H. p. 408. b. [2] I ſhall conclude this Year with an Account of the State of Affairs in France, where King Philip, almoſt as ſoon as he return'd from the Holy-Land, (and before he had heard of King Richard's Impriſonment) went to the Borders of Normandy, and there held a Treaty with the Seneſchal and Noblemen of that Dutchy, of whom he demanded his Siſter Alice, who was then kept in the Caſtle of Roüen; as alſo the Caſtle of Giſors, and the Earldoms of Ewe and Albemarle, and ſhewed them the Agreements in writing which had been made between Him and King Richard at Meſſina for the delivery of the Lady and of thoſe Territories: but the Seneſchal and Nobility would return the French King no other Anſwer, Than that they had received ceived no Orders from their Maſter concerning any of thoſe things, and therefore could not comply with his Deſires: At which King Philip being provok'd, raiſed a great Army, and would preſently have invaded Normandy; but the Chief Noblemen of France would by no means agree to it, ſaying, That the Pope had Excommunicated all thoſe who ſhould make War upon the King of England before his Return: So King Philip was forced for that Time to give over this Enterprize.

Anno Dom. MCXCII.

Upon the Seneſchal and other Noblemen of that Dutchy their denial, he raiſes an Army to invade Normandy, but durſt not.

Alſo about the ſame Time, whilſt the Seneſchal of Gaſcony lay ſick, the Count of Perigord, and the Viſcount de la Marche, with all the Barons of thoſe Parts, began to waſte the Territories of the King of England, and would grant the Seneſchal neither Peace nor Truce, though he often deſired it: Wherefore, as ſoon as he was well, he in Revenge invaded the Territories of that Count, and taking ſeveral of his Caſtles, fortified ſome of them, and deſtroy'd others, and ſubdued the whole Earldom to the King's Obedience.

The Seneſchal of Gaſcony ſubdues the whole Earldom of Perigord to K. Richard's Obedience.

[3.] Not long after which, the Eldeſt Son of the King of Navarre, and Brother to Queen Berengera, came to the Seneſchal's Aſſiſtance with Eight Hundred Souldiers, and they both together entred the Territories of the Count of Tholouſe, and took divers Caſtles near that City, ſome of which they fortified, and others they razed.

[3.] Id. p. 410. a. Q. Berengera's Brother, and the Seneſchal, take divers Caſtles from the Count of Tholouſe.

[4.] King Philip, being highly diſſatisfied that the Seneſchal of Normandy had refus'd to deliver him his Siſter, with thoſe Places he demanded, and being now aſſured by the Emperor's Letters of King Richard's Impriſonment, was reſolved to take another courſe; therefore preſently after Chriſtmaſs he ſent ſeveral Meſſengers into England to Earl John, promiſing him, That if he would ſubmit to, and follow his Advice, he ſhould Marry his Siſter Alice, and with her ſhould enjoy all Normandy, Aquitain, and Anjou, as likewiſe all the Lands his late Father had been poſſeſſed of in France; Nay farther, he promiſed him that he would make him King of England in his Brother's Room.

Anno Dom. MCXCIII.

[4.] Id. p. 412. a. The King of France ſends to Earl John, offering him his Siſter Alice in Mariage, and to make him K. in his Brother's room.

[5.] Whereupon Earl John ſoon after paſſed into Normandy, where the Seneſchal and other Great Men met him, andbeing ignorant of his Traiterous deſigns, they deſired his Preſence at Alençon to conſult with them about the King, his Brother's Affairs, and the freeing him from his Impriſonment: But the Earl told them, That if they would receive him as their Lord, and ſwear Fealty to him, he would go with them, and undertake their defence againſt the King of France, but otherwiſe he would not: Whereupon the Noblemen of Normandy refuſed his Propoſals, and reſolved to own none but their Lawful Sovereign.

[5.] Id. ib. Earl John refuſes to treat with the Norman Nobility about the K's releaſe, unleſs they would accept him for their Lord.

But they refuſe.

[1.] The Earl being thus diſappointed of his Expectations, immediately went to the King of France, and did Homage to him for Normandy, and the reſt of his Brother's Dominions on that ſide the Sea; nay (as it was reported) for England alſo, and ſwore he would take take to Wife his Sister Alice; and then releasing to him Gisors, and the whole Norman Veuxin, the King gave him with his Sister that part of Flanders he had in his possession, and swore he would do his utmost to help him to gain England, and the rest of his Brother's Dominions.

He does Homage to the King of France for Normandy, and swore he would marry his Sister Alice.

What the French K gave him with his Sister.

[2.] Then Earl John return'd into England, bringing many Strangers over with him, and had the Castles of Windsor and Wallingford deliver'd to him: From whence he came to London, and demanded the Kingdom from the Archbishop of Roüen, and the other Justices (or Commissioners for the Government) and the Fealty of the Military Tenants or Vassals, affirming, That his Brother the King was dead, but they believed him not: And when he saw he was rejected by the Justitiaries and Great Men, he, transported with Indignation, fortified his Places of Strength, and invaded his Brother's Territories in an Hostile manner. But the Justitiaries had so well secured the Ports, as neither French nor Flemings, that promised him Assistance, durst attempt to Land in England. They likewise Besieged Windsor-Castle; and the Archbishop of York, with Hugh Bardolfe, One of the King's Justitiaries (and then Sheriff of Yorkshire,) and William de Stuteville raised an Army in that Countrey, and marched to Doncaster, which they very well fortified. Then the Archbishop would have gone on, and Besieged Tickhill, a Castle belonging to Earl John: but the Other Two Justitiaries would not consent to it, because they were his * Tenants or Feudataries: Upon which the Archbishop, with his People, left them, calling 'em Traytors to the King and Kingdom.

[2.] Then Earl John return'd into England, bringing many Strangers over with him, and had the Castles of Windsor and Wallingford deliver'd to him: From whence he came to London, and demanded the Kingdom from the Archbishop of Roüen, and the other Justices (or Commissioners for the Government) and the Fealty of the Military Tenants or Vassals, affirming, That his Brother the King was dead, but they believed him not: And when he saw he was rejected by the Justitiaries and Great Men, he, transported with Indignation, fortified his Places of Strength, and invaded his Brother's Territories in an Hostile manner. The Justitiaries reject him, and secure the Ports.

And raise an Army to oppose him.

* Homines sui.

But it is high time to look back into Germany, and see how King Richard passed his Time there during his Imprisonment by the Duke of Austria at [3.] Vienna; where having been kept close Prisoner ever since the latter end of December, the Emperor Henry VI. now sent to demand him, alledging, That the Duke being his Vassal, it belonged not to him to have the Custody of the King's Person: Whereupon the Duke (partly for fear of the Emperor, and partly because he was by him promised a large Share of the Ransom demanded for his Liberty) deliver'd him into the Emperor's Custody: So on the Wednesday before Easter the King was brought into his Presence in a great Assembly of the Nobility and People. The Emperor thinking to terrify him, spake at first roughly to him, and laid many things to his Charge, especially the Murther of the late Marquess of Conrade his Cousin: but the King knowing his own Innocency, answer'd all the Emperor's Allegations with so much Eloquence and Courage, that he not only gave great Satisfaction to all there present, but moved the Emperor himself to Compassionate his Misfortunes, and to Reverence his Person, though not to that degree, as to make him willing to discharge him without a great Ransom, which was soon after agreed upon for One Hundred Thousand Marks; and till the payment of part, and giving Security for the rest, the Emperor detain'd him in [5.] safe (though honourable) Custody, and suffer'd his Servants and Great Officers to have Access to his Person.

[3.] R. H. p. 410. a. The Emperor sends to the D. of Austria, to deliver K. Richard up to him, which he did accordingly.

[4.] Id. p. 411. a. The K being brought into the Emperor's Presence, he at first treated him roughly.

But the King's Eloquence and Courage in answering, moved all there present to compassionate him.

Thither

Thither alſo came to him the Biſhop of Ely, the late Chancellor, to complain againſt thoſe who had expell'd him the Kingdom; and thereupon the King preſently reſtores him to his former Office, becauſe he was not turn'd out by his Orders: After him came Hubert, Biſhop of Salisbury, out of Sicily, where he had receiv'd the ill News of the King's being taken Priſoner; but his Stay was not long there before he was diſpatch'd away into England, not only to take care of the Kingdom, but alſo to haſten the raiſing his Ranſom, ſince there was no Man, upon whoſe Prudence and Fidelity the King could more ſafely rely.

Anno Dom. MCXCIII.

The Bp. of Ely goes to him, and complains of his hard Uſage, who reſtores him to his Chancellorſhip.

[1.] Not long after Eaſter the Abbots of Boxley and Robertsbridge, who had been ſent by the Juſtitiaries ſome Months before to find out the King, return'd home, and brought back a full Account of the Agreement that had been made between him and the Emperor, which was to this effect; viz. That the King of England ſhould pay to the Roman Emperor an Hundred Thouſand Marks of Silver for his Ranſom, and find moreover Fifty Galleys with all their Furniture, and Twenty Knights to be in his Service for One Year; and that they themſelves had been preſent at the making of this Contract; and farther, that the King of France having lately ſent his Envoys to defy King Richard on his behalf, the Emperor had anſwer'd them, That whoever affronted the King of England, injur'd himſelf: All which were but meer Words, for he never did any thing againſt the King of France in favour of King Richard, nor ſent any Forces to his Aſſiſtance.

[1] Id. ib.

The Two Abbots that had been ſent to find out the King, return home, and bring an Account of the Agreement between Him and the Emperor.

[2.] In the mean time the King of France again invaded Normandy, and beſieged the Caſtle of Giſors, which Gilbert de Vaſcoil preſently ſurrender'd up to him, together with the Caſtle of Neſle; but he was accounted a moſt notorious Traytor for this unworthy Action; He having had the Cuſtody of both theſe Places committed to him by the King himſelf whilſt he was at Meſſina.

[2.] Id. ib.

Giſors ſurrender'd to the K. of France, and the Caſtle of Neſle, by Gilbert de Voſcoil.

[3.] King Philip having taken Albemarle, and divers other ſtrong Caſtles in Normandy, came before Roüen with his whole Army, threatning its deſtruction unleſs they ſurrender'd the City: But Robert Earl of Leiceſter, who was lately return'd from the Holy Land, having put himſelf into it, ſo encouraged the Citizens againſt the French King, that though he Beſieged the City for ſome days, yet having received more damage than what he had done to the Town, he was forced at laſt to Raiſe the Siege. But in his Retreat from thence he took the ſtrong Caſtles of Paſcie and Wierie without much difficulty. Then, to put ſome ſtop to his Carriere, the Governors of Normandy procured a Truce from the King of France, by promiſing him a great Sum of Money, and by delivering up Four Caſtles as a Pledge for the performance of the ſame.

[3] Id. p. 411. W. N.

K. Philip with his whole Army threatens deſtruction to Roüen, and beſieges it.

The E. of Leiceſter then in it oppoſes him, & makes him Raiſe the Siege.

The Governors of Normandy procure a Truce from the K. of France.

[4.] In the mean while King Richard looking upon his delivery as certainly agreed on, (the Terms of it being already ſetled as you have heard,) thereupon ſent into England for Ships under Alan de Trenchmer

Anno Dom. MCXCIII. King Richard ſends for his Ships to bring him over.

Trenchmer his Admiral in order to his Tranſportation, as alſo Orders to get ready the Hoſtages that were to be delivered to the Emperor for the payment of the Ranſom, according to the Agreement which had been made between them: But the performance of it being from time to time delay'd, All began to wonder at his long Stay, and very much to doubt of his Return, for the reaſon of this delay was not then known. But the King of France combining with Earl John againſt the King his Brother, had ſent underhand certain Envoys to the Emperor, promiſing him a great Sum of Money if he would detain King Richard ſtill a Priſoner; So that for ſome time he was put under ſtreighter cuſtody, and had heavier Chains upon him, which made his Subjects in England, who knew nothing of theſe Tranſactions, to be in ſuſpence, what would become of him: and this was the true Reaſon, that now the Archbiſhop of Roüen, and the other Juſtitiaries, though they had forced Earl John to a Complyance, and taken the Caſtle of Windſor out of his hands, yet now made a Truce with him till the Feaſt of All-Saints; the Caſtles of Nottingham and Tickhill being to remain ſtill in his Cuſtody as they were before; but the Caſtles of Windſor, Wallingford and Pet, were ſurrender'd to the Queen-Mother, upon Condition, to have them re-delivered to the Earl, if the King never returned.

K. Philip underhand combines with E. John, and promiſes the Emperor a good Sum of Money to keep Richard ſtill a Priſoner.

A Truce made with E John by the A. Bp. of Roüen and the other Juſtitiaries.

The K. writes to his Subjects to ſend Money for his Releaſe.

[5.] Not long after this there arrived other Meſſengers from the King, who brought his Letters directed to all Archbiſhops, Biſhops Earls, Barons, Clerks and Free Tenants of the Kingdom, wherein he deſired all the Clergy and Laiety to give ſuch an Aid as might procure his Liberty; and the Emperor himſelf then alſo wrote to them (though in general Terms) that the King and He were agreed upon his Ranſom, though without naming the Sum.

[1.] Id. ib.

[1.] And the Reader is alſo to take notice, that the Pope had ſome time before threatned the whole Kingdom with an Interdict, unleſs the King were ſpeedily ſet free, and had wrote to the King of France, declaring, That he would anathematize his Kingdom, unleſs he forbore diſturbing the King of England's Territories, whilſt he was a Priſoner.

His Letters directed to the Q. his Mother, his Juſtices, and all other his faithful Subjects.

[2.] Our Author hath alſo given us the King's Letters above mention'd, directed to Queen Eleanor his Mother, and to his Juſtices and all other his faithful Subjects; wherein he lets them know, that being lately brought from the Caſtle of Triuellis, he had met the Emperor at Hagenon; and being by him honourably received, there was now a firm League and Agreement made between them, but mentions not the payment of more than Seventy Thouſand Pounds for his Ranſome, which he deſires all the Parties abovemention'd to raiſe with all poſſible ſpeed; and alſo to take an Account in writing of what Plate belongs to any Churches; and likewiſe that they ſhould get the Hoſtages ready that were to be ſent over for the true payment of the reſidue of the Money that ſhould remain behind; and further orders it to be paid to the Queen his Mother, and thoſe whom ſhe ſhall appoint to receive it. Theſe Letters are dated from Hagenow the Tenth of April this Year. Anno Dom. MCXCIII

[3.] Upon the Receipt of the King's Letters, and by their Authority, the Queen-Mother and the Lords Juſtices determined, that all Clerks and Laicks ſhould contribute a Fourth part of their Revenues that Year for the Redemption of the King; and beſides, this ſhould add ſo much more out of their Moveable Goods, ſo that when the King return'd he might own it as an Obligation. [3.] Id. ib. How and upon whom this Sum was levied and raiſed.

[4] Then beſides this, they ſet Twenty Shillings upon every Knight's Fee; and farther ordered, that the Abbies of the Ciſtertians, and Houſes of the Order of Semplingham, ſhould contribute all their Wooll of that Year; and that all the Gold and Silver the Churches were poſſeſſed of ſhould be brought forth, and delivered up for the ſame purpoſe; yet that this Tax was not impoſed by the King's Prerogative, (as ſome are apt to believe) appears from hence, That [5.] (as Rad. de Diceto relates,) all this Money was raiſed Aſſenſu Communi, that is, by the Authority of the Great Council of the Kingdom. [4] Id. ib. The Gold and Silver taken out of the Churches, to be reſtored. [5.] Col. 670. This only a Benevolence.

[1.] Thus was a vaſt Sum raiſed in England, and received by the Emperor's Envoys at London, in part of the King's Ranſom, and that by exact Weight and Meaſure, being ſeal'd up, and deliver'd to ſuch as were to convey it to the Borders of the Empire, at the hazard of the King of England. [1.] Id. ib.

But certainly this was raiſed with very great Severity; for [2.] William of Newburgh tells us, That the King's Officers puſh'd forward this buſineſs in all Parts of England with that Earneſtneſs, that they ſpar'd no body; and that without any diſtinction of either Clerk, or Laick, Secular or Religious Perſons, all were compell'd to pay indifferently, according to their Ability, or their Yearly Incomes: Nor did the Privileges of Churches and Monaſteries then ſignify any thing; ſo that the very Chalices and Altar-Plate was deliver'd to the King's Officers to make up the Sum. Nor did one Levy ſuffice; for when it was believed, that the Sum already raiſed did much exceed what was demanded for the King's Ranſom, yet by Tricks and Artifices (as was ſuppoſed) of the King's Officers, it fell ſhort, ſo that there was a Neceſſity for a Second payment, and after that a Third, whereby they deſpoiled all the Wealthy Men of the Kingdom of their Money and Goods. However, this ſpecious and popular Argument of reſtoring the King his Liberty, made them the more contentedly to ſwallow this bitter Pill; for it was very well urged to the Clergy, that ſince the Gold and Silver Plate belonging to Churches might be beſtow'd upon the Redemption of Chriſtian Captives, much more for reſtoring the King to his former Liberty. This Benevolence raiſed with great Severity. [2] Q. 4 c. 35. B. C. Col. 12. By Three Levies, and yet proved not ſufficient.

But though the whole Nation was near quite drained of its Money, yet was it not ſufficient to diſcharge the Sum demanded, and therefore Hoſtages were to be given for the Remainder: [3.] About which Affair the Biſhop of Ely now came to England, and immediately went to St. Albans, where the Queen-Mother, the Archbiſhop of Roüen, and the other Juſtitiaries then were; and he there produced a Letter from the Emperor to the Earls, Barons, and Noblemen of England, ſeal'd with a * Bull or Seal of Gold, ſetting forth his late Agreement with, and great Reſpect he had for the Hoſtages given for the Remainder. [3.] R. H. p. 413. b. The Bp. of Ely returns into England to manage the King's buſineſs.

King, as alſo his Readineſs to reſent all Injuries done to him as if they were done to himſelf.

And then the Biſhop with ſeeming great Humility told the Lords, That he came not as a Juſtitiary, or a Legate, nor yet as a Chancellor, but only as a Biſhop and the King's Envoy. Then he Enjoyn'd ſome of the Biſhops, Earls and Barons, to go back with him, and attend upon the King; Whereupon Gilbert, Biſhop of Rocheſter, Sefred Biſhop of Chicheſter, Benedict Abbot of Peterburgh, Richard Earl of Clare, Earl Roger Bigot, Geoffrey de Say, and many other Noblemen went along with him accordingly.

He is reinveſted with it by the Emperor to hold it of him by Annual Tribute.

But before his Death the Emperor diſcharges him of it.

But it is now time to ſhew you, by what means the King had at laſt hopes to obtain his Liberty, [4.] which, our Author (under the laſt Year) tells us, was, by making over his Kingdom to the Emperor, inveſting him with it by the delivery of his Cap; and that then the Emperor preſently delivered it back to him, to hold it of him by the Annual Tribute of Five Thouſand Pounds Sterling, and re inveſted him by a double Croſs of Gold: but the Emperor before his Death acquitted and diſcharged King Richard and his Heirs of this and all other manner of Contracts: But ſince I find this Tranſaction in no other Author of that Time, nor yet to be comprized in the Articles of Peace between the Emperor and the King, and that it does not ſeem agreeable to his wonted Greatneſs of Mind, I know not what great credit to give to it.

A Treaty between the Emperor and K. of France.

But broke off by K Richard's Policy.

[5.] But this is more certain which the ſame Author relates, that there being about this time a great Conſpiracy of the Princes of the Empire againſt the Emperor, by reaſon of the Murther of the late Biſhop of Liege, which the Emperor was ſuſpected to have contrived; he had no way to avoid it, but by making a ſtricter Confederacy with the King of France. One of the main Articles of which (if it had taken effect) was, That King Richard ſhould be deliver'd up to King Philip, and the Day was appointed for that purpoſe: But the King of England by his Intereſt and Mediation ſo prevailed with the Princes of the Empire to reſt ſatisfied with the firſt Agreements, that the intended Treaty between the Emperor and the King of France was wholly defeated.

[1] Id. ib.

A Treaty between the Emperor and K. of England.

[1.] This done, the Emperor the next day after St. John Baptiſt came to Wormes, where the King of England then was: and there a Treaty was held between them four days; there were preſent at it all the Biſhops of thoſe Parts, with the Dukes of Lovain and Lemburgh, and many Earls and Barons; On the King's behalf appeared the Biſhops of Bathe and Ely, and on the Fourth day after William Briwere, and Baldwin de Bretun came to the King, though as yet they all deſpaired of his Liberty; But on the day following they came to a final Agreement upon theſe Conditions.

The Agreement between them.

I. That the King of England ſhould pay Henry the Emperor One Hundred Thouſand Marks of pure Silver, according to the Weight of Cologne, and another Fifty Thouſand, as an Aid toward his Reducing Apulia.

II. That the King ſhould give the Siſter of Arthur Duke of Bretaign, his Nephew, in Mariage to the Son of the Duke of Auſtria; and that the King ſhould deliver the Emperor of Cyprus and his Daughter.

III. That

III. That the Hundred Thouſand Marks were to be brought into the Empire, at the hazard of the King of England; and when they were ſafe got there, he was freely and quietly to return into England under ſafe Conduct. Anno Dom. MCXCIII.

To which we may likewiſe add one other Article, viz. IV. That the King was to give Hoſtages for Fifty Thouſand Marks more to the Emperor, and the Duke of Auſtria; of which nevertheleſs the King was to be excuſed, if he perform'd his Promiſe concerning his Reſtoring of Henry Duke of Saxony.

[2.] The Emperor likewiſe was to give the King upon his being ſet free, ſafe Conduct through his Countrey, to what Port he ſhould pleaſe to take Shipping at; and to this all the Biſhops, Dukes, Earls and Barons there preſent ſwore on behalf of the Emperor; the Form of which Bargain or Compoſition you may find at large in our Author. [2.] Id. ib.

[3.] But that the World might believe King Richard had ſomewhat more for his Money than his bare Liberty, the Emperor at the ſame time gave unto the King of England by his Charter the Sovereignty of Provence, Vienna, and Viennois (now part of Dauphiny) Marſeilles, Narbon, Arleblanc, and Lions upon the Rhone, as far as the Alps, and whatſoever he had in Burgundy, and the Homage of the King of Arragon, the Homage of the Earl of Diſdiers, and the Homage of the Earl of St. Giles; all which were indeed noble Dominions; but the miſchief of it was, the Emperor never was poſſeſſed of them, ſo that it proved no more than a meer empty Title, without any Power, or other Advantage. [3.] Id. ib. What the Emperor gave to the K. of England. Tho his Donation proved but an empty Title.

[4.] But it is now Time to return to England, and ſee what has been done here during the King's Impriſonment: And the moſt Conſiderable Action was Eccleſiaſtical, which I ſhall mention now, becauſe it has a near Relation to Civil Affairs. [4] Id. p. 415.

The King ſent over his Letters of Congè for the Election of a new Archbiſhop of Canterbury in the Room of Baldwin, who died in the Holy-Land (as you have already heard) upon the Receipt of theſe Letters, the Biſhop of London, as Dean of that Province, ſummon'd all the Biſhops thereof to that City, with Geoffrey Prior of Canterbury and his Monks; which laſt being arrived, they would not ſtay for any Nomination by the Biſhops (as not thinking it neceſſary) but preſently Elected Hubert Walter Biſhop of Salisbury (then newly return'd from the Holy Land) Archbiſhop of Canterbury; and ſoon after preſented him to the Queen-Mother, the Archbiſhop of Roüen, and the reſt of the Biſhops, who were by that time aſſembled for this Election; who when they ſaw what the Monks had done, and that the Perſon elected was worthy of their Choice, to avoid having any difference with them, the Biſhops likewiſe preſently elected him, though the Prior and Monks did not regard it, as looking upon the Right of Electing an Archbiſhop to be wholly in themſelves: Then the Archbiſhop of Roüen, and Biſhop of London, ſitting in the King's Seat as his Vicegerents, declared the ſaid Hubert to be duely elected, and the Archbiſhop of Roüen, by the King's Authority, confirmed the ſaid Election. The King, during his Impriſonment, ſends over Letters of Congè to chuſe an A. Bp. of Canterbury. Hubert Bp. of Salisbury being Elected both by the Monks and Biſhops, is declared and confirmed A. Biſhop.

Anno Dom. MCXCIII.

I have been the more particular in the Relation of this Tranſaction, to let the Reader ſee, that it was not as yet ſetled who had the Right of Electing an Archbiſhop, whither it lay in the Monks of Chriſt-Church, Canterbury, or in the Biſhops of that Province: But this Diſpute between them being renew'd in the next Reign, it gave the Pope a Pretence to nominate one that was choſen by neither of them, as you will find in due time.

[5.] Id p 416. b. The K. ſends over for his Mother and ſeveral Great Men to attend him.

[5.] Not long after this, the King ſent for his Mother Queen Eleanor, and for Walter Archbiſhop of Roüen, with many other Great Men, to come over to him into Germany, and [1.] at the ſame time appointed Hubert the New Archbiſhop elect, Juſtitiary of England.

[1.] Id. ib. Hubert made Chief Juſtitiary of England.

In the mean while the Emperor, by the Advice of the Princes of the Empire, ſet King Richard a day for his Deliverance, of which the King gave the Archbiſhop of Canterbury notice in a Letter, on purpoſe that He might partake of the ſatisfaction he himſelf received in the aſſurance of his being ſet free at the time prefix'd, which was to be upon the Monday Three weeks after Chriſt's Nativity, and that the Sunday following he was to receive the Crown of the Kingdom of Provence, which the Emperor had beſtow'd upon him, and whereof he now ſent him the Letters Patents, &c. This bears date at Spire the Twenty-ſecond of September. A little before Chriſtmaſs the Emperor himſelf wrote to the Biſhops, Earls, Barons, and other Subjects of England, not only to let them know the certain day of the King's Deliverance, but alſo how magnificently he intended to honour him with the Crown of Provence; but all this was only to wheadle the People to part with their Money the more eaſily and contentedly.

K. Richard by Letter gives the A. Bp. of Canterbury notice, that the Emperor had ſet a day for his Deliverance, and receiving the Crown of Provence.

The Emperor writes to the ſame purpoſe into England.

[2.] So ſoon as the King of France had heard of this Agreement between the Emperor and the King, he ſent to Earl John, bidding him have a care of himſelf, for the Devil was now like to get looſe; the Earl knowing what was meant by it, preſently paſſed into Normandy, not daring to expect the King his Brother's arrival in England. Our Author a little after gives us a much more probable Account of the Reaſon of Earl John's going over, viz. That before the Agreement was confirm'd between the Emperor and King Richard, the Latter ſent William Biſhop of Ely his Chancellor, and Others into France to his Brother John, and ſo effectually prevailed with him, that he returned into Normandy, and ſwore Fealty to the King his Brother againſt all Men; and then by his Letters the King Commanded all the Caſtles belonging to the Honours he had given him to be delivered to him, as well in England as beyond Sea; but yet thoſe who had them in their Cuſtody would not deliver them upon thoſe Credentials. Whereupon he returned in Anger to the King of France, and ſtayed with him, and he gave him the Caſtles of Driencourt (now Drencourt) and Arches, which ſhould have been delivered to William Archbiſhop of Rhemes.

And ſwears Fealty to his Brother King Richard.

[3.] Id. ib. The Bp. of Ely and others ſent to King Richard by the K. of France, to make Peace with him.

[3.] Our Author farther relates, that ſoon after this, King Richard ſent the Biſhop of Ely his Chancellor, and William Briwere and Other Wiſe Men to the King of France to make Peace with him, upon any reaſonable Terms, and that they did it accordingly, and ſettled the Claims on both both ſides: Then [4] follows a long form of the Peace, which was ſuppoſed to be made between the Two Kings; wherein the Firſt Article was that the King of England ſhould be at the Mercy of his Lord, the King of France, for all thoſe Territories he had taken from him, ſo that he might keep what he would of them: After this follows very large Proviſions for the Indemnity of Earl John, and for the ſecurity of ſuch Earls and Barons of Normandy, and other the King's Dominions, who had joyned with the King of France againſt him; alſo that King Richard ſhould pay to the King of France Twenty Thouſand Marks per Annum for Two Years: and for the performance of theſe Articles, and the true payment of this Money, King Richard was to deliver up Four Caſtles to the King of France, and in the mean time they were to be maintained at the Charge of the King of England: And the ſaid Biſhop of Ely with the other Three Ambaſſadors ſwore, that King Richard at his Return home ſhould ſwear to ratifie this Agreement by his Charter; and that if he refuſed it, they would ſurrender themſelves up Priſoners to the King of France, with ſome other conditions highly diſadvantageous to King Richard.

Anno Dom. MCXCIII.

[4] Id. p. 415. The Form of the Peace ſuppoſed to be made.

The Ambaſſadors ſwore that the King their Maſter ſhould Ratify the Agreement by his Charter.

Theſe Articles, though they are there ſaid to be ſealed by all the Ambaſſadors above-mentioned, yet ſince no Other Author makes any mention of them, and that certainly they never were confirmed, or performed by King Richard, and that no Peace was ever made between them according to the Tenor of thoſe Articles, I look upon them to have been only a haſty and raſh Act of thoſe Ambaſſadors: Wherefore the King their Maſter had no reaſon to ſtand to them, they being ſo much to his Prejudice, that the Continuation of the War would ſcarce have put him into a worſe condition.

But the King was no ways obliged thereby.

This is all I can find to have happen'd worth taking notice of, during this moſt unfortunate Year of King Richard's Reign, except that [5.] his Queen Berengera, and his Siſter Joan, Queen-Dowager of Sicily, (who left the Holy Land, ſometime before the King, under the Guard of Stephen de Turnham) at laſt arrived in Italy, and from thence going to Rome, they continued there almoſt half a Year for fear of the Emperor; till they were ſent by the Pope, under the Conduct of One of his Cardinals, as far as Genoa; and there Embarking, they Landed at Marſeilles, and being honourably received by the King of Arragon, and then Earl of Provence, they were conducted through the Territories of the Earl of St. Giles into Poictou.

[5.] Id. p. 417. Q. Berengera and Joan the King's Siſter, their Travel from the Holy-Land unto Poictou.

As for other Foreign Affairs, it is very obſervable, [1.] that in the beginning of Lent this Year Saladine the Wiſeſt and moſt Valiant King that ever the Turks had, deceaſed, and his Brother Saphadine having then the Command of his Army, made himſelf King, whereupon a War aroſe between Him and his Nephew, the Son of Saladine. This I mention, to let the Reader ſee, how unfortunate it was for the Chriſtian Intereſt, that King Richard was forced to return out of Paleſtine; for could he have ſtay'd there, he might by thoſe Diſſentions among the Turks, have again recovered all that he had loſt by his Departure.

[2.] King Richard ſtill remain'd at Spire, till the time of his intended delivery, which was yet delay'd upon this occaſion; the Emperor, with the Archbiſhops, Biſhops, Dukes, and Great Men of his Empire not long after Chriſtmaſs again holding a Dyet at that City, to conſult further about the Delivery of the King of England; there came thither freſh Ambaſſadors from the King of France and Earl John, who offered the Emperor Fifty Thouſand Marks from the King, and Thirty Thouſand from the Earl, upon condition King Richard might be kept à Priſoner until Michaelmaſs following; or, if the Emperor had rather, they would give him a Thouſand Pounds a Month ſo long as he ſhould keep him Priſoner; or if it ſhould ſtill be more pleaſing to him, the King of France ſhould give him One Hundred Thouſand Marks, and Earl John Fifty Thouſand to deliver him into their hands, or at leaſt to keep him One Year longer; whereupon the Emperor being tempted with theſe great Offers, moſt diſhonourably put off his Delivery from time to time, and ordered it to be at Mentz upon Candlemaſs-day next enſuing.

But William of Newburgh and Bromton's Chronicle alſo relate ſomewhat more concerning the King's deliverance, viz. that after King Richard was thus diſcharged, and had gone ſome days Journey toward the Sea-ſide, the Emperor through evil Council repented that he had let him go, and ſent ſome of his Officers after him to cauſe him to be brought back again; but the King having timely notice of it, made ſuch haſte to get on Shipboard before they could overtake him, that they were fain to go back on an April's Errand: But ſince this Action ſeems unworthy ſo great an Emperor, and is related by no other Author except William of Newburgh, (for Bromton's Chronicle ſeems only to have tranſcribed this paſſage,) I look upon it as a malicious Report.

Some Authors relate the Emperor would ſtill have detained the K. which is not likely.

[2.] Not long before the King's arrival, one Adam of St. Edmund, a Clerk and Servant to Earl John, was ſent by him into England with Letters and Directions, that his Caſtles ſhould be fortified againſt the King his Brother; this buſy Clerk coming to London, went to the Palace of Hubert Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and dined with him; where he mightily boaſted of the Greatneſs of his Maſter, and the Intimacy he had with the King of France, telling him that he had given him the Caſtles of Driencourt and Arches; then talked at a very high and extravagant rate what his Lord could do, if he had but Faithful Servants. This vain bragging Diſcourſe of his much exaſperated the Archbiſhop and all that heard him; yet out of regard to Hoſpitality, he was not then apprehended, but ſometime after Dinner the Mayor of London took him in his Lodgings with all his Letters and Papers, which contained Earl John's whole deſign, and ſo deliver'd them to the Archbiſhop of [3.] Id. ib. The ſame day Archbiſhop Hubert, and the Biſhops of Lincoln, London, Rocheſter, Wincheſter, Worceſter and Hereford, and the Elect of Exceſter, with many Abbots and Clerks of the Province of Canterbury, met together and anathematized Earl John, and all his Abbetters and Adviſers who had or ſhould diſturb the Peace of the King and Kingdom, or unleſs they laid down their Arms, and gave ſatisfaction; and then they appeal'd to the Pope againſt William Biſhop of Ely, that he ſhould not for the future Exerciſe the Office of a Legate in Ireland; and having confirm'd this Appeal with their Seals, they ſent it over to the King.

An Appeal to the Pope againſt the Bp. of Ely.

Then all thoſe, to whom the Power of reducing Earl John's Caſtles was Committed, went into the Countrey where their Commands lay, and there they levied Forces for that end; the Biſhop of Durham went into Yorkſhire and Northumberland, and raiſing an Army, beſieged Tickhill; whilſt Earl David the King of Scot's Brother, Ranulph Earl of Cheſter, and the Earl Ferrars beſieged Nottingham; and the Archbiſhop of Canterbury (being, as I ſaid before, then the King's Juſtitiary) with a great Army beſieged Marleburgh, which within a few days was ſurrender'd to him, ſaving the Lives and Limbs of the Beſieged; after which were alſo deliver'd the Caſtle of Lancaſter, which Theobald the Archbiſhop's Brother had kept for Earl John; and St. Michael's Mount in Cornwall was alſo ſurrender'd, which Henry de Pomeray had fortified; but the Caſtles of Nottingham and Tickhil held out till the King's return into England.

Earl John's Caſtles & Towns in England beſieged.

And ſurrender'd to the King.

[4] Id. ib. [4] Immediately after his Landing he went to Canterbury, and at the Shrine of Thomas Becket gave Thanks to God, and that pretended Martyr; from whence he went to London, and being received with great Joy and Solemnity, after a ſhort Stay there he went on Pilgrimage to St. Edmunds-Bury, and from thence to St. Albans, to perform his Devotions at the Shrines of thoſe Saints: which done, the King marched down againſt the Caſtles of Nottingham and Tickhill, the Latter of which, by the leave of the Biſhop of Durham who had then beſieged it, ſent out Two Knights to ſee if the King were come indeed; and, if it were ſo, to offer him the Caſtle, which they did; but the King would not receive it, unleſs they would ſurrender to his Mercy; which Meſſage they carried back to the Governor: then the King, by the Advice of the Biſhop of Durham, promiſed them their Lives and Limbs, and upon that condition they delivered the Caſtle to the Biſhop: but thoſe that were in Nottingham-Caſtle never ſent any Meſſengers to the King at all; at which being much provoked, he came before it, and on our Lady-day beſieged it with a ſtrong Force; but thoſe within would not believe the King was there in Perſon, wherefore he was obliged to make an Aſſault upon it, and having killed divers of thoſe who had made a Sally, and cauſed ſome of them, who were Earl John's Servants, to be hanged upon a Gallows which he had ordered to be ſet up in their ſight; and ſeeing Tickhill-Caſtle ſurrender'd to the K's mercy.

ing the King's Petrars (or Engines to caſt Stones) were alſo made ready, the Conſtables of the Caſtle then ſent out ſome to ſee whither the King were there indeed or no; which when thoſe within were aſſured of, they delivered up the Caſtle with themſelves to the King's mercy. Anno Dom. MCXCIV. Nottingham Caſtle is likewiſe deliver'd.

[1.] The ſame day the King alſo diſſeized Gerard de Camvil of the Caſtle and Sheriffwick of Lincoln, and Hugh Bardolf of the Sheriffwick of Yorkſhire, and of the Caſtles of York and Scarburgh, and of the Cuſtody of Weſtmorland, and then expoſed them all to Sale: the Chancellor offer'd down in Ready-money for the Sheriffwicks of Yorkſhire, Lincolnſhire, and Northamptonſhire Fifteen Hundred Marks, and an Hundred Marks every Year for each of them; but Geoffrey the Archbiſhop offer'd Three Thouſand Marks for the Sheriffwick of Yorkſhire only, and One Hundred Marks by the Year, and ſo obtained it; by which means he was made the King's Servant, and Subjected himſelf to his Power. [1.] Id ib. Gerard de Camvil, and Hugh Bardolf diſſized of their Caſtles and Sheriffwicks. Geoffrey A. Bp. of York outbids the Chancellor for their Sheriffwicks.

[2.] The Thirty-Firſt of March was the Second day of this Council, in which he requir'd Judgment to be given upon Earl John his Brother, who, contrary to the Fealty he had ſworn to him, had ſeized his Caſtles, deſtroyed his Dominions as well in England as Beyond Sea, and had Confederated with his Enemy the King of France: He alſo demanded Judgment againſt Hugh Nunant Biſhop of Coventry, who, though privy to his Secrets, had deſerted him, and adhered to his Enemies, Earl John and the King of France, and contrived all the miſchief he could againſt his Government: Hereupon it was adjudged that they ſhould be peremptorily cited, and if within Forty days they appeared not, nor ſtood to the Law, they then declared Earl John to † have forfeited the Kingdom, (that is, his Right to return into it again) and that the Biſhop of Coventry was to be Judged by the Biſhops as he was a Biſhop, and by Lay-men as he was the King's Sheriff. [2.] Id ib. The ſecond day of the Council. The King demands Judgment upon E. John, and the Bp. of Coventry. † Demeruiſſe Regnum.

But not to omit any thing Conſiderable concerning this Condemnation of Earl John now mention'd; I confeſs I am not certain, whither Roger Hoveden in this Relation of it, by this barbarous Phraſe (or rather Soleciſm) of Demeruiſſe Regnum, might not mean the Forfeiture of his future Right to the Kingdom; becauſe upon his refuſing to Appear to this Summos, and to ſtand to his Tryal according to Law, he was ſome time after Attainted of Treaſon by the Great Council of the Kingdom, as I find by a Paſſage in the Annals or Chronicle of Margan, which ſays, that King John's Coronation was performed contrary to a precedent and ſolemn * Judgment of the Archbiſhops, Biſhops, Earls, Barons, and other Great Men of England, which had been pronounced againſt him at Nottingham, in the Preſence of King Richard his Brother, for the Treaſon by him committed againſt the ſaid King and Kingdom, in confederating with the King of France whilſt King Richard Earl John attainted of Treaſon by the great Council of the Kingdom. * Vid. v. Scripter. p. 12.

Anno Dom. MCXCIV.

was in Priſon; for which Earl John was not only diſinherited of all his Lands he then held in England, but alſo of all Honours which he expected to enjoy after the King's deceaſe; and it was then likewiſe adjudged, that he ſhould be Summon'd by the Space of Forty days to appear in the King's Court, there to anſwer and defend himſelf from that Accuſation. But that upon the Earl's not appearing within the Time limited, nor ſending any one to anſwer for him, Sentence paſſed accordingly; though it is here omitted by R. Hoveden, yet is it expreſsly related by * Walter Hemingford, who ſays, That King Richard adjudged his Brother Earl John, for his monſtrous Ingratitude and Perfidy, to loſe all his Honours, and This was by a Solemn Sentence of his Peers, ſo that all fear of Civil War was now at an End in England.

* Lib. 2. c. 71. † Adjudicavit. It is farther proved that Sentence paſs'd againſt E. John, from another Author.

This Relation is likewiſe confirmed by a Letter of Prince Lewis of France, which though it was written ſome years after to the Abbot and Convent of St. Auguſtin's in Canterbury, when that Prince came over by the Invitation of the Barons to take the Crown from King John, yet it is recited at large by [3.] William Thorne in his Hiſtory of the Abbots of that Monaſtery; the Purport of which you will find in the latter end of that King's Reign; and therefore I ſhall refer you thither, if you have a mind to conſult it.

[3.] Vid. X. Script. Col. 1868.

From which Relation and Letter it appears, that the Biſhops did then Vote and give Sentence in Cauſes of Blood, notwithſtanding the Conſtitutions of Clarendon to the contrary; unleſs you will ſuppoſe this Judgment to have been given by the Peers in full Parliament, by an Act of Attainder, as at this day, which is not unlikely.

The Biſhops give Sentence in Caſes of Blood.

But to return to that from which we have ſomewhat digreſs'd, viz. the Reſt of the Tranſactions of this Great Council at Nottingham.

[4.] The Firſt of April being the Third day of this Council, It was ordain'd, That there ſhould be given the King out of every Plough Land in England the Sum of Two Shillings; then he required, That every Military Tenant ſhould perform one Third part of his Service, according to what every Fee would bear, and that they ſhould go over with him into Normandy: He alſo required of the Ciſtercian Order all their Wooll for that Year; but becauſe this Demand was very grievous to them, they choſe to pay the King a certain Sum of Money in lieu of it.

[4] R. H. Ib. b. The Acts of the Third day in this Council.

[5.] The Second of April was the Fourth and Laſt day of this Great Council, in which many Clerks and Laicks complained of the Oppreſſions and unjuſt Exactions of Geoffrey Archbiſhop of York; to which he returned no Anſwer. After this, by the Advice of the Biſhop of Ely, the Chancellor, (as it was ſaid) Gerard de Camvill was accuſed for receiving certain Thieves, who had robbed ſome Merchants going to Stanford-Fair; and that they came from his Houſe when they committed the Robbery, and returned thither after they had done it. They further appealed him of Treaſon, becauſe he would not appear upon the Summons of the King's Juſtitiary, nor ſtand to the Law concerning the receiving of thoſe Robbers, nor would bring them to Juſtice: but Camville's Anſwer was, That he was Earl John's Tenant or Feudatary, and would ſtand to the Law of his Court. He was alſo accuſed, that he was with force of Arms in the Aſſiſtance of Earl John, and other the King's Enemies, when the Caſtles of Nottingham and Tickhill were ſurprized: All which Gerard denied; whereupon his Accuſers gave Security for proſecuting their Accuſation, as he did alſo of defending himſelf by one of his * Free-men, or Tenants, who was his Surety.

And I ſuppoſe it was for theſe Offences, that [1.] this Gerard, on the Firſt day of the Seſſion of Council, was by the King diſſeized of the Caſtle and Sheriffwick of Lincoln, as hath been already mention'd. Anno Dom. MCXCIV.

[2.] After theſe great Affairs were over, the King declared the Day of his Second Coronation, which he now reſolved ſhould be on the cloſe of Eaſter at Wincheſter, and then went to Chipſton in the ſame County, to meet William King of Scots; who, as they journeyed together toward Wincheſter, demanded of the King the Dignities and Honours his Predeceſſors had enjoy'd in England, and alſo the Counties of Northumberland, Cumberland, Weſtmorland and Lancaſter (though I do not find this laſt Earldom ever to have belong'd to the Kings of Scotland) to be reſtor'd to him as the Right of his Predeceſſors: the King anſwer'd, He would ſatisfy him by the Advice of his Earls and Barons. They ſtay'd at Northampton the Tenth and Eleventh of April, and there King Richard having deliberated, and adviſed with the Biſhops, Earls and Barons, gave the Scotiſh King this Anſwer, That as to his demand of Northumberland, he ought not then to have made it, when all the Princes of France were become his Enemies; for if he granted it now, it would ſeem as if he did it out of Fear, and not out of Affection.

Yet, to give him all the ſatisfaction he could, the King then granted by his Charter to Him and his Heirs for ever, in the preſence of the Queen-Mother, Hubert Archbiſhop of Coventry, Hugh Biſhop of Durham, Jocelin Biſhop of Glaſcow, and many other Clerks and Laicks of both Kingdoms, that whenever the King of Scots was ſummoned to the King of England's Court, the Biſhop of Durham and Sheriff of Northumberland ſhould receive him at the River Twede, and bring him to the Teiſe, and there the Archbiſhop of York and Sheriff of Yorkſhire ſhould receive, and conduct him to the Borders of that County; and ſo the Biſhops of each Dioceſs, with their Sheriffs, ſhould conduct him from County to County until he came to the King's Court. And from the time he enter'd England, he ſhould receive every day out of the King's privy Purſe an Hundred Shillings for * Allowance or Livery: and after he came to the King, and ſo long as he ſtayed there, he was to have every day Thirty Shillings allowance, and Twelve of the King's fine Loaves, or Cakes, and Twelve of the King's Biſcuits or Simnels made of the fineſt Wheat, and four Gallons of the King's beſt Wine, and eight Gallons of Ordinary Wine; with divers other allowances of Spice, Wax-candles, and other things, which need not here be particularly recited.

And when the Scotiſh King return'd into his own Countrey, he was to be conducted back by the Biſhops and Sheriffs to the River Twede, and to be allowed an Hundred Shillings a day. [4] This Charter was delivered to William King of Scots at the Town of Northampton on the Twelfth of April 1194, being Eaſter-Tueſday, by the hands of William Biſhop of Ely the Chancellor.

[4.] Id. p. 420.

[5.] Then on the Thirteenth of April the King left Northampton, and lay at a Place called Silveſton, whilſt the Archbiſhop of Canterbury and Biſhop of Durham lay at Brackley; where happen'd a great Quarrel between the Servants of that Biſhop and thoſe belonging to the King of Scots, about the Lodgings that had been aſſign'd the Biſhop, by the Kings Mareſchal; for the Biſhop would not give up his Houſe to the Scotiſh King, and he thereupon reſented it ſo ill, that he complain'd to the King of the Affront he had received, who ſharply reproved the Biſhop for his Incivility.

[5] Id. ib. A great Quarrel between the K. of Scots and Biſhop of Durham's Servants.

[1.] Then the King went by Woodſtock to Worceſter, where ſo ſoon as he

[1] Id. ib.

Anno Dom. MCXCIV. arrived, being the 15th of the ſaid Month, he diſſeized Godfrey Biſhop of Winton of both that Caſtle and the County of Hampſhire, with Two Mannors he had bought of him before his Expedition to the Holy-Land.

Godfrey, the Bp. of Winton diſſeized.

And as William of Newburgh informs us, He alſo about this time demanded the Crown-Lands from all thoſe that had bought them of him, or on whomſoever he had beſtowed them; pretending they had been only mortgaged and not ſold out right; nor durſt they defend the Right they had to 'em by any Charter or Agreement from him, for it ſignified nothing, ſeeing all were alike born down by the weight of the King's Power: and though this was a moſt manifeſt piece of Injuſtice, yet he put a very fair Colour upon it, telling them, that they ought not to take advantage of their King's Neceſſities; and beſides, that they had either received their Moneys out of the profits of the Eſtate, and then they ought to be content, or if they had not he would make it good to them; and particularly he told the Biſhop that he knew there was a Brief from the Pope to extort by way of Uſury more than the principal from their King, yet however that he would further conſider him in due time: which ſhews us, that the moſt prodigal Princes when reduced to neceſſity, become more griping and oppreſſive than any other.

The King demands the Crown-Lands from thoſe that had bought them of him formerly.

And how he excuſes himſelf for ſo doing.

[1.] Id. ib. The K. is new Crown'd at Winchester, with the manner of that Ceremony.

[2.] The King being now come to Wincheſter, reſolved to begin his Reign as it were anew, and to be crowned again; Since his Subjects might doubt, whither by being ſo long a Priſoner to the Emperor, and by the report of his ſurrend'ring the Crown to him, he had not weakned his Royal Title and Authority; therefore on the Seventeenth of April (being Eight days after Eaſter) the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, with all the reſt of the Biſhops in their Formalities, waited on the King in his Chamber, and when they had put on his Royal Robes, Sword, Spurs and other Ornaments, the Archbiſhop ſet the Crown upon his head, and put the Scepter in his Left, and the Golden Staff having a Dove on the top of it in his Right hand, and then after the Archbiſhop had ſaid a ſhort Prayer, and the Pre-center had ſung an Hymn, all the Biſhops, Earls and Barons went to St. Swithins Church in Solemn proceſſion, four Earls ſupporting the Canopy, and Three Swords being carried before him as at his firſt Coronation; the King of Scots going in the Middle, carry'd the firſt Sword, as Earl of Huntington, and on each hand of him Hamelin Earl of Warren, and Ranulph Earl of Cheſter, carried the other Two: then after the King had heard Maſs he returned back to his Palace with the like proceſſion, where he made a ſplendid Feaſt for all that were there aſſiſting at it: and the Citizens of London preſented the King with Two Hundred Marks; and they and the Citizens of Wincheſter ſerved him, the former in the * Buttery, and the latter, to bring up his Meat from his Kitchin, as they had done formerly.

* In Pincernaria.

[3.] Id. ib. b. John de Pomeray accuſed of Treaſon, flies the Land.

[3.] After this Solemnity was over, John (or Jollan) de Pomeray was accuſed of Treaſon, in that he had aſſiſted his Brother Henry at the taking of St. Michael's Mount in Cornwall: Wherefore John diſtruſting his Cauſe, choſe rather to quit England than to ſtand to the Judgment of the King's Court. On the 19th of this Month, Hugh Biſhop of Durham, of his own Accord, ſurrender'd up to the King the County of Northumberland, with the Caſtles and other Appurtenances which had been formerly granted him by Charter.

What Hugh Biſhop of Durham ſurrenders to the King.

But William of Newburgh (with greater probability) tells us, that the Biſhop did this, becauſe he could not help it; and that though he had bought his Earldom for no ſmall Sum of Money, yet he found no more favour than ſeveral others.

But

But this is certain from [4] Roger Hoveden, that the King ordered the Bishop to deliver the County with its Castles to Hugh Bardolf, and then the King of Scots offer'd fifteen thousand Marks for them, saying, his Father and his Brother Malcolm had held them of the Gift of King Henry the Second; whereupon the King offer'd him the whole County, except the Castles, for that Money, but he refused to accept it on those Terms: then the Prisoners that were taken in Earl John's Castles were brought to Winchester, where the King caused the better sort of them to be imprisoned, that so they might compound, or fine; and the rest gave Security, every one in an Hundred Marks, for their appearance upon Summons in the King's Court, and standing to Judgment there.

[5] On the 24*th* of April, the King made a Peace and final Concord, between the Archbishop of York, his base Brother, and the Bishop of Ely his Chancellor, concerning all Controversies that had happen'd between them, as well about the Archbishop's imprisonment at Dover, as the Chancellor's being forced out of England; so that whenever he was called to it by the Archbishop, he should swear with an * Hundred Priests (his Compurgators) that he neither commanded, nor desired he should be imprisoned.

* Cum centesima manu Sacerdotum.

[1] The King having received the News that the K. of France had invaded Normandy, resolved to make what speed he could over thither; so on the above mention'd day that he had made that Agreement, viz. the 24*th* of April, he and the Queen his Mother went to Portsmouth, to go beyond Sea, but they went not on Board until the 12*th* of May following, because the Wind was all that while contrary. The King growing impatient of this delay, went to Sea in a small Vessel with Oars; but being driven back again by a Tempest to the Isle of Wight, he return'd to Portsmouth, and after eight day's longer stay, set sail again with an hundred great Ships laden with Souldiers, Horses, and Arms, and landed at Barb-fleet: the King of France had then besieged Verneüil eighteen days; but when he heard of King Richard's arrival, and that he was coming to its Relief, he retreated, unknown to his Army; but they not long after hearing of their King's departure, raised the Siege, and follow'd him on the Monday in Whitson week. When King Richard heard of the French men's retreat from before Verneüil, he persued the flying Army; but not being able to overtake it, he return'd to that Place, and repair'd the Breaches, and strengthned the weak Places.

[1] Id. ib. 421. a.

[2.] About this time Earl John, when he saw he was not able to do the King his Brother any more mischief, and found himself also slighted by the French, thro the Mediation of Queen Eleanor his Mother, he got himself reconciled to the King, and coming to him implored his Mercy and Pardon, which the King readily granted him, [3] saying generously, I wish I may as easily forget your Offence, as I doubt you will my Pardon of it; therefore to keep him to his good Behaviour, the King did not then restore him his Castles and Lands, tho he did it afterwards, upon his perseverance in his Duty, as you will find anon: yet to give Earl John his due, he was so mindful of the King's Admonition, that he ever after served him faithfully in all his Wars against the King of France.

Anno Dom. MCXCIV.

Earl John's Cruelty and Treachery before he was reconciled to his Brother.

But I cannot here omit a notable piece of Cruelty and Treachery that had been committed by Earl John (if we may believe the French Hiſtorians) a little before his Reconciliation with his Brother, whilſt he was on the K. of France's ſide, and which perhaps was done to render his Reconciliation with his Brother the more eaſy and aſſured to him: King Philip had not long before made this Earl Governour of the City of Eureux, but he reſolving to deliver that place up to K. Richard, knew not how to bring it about any other way than by inviting three hundred of the chief Officers and Souldiers of the Gariſon to an Entertainment. I ſhould have told you that before he had privately brought over the greateſt part of the Citizens to his Party, for they were deſirous to return to King Richard their former Prince. So that in the midſt of their Jollity, Earl John with the other's Aſſiſtance, ſet upon his Gueſts, and having cruelly maſſacred them, delivered the City to the King of England, as an earneſt of his future Loyalty: but the ſame [4] Author aſſures us, that tho the King preſently after received his Brother into favour, yet did he not at all approve of this his wicked and treacherous Action.

[4] W. Brito, Philip. p. 143. in Hiſtor. Franc. Vol. V.

This indeed is not mentioned by any of our Engliſh Writers, but it is ſet down at large by [5] Rigord and William le Breton, who lived in thoſe times; and it being ſuitable enough to this Prince's natural Diſpoſition, I think we need not much queſtion the truth of it.

[5] Ib. p. 77.

I ſhall alſo from the [1] ſame Authors, give you a Relation of the reſt of the Tranſactions that happened about this Time, ſince it differs very much from that we find in ours, both in the order of time, and in other Circumſtances, and indeed gives us a great deal of light into our Hiſtory, which (ſhould we rely upon our Engliſh Writers only) is here very obſcure: For the former relate what ours have quite and clean omitted, that the King of France having beſieged Verneüil three Weeks, whilſt he lay before it, received the News of Eureux being betray'd and ſurprized by Earl John; at which he was ſo much incenſed, that he immediately left the Siege to be carried on with part of his Forces, and march'd away privately with the reſt to Verneüil; where falling upon the Normans on the ſudden, he not only retook the Place, but in revenge of the Treachery of its Citizens, he kill'd the Inhabitants, not ſparing Age or Sex, and burnt the Town to the ground, with the Churches; ſhewing this only Mercy, that he carried away the Reliques of the Saints.

[1] Id. ib.

Upon the News of Eureux's being betrayed by Earl John, the K. of France marches to Verneüil, takes it, and puts all therein to the Sword.

But in the mean while, that part of the Army which had orders to ſtay behind at Eureux, being diſpirited by the King's Abſence, and the briſk Sallies of the Beſieged, preſently raiſed the Siege, and march'd off with ſuch great precipitancy, that they left the beſt part of their Baggage and Proviſions behind them, and followed the King; but as ſoon as they were gone, thoſe in the Town ſallied out and enriched themſelves with their Booty: yet why the French Army ſhould fly away in ſuch haſt, had it not been for fear of King Richard's coming upon them, I cannot underſtand: but of this the French Writers ſay not a word.

The Siege of Eureux raiſed.

The French fly, leaving great Booty behind them.

But Roger Hoveden, Radulphus de Diceto, and all our Engliſh Hiſtorians relate it quite otherwiſe, and paſſing by the French King's taking of Eureux at that time, they make him to have fled from the Siege of Verneüil; and Hoveden places King Philip's burning the City of Eureux

The Engliſh differ from the French Hiſtorians in this buſineſs of Eureux.

The Caſtle of Mirabel taken by K. Richard's Subjects.

Alphonſo returns home on the News of his Father's Death.

3 Then King Richard from thence marched with great haſt by the City of Tours, and went to reinforce the Siege of the Caſtle of Loches, with the Souldiers of Navar and the Brabanters, who had long beſieged it, tho to little purpoſe; but notwithſtanding they were now almoſt tired out, yet they again received freſh Courage by the King's Preſence, and carried on the Siege with ſuch Vigour and Reſolution, that he took the Caſtle by Storm, and made divers Knights and Souldiers, whom he found in it, Priſoners.

3 Id. ib.

The K. takes the Caſtle of Loches.

In the mean time the Counſellors of the King of France had appointed a Treaty with the Seneſchal and Conſtable of Normandy at Pont-del-Arche, who on the day prefix'd came thither with Walter Archbiſhop of Roüen, on the behalf of King Richard, where they waited long for the Commiſſioners of the King of France to no purpoſe, for they came not at all, he being at that time otherwiſe engaged; for he was marched with a ſmall Army to take in a Caſtle within four miles of Roüen called Fountains, which he reduced by Aſſault after four days Siege: and tho Earl John, and Robert Earl of Leiceſter, were then in Roüen, yet finding their Forces much inferior to thoſe of the King of France, they durſt not fall upon them: but the Earl of Leiceſter imprudently ſallying out with a Party of his Men, thinking to lie in Ambuſcade, and ſo ſurprize that King in his Return, was himſelf taken Priſoner and preſented to him, who uſed him civilly for the time he had him, but for all that made him pay no leſs than 10000 l. for his Ranſom.

A Treaty appointed by the French at Pont-del-Arche, but none of their Commiſſioners ever came.

4 After this, by the common Conſent of both Kings, William Archbiſhop of Rheimes, and the Count of Nevers, with ſome others, both Clergymen and Noblemen on the French King's ſide, and Walter Archbiſhop of Roüen, with the two great Officers of Normandy abovementioned on King Richard's, met again at Vale Roole, to treat of a Truce between their Maſters, and came very near to a Concluſion, but at laſt broke off, becauſe the King of France ſtill inſiſted, that all thoſe who had adhered either to himſelf, or to King Richard, chard, ſhould be included in the Truce; which the latter not conſenting to, both Kings return'd again to their former courſe of burning and deſtroying each other's Countries.

The two Kings burn and deſtroy each other's Countries.

5 Roger Hoveden upon the breaking off this Treaty, brings in King Philip's burning the Town of Evreux, but very much out of order, as I have already ſhewn. But this is more probable (as the ſame Author relates) that about this Time the King of France marched with his Army to a Place called Freteval; and the King of England, that he might attend his Motions, came with his Forces to Vendoſme: He had lain there but one Night, when King Philip early next morning ſent him word, that that day he would give him a Viſit with his Army. King Richard being very well pleas'd at the News, told the Meſſenger he would expect him, and if he did not come according to his promiſe, that the next Morning after he would return his kind Intentions, and repay him his Viſit in the ſame manner; but the King of France did not think it convenient to be ſo good as his word, but the next Morning early, when King Richard was marching towards him, he having notice of it, fled with his whole Army in ſuch haſt that many were killed and taken Priſoners, and all the Waggons and Baggage, as alſo a great deal of Treaſure, fell into the hands of the Engliſh; the King's portable Chappel was alſo taken, and the Charters of all thoſe Vaſſals of the King of England, who had confederated with the K. of France and E. John; to which Mezeray (in the Reign of Philip. Aug.) alſo adds, that this Prince (like the Grand Seignior at this day) carrying along with him the antient Records of the Crown, they were all taken by the Engliſh, and loſt, to the great damage of the King's Affairs, as well as to the Hiſtory of thoſe Times.

5 Id. ib.

K. Philip profers K. Richard Battel.

The King of France flies, leaving his Camp and Baggage a prey to the Engliſh.

Upon this Victory King Richard perſued the King of France, but, not being able to find him, returned to Vendoſme with a very great Booty, both of Men, Horſes, and ready Money. This Action is very lightly mention'd by the 1 French Hiſtorians, who here (as on the like occaſions) conceal their King's Defeat, and ſay no more than that as he paſſed through the Territories of the Count of Blois, King Richard ſet upon him on the ſudden, and his Forces being put to flight, he there loſt all his Money, Plate, and other rich Moveables, tho the loſs was indeed more in Men and Reputation than in Money, or Furniture.

2 R. H. p. 421. b.

2 This Victory produced a Truce for one Year, which was agreed on by Commiſſioners on both ſides, between Verneüil and Tilieres; the Commiſſioners for the King of France were Drogo de Merlot his Conſtable, Urſe his Chamberlain, and Anſelme of St. Martin Archdeacon of Tours, in whoſe Names the Truce was concluded on the behalf of their Maſter; and I could wiſh our Author had ſet down who were Commiſſioners for the King of England: but tho he has omitted them, yet it is very likely they were the Archbiſhop of Roüen, and the reſt that were before imploy'd in the former Treaties of like nature.

A Truce made for one Year.

The Inſtrument of which Truce is drawn up by way of Letter or Declaration from the ſaid French Commiſſioners, reciting, that they, by the command of their Lord K. Philip, had ſworn and pledged their Faith in the hands of the Legate, that the King ſhould obſerve the ſaid Truce upon the following Terms or Conditions; in the Preamble it is said, that the King of France at the intreaty of the Cardinal Legate, and the Abbot of the Cistercians, had granted a Truce to the King of England and his Subjects, which he might also confirm if he pleased; but the Articles being very tedious, and not much to our present purpose, the inquisitive Reader may find them (if he has a mind) at large in 3 Hoveden under this Year. Anno Dom. MCXCIII.

* ſaid,

3 P. 422. a.b.

The chief Heads of them are to this effect, That the King of England should hold all the Lands which he had then in his possession, and the King of France should peaceably hold those Towns which he had taken; and that in the mean time it should be lawful for either of them to strengthen and fortify those Castles or strong Places, which they already held whole and entire; but the Others that were demolished, were not to be re-fortified, except four Castles there mentioned, which the King of England might fortify if he so pleased. There were also comprised within this Truce the Earl of Angolesme and other Noblemen, who had taken part with King Richard; and two Arbitrators were to be appointed by each King, who were to judge of all Injuries and Breaches of this Truce that should be committed during the time. This Instrument was sealed by the Commissioners on both sides, on the twenty third of July this Year: Yet for all this precaution, the Truce did not hold to the end of the term prefixed. But it is time to return to the Affairs of England. The Substance of the Articles of this Truce.

4 Whilst the King remained beyond Sea, Hugh Bardolf by his Majesty's Order, demanded the County of Northumberland, New Castle upon Tine, and the Castle of Bamburgh, of the Bishop of Durham, which he had promised to deliver up, but delayed the doing it till a Messenger he had sent to the King returned, by whom he offered him two thousand Marks for the County and those Castles. The Messenger brought Letters to Hugh Bardolf, that if the Bishop gave Security for the two thousand Marks, he should deliver him the County and Castles. On the receipt of the King's Letters, he told the Bishop that if he would have him execute the King's Command, he must first surrender to him the County and Castles, and then he would deliver them back as the King had ordered him. The Bishop replied, there was no need of that, because he had them already in his possession: hereupon Hugh sent the King his Answer, and received a fresh Command, that the Bishop should be disseised of the County and Castles, and should pay down also the two thousand Marks; and likewise in his Fury ordered that he should be disseized of the Manor of Sadbergh, with the Knight's Fees and Wapentach which he had by his Charter granted to the Church of Durham in pure Alms. These things were accordingly executed; by which Action you may see how arbitrary this King was towards all those who any ways opposed his Will, not valuing what Sacrilege he committed, for he now took away that which he had before granted to the Church, for a valuable Consideration. 4 Id. p. 423. a. Hugh Bardolf demands of the Bishop of Durham, the County of Northumberland. The Bishop is ordered to be disseised of his County and Castles, and also of the Manor of Sadbergh.

5 About this time also great Quarrels happening between the Archbishop of York and his Chanons (tho our Author does not tell us about what) the Archbishop excommunicated them, and kept them out of their Stalls in the Choir: upon which the Chanons complained to Hubert Archbishop of Canterbury, the King's Justitiary, of several Wrongs and Injuries received from their Archbishop; whereupon Hubert 5 Id. ib. The Chanons of York, their Complaint against their Archbishop.

Anno Dom. MCXCIII. Hubert by the Royal Authority which he had received, ſent Earl Roger Bigod, Wil. de Warrenne, Wil. de Stuteville, Hugh Bardolf, Wil. Potier, Geoff. Haget, and Wil. Fitz-Richard a Clerk, as Commiſſioners to York, to hear and determine the Controverſy between them, according to Right: theſe Commiſſioners heard the Chanon's Accuſations, and the Biſhop's and his Servant's Anſwers, notwithſtanding which they cauſed his Men that were accuſed of Robberies to be impriſoned; and altho he warranted what they had done, yet he could not bail them. Then they ſummoned him to come and hear Judgment; and becauſe he would not, they diſſeiſed him of all his Mannors except Ripon, whither he was then withdrawn, and cauſed his Chanons to be placed again in their Stalls, of which he had diſpoſſeſſed them; and then put the Archbiſhoprick and Sheriffwick of Yorkſhire under the Cuſtody of William Stuteville, and Geoffrey Haget, two of the ſaid Commiſſioners.

Commiſſioners ſent by Hubert to determine the Controverſy.

The Archbiſhop is diſſeiſed of all his Mannors, and the Chanons are reſtored.

1 Id. ib. a. 1 During this interval of Peace the King took all manner of ways to raiſe Money to carry on the War againſt the King of France, as ſoon as the Truce ſhould determine; and to this end in September the King ſent the Itinerant Juſtices through every County of England, to enquire by the Inqueſt of Twelve Men of each County, concerning all Offences that had been committed againſt him; as alſo concerning all Forfeitures and Eſcheats, and of the Lands of Wards, and to whom they had been let to Farm, and at what Value: but ſince they are very long, and now grown obſolete, I ſhall ſay no more of them here, but refer thoſe that are willing to read them in the Latin to R. Hoveden, where they may find them at large: yet for the ſatisfaction of thoſe who either do not underſtand Latin, or have not that Author by them, I have put down a Tranſlation of them at the end of this King's Reign, that ſo you may underſtand the difference between the Antient and Modern Pleas of the Crown. But as for theſe Juſtices Itinerant, they were not firſt inſtituted by this King (tho they were now ſent upon this particular occaſion) but had been often uſed before during the Reign of King Henry the Second, as the Reader may there obſerve.

Itinerant Juſtices ſent thro every County of England, to enquire concerning all Offences.

Tho not firſt inſtituted by him.

2 Id. p. 424. a. 2 Alſo that the King might the better know what Jews had Money, and what they were worth, the better to fleece them when he had occaſion, he directed ſeveral Articles to theſe Juſtices Itinerant, concerning the Jews; the chief Heads of which were, That all their Eſtates both Real and Perſonal, ſhould be inventoried; and if a Jew concealed any part thereof, he ſhould be impriſon'd, and forfeit whatſoever ſhould be ſo concealed. There are likewiſe divers other Articles, appointing where, and in what manner the Jews ſhould lend their Money, and take Pawns for it; and how thoſe or the Obligations for Moneys lent ſhould be kept, whereby no Jew was maſter of his own Eſtate, or could keep the Securities for his own Money: but tho theſe Articles are now become obſolete, yet I have alſo given a faithful Tranſlation of them, which immediately follow the former Articles of Inquiry.

3 Id. ib. 3 King Richard continued ſtill in France, and having finiſhed his Affairs in Poitou according to his deſire, returned into Anjou, and there forced all his Bayliffs or Collectors of his Revenues to redeem or ranſom themſelves (as our Author words it) that is, he made them them to compound for their Extortions and Miſcarriages in their Offices, and did the like in Main; and coming into Normandy, he expreſſed his Reſentments againſt whatever had been concluded at the late Truce, imputing it to the ill management of the Biſhop of Ely his Chancellor; and therefore took the Seal away from him, and made a new one: and then ordered that it ſhould be proclaim'd through all his Dominions, that nothing ſhould be firm or of any force that had been ſealed with his old Seal; and commanded, that all who had any Charters ſhould come and renew them at his new Seal, which is another inſtance of this King's Arbitrary Proceedings, in raiſing Money by any Means: but this did not ſuffice, you ſhall have a freſh one in what follows. Anno Dom. MCXCIV.

Inſtances of the King's Arbitrary Proceedings in raiſing Money.

[4] The King likewiſe ordered there ſhould be Torneaments, that is, Tiltings (or Feats of Arms) performed in England, and by his Charter confirmed them; ſo that every one who would Tilt, or ſhew Feats of Arms, ſhould pay according to the following Rates; an Earl for a Licence twenty Marks of Silver, a Baron ten Marks; every Knight that had Land, four Marks; every Knight that had no Land, two. And he commanded that no Knight ſhould be admitted to the place of Tilting, unleſs he firſt paid down the Money above-mentioned.

[4] Id. ib.

What was to be paid for Licence of Tilting.

This Charter the King gave to William Earl of Salisbury to keep; and Archbiſhop Hubert the King's Juſtitiary appointed Theobald Walter his Brother to be Collector of this Money: thus did the Archbiſhop comply with the King's deſires, tho Torneaments had been already forbidden by three General Councils, and that the Bodies of thoſe that were killed in ſuch unlawful Rencounters, ſhould be deprived of Chriſtian Burial: nor had there been any ſuch Torneaments ſince the Reign of King Stephen.

To whom the Money was to be paid.

[5] Some time after this Geoffrey Archbiſhop of York, went into Normandy to the King his Brother, and there was reconciled to him for two thouſand Marks: and obtained his Letters to William of St. Mary's, and Hugh Bardolf (who then held the Archbiſhop's Lands under Sequeſtration) that upon payment of another thouſand Marks over and above the two Thouſand he had already paid, they ſhould reſtore to him all his Lands and Rents free, and diſcharged from all Lay diſturbance.

And reſtored to his Lands and Rents upon Condition.

[1] The Truce between the Kings of France and England yet continuing, we find very little to have happened conſiderable, either here or in France; only toward the latter end of the Truce, * Radulphus de Diceto informs us, that King Philip ſent four Ambaſſadors to King Richard to treat with him for the benefit of both Kingdoms; and therefore propoſed to him, that if he pleaſed to ſave the effuſion of more Chriſtian Blood, he was willing to leave the Controverſy between them, to be decided by five Combatants to be choſen on each ſide; and whichſoever Party got the Victory, the other ſhould ſubmit to the Terms agreed on. King Richard's Anſwer to this Propoſal was, That he very well approved of it, provided that the King of France would be the fifth Man on one ſide, and he himſelf would be ſo on the other; which Meſſage being carried back to King Philip, he did not well approve of that Propoſal, and ſo it came to nothing.

[2] But to say somewhat of Affairs more distant; Leopold Arch Duke of Austria, having suffer'd many Calamities this Year in his Country by Fire and Inundations, as well as bad Seasons, they are by our Authors looked upon as Judgments from God for his so barbarously treating King Richard; however he himself was so far from being sensible of his fault, that he still pressed on more violently for the payment of the rest of King Richard's Ransom which was yet behind, threatning the Hostages that were given for him with Death, if it were not speedily paid; whereupon one of them called Baldwin de Betune, was by consent of the rest sent over into England, to put the King in mind to perform the Conditions between him and the Duke. Hereupon the King compassionating the Case of his Hostages, immediately dispatched away this Baldwin with Eleanor the Sister of Arthur Duke of Bretagn, to be married to the Duke of Austria's Son; but before they arrived, they received News of the Duke's sudden Death, as you will hear further in the next Year.

The Duke of Austria presses for the payment of the Arrears of the King's Ransom, or threatens the Hostages with Death.

The Duke's sudden Death.

I shall conclude the Affairs of this Year with some account of Wales, of which we have heard nothing a great while; where it seems [3] David ap Owen, Prince of North Wales, having govern'd above Twenty Years, was now deposed by his Nephew Llewellyn, the Son of Jorwerth Drwyndwn, Son to Owen Gwyneth formerly Prince of that Country. Wherefore looking upon himself as the true Heir of that Principality, of which his Father had been disinherited by his younger Brother David, (as you have already heard) this young Prince imploring the Aid of his Mother's Relations (who was the Daughter of the Prince of Powis) drew also his Cousins, the Sons of Conan ap Owen Gwyneth, to his Party; and thereupon laying claim to the Government, he entred the Countrey with a strong Force, to whom the People willingly submitted, and owned him for their Lord; and so without any Blood-shed, he was made Prince of all North-Wales, except Three Castles which his Uncle David still kept by the help of the Englishmen, in whom was his chief Trust, because his Wife Emma was Aunt to the King of England: but before the new Prince Llewllyn could be well settled in his Government, Roger Mortimer came with a great Power to Melyenyth, and built the Castle of Cymaron, and so quickly brought that Countrey under his Subjection, by expelling the two Sons of Cadwallhon ap Madoc, who before were the Lords thereof.

[4] King Richard kept his Christmas this Year at Rouen, being taken up in providing both Men and Money to carry on the War against the King of France; for the Truce which was to have continued till the Feast of All-Saints next ensuing, he found was not well observed, and the Subjects of both Kingdoms in the mean while committed great Spoils and Rapines upon each other.

I cannot here omit (tho it be somewhat foreign to our English History) what my Author mentions to have happened about this time; that [5] Leopold Duke of Austria abovementioned, keeping a magnificent Christmas at the City of Gratz, on St. Stephen's day after Dinner he would needs go out to recreate himself with some of his Knights on Horseback; but his Horse stumbling, gave the Duke such a fall as broke his Leg, so that the Bones came through the Flesh,

Fleſh, and being carried home, for want of good Chirurgeons it began to gangrene, ſo that he was forced to have it cut off, tho it was to no purpoſe; for the Gangrene ſtill ſpreading further, run up to his Heart, and quickly killed him. Anno Dom. MCXCV.

He on his Death-bed repenting what he had done againſt K. Richard, commanded his Hoſtages to be reſtored, and the Money that was behind of his Ranſom, to be releaſed; which the young Duke his Son not being willing to comply with, the Clergy of that Country would not permit the Duke's Body to be buried, till he had performed what his Father enjoined. This our Writers look upon as an evident Judgment of God upon the Duke, for ſo unjuſtly taking and detaining King Richard Priſoner as you have already heard, not conſidering that the King of France, who ſtill made War upon him without any juſt cauſe, and contrary to the Oath he had taken, went on and proſpered. However King Richard gain'd very well by the Death of this Duke, for above four thouſand Marks of his Ranſom were offer'd to be returned to him, and Baldwin de Betune abovementioned carried the young Lady back again, and delivered her to the King.

By his Command the Hoſtages are reſtored, and the Arrear of the King's Ranſom-Money releaſed.

[1] Some time after this, King Richard being at the Caſtle of Chinon in Anjou, there came thither fifteen Saracen Aſſaſſins, in the Diſguiſe of Pilgrims, ſome of whom endeavoured to be admitted into the King's Preſence, that ſo they might have ſtabb'd him: but being ſuſpected of ſome Evil Deſign, they were apprehended, and upon Examination confeſſed, that they were ſent by the King of France to kill the King, who ſeeming to paſs by this Injury, deferred the Execution of them till the reſt of their Accomplices could be taken.

In the mean while ſome appearance of a Peace ſtill continued, becauſe it was Lent, but more by reaſon of the coldneſs of the Seaſon; [2] ſo that the War did not break out afreſh between the two Kings till after Midſummer, and then it was upon this Occaſion. The Emperor Henry had ſent to K. Richard a Golden Crown of great value, in token of his Affection, and alſo to let him underſtand, that as he loved the ſafety of his Hoſtages, he ſhould then invade the Territories of the King of France, and that he himſelf would ſend him ſufficient Succours to revenge the Injuries that had been done him. But King Richard, fearing leſt ſomewhat of Treachery might lie concealed under this kind Meſſage, ſent William Biſhop of Ely to the Emperor, to enquire how great his Succours ſhould be, and when he would pleaſe to let him have them againſt the King of France; for King Richard was ſenſible, that if the Emperor and that King ſhould both combine againſt him, it would tend highly to his prejudice.

[2] R. H. p. 431. a. The War is again renew'd between King Philip and K. Richard. The Emperor promiſes K. Ric. great Succours againſt the K. of France. The Biſhop of Ely ſent to him to know how many, and when he ſhould have them.

[3] But the K. of France, hearing of the Deſign, and knowing that the Biſhop was to paſs through his Country, laid wait to ſeize him; but being diſappointed of it, he preſently ſent the King of England word that the Truce was broke; which the French Writers do wholly lay to King Richard's Charge, but without any juſt grounds; for the bare ſending an Embaſſy could be no breach of the Truce: but [4] Belleforeſt is fain to renew the old pretence of the diſhonour King Richard had done to the Royal Family of France, in refuſing his Siſter; and that to prevent That King's ſeizing the Caſtle of Reole, he was reſolved to deſtroy it himſelf; ſo that thereupon both Armies taking the Field, they began the old trade of Murdering, Burning, [5] and committing all manner of Rapine; which the King of France perceiving, and that he could not well defend his new conquered Territories againſt the King of England, he demoliſhed ſeveral Caſtles in Normandy, which the King of England afterwards refortified, and made ſtronger than they were before. But whilſt the King of France was at the demoliſhing of the Caſtle of Vale-Reole, the two Kings had an Enterview near that Caſtle, and whilſt they were treating underneath it, the Miners that the King of France had imployed to undermine it ſprung their Mine, and cauſed great part of the Walls of the Caſtle to fall down on the ſudden. K. Richard being ſomewhat ſurprized at this, and ſuſpecting Treachery, put an end to the Conference, and therefore preſently falling upon the King of France's Army he put it to flight; ſo that every body being forced to ſhift for himſelf, King Philip being perſued, and paſſing over the adjoining Bridge, it broke under him, inſomuch that He and his Followers very narrowly eſcaped being drowned in the River Seine; yet getting with ſome difficulty to the Bank ſide, he there encamped.

[5] R. H. ib. Both Kings again burn and ravage each other's Countries.

The two K's have an Enterview underneath the Caſtle of Vale-Reole, but to no purpoſe, by the K. of France's Treachery.

K. Philip flies, and in his flight falls into the River.

[1] In the mean time K. Richard returned to Caſtle Reole, and by the way took many of the King of France's Servants Priſoners; and then reinforcing his Army from all parts of his Dominions, he invaded his Country, puting all to the Sword that oppoſed him, deſtoying the Corn, and cutting up the Vineyards, and burning the Villages where-ever he came. And things continued in this ſad condition for ſome time.

[1] Id. ib. King Richard takes ſeveral of the K. of France's Servants Priſoners, and kills, burns, and deſtroys all before him.

[2] But not long after the two Kings hearing what great ſucceſs the King of the Mores (encouraged by theſe their Quarrels) had obtained in Spain, they reſolved on a Peace for the common good of Chriſtendom; and ſo meeting at another Treaty, they were almoſt wholly agreed upon theſe Conditions: That K. Richard ſhould beſtow in marriage his Neice Eleanor, Siſter to Arthur Duke of Bretaign, on Lewis the French King's Son, and give with her in Dower all the Norman Veuxin, together with the Caſtle of Giſors, and alſo ſeveral other Caſtles which the King of France was then Maſter of, and twenty thouſand Marks in ready Money over and above: and in conſideration of this the King of France engaged to releaſe to K. Richard whatſoever he claimed in the County of Angoleſme, and that he would reſtore to him the Caſtles of Albemarle and Oue, with ſeveral other places which he had taken from King Richard during this War. But the concluſion of this Treaty being delayed till the feaſt of All-Saints, it then came to no effect, by reaſon of the Emperor's being againſt it, and ſo they broke up. However the King of England did then reſtore to King Philip his Siſter Alice, who had been detained ſo long like a Priſoner, and whom, as ſoon as ſhe was deliver'd, her Brother married to John Earl of Pontieu.

[2] Id. ib.

The two K's meet again upon another Treaty.

Lady Eleanor to be married to Lewis the French King's Son, and to have a great Dower.

What the K. of France was to do on his part in return.

The Treaty comes to nothing through the Emperor's means.

In the mean time [3] William Bp of Ely, and the other Ambaſſadors who were ſent to the Emperor, return'd, bringing the King word, that the project of Peace between him and the French King was by no means pleaſing to the Emperor, who did not deſire that the King of England ſhould loſe or give up any thing, becauſe of his being kept in his Cuſtody; but then pardoned him ſeventeen thouſand Marks of Silver which ſtill remain'd unpaid of his Ranſom.

But the Emperor releaſes 17000 Marks of Silver, ſtill unpaid, of K. Richard's Ranſom.

When

When the time appointed by the two Kings for their next meeting was come, (which was to be at Vernuil on the Octaves of All Saints) King Richard happened to be there somewhat before the time; but the Archbishop of Rheimes coming out to him, told him as from the King of France, that he need not come so soon, because his Master was still in Council: Upon this King Richard giving credit to what he said, went back again to the place from whence he came, and waited till three of the Clock in the Afternoon, to hear from the French King; but when he found he still trifled with him, he was resolved to tarry no longer, and therefore went again to the place of Treaty: then Philip Bishop of Beauvois brought him word from the French King, that he challenged him for Breach of Faith, and being guilty of Perjury, because he had sworn to come thither at Nine of the Clock, and had not accordingly kept his word, and therefore he defied him. So this Treaty ending thus abruptly, both Kings returned from whence they came, and on the third day after the King of France made cruel Depredations on King Richard's Territories, and marching as far as Diepe (which King Richard had lately new built) took and burnt it to the ground, with all the Ships in the Harbour; after which Action the French Historians add, that King Richard met the King of France in his return, and sallying upon him on the sudden, out of a Wood, Philip had the worst on't, and there lost many of his Men, he himself escaping very narrowly, but without any hurt.

Anno Dom. MCXCV.

Another day appointed for a Treaty.

Archbishop of Rheimes's deceitful dealing with K. Richard.

K. Philip challenges him for breach of Faith. Whereupon the War is again renew'd with greater Violence.

[4] Then after I know not how many various Chances and Turns of War, the King of France came with his Army to Issoudun, took it, and besieged the Castle; which when it was told the King of England, he being then near Castle Reole, set all his other Affairs aside, and took three days march in one, and entring that Castle which the King of France had besieged, a multitude of Souldiers presently came in to him; King Philip being extreamly surprized at this his sudden Arrival, begged liberty to draw off his Army, which King Richard not granting him, he then desired to have a Treaty with him, and that was agreed on; at which Conference, by the mediation of the Bishops and great Men on both sides, there was an Oath mutually taken, that from that Day (being the Saturday after St. Nicholas's Day) there should be a firm Truce till the Feast of St. Hilary next ensuing, and then they were to meet at Loviers, to make a firm Peace between them in a much greater Assembly of the Nobility; and so both Kings return'd into their own Territories, to keep their Christmas.

[4] Id. ib.

King Richard coming to relieve the Castle of Issoudun, the K. of France desires a Treaty.

And there an Oath was taken on both sides to keep a firm Truce till the Feast of St. Hilary.

But the [5] French Historians relate the occasion and manner of making this Truce much otherwise, viz. that in November the War between the two Kings breaking out as fierce as ever, King Philip muster'd his Army about Bourget, not far from Issoudun, and King Richard did the like, being then encamped but a little way off, on the other side of the River: but they say nothing concerning the Siege of that Castle abovementioned, nor of the great advantage which King Richard had obtain'd over the French King, only the two Armies being now ready to give Battel, King Richard on the sudden (contrary to all Men's Expectations) tho upon what Motives they do not tell us, more than his being touch'd in Conscience, [5] Rigord P. 39. The French Account of this Truce.

Anno Dom. MCXCV. came unarmed with a few Attendants to King Philip's Camp, and did him Homage for Normandy, and all other his Dominions on that ſide the Sea: and then they ſolemnly took an Oath to each other, to maintain Peace from that time forward, and agreed upon another perſonal Conference or Treaty on the Octaves of Epiphany, between Caſtle Gaillard and Rueil, (but our Hiſtorians ſay it was to be held at Loviers at the Feaſt of St. Hilary) to compoſe and determine all Differences between them, and that in the mean while each ſhould keep what he had gotten; and ſo they returned into their own Territories in Peace.

But it favours too much of the Romance, to be probable.

But this Relation, in my Opinion, does not ſeem at all probable, or that King Richard, who had ſo great an Advantage over the French King, ſhould ſo far truckle to him as to go to his Camp, there to do him Homage, before he certainly knew whither any Peace would be concluded on, or not between them; for it is plain, the preſent Agreement was for no more than a Truce, till an abſolute Peace ſhould be concluded. Therefore I rather ſuppoſe that moſt of this Story is a mere Romance, contrived by the French Writers, in honour of their Hero, King Philip: and alſo that this Homage (if done at all) was not made till the Concluſion of the Peace after Chriſtmaſs, of which you will hear more anon.

[1] And here I cannot omit a remarkable Paſſage which I find in the ſame Author, ſince it gives us a knowledg not only of this King's moſt private Vices, but alſo of his Repentance, viz. That about this time he was admoniſh'd by a Hermit to remember the ſubverſion of Sodom, and ſo to abſtain from unlawful Luſts; at firſt the King ſlighted his Admonition, as coming from a poor deſpicable Fellow, but at laſt being (in the Eaſter week) viſited with a ſharp fit of Sickneſs, he called for divers religious Perſons or Monks, and did not ſtick to confeſs before them his being guilty of that Filthineſs: and then not long after recovering, he again took the Queen his Wife to his Bed, whom he had not known of a long time before, and ſo he lived very lovingly with her to the end of his days. He alſo now grew very Charitable, and bountifully relieved the Poor at his Court, who flocked to him from all parts, it being a time of great Famine and Scarcity.

An Account of the King's private Vices, and his publick Repentance.

His receiving the Queen to his Bed again.

His Charity.

Farther, to make amends for the Chalices that had been taken and melted down to raiſe Money for the King's Ranſom, he now ordered ſeveral new ones to be made both of Gold and Silver in the room of thoſe that had been ſo taken away; for it was none of the King's fault, but his adviſers, that thoſe Chalices were then made uſe of; which ſhews how groſly Kings are too often put upon by evil Counſellors, who are many times able to corrupt even the beſt of Princes.

His Juſtice.

The King being throughly reconciled to Earl John, reſtores him all his Earldoms except the Caſtles.

Little elſe happened this Year relating to England, but that King Richard being now throughly reconciled to his Brother Earl John, he reſtored to him his Earldoms of Mortaign and Glouceſter, with the Honour of Eye, and every thing belonging to them, except the Caſtles; and for all his other Lands the King gave him eight thouſand Pounds of Anjou Money: the King was then likewiſe reconciled to Hugh Biſhop of Coventry, and reſtored to him his Biſhoprick, upon his payment of five thouſand Marks of Silver.

He alſo is reconcil'd to the Bpoſ Coventry,

But

[3] But ſome time after, when the King had alſo reſtored his Brother Geoffrey Archbiſhop of York to his favour, he, preſuming too much upon the King's kind Uſage, began to rip up old Quarrels, and provoked him to that degree by his ſharp and undecent Language, that he commanded him again to be diſſeized of his Archbiſhoprick, and of the Sheriffdom of York; which ſhews this Prelate to have been of a very warm and haughty Temper, and had not learn'd how to treat with Kings, whoſe Injuries are better paſſed by than remembred, becauſe they cannot be ſafely returned. Anno Dom. MCXCV.

[3] Id. ib. And would have been alſo to his Brother the Archbiſhop of York, had he not again provok'd him by ill Language.

[4] Nor did this Archbiſhop diſpleaſe the King his Brother only, but alſo his own Chanons of the Church of York; who having had divers quarrels with him about the Election of a new Dean, and other matters, this Year appealed to the Pope againſt him, accuſing him, that giving himſelf up to Hawking and Hunting, and other ſecular Affairs, he neglected his Epiſcopal Function; whereupon the Pope ſent his Letters, or Commiſſion to the Biſhop of Lincoln, the Archdeacon of Northampton, and to the Prior of Pontefract, to make Inquiſition into the exceſſes of the Archbiſhop, and upon Enquiry to return their Proceedings to Rome; which being alſo done, the Archbiſhop was then ſummon'd by the Pope to appear before him; but neglecting to obey the Summons, he was ſuſpended from his Archiepiſcopal Office, tho this Sentence was not executed till the Year following: but I mention it here, becauſe I would not make a breach in the Story of this Prelate.

[4] Id. p. 426. a. The Chanons of the Church of York appeal againſt their Archbiſhop.

[5] But to give you the reſt of the Eccleſiaſtical Affairs of this Year, the King reſolving that Hubert Archbiſhop of Canterbury, now chief Juſtitiary of the Kingdom, ſhould alſo be inveſted with the ſupreme Eccleſiaſtical, as well as Temporal Authority, he ſent to the Pope to deſire him that he would conſtitute him his Legate over all England; which requeſt the Pope readily granted, and thereupon directed [1] a Letter or Bull to the Archbiſhop, whereby he confer'd on him his Legantine Power, to viſit and reform thoſe things that needed Reformation in the Province of York, and to appoint and conſtitute ſuch things as were requiſite: the Pope alſo wrote at the ſame time to the Archbiſhop of York, with his Suffragan Biſhops and Clergy, enjoining them to ſubmit to his Legate's Authority, notwithſtanding any Privilege that Church might pretend to the contrary.

[2] Since therefore this extraordinary Power was given chiefly to humble the Archbiſhop of York, who was then out of Favour, the Archbiſhop, as Legate, preſently ſent Meſſengers to York, commanding the Dean and Chanons of that Church, as alſo the Officials of that Dioceſs, to ſummon the Clergy, and if any refuſed to receive or ſubmit to him, they were to be declared excommunicated; then Archbiſhop Hubert going down to York, on St. Barnabas's day, was received by the Clergy with a ſolemn Proceſſion; and tho not as Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and Primate of all England, but as the Pope's Legate, he was brought into the Cathedral Church, and on the Monday following, as chief Juſticiary, he cauſed Aſſizes to be held of all Pleas of the Crown, and of Novel Diſſeiſins and Mort d'Anceſtors, by his Miniſters; whilſt He and his Officials held Pleas in the Eccleſiaſtical Court, which were all diſpatch'd in one day. On the two following days, was held a famous Synod of all the Abbots, Priors, and and other Officers, as well pertaining to the Cathedral Church, as to the Dioceſs of York, wherein were made eighteen Canons, for the redreſs of divers Abuſes that had crept into the Church, in the Adminiſtration of the Sacraments, and other matters; as alſo for the Reformation of the Lives of Monks, Chanons Regular, and Nuns, and of Prieſts too, forbidding them to frequent drinking-meetings, and Taverns, or to keep Concubines; all which had been ordained before by divers Synods in the Province of Canterbury, but being moſt of them of no great moment to us now, I do but juſt name them: yet I have been the more particular in giving ſome Account of this Synod, becauſe it was the only one of this kind I can find to have been held by any Pope's Legate in this Province, for divers Ages; tho it was not the only Eccleſiaſtical Council that was held in this King's Reign, as a certain Modern [3] Hiſtorian has affirmed, ſince he might have found in [4] Radulphus de Diceto, and [5] Gervaſe of Canterbury, that William Biſhop of Ely, when he was the Pope's Legate, held a Synod of the Biſhops and Clergy of England at Weſtminſter, not long after the departure of King Richard for the Holy Land.

[1] I find nothing elſe performed this Year by Archbiſhop Hubert, as chief Juſtitiary, but an Oath he ſent to be taken all over England, That all Men thereof ſhould keep the King's Peace, and neither receive Thieves, nor be conſenting with them; and that when they knew of any ſuch Malefactors, they ſhould apprehend and deliver them to the Sheriff, who was by no means to ſet them free, unleſs by command of the King and the Juſtitiary; and if they could not apprehend them, then they were to diſcover them to the King's Bayliffs, and upon Hue and Cry being made after ſuch Out-laws, Robbers, &c. all ſhould do their beſt to perſue and ſeize them; and if it appear'd that any had not join'd in it, who was preſent, or had withdrawn himſelf from it, they were to be apprehended as Malefactors themſelves, and to be brought to the Sheriff; not to be ſet free, but by the King and his Juſtitiary's command; and that certain Knights aſſigned for this purpoſe, ſhould cauſe all Men of fifteen years of Age to come before them, and take the Oath abovemention'd. And therefore for the performance of theſe things, there were certain faithful Men choſen and ſent through each of the Counties of England, who by the Oaths of credible Perſons of the Vicinage, took up many and put them in Priſon; but many others who were guilty in their own Conſciences, being forewarned of it, fled, and left their Houſes and Poſſeſſions.

proving ſhortly after with Child, that Agreement came to nothing.

[3] Abour the Feaſt of S. Hilary, the two Kings met at Loviers according to their former Agreement; where, by the advice of their great Men, or * Feudataries, they conſented that the King of France and his Heirs ſhould for ever releaſe to the King of England and his Heirs Iſſodune with its Dependencies, and all the Right he had in Berry, Auvergne, and Gaſcoigne; and that he ſhould render to him the Caſtle of Arches, the Earldoms of Albemarle and Oue, and the other Caſtles he had taken in the War; and that in conſideration thereof, the King of England was to releaſe to the King of France, the Caſtle of Giſors, and all Veuxin-Norman: and for the performance of theſe Articles, they were mutually bound to each other in fifteen thouſand Marks of Silver, and both Princes alſo found ſufficient Sureties for the ſaid Sum.

* Hominum ſuorum.

The two Kings meet at Loviers, and their ſeveral Releaſes to each other by Agreement.

Yet notwithſtanding theſe ſolemn Oaths and Precautions for the true obſervance of the Peace, it did not laſt long, but through whoſe fault it firſt came to be broken is not eaſy for us to determine at this diſtance of Time, eſpecially where Authors differ ſo much about it; the Engliſh Hiſtorians laying all the fault upon the King of France, and the French upon King Richard, and indeed give us ſome plauſible Reaſons why their King Philip ſhould again renew the War, which were, That King Richard had fortified the Iſle of Andely, againſt the conſent of the Archbiſhop of Roüen its Owner; but the main pretence was, becauſe the King having took ſome Offence againſt a petty Lord, called the Seignieur of Vierſon, and had fallen upon him, and ſeized his Caſtle of that Name, and being a Vaſſal of the King of France, he forthwith went to him to make his Complaint, who thereupon ſent Forces to ſecure the reſt of that Lord's ſmall Territories from being alſo taken by King Richard. Nor did this content Philip, but without ever ſending to demand ſatisfaction, he entred Normandy, and ſate down before the Caſtle of Albemarle; which ſo ſoon as K. Richard heard, he in return ſurprized the Caſtle of Noren Court, and having well victual'd and gariſon'd it, marched back to relieve that of Albemarle: but as he drew near the Place, he was engaged by the French, and his Forces put to flight; in which Skirmiſh Guy Viſcount of Thovars, a valiant Nobleman, that afterwards married the Counteſs of Bretaigne, was taken Priſoner.

But Peace did not laſt long between them.

The Reaſons the French give why their King renewed the War.

Upon which good ſucceſs of the French, King Philip had leiſure to perſue the Siege of Albemarle Caſtle, which being much batter'd by the Engines call'd Petrars, was at laſt forced to ſurrender after ſeven weeks Siege, on this ſole Condition, viz. that the Gariſon ſhould march out with their Horſes, Arms, and Baggage; then King Philip razed the Caſtle to the Ground, from whence he went to the Caſtle of Noren-Court, which he beſieging, ſoon took by Storm, and in it divers Knights and Eſquires.

Albemarle Caſtle ſurrendered to the French.

And Noren-Court.

But of all theſe Victories gain'd by the French our Engliſh Hiſtorians are wholly ſilent, [4] Roger Hoveden telling us little more than that the King of France ſoon repented of this Agreement, and levying a great Army, came upon Albemarle on the ſudden, and took and demoliſhed it; and that upon the breach of this Peace, on the French King's part, the King of England cauſed the Goods, Lands, and Poſ-ſeſſions of the Abbots of the rich Monaſteries of Clugni, St. Denis, and la Charité, lying almoſt in all places of his Dominions, to be ſeized, as having been Sureties to him, for the fifteen thouſand Marks which King Philip was to forfeit if he firſt broke the Peace.

The two Kings burn and ravage each other's Countries.

I cannot find any thing conſiderable that was done by way of Revenge, unleſs it were, [5] that not long after Earl John, the King's Brother, took the Caſtle of Gamage. Thus theſe Kings being now more incenſed than ever againſt each other, ſpent moſt part of this Year in burning one another's Towns, and deſtroying their Countries.

[5] Id. ib.

The Counteſs of Bretaigne is ſeized in Normandy by her Husband, and ſhut up in one of his Caſtles.

Not long after this, the Counteſs of Bretaigne, Mother to Earl Arthur, came into Normandy at King Richard's Requeſt, to diſcourſe with him about private matters: But her Husband Randulph Earl of Cheſter meeting her, he ſeized her Perſon, and ſhut her up in one of his Caſtles. But when her Son, the Earl of Bretaigne, found he could not ſet her free, he declared for the King of France, and deſtroyed the Territories of the King his Uncle; who raiſing a ſtrong Army in Revenge, entred Bretaigne, and laid great part of it waſte. But [1] Gervaſe of Canterbury, and Brompton's Chronicle, do both with greater probability report, that King Richard requiring the Tutelage of his Nephew Arthur till he came of Age, ſome of the chief Noblemen of that Countrey oppoſing his Deſigns, carried him away into the farther parts of Bretaign, and then being out of the King's reach, thought he could more ſafely take up Arms againſt him: all which conſider'd, ſhews us the reaſon why the Dutcheſs his Mother was lately ſecured, becauſe ſhe was wholly of the French Faction. But this her impolitick, and I may ſay womaniſh wilfulneſs, gave the King a juſt pretence not to declare her Son (tho his Nephew) his Succeſſour; and indeed this Folly of his Mother loſt him the Crown of England.

[1] Sub hoc Anno.

Which loſt him the Crown of England.

[2] Id. ib.

[2] Sometime after this happened an Affair which gave the King a great deal of Diſturbance, and ſufficiently ſhews us the mighty Power, as well as Haughtineſs of the Prelates of thoſe Times, who would rather expoſe their Countrey to the Ravage of the Enemy, than part with the leaſt Right of their own.

[3] Id. ib. A ſharp Diſpute between King Richard and the Archbiſhop of Roüen.

But to give an Account of the original of this Diſpute between the King and the Archbiſhop of Roüen; [3] the Iſle of Andely on the Seine being part of the Demeaſnes of that Archbiſhoprick, was a conſiderable Paſs by which the King of France uſed to enter Normandy whenever he pleaſed, over a ſhallow Ford in that River: wherefore King Richard being reſolved to put a ſtop if he could to his future Incurſions, and finding this Iſle to lie very convenient for that purpoſe, he had been treating with that Archbiſhop either to buy it of, or exchange it with him for ſomewhat elſe at leaſt of equal value: but this fair offer being peremptorily refuſed by this Prelate, King Richard, to prevent the French King's ſeizing it, and ſo to do him further Miſchief, began to build a Caſtle on the ſaid Iſle, contrary to the Archbiſhop's Will and Conſent: and becauſe the King would not deſiſt upon his prohibition, he pronounced the Sentence of Interdict againſt Normandy, and went to the Pope to complain againſt the King, notwithſtanding he had offered him what Satisfaction he would reaſonably demand, either in Land or Money, for that place.

He pronounces the Sentence of Interdict againſt Normandy.

On

[4] On May the 19*th*, John Earl of Mortaign, and Marchades the General of the Brabanters, with a good body of Horſe appeared before the City of Beauvais, and began to plunder and ſpoil that Country; whereupon Philip the Biſhop of the City, and William de Merlou, with his Son, and a great many Knights, and ordinary People, went out armed to oppoſe them; but they were preſently routed, and the Biſhop, William de Merlou's Son, and ſome Knights were taken Priſoners, and moſt part of the ordinary People killed: ſo that the ſame day King Richard's men marched to Milli, a Caſtle belonging to the Biſhop, and took it by Aſſault; and when they had demoliſhed it, they returned triumphantly into Normandy, and delivered their Priſoners (among whom was the Prelate himſelf) to the King, who was very glad he had got the Biſhop in his power, he being at that time one of the greateſt Enemies he had. And therefore [5] he ordered him to be ſent to Roüen, and there laid in Fetters; and when two of that Biſhop's Houſhold Chaplains came ſome days after to the King, to deſire him that they might wait on their Lord in Priſon, and that he might be more gently uſed; the King's anſwer was, That he would refer the caſe to them, and let them be Judges between their Lord and himſelf: for he told them, when he was kept Priſoner by the Emperor, and had been for ſome time honourably treated as his Dignity required, after their Lord's Arrival there from the K. of France, he found by experience what they had been treating of over Night, being the next day loaded with as many Irons as would tire an Aſs: upon hearing of which the Chaplains went away very much confounded from his Preſence.

This being the ſum of Affairs that happened this Year in France, we ſhall now relate what fell out in England.

[1] At London, in Lent, a great Sedition aroſe among the common ſort of People, which might have proved of a very dangerous Conſequence to the whole City if it had not been timely prevented: and I ſhall give you a true Account of it from two Authors, who were then living, viz. Roger Hoveden, and Radulphus de Diceto, Dean of St. Paul's, who was an Eye-witneſs of it; the occaſion and manner of which was thus.

[1] R. H. p. 435. b. A dangerous Sedition in London.

There was then in the City of London one William Fitz-Osbert, commonly called William with the Long-Beard, which he wore to make himſelf more reſpected by the common People, tho otherwiſe he was a Man in Perſon as contemptible as he was in Quality; yet he had procured himſelf a mighty Reſpect and Intereſt with them, becauſe he took upon him to be an Advocate of the Poor againſt the Rich: and this he often did before the Magiſtrates of the City, by a wonderful natural Eloquence which he was a great maſter of, and by means whereof he thought he might lead the People which way ſoever he pleaſed; ſo that theſe having him for their Leader, they were more at his diſpoſal than at that of the Mayor of the City, which ſtruck ſuch a Terror into the better ſort of Citizens, that they ſtood upon their Guard Night and Day: for this Fellow had neither ſpared his own Brother, nor two other honeſt Men of good Reputation, whom he had accuſed of Treaſon againſt the King, and perſecuted almoſt to Death. But not long after he raiſed a mighty Diſſenſion among the Mob (as we now call them) about a certain Aid or Tallage lage which was to be raiſed upon them; alledging, that it was unequally laid, and that the richer Citizens being excuſed, the burden fell in a manner wholly upon the Poor; which at laſt cauſed ſuch a Tumult at St. Paul's Church, that many there were killed. Whereupon the Archbiſhop, who was the King's Juſtitiary, commanded that this William their Leader ſhould be taken into Cuſtody, and brought before him; but when the King's Officers went about to ſeize him, he and his Accomplices fled to the Church of St. Mary le Bow in Cheapſide, and getting up into the Steeple, and having ſome Proviſions with them, they fortified it like a Caſtle; ſo that not being able to get them out any other way, by the Archbiſhop's Command a Fire was made under them, which being at firſt done only to ſmoke them out, yet it took hold of the Church, and conſumed moſt part of it; tho Radulphus de Diceto relates, that this William ſet Fire on it himſelf (which ſeems not ſo likely) but however it is certain, that he and his followers being ſmoked, or rather burnt out, were forced to ſurrender themſelves; and William with the Beard being there taken, and eight others of his Companions, they were carried to the Tower of London, and there by the King's Court ſentenced to be hanged; and being drawn by the Feet as far as the Elms near Tyburn, they were executed accordingly, and hung up in Chains, and ſo this Sedition was appeaſed: but this William's Carcaſs being ſometime after ſtolen away and buried, his Followers pretended that divers Miracles were wrought at his Grave; hereupon Guards were ſet at the place, and thoſe that came thither to pray being well beaten for their pains, People ſaw through the Cheat, and quickly left off their Devotions to this pretended Saint.

I have been the more particular in this Relation, to let the Reader ſee, that the temper of the common People, or rather the Mob (as they now call them) has been much the ſame in all Ages.

Before we conclude this Year, I ſhall give you ſome Account of the Affairs of Wales; [2] where the Welſh had been for ſome conſiderable time pretty quiet, but now taking Advantage of the King's being engaged in foreign Wars, Rees Prince of South-Wales muſtering a great Army, and laying Siege to the Town and Caſtle of Caermarthen, took them both, ſpoiling and deſtroying the ſame, and then returned with much ſpoil: after this he led his Army before the Caſtle of Clun, which he likewiſe took, tho not till after a long Siege: from thence he went to Radnor Caſtle, and took that alſo, before Roger Mortimer and Hugh de Say, who were marching thither with a powerful Army of Normans and Engliſh to prevent him, could arrive. But Prince Rees, reſolving not to keep his Men within the Caſtle, boldly marched out againſt the Engliſh Commanders; and tho a great many of his Men were undiſciplined and unarmed, yet they ſo well acquitted themſelves, that the Engliſh Army were routed with a great loſs of Men, the Welſh purſuing the reſt till the darkneſs of the Night came ſeaſonably on to protect them; then the Prince forthwith laid Siege to the Caſtle of Payn in Elvel, and took it. But William de Bruce, the Lord of it, coming thither to him, made Peace with Prince Rees, of whom he received the Caſtle again upon certain Conditions. Not long after the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, the King's Juſtitiary, hearing of theſe Incurſions, came with a mighty Army into into Wales, and laid Siege to the Caſtle of Gwenwynwyn, at the Pool; but the Gariſon defended the Place ſo well, that he loſt divers of his Men; ſo that he perceiving he could do no good there by Aſſault, he ſent for Miners to undermine the Walls; which when the Gariſon heard of, and finding themſelves too weak to hold out, they offer'd to ſurrender it provided they might march out with their Arms: the Archbiſhop accepted of theſe Terms, and permitted them to go their way; then ſtrongly fortifying the Caſtle for the King's uſe, and placing therein a Gariſon for its defence, he returned into England: but immediately after Prince Lhewellyn laid Siege to it again, and had it ſurrendered to him upon the ſame Terms, that his Men had before given it up.

The ABp of Canterbury goes againſt the Welſh with a great Army, and has the Caſtle of Gwenwynwyn ſurrendered to him.

Prince Lhewellyn ſoon after recovers it again.

I cannot here omit what our Author farther relates, concerning [3] Archbiſhop Hubert, that whilſt he thus continued the Pope's Legate, and King's Juſtitiary, he either really was, or elſe ſeem'd to be weary of ſo great a Burden; and therefore ſent Meſſengers to the King, deſiring him to place ſome other Perſon in the Government of the Kingdom, and give him leave to lay it down, ſince he was not able to diſcharge both the Spiritual and Temporal Functions any longer. Then the King, tho very unwillingly (for he knew there was none more capable of maintaining the Laws and Rights of the Kingdom, than the Archbiſhop) yet at laſt conſented to his Diſcharge; but when it came to, the Archbiſhop repented of that Meſſage he had ſent to the King, knowing that he was very well paid for his Pains; and therefore having looked over the Rolls of Accounts, he ſent the King word, that he had raiſed out of this Kingdom for his ſole uſe Eleven hundred thouſand Marks of Silver; and added, that if he thought his Service further neceſſary, and it was his Pleaſure he ſhould ſtill continue in his Office, he would not deny ſerving of him, notwithſtanding his great Age. It is therefore no wonder that he ſtill kept the Government, ſince the King did not know where to find ſuch another Miniſter for his turn.

[3] R. H. p. 435. a.

The ABp begs of the King to eaſe him of the Secular Government, which is granted.

But afterwards repenting of it, he is again reſtored.

Thus we ſee Men are ſeldom cloyed with too much Power; but the greateſt wonder is, how one old Man could bear up under the weight and fatigue of ſo much Buſineſs, or how England having been ſo lately exhauſted for the King's Ranſom, could now again afford ſuch a vaſt Sum in ſo ſhort a time, which was then (the value of Money, and prices of things conſidered) more than five Millions of Pounds at this day; and ſhews that England muſt have had at that time a very conſiderable Trade for its Commodities, or elſe having no Silver Mines, the Species then wrought of Silver and Gold could never have ſo multiplied in two or three Years: and therefore we have the leſs reaſon to admire the greatneſs of the Taxes that England has lately undergone.

As for Eccleſiaſtical matters, this Kingdom affords us none, unleſs we may take notice [4] that Geoffrey Archbiſhop of York, having been Suſpended by the Pope (as you have already heard) and forced to take a Journey to Rome to clear himſelf of the Crimes laid to his Charge, had (tho with ſome difficulty) obtain'd a fair Hearing from his Holineſs, who was then much prejudiced againſt him, wherein he ſo well acquitted himſelf, that his Adverſaries not being able to make good their Allegations againſt him, the Pope at laſt, by the conſent

But finding himſelf now ſo miſerably diſappointed, he commanded two of the Prebends (who were his Enemies) not to permit the Archbiſhop, or his Officials, to have any thing to do with the Spiritual Juriſdiction: And the King himſelf in the mean time beſtowed all the Prebendaries and vacant Benefices of that Church upon his own Clerks as he pleaſed: but when the Archbiſhop ſaw upon his return from Rome to France, that his Reſtitution would do him little good, ſo long as the King thus deprived him, both of his Spiritual and Temporal Rights, after ſome ſtay there, he thought it beſt to go back to Rome again, where he continued till the next Year before he could get the King to be reconciled to him.

And is reſtored to his Epiſcopal Office, &c.

But the King will not ſuffer him to have any thing to do with the Spiritual Juriſdiction.

And ſo he goes back to Rome, and is not reconcil'd to the K. till the next Year.

Anno Dom. MCXCVII. [5] King Richard being ſtill in Normandy, kept his Chriſtmaſs at Buers, and was very much troubled that the Archbiſhop of Roüen would not releaſe that Dutchy from the late Interdict which made the dead Bodies to lie unburied in the Streets of the Cities and Towns.

[5] Id. p. 437. a.

The dead Bodies lie expoſed in the Streets, becauſe of the ABp of Roüen's Interdict.

Wherefore, not long after, the King ſent William Biſhop of Ely his Chancellor, with the Biſhop of Liſieux, and Philip the Elect of Durham, Ambaſſadors to the Pope to make his Defence; but the firſt of theſe falling ſick by the way, dyed at Poictiers, ſo the other two went on to Rome, and appearing before the Pope with the Archbiſhop, who was there before them, he aſſerted the Right he had to the Iſle of Andeli, and complained of the Injury K. Richard had done him, by building a Caſtle upon the Patrimony of the Church of Roüen, without his Aſſent, nay contrary to his Will. To which they anſwered, that the King had often offered him, by the mediation of his Biſhops, Abbots, Earls, and Barons, full ſatisfaction, according as ſelect and diſcreet Men ſhould eſtimate; and alſo affirm'd on the King's behalf, that he could not part with that Iſland in which the Caſtle was built, becauſe the K. of France had uſually made his Paſſage that way into Normandy, and often waſted it; and therefore he was obliged to fortify it for the defence of his Country, againſt his Enemy of France.

K. Richard ſends Ambaſſadors to the Pope, to make his Defence.

Their Plea on the King's behalf.

The Pope and Cardinals after long Deliberation, conſidering the damages which might accrue to Normandy, if there were not a Caſtle erected there, adviſed the Archbiſhop amicably to compoſe the matter, and to accept a Recompence according to the eſtimation of honeſt and indifferent Perſons; adding farther, that it was Lawful for Kings and Princes to fortify the weak places of their Countries, to prevent thoſe Dangers which otherwiſe might happen to themſelves and their People. This matter being thus ended, the Pope releaſed the Interdict that was upon Normandy.

The Pope's Advice to the ABp of Roüen.

The Interdict releaſed.

[1] Id. ib. b. [1] Some months after this, the Ambaſſadors and the Archbiſhop being return'd with the determination of the Pope and Cardinals, the King ſummon'd the Biſhops, Abbots, Earls, and Barons of Normandy together; and then gave to Walter Archbiſhop of Roüen in Recompence for his Iſle of Andeli, the Towns of Diepe and Loviers, with their Appurtenances, and divers other Mannors and Mills, as appears by the King's Charter, and the Pope's Confirmation of it

[3] The ſame Year King Richard marched to the Town of St. Valery in Picardie, and burnt it; and deſtroying the Monaſtery, he carried away the Monks, together with the Shrine and Reliques of St. Valery with him into Normandy; and finding in that Port divers Ships come from England, laden with Corn and Victuals, he hang'd the Mariners, burnt the Ships, and diſtributed the lading amongſt his Souldiers; for it ſeems he had not long before iſſued out a Proclamation, that none ſhould bring any Proviſions out of England upon pain of Death.

[3] R. H. ib. The K. plunders and burns St. Valery.

[4] About this time the King of France's Efforts againſt King Richard growing ſtill weaker and weaker, it encouraged his Neighbours to deſert his Party; for now the People of Champaigne, the Flemings and Bretaigns, gave Pledges mutually, that they would not make Peace with the King of France, unleſs by common Conſent; for it ſeems the King of England had brought over to him many of the Great Men of France by his Favours and Bounties: he gave to the Earl of Flanders five thouſand Marks for his Aſſiſtance, and he gave Hoſtages not to make Peace with the King of France, without the King's conſent; and the King of England did the ſame to him. Radulphus de Diceto has given us the Articles of Agreement between theſe two Princes at large, which were ſworn to by Earl John on the behalf of the King his Brother, before ſeveral witneſſes in the Iſle of Andeli.

[5] Some time after this, William Criſpin, Conſtable of the Caſtle of Dangu, was forced to ſurrender it to King Richard, who having well ſtored it with Men and Ammunition, marched into Auvergne, and there took ten Caſtles belonging to the King of France, or his Vaſſals: in the mean time K. Philip retook the Caſtle of Dangu, granting to the Knights and their Followers that were in it, their Lives and Members; and receiving five hundred Marks of them for their Ranſom, he gave them their Liberties, and fortified the Caſtle for his own Uſe.

[1] About the ſame time Baldwin Earl of Flanders had beſieged the City of Arras, which the King of France hearing of, preſently marched thither with a great Army, upon whoſe approach the Earl of Flanders raiſed the Siege, and retreated; but the French King not ſatisfied with this, would needs follow him into his own Territories, till at laſt his Army being encompaſſed between two Rivers, the Earl by breaking down the Bridges, and putting ſtrong guards upon the Paſſes, ſo ſhut up the King of France's Army, that no Proviſions could be brought to them; whereupon the King finding himſelf in ſo great a ſtreight, deſired the Earl that he would not put any Affront upon the Crown of France, affirming, that he came into Flanders with an intention to make Peace with him, and that he would reſtore to him all his Rights which he then detain'd, provided he would quit the King of England's Intereſt: but tho the Earl of Flanders refuſed to do that, becauſe of his late Agreement with King Richard, yet yet he ſo far complied with the French King's deſires, that upon his promiſe to make Peace with King Richard likewiſe, and to reſtore to him what he had taken from him, he ſuffered the King of France and his Army to make their Retreat without any diſturbance; but he had only this return for his kindneſs, that the French King never perform'd one jot of what he had promiſed him.

How far he offered to comply with the French K's deſires.

[2] Then the Earl went in Perſon, to perſwade the King of France to a Treaty of Peace between Gaillion and Andeli, where both Kings having enough of War, and being met with a great Aſſembly of the Nobility on both ſides, altho their Stomachs were too high to condeſcend to an abſolute Peace, [3] yet for the preſent they conſented to a Truce for a Year and four Months, during which it was alſo agreed that there ſhould be a free Trade between their Subjects, and that the Priſoners ſhould be ranſom'd at a reaſonable price: ſo the Aſſembly broke up, and both Kings returning home, there was an end of this years War; tho the Truce did not hold out the full time agreed upon, as you will find by and by, in the next Year.

The two Kings in a great Aſſembly, conſent to a Truce for a Year and four Months.

[4] About this time Philip Biſhop of Beauvais growing weary of his Impriſonment, ſent his Brother, the Biſhop of Orleans, with Letters to the Pope, informing him that he was made a Priſoner by the King of England, and complained how he was bound and laden with Irons, notwithſtanding the Dignity of his Order, and (as my Author ſays) petitioned with Tears for Relief.

The Bp of Beauvais his Complaint to the Pope againſt K. Richard.

The Pope hereupon wrote to King Richard on his behalf, expoſtulating with him, why he would detain in Priſon his dear Brother and Son, the Biſhop of Beauvais? [5] Upon this the King is ſaid to have ſent to the Pope the Archbiſhop's Armour in which he was taken, together with a Letter wherein was this Paſſage, Holy Father, will you be pleaſed to ſee whither this is your Son's Coat, or not? Which, if true, ſhews that that Prince was not ſo ignorant of the Scripture, but that he knew how to make an ingenious uſe of it when it was for his purpoſe: but whither this Anſwer were real or not, ſince I find it in no Author before Matt. Paris, I will not affirm; yet ſo much is certain, that the Pope return'd to the Biſhop himſelf no very kind Anſwer, being to this effect, That he had put on the Armour of a Souldier, inſtead of the Habit of a Prieſt; [1] "And that altho the K. of France was bound "by Oath, not to do any damage to the King of England's Dominions "during the time of his Pilgrimage, yet that he had impudently, a- "gainſt his Faith and Oath, by Force, taken his Towns, and cruelly "waſted his Territories; the Equity of whoſe Cauſe fought for him "againſt the Arrogance and Injuries of the French King: that he, "the Biſhop, was not only a fooliſh Adviſer of, but an inſolent Actor "in this unlawful Quarrel; and at laſt concludes thus, That he could "only ſupplicate the King of England in his behalf, for in ſuch a caſe "he neither could, nor ought to command.

Whither the Pope wrote any more on his behalf, I do not find; but it is certain the Biſhop remain'd ſtill in Priſon till the Year following, when he offer'd for his Liberty ten thouſand Marks of Silver.

Having thus diſpatch'd foreign Affairs, let us now look homewards, and ſee what was done in England. [2] The Archbiſhop of Canterbury, the King's Juſtitiary, going over this Year, by the King's Command, into Normandy about the middle of June, ſtayed there till the latter end end of October following, where divers things were eſtabliſhed for the good of the publick; and it is very probable that [3] King Richard then ordained that Aſſize concerning Meaſures, which we find in R. Hoveden under this Year. But Walter of Coventry in his Memoriale Hiſtoriar. ſays, they were made at Weſtminſter at the Feaſt of St. Edmund, at the Petition, and by the Advice of all the Biſhops and Barons of the Kingdom; ſo that it ſeems to have been an Ordinance of that King's great Council of Peers. Yet ſince they were not ordained by the General Council of the Kingdom, or Parliament, I look upon them only to have been in the nature of a Temporary Edict; and therefore I ſhall refer the Reader, that has a mind to peruſe them, to the end of this King's Reign, where he will ſee them tranſlated to his hand. I do not find there happened any thing elſe conſiderable in England this Year.

But to give ſome Account of the Affairs of Wales: [4] Rees Prince of South-Wales now deceaſed, whom the Welſh Chronicles highly extol, and lament with a great deal of Monkiſh Eloquence, in rhiming Latin Verſes, as a Prince of that Valour and Worth, that he was the only Hope and Defence of his Country: and indeed after his Death, all things in South-Wales fell into Civil War and Confuſion, his Sons taking up Arms againſt each other, contending for the Government. [5] To extinguiſh which Diſſentions, Archbiſhop Hubert, tho lately an Enemy, marched down into thoſe parts to ſettle Peace amongſt them, which continued for ſome time. Griffyth, Prince Rees's ſecond Son, ſucceeded him for a while, and ſubduing all that Country, enjoyed it in Peace until Maelgon his Brother (whom his Father had diſinherited) made a League with Gwenwynwyn, the Son of Owen Cyvelioc, Lord of Powis, who both together levying tho but a ſmall Army, came ſuddenly upon Prince Griffyth at Aberyſtwyth, and killing many of his Men, took him Priſoner, and ſo recovered all the Country of Caërdigan, together with the Caſtle Maelgon: He having thus taken his Brother, ſent him to be impriſoned with Gwenwynwyn, who in deſpite delivered him to the Engliſhmen: and then Gwenwynwyn gathering a ſufficient Power, entred Aruſtly, and ſubdued it to his own Dominion.

[3] Id. ib. b. A great Diſturbance in the Church of Dublin, and the occaſion of it.

[3] Alſo this Year there happened no ſmall diſturbance in the Church of Dublin; for John Cumin the Archbiſhop of that City, having ſuffer'd great Injuries from Hamo de Valoins, and the other Guardians of Ireland, who were the Servants of Earl John, the King's Brother, reſolved rather to endure Baniſhment, than ſuch Abuſes to himſelf and his Church: but before he went away, he excommunicated all thoſe who had done him wrong, and laid an Interdict upon his Archbiſhoprick, and alſo commanded the Crucifixes and Images about the Cathedral Church to be taken down, and laid upon Thorns; which, as our Author relates, produced ſuch a wonderful Miracle, that the chief Crucifix being thus uſed, its Face began to look very red and fiery, and to ſweat extreamly, and great drops fell from its Eyes as if it wept, and out of its ſide came Blood and Water, which the Officers of the Church gathering up, ſent after to the Archbiſhop, with a large Relation of this ſtrange Miracle: but it ſeems, neither the reſt of the Biſhops, nor any of Earl John's Officers were converted by it; nor did they make the Biſhop any ſatisfaction, any more than did King Richard, or the Earl himſelf, when the Archbiſhop came over to them to complain, and to demand Reſtitution of what had thus violently been taken from him; ſo that it ſeems they looked upon this Miracle to be but a cheat of the Monks, if it was ever told them at all.

The ABp before his departure, excommunicates all thoſe that had injured him, and puts his Archbiſhoprick under Interdict.

The Miracle of the chief Crucifix look'd on as a Monkiſh cheat.

[1] The King kept his Chriſtmaſs this year at Roüen, and the reſt of the Winter and following Summer paſſed over without any Action between the two Kings, becauſe the late Truce as yet continued; and therefore we ſhall in the mean while, give you an account of what was done in England.

[2] Id. ib. ABp Hubert marches to the borders of Wales.

[2] About the beginning of this Summer Archbiſhop Hubert, the King's Juſtitiary, marched down with ſome Forces to the Borders of Wales, and there took into his hands, for the King's Uſe, the Caſtles of Hereford, Bridgnorth, and Ludlow, putting out the old Conſtables, and placing in new ones, whom he could better truſt: not long after which King Richard deſired of the Feudataries, or Military Men of England, by the ſame Archbiſhop, that they would find him three hundred Horſe, to remain in his Service for one Year; or elſe to let him have ſo much Money as would maintain ſo many Knights, and give them for their Livery or Wages, every day, three Shillings of Engliſh

The K's Feudataries to find 300 Horſe, or pay ſo much as would maintain them.

English Money, to which demand all preſent (not daring to deny it) ſeemed to give their conſent, except Hugh Biſhop of Lincoln, who ſaid he knew not what Injury it might do the Church in future Times; and then turning to the Archbiſhop, earneſtly entreated him that nothing might be farther done in it: but whither he complied with that Requeſt or no, I do not find. Anno Dom. MCXCVIII.

[3] Alſo the ſame Year the King took an Aid of five Shillings of every Carucate or Hyde of Land in England, and ſent into every County one Clerk and one Knight to collect it: theſe took the Sheriff, and certain legal Knights, choſen for that purpoſe, who being all ſworn faithfully to execute the King's Buſineſs, cauſed to come before them the Stewards of the Barons of that County, and the Lord or Bailiff of every Town, and the Reeve with four lawful Men of the ſame (whither Freemen or Ruſticks) and two of the moſt legal Knights of the Hundred, who did all ſwear faithfully to diſcover how many Plough Tilths, or Lands, there were in every Town, how many in Demeſne, how many in Villenage; how many the Religious held in Alms, and what ſervices they did for them; and upon every Plough-land they impoſed firſt two, and then three Shillings, and inrolled them all; whereof the Clerk had one Roll, the Knight another, the Sheriff a third, and the Baron's Steward a fourth; the Money was received by two Knights, and the Bayliff of every Hundred, and they anſwered it to the Sheriff, and he according to his Roll anſwered it at the Exchequer before the Biſhops, Abbots, and Barons aſſigned for that purpoſe. [3] Id. p. 442. b. 443. a. The K. takes an Aid of every Hyde in England. Who were appointed, and the manner how it was collected.

[4] The puniſhment appointed for ſuch as concealed any thing againſt their Oath, was, If he was a Ruſtick (that is, a Villain) he was to give his Lord the beſt Oxe in his Plough, and pay as much of his own to the King's uſe, as by his Perjury he had concealed: if a Freeman was convicted, he was in the King's Mercy, and to anſwer as much of his own to the King's Uſe as he had concealed. It was alſo ordained, that the Barons with the Sheriff ſhould diſtrein their Tenants, and if they did not, ſo much ſhould be taken upon their Demeſnes as the Tenants were in Arrear. All Free-Fees (that is, Mannors and Military Fees) belonging to Parochial Churches and Serjeanties, which were not ſettled upon Knight's Fees, were excepted out of this Aid; yet the names of the Serjeants and the value of their Lands were inrolled, and they were ſummoned to be at London fifteen days after Whitſunday, to hear and perform the King's Command; and thoſe who were choſen and appointed to do this buſineſs for the King, allow'd for the Carts and Ploughs (called here the Wainage) of each Plough-Land, one hundred Acres, according to the value or eſtimation of certain Legal Men. From whence we may obſerve, that in this Taxation, a hundred Acres of arable Land were reckoned a Plough-Land. [4] Id. ib. The Penalties inflicted upon Concealers againſt their Oath. What Fees excepted out of this Aid.

I have been the more particular in relating this Taxation, as alſo the manner how it was performed, that ſo the Reader may ſee that it was not only very great, but alſo impoſed without the conſent of the Great Council of the Kingdom; and tho it was very ſtrict and ſevere, yet it was equally laid upon all the Kingdom alike, and therefore the better born, being not as our Taxes are at this day. This was not only a great Tax, but impoſed without the conſent of the great Council.

Anno Dom. MCXCVIII.

[5] Sometime after this, the Monks of the Holy Trinity (or Chriſt-Church in Canterbury) being not at all pleaſed with ſome of Arch-Biſhop Hubert's Actions towards them, ſent ſome of their number to Rome, and complain'd to the new Pope Innocent (for Celeſtine was lately dead) that contrary to the Canons, he was chief Juſtitiary of the Kingdom, and a Judg in cauſes of Blood, and ſo involved in ſecular Buſineſs, that he could not but neglect the Affairs of the Church; and they likewiſe accuſed him in particular, that the Peace or Sanctuary of the Church of St. Mary del Arch, or Bow-Church in London, had been violated by his Precept, and that William with the Beard, was by force taken out from thence, with nine of his Companions, and adjudged to Death, and hanged accordingly.

[5] Id. ib. p. 443. a. A Complaint made by the Monks of Canterbury to the Pope againſt ABp Hubert.

Upon this the Pope ſent a Paternal Admonition to King Richard, that for the health of his own Soul he ſhould remove the Archbiſhop from all ſecular Affairs, and for the future neither to admit him, nor any other Biſhop or Prieſt to any ſecular Employment or Adminiſtration, and commanded all Prelates by virtue of their Obedience that they ſhould not dare to undertake them for the future.

The Pope ſends to the K. to remove him from Secular Buſineſs.

[1] Thus was the Archbiſhop laid aſide, tho much againſt his Will, being a ſtirring ambitious Prelate, who delighted more in Temporal than ſpiritual Functions; after whom Geoffrey Fitz-Peter ſucceeded in the Government of the Kingdom. But the main occaſion of this Quarrel, and which alſo the Monks then chiefly laid to his Charge, was, that in prejudice of the Mother-Church of Canterbury, he had finiſhed the Chappel at Lambeth, which had been begun by Archbiſhop Baldwin his Predeceſſor, and placed ſecular Chanons therein, endowing them with the Lands and Goods of the Monks, and contrary to the Cuſtom and Dignity of the Church of Canterbury, had conſecrated Biſhops therein; inſomuch that they were afraid, unleſs it were timely prevented, that the Dignity of the Mother-Church would be diminiſhed, and transfer'd to that * Apoſtate Chappel: their true meaning was, that they were apprehenſive that theſe might become ſome time or other the Archbiſhop's Chapter, and the power of electing the Archbiſhops would be transfer'd to them; whereupon Pope Innocent being much moved at this Information, wrote to the Archbiſhop, charging him to demoliſh the Chappel within thirty days after the receipt of his Letters, and aſſured him that if he did not do it, he was thereby ſuſpended from his Epiſcopal Dignity and Function, until he ſhould appear before him, and make ſatisfaction for the ſame. His Letters bare date the 8*th* of May at Rome, in the firſt Year of his Pontificate, for Celeſtine deceaſed in January before, and he was choſen the next day by the Cardinals, being then himſelf but a Deacon Cardinal, and not much above thirty years of Age.

Innocent made Pope about 30 years of Age.

[2] Yet notwithſtanding, the Archbiſhop thought himſelf ſo well guarded by the King's Power, who ſupported him in this Quarrel, that he was far from obeying the Pope's Command, and hoped he was able to overcome the obſtinacy of theſe Monks; and therefore to humble them, and bring them to his beck, he ſeized into the King's hands all the Revenues of that Monaſtery, with the Oblations made at Thomas of Becket's Tomb, and ſhut up the Monks in their Cloyſters. Yet for all that this ſtout Archbiſhop could do, he was forced at laſt, for fear of the Pope's Threats, to comply with the Monks, and demoliſh the above-aforementioned Chappel, as you will find in the next Year; and this being a piece of Ecclesiastical History, ought to have been set last; but that I was loth to break the connexion of the Story. Anno Dom. MCXCVIII.

[3] Sometime also this Year (for our Author has not given us the Month) Geoffrey Fitz-Peter, the new Justitiary, sent forth Itinerant Justices throughout England; and Hugh Bardolf, Mr. Roger Arundel, and Geoffrey Haget, had the Office committed to them, and went their Circuit through the Counties of Lincoln, Nottingham, Derby, York, Lancashire, Westmoreland, Cumberland, and Northumberland, and held both the new and old Pleas of the Crown in them all; the Articles of which being long, I have referred them to the Laws at the end of this King's Reign. [3] Id. p. 445. a. Itinerant Justices sent throughout England by the new Justitiary.

But before this Inquisition was fully ended, there began a new Oppression upon the Subjects, to the ruin of many Men, which was set on foot by Hugh de Neville, chief Justitiary of all the King's Forests in England, with Hugh Wac, and Ernis de Neville, his Associates; who going as Justices Itinerants of the King's Forests, they issued out their Precepts to this Effect, viz. "That in all the Counties thro which "they were to pass, the Archbishops, Bishops, Earls, and Barons, and "all Freeholders, and the chief Officer and Constable of every Town, "should come before them at the Pleas of the Forest, to hear the "King's Commands. Here also follows the King's Assize, or Laws concerning the Forests; and tho they are long, yet since they may be satisfactory to those who are curious to know what the Forest Laws were in this King's Reign, before the Charter of Forests was granted by King John, I have also added them immediately after the aforesaid Articles or Pleas of the Crown. A new Oppression upon the Subjects, begun by Hugh de Neville, chief Justitiary of all the K's Forests.

[4] About the same time the King commanded all Men, both Clerks and Laicks, that had any Charters or confirmations of Charters under his old Seal, to carry them to his new one, to have them renewed, or else they should be of no Force; and therefore Mr. Pryn informs us in his Chronological Vindication, &c. * that he found most of this King's Charters to Monasteries renew'd in the seventh and tenth Years of his Reign, which he had granted in his first, or any other following Year: from whence it appears, that there were two several Callings in and Renewals of all former Charters, against all Equity and Justice. [4] R. Id. p. 446. b. All Charters and Confirmations of them are order'd to pass the new Seals. * Tom. 1. p. 1133.

But to say something of Ecclesiastical Affairs; [5] this Year the Clergy * refused to give the King five Shillings upon each Plough-Land, as the Laiety had done before; wherefore the King in Revenge issued out an Edict or Proclamation, that whoever injured a Clergyman in any thing, should not be compelled to make him satisfaction; but if a Clergyman owed a Layman any thing, he was to be forced to make true payment. [5] R. H. ib. *In the printed Copies it is voluerunt dare, but noluerunt in all the Manuscripts that I have consulted of this Author.

Thus Kings sometimes were fain to stretch their Prerogative a little too far, to make these stubborn Clergymen comply with their reasonable desires. This I take notice of, because Dr. Brady in his History, p. 456. says, the Religious Orders now gave the King five Shillings out of each Plough-Land, as the Laiety had done before; but had he consider'd what follows, or consulted the Manuscripts above-mention'd in the Margin, I suppose he would have been of another mind. The Clergy refusing to give the King 5 s. out of each Plough-Land, are denied common Justice.

Anno Dom. MCXCVIII.

But before I pass to the Affairs of Normandy, it is fit I should give some Account of what was done in Wales this Summer; [1] where Prince Gwenwynwyn abovementioned designing to extend the Limits of Wales as far as ever they had been formerly, gathered a great Army, and laid Siege, first to the Castle of Payn in Elael, which was the Estate of William de Brause; making Proclamation, that so soon as he had gained the Castle, he would burn the whole Country as far as the Severn without any Mercy, in revenge of the Murder of Trahern Vachan his Cousin, who had been treacherously put to Death the Year before by this William de Brause; but because he wanted Engines and Miners to put his design in Execution, he lay three Weeks before that Castle, whilst William de Brause sent for Succours into England; whereupon Geoffrey Fitz-Peter, Lord Chief Justice of England, assembled a great Army, and joining with him all the Lords Marchers, came to raise the Siege; and because the Fortune of War is variable and uncertain, he sent first to Gwenwynwyn to have a Treaty of Peace with him; but he and those of his Party would hear of no Peace, for they made that Expedition partly to revenge their own Injuries; whereupon the English Lords thought it best to set Griffyth, Son to Rees Prince of South-Wales, free, whom they knew to be an old Enemy to Gwenwynwyn.

Geoffrey Fitz-Peter raises an Army, and marches against him.

Griffyth is set at liberty, and joins the English Lords against Gwenwynwyn.

Then Griffyth mustering up great Forces, joined with the English Lords, and marched towards the Castle; against whom Gwenwynwyn came out very stoutly, and there began a cruel Battel with much slaughter on both sides; but at last the English got the Victory, and Gwenwynwyn lost a great number of his Men, among whom were divers of the Blood-Royal, tho some of them were taken Prisoners. Matt. Paris makes this Battel to have been fought before Maud Castle, and that of the Welsh there were slain three thousand seven hundred.

Who is defeated, and a great number of his Men killed.

After this Victory Geoffrey Fitz-Peter, with the other English Lords, returned home with great Honour.

The Truce [2] between the two Kings was not yet expired, which our Author makes to have been only during the time of Harvest; yet it appears from William of Newburgh, that it was for a Year and four Months, which I take to be certain, since we find no acts of Hostility committed during one Year last past; but whatever occasion there was for breaking it before it was expired, I find not: yet now the two Kings (as if it were by mutual Consent) invaded each other's Territories, wasting them with Fire and Sword, and carrying away many Prisoners on both sides; but the King of France found a new way of exercising his Cruelty upon the King of England's Subjects, and that was by pulling out the Eyes of many whom he took Prisoners, which provoked him to do the like to those belonging to the King of France: so that all the rest of this Autumn was spent in mutual Slaughters, Cruelties, and Devastations.

The K. of France causes the Eyes of the English to be pulled out.

[3] Id. ib.

Then several Princes and great Men of France, who had taken part with [3] King Philip, seeing him resolved to ingage them in a perpetual War for his own Advantage, and finding also that they could not vanquish King Richard, whose Strength daily increased, left the former and adhered to the latter. These Princes were the Duke of Lovain, the Earls of Brene, Boloign, Perche and Blois, as also Ar-

But tho Roger Hoveden has alſo here added the Earls of Flanders and St. Giles, yet in this he forgot himſelf; for he tells us under the Year 1197, that the Earl of Flanders had already made Peace with King Richard; and under the Year before that, the Earl of St. Giles was then reconciled to him, by marrying his Siſter Joan, Queen Dowager of Sicilie; [4] But our Author is more certain in what follows, viz. that not long after the renewing of the War, the Earl of Flanders beſieged the Town of St. Omers, and took it by force at three Weeks end, the King of France not being able to relieve it; the like he did to Air, and ſeveral other Towns of ſmaller importance in Flanders.

[4] Id. ib.

[5] Not long after which, in September, the two Kings had a ſharp skirmiſh between the Caſtles of Vernon and Gamage in Vexsin, in which engagement the King of France was put to Flight, and loſt twenty Knights, ſixty Eſquires, and a great many Horſe and Foot, and was cloſe perſued until he got to his Caſtle of Vernon.

[5] Id. ib.

The K. of France put to Flight.

[1] About the middle of the ſame Month the King of France entered Normandy with a great Army, whilſt King Richard had not with him above ſixty Men, for he had diſperſed his Army into divers Gariſons; yet nevertheleſs getting together as many Souldiers as he could, upon the ſudden he followed them in the Rear, until ſuch time as two hundred Horſemen, and Marchade Captain of his Flemings could come up to him; then the French, after they had burnt about eighteen Villages, (altho they were much ſuperior in number to King Richard's Men, yet) ſeeing him at their Heels, retreated as faſt as they could, but the King perſued, and killed a great many of them, and took about thirty Priſoners; this happen'd near Vernon: and that which was a greater Diſgrace than all to the French was, that their King fled ſo faſt, that in the way he ran over an old Man, and carried nothing away with him out of Normandy but Shame and Diſhonour.

K. Philip's ſhameful Flight.

Then the King of England in revenge invaded France near the Ford of Dangu, and took the Caſtle of Curcelles by Aſſault, and alſo another leſſer place called Buric, with all that were in it, and returned that night with his Army to Dangu: the day after the King of France came from Maute with three hundred Knights and their Followers, to ſuccour the Caſtle of Curcelles, which he hoped and thought had not been taken; but when K. Richard knew of his coming, he went out to meet him, tho accompanied with no great Force, for he had placed the greateſt part of his Army upon the Bank of the River Ethe, becauſe he believed the French K. would have come upon them by Dangu, from the other ſide the River, whilſt indeed he with his Men came down toward Giſors; but King Richard meeting with them, there began a very ſharp Fight between Curcelles and that place, [2] in which he behaved himſelf ſo valiantly, that he diſmounted no leſs than three French Knights with one Lance, and took them Priſoners, whoſe names need not to be recited, only the chiefeſt of them was Matthew de Montmorancie, Anceſtor to the Dukes of that name; and beſides theſe there were above an hundred Knights more taken, whoſe names the Reader may find in R. Hoveden (but I think needleſs needless to repeat them here) besides ordinary Horsemen, Footmen, and Servants without number, as also a great many Horses covered with Iron. The issue of which Battel was, that the King of France's Army being wholly routed, he fled as fast as he could to the Castle of Gisors; but when he came upon the Bridg that leads to the Town, it broke under him, being over-charged with the weight of those that crouded after the King; so that he and most of those that were upon it fell into the River, from which if he had not been quickly pulled out, he had been certainly drown'd, as were many Persons of Quality that were with him; most of which particulars we learn not only from our Author's Relation, [3] but also from K. Richard's own Letter to Philip Bp of Durham, which gave him an account of this Victory; wherein after he had related some of his own Exploits, he concludes with great modesty, that he does not ascribe this to himself, but to God who had supported his Right; yet says in Railery, that he heard the King of France had fallen into the River, and drunk his Belly full before he could be got out. This Letter bears date from Dangu the thirtieth of September, being two days after the Battel.

He hardly escapes drowning.

The King of France to be revenged of this shameful Defeat, after a little breathing time, recruits his Army, and again invaded Normandy, and burnt and destroyed all the Country as far as Beaumont le Roger, and then return'd home; after which there were no great Mischiefs done on either part, only Earl John burnt the Town of Newburgh, and took some Prisoners; and Marchade with his Flanderkins fell upon a Fair which was near Abbeville, and spoiled the Merchants there, carrying away a great many Prisoners, with much rich Booty.

[5] Id. ib. b.

[5] Upon these mutable and various Successes, both Kings growing weary of the War, began again to think of Peace, and Hubert Archbishop of Canterbury was sent for out of England into Normandy, to treat on the behalf of King Richard; to whom the King of France offer'd for the procuring of Peace, to restore all the Territories and Castles which he had taken from him, except that of Gisors; and for this he was willing to refer it to six Barons of Normandy whom he himself should chuse, and to six Barons of France to be chosen by King Richard, to judg who had most Right to it: but tho these Conditions were advantageous enough for the King of England, yet would he not agree to them unless the Earl of Flanders, and all other Princes and Lords who had quitted the King of England and adhered to him, were likewise comprised in it; which I suppose was at last agreed to, for in the Month of November there was a Truce clapt up between the two Kings, till the Feast of St. Hilary next ensuing; and so ended this Year's Action.

The two K's weary of War, begin to think of Peace.

[1] Id. p. 447. a. b. Pope Innocent writes to the Bps and Clergy of England, for the Relief of the Holy-Land.

[1] As for Ecclesiastical matters there happen'd little, only we find Pope Innocent wrote a long Epistle to the Archbishops, Clergy, Nobility, and People of England, to contribute Men and Money for the Relief of the Holy Land, which was still in great Distress: but the Nation being much exhausted with the late heavy Taxes, I do not find any thing farther done in it. [2] The Pope also wrote a little before to King Richard, that he would be reconciled to his Brother the Archbishop of York, and restore him to his Archbishopwick, lest otherwise he should be forced to constrain him by Excommunication and Interdict upon his Kingdom; at which the King being much concern'd, he ſent to the Archbiſhop to let him know, that if he would confirm the Donations he had made in the Church of York, he would entirely reſtore him to the Archbiſhoprick: but he for ſome reaſons refuſed it, and went again to Rome to complain, and ſo continued in the ſame ſtate during the King's Life, but that was not long, for he happened to die the next Year. Anno Dom. MCXCVIII.

[3] As for foreign Affairs, the moſt memorable is, that Otto, Son to Henry Duke of Saxony, having by the mediation of his Uncle King Richard, with the Princes of the Empire, been elected Emperor, was firſt crown'd King of the Romans according to Cuſtom, at Aix la Chapelle; but he was not long after ſtiffly oppoſed by Philip Duke of Swevia, Son to Henry the late Emperor, who alſo claimed it by election of ſome other Princes of the Empire of the contrary Faction. [3] Id. p. 448. Otto, K. Richard's Nephew, crowned K. of the Romans.

Anno Dom. MCXCIX.

[4] This being the tenth and laſt Year of King Richard's Reign, he kept his Chriſtmaſs at Dampfront in Normandy, whilſt King Philip kept his at Vernon; and not long after that Feſtival King Philip finding himſelf like to be worſted in this long War, became more earneſt for Peace than ever, and made a freſh Propoſal to renew the Truce, which was now almoſt expired: For this end the two Kings agreed to meet at a place upon the River Seine, between Andeli and Vernon, where they both met accordingly upon St. Hilary's day as they had appointed; the King of England came up the River in a Boat, but not being willing to come on Shore, diſcourſed with the King of France on Horſeback, near the Bank of the River. [4] Id. p. 449. a. K. Philip makes freſh Propoſals of Peace. K. Richard treats with K. Philip on Horſeback.

But not coming to any concluſion then, they appointed another day of Treaty, and at laſt thro the mediation of Peter of Capua, Cardinal Deacon of St. Mary's, and the Pope's Legate, and by the Advice of all the great Men on each ſide, they agreed upon a Truce for five Years, beginning from the Feaſt laſt paſt, upon this only condition, that Things and Poſſeſſions ſhould remain as they then were on both ſides; and ſo they confirmed the Agreement with their Oaths. A Truce agreed on for five Years.

[5] Matthew Paris gives us a more particular Account of this laſt Treaty, and tells us, that after the Battel of Gureelles, (which happened towards the latter end of September, or beginning of October 1198, wherein the King of France's Forces were routed) he was at laſt glad to deſire Peace; and therefore now ſent to the Pope to requeſt his Mediation, that a Peace, or at leaſt a Truce for ſome time, ſhould be made between him and the King of England, that ſo ſuch as were willing to undertake the Cruſado, might have better leiſure to perform it; and that it might be accompliſhed with greater certainty, he deſired to have a Cardinal Legate ſent with ſo full a Commiſſion, that (if need were) he might force either of them, upon proving obſtinate, to Peace and Concord, by Excommunication. Whereupon Pope Innocent, who much affected the buſineſs of the Croſs, (tho induced thereto more by Money than Devotion) ſent Peter de Capua, a Cardinal, to negotiate the matter between them; who, when he came to the King of France, by his Advice, took ſome Biſhops of both Nations with him, and went to the King of England, and when he came, laid before him what Injuries, Damages and [5] In hoc Anno. *Matt. and Depredations had been, and might be done in both their Dominions, if a firm Peace was not ſpeedily eſtabliſhed.

[1] Id. ib. K. Richard refuſes to do any thing upon the Pope's Account.

[1] King Richard anſwered with Indignation, that he was not obliged to do any thing of that kind upon the Pope's Account, eſpecially ſeeing he had often requeſted him to compel the King of France by Eccleſiaſtical Cenſures to reſtore him his Dominions and Caſtles which he had ſo unjuſtly ſeized, in violation of the Oath he had made, not to give him any trouble whilſt he was in the Holy Land, endeavouring to reduce it to the Obedience of the Chriſtian Church. So that by reaſon of the Pope's remiſneſs, he was forced to ſpend a vaſt Sum of Money to regain his Inheritance; when as the King of France had not only been guilty of Perjury, but deſerved to have had the Sentence of Excommunication long ſince pronounced againſt him; neither did King Richard know whither he deſired a Truce, or not.

[2] Id. ib. The Cardinal's Advice to K. Richard.

[2] Then the Cardinal taking the King aſide, and injoining him Secreſy, acknowledged, that he was ſent from the Pope at the ſpecial inſtance of the King of France, to compound the Differences between them, and adviſed the King for that time to acquieſce in the Pope's deſires, and to be poſitively aſſured, that he would hear him as well concerning the King of France, as concerning all his other Affairs.

[3] Id. ib.

[3] King Richard was mightily pleaſed that his Nephew Otto had been Crowned King of the Romans, and did hope, by the favour of the Pope, to get him put into the poſſeſſion of the Empire; and therefore, being alſo preſſed by the importunity of many Religious Perſons, he at laſt yielded, and ſo far confirmed it by his Oath, That for five Years the Subjects and Traders of both his and King Philip's Dominions, ſhould have free intercourſe to paſs and repaſs peaceably to Fairs, and buy and ſell with one another.

[4] R. H. p. 449. a. The Truce like to be broke again.

But tho [4] this Truce was ſo far concluded, yet was it like to have been ſoon broke again on the King of France's part; for whilſt the Forces on both ſides were returning to their Quarters, and Marchade with his Flemings on their way home, four French Earls, whoſe Territories he was to paſs through, ſet upon him, and routing his Party, kill'd many of his Men; and farther, whilſt King Richard went into Poictou to reduce ſome Rebels to their Obedience, the King of France fortified a certain new Caſtle between Beauvais and Gaillé, and cut up the King of England's Foreſts about that place: wherefore upon his return into Normandy, he ſent Euſtace Biſhop of Ely, his Chancellor, to the King of France, to let him know that the Truce was broke, unleſs he would preſently demoliſh that Caſtle; which Meſſage, ſo ſoon as the Ambaſſador had delivered to the King of France, he promiſed him that rather than the Truce ſhould be broken, he would forthwith demoliſh it; but King Richard not being content with this, ſent him further word, that if there were not a full Agreement made between them, then there ſhould be no Peace at all: ſo that at laſt they agreed upon new Articles, whereby the King of France ſtood obliged to reſtore to the King of England all his Territories by which way ſoever obtain'd, excepting the Caſtle of Giſors, and in lieu thereof he granted to him the Donation of the Archbiſhoprick of Tours; and covenanted that Lewis the French King's Son should marry the Daughter of the King of Castile, King Richard's Niece: and King Philip swore on his part, that he would assist Otto King Richard's Nephew, to obtain the Roman Empire; for tho he had been Crowned King of the Romans, yet could he not enjoy the Empire, by reason of the Opposition of the Duke of Suevia, as has been said before. On the other side King Richard swore, that he would not only release the Castle of Gisors, but also bestow twenty thousand Mark's in Silver, as a Portion with his Niece.

Anno Dom. MCXCIX.

[5] Then the King of France, who was always a sower of Discord, gave King Richard to understand, that his Brother Earl John had come over to him, and pretended to shew him a Charter of his to that purpose; whereupon King Richard being highly incensed against his Brother, ordered him to be dissezed of all his Territories; which when the Earl understood, and the reason of it, he presently sent two Knights to the French Court, who undertook on the Earl's behalf, to prove him innocent of this Crime by any means the King of France's Court should adjudge: but when neither that King, nor any other would undertake the Proof thereof against Earl John, King Richard for the future put more confidence in his Brother, and gave his Credit to the King of France's Messages.

[5] Id. ib. b.

The K. of Fr. acquaints K. Richard that E. John was come over to him.

But the Earl undertakes to prove his Innocence.

[1] After this Truce King Richard going into Aquitain, to settle his Affairs there, Vidomar, the Viscount of Limosin, having found a great Treasure of Gold in his own Land, sent a good part of it to the King; but he not being content with that, demanded all of it by his Prerogative, as being, he said, Treasure trove: but when the Viscount would by no means yield to that, the King came into those parts with a great Army, and besieged his Castle of Chalus near Limoges, in which he supposed that Treasure was hid; but tho the Knights and others that were in the Castle went out to him, and offer'd to surrender it, provided they might have their Lives, Limbs, and Arms secured to them, yet the King would not accept of it, but swore he would take the Castle, and hang them all up; at which the Knights went back again much confounded, and resolved to defend themselves as well as they could.

[1] Id. ib.

[2] The same day whilst the King, being arm'd only with his Corselet, went after Dinner with Marchade (Captain of the Brabanters) about the Castle, to view what part lay most open for their Assault, a certain Cross-bow man shot at the King from the Wall, and gave him a desperate wound in his Shoulder, joining to the Neck; upon which presently mounting his Horse, he return'd to his Quarters, and then order'd Marchade, and all his Army, never to leave storming the Castle till they had took it; which being done, he commanded all within to be hanged, except that Man who had wounded him; and how he would have used him had he recovered, I will not determine.

But the King put himself into the hands of an unskilful Chirurgion of Marchade's, who as he strove to pull out the Arrow, left the head of it in his Flesh, and could not tell how to get it out without grievously mangling that part, which at last turn'd to a Gangreen; and thus lying eleven days in great Torment, and finding there was no longer hopes of Life, he made his last Will and Testament, and in it bequeathed the Kingdom of England, and all his other Dominions and

He also left him three parts of his Treasure, but the fourth part he ordered should be divided between his Servants and the Poor; he then devised his * Jewels to Otho King of the Romans; and lastly, having caused Bertram de Gurdun, the Person who had given him his death's Wound, to be brought before him, he said thus, What have I done to thee, that thou couldst kill me? to whom the young Fellow bluntly replied, Thou slewest my Father and my two Brothers with thine own Hand, and now thou couldst have slain me; take therefore what revenge thou shalt, nothing in earth can be Torture whatsoever thou canst inflict upon me, grieves me, but that I have not slain thee, who hast done so much mischief in the World. The King, notwithstanding this rough and desperate Answer, caused him to be let loose, and not only forgave him his Death, but commanded a hundred Shillings to be given him: but Marchade, after the King was dead, caused him to be flead alive, and hanged.

His Clemency to the Man that gave him his Death's wound.

But Marchade after his Death caused him to be flead and hanged.

The King deceasing on the sixth of April, his Body was Interr'd at Fontevrard, at the Feet of his Father, his Heart at Rouen, but his Bowels were buried at Charron in Poitou, according as he himself had appointed before he died; the reason of which some French Authors relate thus: That after he had order'd how his Body, Heart, and Bowels should be disposed of, as you have heard, he said farther to those that stood by his Bed-side, that he had so disposed of the first to testify his true Repentance, for offending his Father, being willing to make satisfaction even to his Ashes; that by the second he thanked the Esteem he retain'd for his Valiant and Faithful Normans; and by the third, the small value he had for the Poitovins, whom he had always found inconstant and disaffected to him.

How the K's Body, Heart, and Bowels were disposed of.

Thus fell this Valiant and Magnanimous Prince, in the forty second Year of his Age, and the tenth of his Reign, by the hand of a mean Fellow, having (according to Rad. de Coggeshal's Account) govern'd nine Years, seven Months, and twenty days, reckoning from the day of his Coronation.

And it is somewhat remarkable, that he [] who had revived the use of that fatal Engine the Cross-bow, and had himself dispatched so many with it, should himself meet with the same Instrument; and which was worse, that he should contribute to reach to his own Death; first by a too great desire of Money, and then by his own willfulness, in not accepting the Surrender of the Castle upon those reasonable terms proposed by the Besieged, unless he might put them all to Death; and lastly, by his too great carelessness of his own Person, not considering, That he who fears not to expose his own Life, may at any time be master of another Man's.

But before I dismiss this Subject, I cannot but take notice of the various Accounts Historians give us of the Place and other Circumstances of this King's Death; for the Radulphus de Diceto was alive at that very time, and wrote his Chronicle, (which he called the Images of History) not long after, and agrees with R. Hoveden as to the Place, yet he differs from him in the Person that gave him the Death's Wound, for he calls him Pierr Basile; but Gervase of Canterbury (who lived likewise at, and wrote about the same time) tells us, that that the King received this Wound at a Caſtle of the Earl of Angoleſme's, called Nantrum, and that the name of the Perſon who ſhot him was John Sabraz; but Walter of Hemingsford (otherwiſe called Walter of Gisborne, from the place in which he was a Chanon) in * his Chronicle (lately publiſhed by the Learned and Reverend Dr. Gale, now Dean of York) makes it to have been at the Caſtle of Galliard, which King Richard had lately built in the Iſle of Andeli; and that the French coming ſuddenly upon it, ſurprized and took it; and the King going to beſiege and retake it, there received his death's Wound in the manner as has been already related, but without naming the Perſon that gave it him: and beſides, he makes him not ſo much to die of the Wound, as by lying with his Wife, which was forbid him by his Chirurgeons. Anno Dom. MCXCIX.

* Inter Script. tor. Ang. Edit. Oxon. Vol. 2.

He gives us alſo a Relation of the Diſcourſe between the King and the Archbiſhop of Roüen, when he acquainted him that he could not live; as that he deſired of the King to beſtow his three Daughters before he died, which were Pride, Covetouſneſs, and Luxury; and that the King replied to him, "Yes, I will; for my eldeſt Daughter Pride, "I beſtow to the Knights-Templars; my Daughter Covetouſneſs to "the Ciſtertian Monks; and my Daughter Luxury to the Benedictines. This, tho it be a ſevere Satire upon the chief Religious Orders of thoſe times, yet it is not at all likely that the Archbiſhop would preſume to talk ſo lightly and ſaucily to the King when he lay a dying, or that he ſhould be in the humour to make ſo Sarcaſtical an Anſwer to him: but R. Hoveden ſuppoſes the King to have ſaid this to one Fulke, a French Prieſt, who taxed him long before of his having thoſe three Daughters abovementioned; only he ſo far differs from the Author laſt quoted, that he makes the King beſtow his daughter Luxury upon the Prelates; which is indeed the more probable Relation, if the King ever ſaid it at all.

An Account of the Diſcourſe between the ABp of Roüen and the K. before his Death.

His Legacy to his 3 Daughters, Pride, Covetouſneſs, and Luxury.

I have given the Reader theſe different Readings, that he may ſee how variouſly the Place and Circumſtances of this King's Death were related, even by them that lived ſo near that time; not but that I give moſt credit to R. Hoveden and Radulphus de Diceto, who both agree in the Relation of his receiving his Death's Wound at the Caſtle of Chaluz, tho they differ in the Man's name that did it.

I ſhall conclude this King's Reign with a Deſcription of his Perſon and Character; as for the former, [4] Geoffrey Vinſauff, in his Relation of this King's Voyage to Jeruſalem, deſcribes him to have been very Tall, of a fair and comely Viſage, his Eyes blew and ſparkling, his Hair between Red and Yellow; his Limbs ſtreight, of a noble and majeſtick Mein, that ſeemed worthy of Empire.

As for his Valour and Magnanimity, he equals him with all the Heroes of the Antients; and for Eloquence and Prudence, compares him to Neſtor and Ulyſſes: which, tho a great Hyperbole, yet that he might have had both thoſe Qualities in ſome degree I will not diſpute, tho his Voyage to the Holy-Land, and his paſſing through an Enemy's Countrey in his return from thence, do not much confirm that Character. But as for his undaunted Courage, it is not to be denied, for it gave him the Sirname of Coeur de Lyon; nor is his Wit to be diſputed, ſince that ſufficiently appears by his ſharp and witty Replies upon all occaſions; and I wiſh we had that Song or Ballad, which this Author relates he made upon the French, who had began with him in the ſame manner, for then we might have the better judged of his Genius in writing, as well as in his Diſcourſe. He was alſo Magnificent and Liberal to exceſs, and that made him likewiſe as Covetous at other times when he wanted Money, which he ſtuck not to get by all the means he could, how hard and unjuſt ſoever, as you may obſerve through the whole courſe of his Reign; eſpecially after his return from his Impriſonment, when (as Rad. de Coggeſhal relates) he was ſo greedy of Money, that ſcarce any Man of an Eſtate could quietly enjoy his own Inheritance, unleſs he would pay for it almoſt as much as it was worth; and he then ſo much oppreſſed his People, that he ſpared no Orders nor Degrees of Men, altho Archbiſhop Hubert, whilſt he was his Juſtitiary, having ſome mercy on the afflicted People, did as much as he could to alleviate and mollify the King's ſevere Edicts; yet he adds this in his commendation, that he did not reap any Advantage to himſelf, by keeping Biſhopricks and Abbeys vacant in his hands, as his Predeceſſors had done.

His Covetouſneſs.

In his Youth he was noted for too great Cruelty, which in his riper Years turn'd to a due ſeverity towards Malefactors; yet the ſame Author repreſents him as very harſh and moroſe towards thoſe that had any Buſineſs with him, unleſs they would mitigate his Paſſion, either by ready Money, or large Promiſes: nevertheleſs, when he was in private among his Confidents, he was affable and good humour'd, unbending his Mind with Raillery, Jeſts, and pleaſant Converſation; yet he was alſo very Cholerick, and Paſſionate, and ſooner provoked by little ſudden Accidents than greater Injuries, as you may ſee by the ſtory of his Rencounter with Des Barres. He was very ſevere to thoſe againſt whom he had a Prejudice, and that even to cruelty; yet he had likewiſe a great ſtock of Generoſity, Clemency, and (what might be then called) good nature, even to ſeveral that had moſt highly offended him, as appears by his dealing with the Greek Emperor of Cyprus, as alſo with his Brother Earl John, after his Rebellion againſt him; and this is moſt conſpicuous in the laſt Act of his Life, when he not only pardoned, but rewarded the man that had been the cauſe of his Death.

Affable in his private Converſation.

But ſubject to Paſſion.

His Generoſity and good Nature.

He was alſo obſerved to be juſt and conſtant to his Word, and firm in his Reſolutions, which are indeed the two Qualities that beſt become a Prince. He is likewiſe taken notice of for having been much given to Women, if not to other more unlawful Luſts; which is no great wonder for a Prince of his warm and vigorous Conſtitution: yet Brompton's Chronicle tells us, that not long before his Mariage, in his Voyage to Paleſtine, he made a ſolemn Confeſſion to the Biſhops then with him, of his failings in that kind, and received Penance for it at their hands; tho we read in R. Hoveden, that ſome Years after leaving his Wife, he returned to the ſame Vices as formerly; of which being admoniſhed by a Hermit, and alſo by a ſevere fit of Sickneſs, he was again reclaimed to his Queen's Bed, and ever after continued conſtant to her.

To conclude, tho England ſuffer'd ſeverely under his Government, through the conſtant occaſions he had for Money, and the great Rapacity of his Juſtitiaries, during his almoſt as conſtant abſence out of England, where he never ſpent above eight Months of his whole Reign; yet this Nation, as well as his other Dominions, ſoon found the miſs of him under his Brother John, who had all his Vices, but few or none of his Vertues. In ſhort, we may ſay of him, what a Roman Author does of one of their Emperors, that it had been better he had never Reigned, or had Reigned longer; ſince his Subjects felt all the inconveniencies of his Courage, without being much the better either for that, or his other good Qualities in time of Peace; which he never enjoyed, except it were a very little while, at the beginning of his Reign. I have dwelt the longer on this Character, becauſe he was not only one of the greateſt and moſt generous Princes that this Nation ever bred, but perhaps any other whatſoever.

The Nation quickly felt a loſs by his Death.

His Wives.

As for his Wives, we have already ſhewn you, that in his Infancy he was Contracted to a Daughter of Raymond Earl of Barcelona, and after that he was affianced to Adela, or Alice, the Daughter of Lewis King of France, yet was never married to either of them; but to Berengera, the Daughter of Garſias King of Navarre, whom his Mother Queen Eleanor, brought to him into Sicily. She went alſo with him to the Holy-Land, and returned before him into France (as you have already heard) after which we hear little of her; whither he was not very fond of her, or elſe ſo taken up with Martial Affairs, as that he could not conſider her, I know not: only we find that in the third Year of King John, ſhe compounded with him for her Dower.

His Iſſue.

Nor do we read that King Richard had any Children by her, nor any natural Iſſue by other Women, except one Philip, whoſe Mother is not mentioned any more than the place of his Birth. But yet he beſtowed on him the Caſtle and Honour of Cuinac in Aquitain; nor do we find any more of him; which ſhews that he was not indued with many of his Father's noble Qualities, or elſe ſure he would have made himſelf more remarkable.

WE have but a dry Account of the Affairs of Ireland for nine Years and odd Months, that King Richard reigned; for tho it muſt be acknowledged from the Teſtimony of [5] William of Newburgh, that Earl John was left by King Henry his Father Lord of all his Iriſh Acquiſitions, which is alſo confirmed by [1] Radulphus de Diceto, under the Year 1190. when he relates, that the Pope then ſent his Brief to William Biſhop of Ely, appointing him his Legate over all England and Wales, as likewiſe over that part of Ireland which was under the Dominion of Earl John: yet notwithſtanding his great Intereſt and Power in that Kingdom, I do not find he ever went over thither in his Brother's Reign, being (I ſuppoſe) taken up during his Abſence in the Holy Land, either by Domeſtick Intrigues againſt the Biſhop of Ely, or elſe in open Rebellion; or after this King's Return home and Reconciliation to him, he was otherwiſe wiſe ſo imploy'd in the War againſt France (which took up all the reſt of this Reign) that he had no leiſure to go over to ſettle the Affairs of Ireland, which by reaſon of his Abſence and want of a good Government there, were in great Confuſion; ſince through the negligence or deficiency of Power in his Juſtitiary, or Lieutenant, the Engliſh Nobility did not only deſtroy each other by their Civil Wars, but the Iriſh Princes thereby took Courage to rebel and caſt off the Engliſh Yoke; ſo that I do not find Ireland more than twice mention'd by Hoveden in all this Reign.

But that Earl John had ever any abſolute independent Power in that Kingdom, without any relation to England, I cannot believe, notwithſtanding what a late [2] ingenious Gentleman has wrote to the contrary; for firſt, it is certain, that tho he was by his Father King Henry made King of Ireland, in a Parliament at Oxon, (as you have already heard) yet that he was no more than his Vice-Roy, or Lieutenant, appears by the [3] Oath of Fealty which was at that time taken by all thoſe great Men, upon whom that King beſtow'd Eſtates in Ireland; the Oath being in theſe words, That they ſhould be true and faithful to King Henry, and to the Lord John his Son: upon whoſe return out of that Kingdom with ill Succeſs, it ſeems his Father revoked his Power. For the [4] ſame Author preſently after tells us, that King Henry obtain'd from Pope Urban, that which he could not get from Lucius his Predeceſſor, to wit, that he might make which of his Sons he pleaſed King of Ireland, and in token thereof the Pope then ſent him a Crown of Peacock's Feathers interwoven with Gold, which had been needleſs, if Earl John had been already abſolute King or Lord of Ireland, as the Author abovemention'd will needs have him. But indeed, tho it ſeems to have been once King Henry's Deſign to have had his Son John crown'd King of Ireland, and that this Pope's Legate came over to do it, as you will find in [5] R. Hoveden; yet it is alſo as certain, that when it was juſt going to be executed, the King himſelf put it off, and carried the Legate over with him into Normandy; ſo that Earl John never being crown'd, only contented himſelf with the Title of Lord of Ireland ever after.

And tho this Dominion was thus left him by his Father King Henry, yet that it was never independent from the Crown of England, further alſo appears from another Paſſage in the [1] ſame Author, where he relates, that John Archbiſhop of Dublin, having received divers great Injuries from Hamo de Valoins, and other of Earl John's Officers or Miniſters in Ireland, the Archbiſhop thereupon went over into Normandy, to complain againſt them to King Richard and Earl John; and tho he could obtain no Relief from them, yet however his very complaining to the King ſhews, that his Brother had not then a ſole and independent Authority in that Kingdom.

But as for this Prince's Charters, which are alſo urged as Teſtimonies to prove his being Lord of Ireland, I cannot but obſerve, that I never ſaw any of them before he was King, wherein he ſtiles himſelf Lord of Ireland; and as for their Seals, tho the words Domini Hiberniæ are plain enough to be read, yet it is very doubtful to whom thoſe words refer; for in two of his Charters now kept in the Office of the Dutchy of Lancaſter, the Inſcriptions run thus, * Sigillum Johannis Filii Regis Angliæ, Domini Hiberniæ; and in another preſerved in the Taxes and Money raised in this King's Reign.

I shall now give you an Account of the Taxes and Monies that were raised in this King's Reign, and shall then conclude with the Laws and Judicial Proceedings that were ordained by him.

His Taxes were as follow.

1. A Scutage for Wales of ten Shillings of every Knight's Fee in the first Year of his Reign, which probably happen'd upon this Account: Richard was Crowned September the third; in October, Rees Fitz-Gerald, King of South Wales, came into England as far as Oxford, conducted by Earl John of Mortaigne; and because King Richard would not meet him as his Father had done, he fell into a Passion, and returned into his own Country, and would not speak with the King; so that this might be taken for a good occasion to raise some Forces to reduce Rees into a better temper.

A Scutage of 10 s. for every Knight's Fee.

2. Next Year toward his Expedition to the Holy Land, two Saddle-Horses and two Sumpter Horses were taken for an Aid of every Fee; also of every Abbey one Saddle Horse, and one Sumpter; and of each of the King's Manors, as of the Abbeys, for an Aid.

An Aid granted for the Expedition into the Holy Land.

3. For his Ransom, when Prisoner to the Emperor, of every Knights Fee twenty Shillings, the fourth part of the Rents of all Laici (that is, of the Husbandmen or Tenents) also a fourth part of the Rents of some Clerks, and a tenth of others; all the Gold and Silver the Churches had, and all the Wool of that Year of the Cistertian Monks, and the Order of Semplingham.

A Tax for the K's Ransom.

4. A Carucage of every Plough-land, two Shillings; also of the Husbandmen or Occupiers of every Knight's Fee a third part of the service for his Expedition into Normandy. After his return the King demanded all the Wool of the Cistertians this Year also, for which they made a Fine or Composition in Money.

An Aid for his Expedition into Normandy.

5. For liberty of Tornaments or Tilting, every Earl was to give twenty Marks; every Baron ten Marks; every Landed Knight four Marks; every Knight of Fortune, or without Land, two Marks. So that eleven hundred thousand Marks were raised in two Years, (viz. in Anno Dom. 1195, and 1196, but not said how) by Hubert Archbishop of Canterbury, the King's Justiciary for his Master's Use.

For liberty of Tornaments.

1100000 Marks raised by Hubert the K's Justiciary.

6. Anno Dom. 1198. He had also an Aid of five Shillings of every Carucate, or Plough-land.

The Religious Orders this Year gave the King the same upon each Plough Land, as the Laiety of the Kingdom had done before.

The

The occasion of these Taxes.

The Cause of this great Tax (besides the King's Exigencies abroad) might be two Expeditions into Wales this Year, one by Hubert Archbishop of Canterbury, when he was Justitiary, about Christmas, when he turned out the Constables of the Castles of Hereford, Brecknock, and Ludlow, and put in others to keep them for the King's Use; the other by Geoffrey Fitz-Peter, for the Assistance of William de Braose an English Baron, whom Gwenwynwyn, Son of Cadwallan, had besieged in Maud-Castle, where above three thousand Welsh were slain and put to flight.

Much Money was also raised by Seizures, Fines and Compositions, and the Sale of his Demesnes. Radulphus de Coggeshal, in his History of this King's Reign observes, that none of his Predecessors rais'd so much Money upon the People as he did in five Years after his Return, tho the same Author does in great part excuse him, in regard of his great Occasions for Money to maintain his Wars against the King of France, and to bring over the great Men of that Kingdom to his Interest, as also to promote his Nephew Otto to the German Empire.

Laws (properly so called) we find none made in this King's time, only some Edicts or Temporary Constitutions; and they were such as these that follow.

[2] R. H. Itinerant or Errant Justices sent thro England.

[2] In the Month of September, An. Dom. 1194. the King sent Itinerant Justices throughout all the Counties of England, who were to proceed in doing Justice, according to the underwritten Heads or Articles.

The Form of proceeding in Pleas of the Crown.

First, four Knights were to be chosen out of the whole County, who upon their Oath should choose two Legal Knights of every Hundred or Wapentach, and those two should choose upon their Oaths ten Knights in every Hundred or Wapentach; and if there were not Knights enough, then Free and Legal Men, so as those twelve together might answer to all the Articles, which concerned that Hundred or Wapentach.

Articles of the Pleas of the Crown.

[3] Id. ib.

[3] The Justices should enquire of, and determine new and old Pleas of the Crown, and all such as were not determined before the King's Justices; also all Pleas of Novel Disseisins, and all Pleas which were summoned and brought before the Justices by the Writ of the King, or Chief Justice, or sent to them from the King's * Capital Court. Also concerning Escheats, what they were, and had been since the King's Expedition to Jerusalem; and what were then in the King's hands, and whither they were now in the King's hands, or not: and if they were taken out of his hands, how, and by whom, and into whose hands they came, and in what manner, and who received the Issues and Profits of them, and what the Profits were, and what was, and now is their true Value; and if there be any Escheats which belong to the King, and were not in his possession; also of Churches which were in the King's Gift, as likewise of the Wardships of Boys (or Youths) that belong to the King; also of the Mariages of Maidens and Alſo Enquiry was to be made of all Aids given for the redemption of the King; who, and how much every one promiſed, how much is paid, and how much was in Arrear: Alſo of the Favourers and Abettors of Earl John, who have made Compoſition with the King, and who not: Alſo of the Goods and Chattels of Earl John and his Abettors, which were not yet converted to the King's Uſe; how much the Sheriffs and Bayliffs had received, and whither any one had bribed them contrary to the antient Cuſtoms of the Kingdom: Alſo of all the Lands of Earl John, ſuch as he had in his own hands, his Wardſhips and Eſcheats; of ſuch as had been given him, and for what Cauſe they had been given him; all theſe to be taken into the King's hands, unleſs ſuch as the King confirmed to him: Alſo of the Debts and Fines due to Earl John, and for what cauſe due, and they were all to be required for the King's Uſe. Alſo of Uſurers that were dead, and of their Goods. Alſo of Wines ſold contrary to the Aſſize, and of the falſe Meaſures of Wines, and other things: Alſo of ſuch as undertook the Cruſado, and died before they ſet forward toward Jeruſalem; who had their Chattels, what, and how much. Alſo of great * Aſſizes, which were of Land worth an hundred Shillings a Year, and under. Alſo of Defaults (that is, Non-appearance in Court, at the day aſſigned). Furthermore, they were to chooſe, or ſee there ſhould be choſen, three Knights, and one Clerk in every County, who were to be Keepers of the Pleas of the Crown; and no Sheriff was to be a Juſtitiary in his own County, nor in any County which he held, ſince the firſt Coronation of the King. Furthermore, all Cities, Burghs, and the King's Demeſnes, ſhould be taxed. But the † Juſtices named, together with the Bayliffs of ‖ William of St. Mary's Church, Geoffrey Fitz-Peter, William de Chimelli, William Briwer, and Hugh Bardolf, with the Sheriffs of the Places, ſhould cauſe the Knights in the Counties named in a Roll, to be ſummoned, that they come at the day, and to the Place they ſhould have notice of, to ſwear before them, that they would uſe their utmoſt lawful endeavours to * ſtock the King's Ward Lands, and Eſcheats, and appriſe them for his Advantage, and not omit it for the Hatred, Fear, or Favour of any Man: and the Knights named in the Roll were to chooſe, upon their Oaths, twelve Lawful Knights, or elſe Legal Freemen, if Knights were not to be found, in ſeveral parts of each County in the Iter (or Circuit) of the aforeſaid Juſtices, as they ſhould think fit; and theſe in like manner were to ſwear, that they would apply their utmoſt lawful Endeavours, Counſel and Help, to improve and appriſe the King's Ward-Lands and Eſcheats in thoſe parts, to the profit of the King, as aforeſaid;

The Farmer, when he left his Farm, ſhould take off all his own Stock he ſet upon it, (except the King's Stock) freely, and without diminution: and the Farmers ſhould have the Letters Patents of the Archbiſhop (i. e. as Chief Juſtice) containing the tenour of the King's Charter made concerning this matter. They were alſo to enquire what was the Rent of Aſſize (or conſtant Rent) in every Mannor of the King's Demeſnes, and the value of all things upon thoſe Mannors, and how many Carucates or * Plough-Lands they contained: and what their value, not eſtimating them only at † twenty Shillings the Plough-Land, but more or leſs, according as the Land was better or worſe; and thoſe that took the Farms might ſtock them out of the Profits of the Lands, as aforeſaid. They were alſo to enquire how many Oxen and Horſes ought to be kept for the Tilling of every Plough-Land, and what Stock every Mannor would maintain, and clearly and diſtinctly to put them in Writing: a Plough-Oxe was to be valued at four Shillings, a Cow and ‖ Plough-Horſe at the ſame rate; a Sheep with fine Wool at ten-pence, and with coarſe Wool ſix-pence; a Sow at Twelve-pence; and a Boar at Twelve-pence: and when the Farmers left their Farms, they were to pay ſo much Money, or leave ſo many ſaleable Beaſts upon them, at their choice; and when all the Ward-lands and Eſcheats were thus ſtocked, improved and valued, they then were to be inventoried clearly and diſtinctly, and the Inventory carried into the Exchequer: but Biſhopricks, Abbacies, and the Lands of Barons near of Age, were excepted out of this Conſtitution. They were alſo to enquire by the Oaths of the Perſons aforeſaid, of all Wards and Eſcheats, that were not already in the King's hands, that ſo they might be taken into his poſſeſſion, and ordered as the others.

and all their Poſſeſſions and Goods: nor ſhould it be lawful for any Jew to recover the Concealment (i.e. have it reſtored.) That ſix or ſeven Places ſhould be allowed where the Jews ſhould lend their Money, and take Pawns; and there ſhould be two legal Chriſtians, two legal Jews, and two legal Scribes appointed, before whom and the Clerks of William of St. Mary's Church, and William de Chimelli, the Money (ſo lent upon the Pawns, and the Pawns taken) ſhould be regiſtred; and that the Charts of the Money lent, and Pawns taken, ſhould be in form of a Chirograph; and one part to remain with the Jew, ſealed with his Seal that borrowed the Money, and the other part to remain in a common Cheſt, to which there were to be three Locks, of which the two Chriſtians were to have one Key, and the two Jews another, and the Clerks of William of St. Mary's Church, and William de Chimelli, the third; and beſides thoſe Locks, three Seals were to be affixed by thoſe that kept the Keys: and that the Clerks of the two Williams ſhould have a Tranſcript; and as the Charts were changed, the Roll was to be changed likewiſe: for every Charter three pence was to be paid, half from the Jew, and half from him that borrowed the Money, of which the Scribes were to have two pence, and the keeper of the Roll one penny; and for the future, no Security ſhould be given, nor Pawns taken, nor any Payments to be made to the Jews, nor any changing of Charts, but before the aforeſaid Perſons, or the major part of them, if all could not be preſent: and that the two Chriſtians ſhould have one Roll of the payments of the Jews delivered to them for the future, and that the two Jews ſhould likewiſe have one, and the keeper of the Rolls another; alſo that every Jew was to ſwear upon his * Rolle (if he did not believe the Goſpel) that he would cauſe all his Debts, Pawns and Rents, and all his Things and Poſſeſſions to be inventoried, and that he would conceal nothing; and if he knew any thing another Jew concealed, he would reveal it to the Juſtices ſent about that Affair; and that he would diſcover all Falſifiers or Forgers of Charts, and Clippers of Money wherever he knew them.

* i.e. the Law of Moſes, then (as now) written in a Roll.

Furthermore, Inquiſition was to be made what the King's Officers had taken, or exacted, as well his Juſtices, Sheriffs, Conſtables, and Foreſters, as their Servants, after the firſt Coronation of the King; and why thoſe prizes were taken, and by whom.

Here alſo follows another Article concerning the Chattels, Gifts, and Lands of Earl John, which having been already ſet down in the former Articles, need not be again repeated.

One Aſſize of Meaſures and Weights appointed over England.

In the year 1197. King Richard made an Aſſize of Meaſures, by which he appointed one Meaſure throughout England, for all ſorts of Grain, as well within Cities, and Boroughs, as without; alſo that the Meaſures of Wine and Ale, and other Liquors ſhould be the ſame over all the Kingdom, according to the diverſity of Liquors; and the Weights to be the ſame, according to the diverſity of things weighed; and all the Meaſures were to be ſo ſecured, as that they could not be falſified. He likewiſe ordered, that all woollen Clothes, wherever made, ſhould be of the ſame breadth; that is, two Ells within the Liſts, Id. ib.

Keepers of the Aſſize in Cities and Boroughs.

and that the Ells ſhould be made of Iron. He alſo ordered there ſhould be four or ſix Perſons, according to the largeneſs of the City or Borough, aſſigned in every City, or Borough, who ſhould ſee and ſearch that all things were ſold according to theſe appointed Meaſures and Weights: and if they found any one that confeſſed, or was convicted of ſelling by other Weights and Meaſures, than by thoſe appointed, he was to be impriſoned, and all his Goods ſeized into the King's hands. If the Keepers of the Aſſize were negligent, and convicted before the King's Juſtices, they were to be in the King's Mercy concerning their Goods. And he commanded that no Man in any Court, after the Feaſt of Purification, ſhould ſell any thing but by the Meaſure preſcribed, nor that any Man after the Fair at Stanford in Mid-Lent, ſhould ſell any Cloth that was not two Yards within the Liſts.

After the making of this Law or Aſſize concerning Meaſures, in the Year following the King's Juſtitiary ſent forth new Juſtices Itinerant, who were to enquire concerning

Other Articles of Pleas of the Crown in this Form.

The Judges Itinerant were to hear and determine all Pleas of the Crown, new and old, which were not determined before the Juſtices, and all Aſſizes of the death of Anceſtors, Novel-Diſſeiſins, and of Great Aſſizes, ſo far as ten Pounds by the Year of Land and downwards, and of Advouſons of Churches: the Actions of the great Aſſize (or a Writ of Right by which the Property was tryed) were brought by the King's Writ, or that of his Capital Juſtice. Alſo they were to enquire of vacant and full Churches which were in the King's Gift, who gave them, and who enjoy'd them, and what was their Value; alſo of the King's Eſcheats, their Value, who had them, and by whom. Of young Gentlemen and Gentlewomen, who were, or ought to be in the King's Wardſhip (that is, as to Marriage) what the value of their Lands, and whither they were married, and to whom, and how long. They were alſo to enquire what Widows had not fined or compounded for Licence to marry, and the Fine to be taken to the King's Uſe. Of the King's Serjeanties, who had them, and from whom, and their Value, and which of them had contributed towards an Aid to the King, and which not; the Fine or Compoſition for the Aid to be taken to the King's Uſe: Of the Uſury of Chriſtians, and of their Goods, and what Uſurers were dead. Of thoſe that were in the King's Mercy, and were not amerced or fined. Of Purpreſtures, or of the King's ways ſtreightned: Of Treaſure-Trove: Of Malefactors and their Receivers: Of Fugitives, who had been accuſed and were returned, ſince the laſt Aſſize: Of all Weights and Meaſures and Ells renewed; and vvhither four Men that vvere appointed to look after them in every Town, (that is, City, Burgh or Mercate Town) had done as the Statute required, and had attached or proſecuted the Tranſgreſſors or not; if not, they vvere to be puniſhed as the Tranſgreſſors themſelves. All Wine ſold contrary to the Aſſize or Statute, vvas to be ſeized to the King's Uſe, and the Owners and Sellers of the Wine vvere to be in the King's Mercy (that is, to be fined by him): They vvere alſo to enquire hovv many Hydes or Plough-Lands there vvere in every County, and vvhither the Officers appointed appointed to aſſeſs and collect the five Shillings upon every Plough-Land, had done their Duty, and had received it of all, or concealed any part of it. Of the Officers of Sea-Ports, if they had received any thing they had not given an Account of, or taken any thing for concealing the King's Right; or if any one had received any thing, who was not appointed a Receiver. Laſtly, they were to enquire if all appear'd as they ought, that were ſummoned by the King's Juſtices, and who they were that came not, and what their Names.

Before this Iter, or theſe Circuits of the Juſtices were over, the Iter or Circuit of the Foreſts began; and the King commanded Hugh Neville, chief Juſtice of all the Foreſts in England, Hugh Wac, and Ernis Nevill, that, in every County through which they went, they ſhould ſummon to appear before them at the Pleas of the Foreſt, the Archbiſhops, Biſhops, Earls, Barons, and all free Tenants, and the Reeve, and four Men of every Town, to hear the King's Commands. Id. ib.

Then follows the Aſſize it ſelf.

This is the Aſſize of our Lord the King, and theſe are his Precepts concerning his Foreſts in England, made by the Aſſent and Advice of the Archbiſhops, Biſhops, Earls, Barons, and Knights of the whole Kingdom.

The King declares, that if any one forfeits in any thing concerning his Veniſon, or his Foreſts, he is not to expect that he ſhall only be puniſhed in his Goods, as hitherto; for if after that time any one ſhould forfeit, and be convicted, he ſhould have full Juſtice done upon him, as it was in King Henry his Grandfather's time; that is, he ſhould loſe his Eyes and Teſticles: alſo the King forbids, that any one have Bows and Arrows, or Hounds, or Grey-hounds within his Foreſts, unleſs he had the King's Warrant, or the Warrant of any other that was of Right able to protect him: alſo the King forbids, that no Man give or ſell any thing to the deſtruction of his Wood, nor do waſte in his Foreſts; but he grants that any Man may take of his own Wood, as much as he ſhall have need of, without waſte; and this by the overſight of his Foreſter and Verderers. Likewiſe the King commands, that they who have Woods within the bounds of the Foreſt, do ſet good Woodmen to look after them, and ſuch as they will be anſwerable for; or ſuch as can give Security to make ſatisfaction, if they offend in any thing that concerns the King. Alſo the King commands, that his Foreſters ſhall ſwear, that according to their whole Power, they ſhall keep this his Aſſize, or Law, which he hath made concerning his Foreſts, and that they ſhall not vex or trouble the Knights, or worthy Men, about what he granted them concerning their Woods. Alſo he commands, that in every County wherein he hath Veniſon, there ſhall be twelve Men appointed to preſerve his Veniſon, and Green-Hue in his Foreſts; and that there ſhall be four Knights appointed to agiſt his Woods, (that is, take in a certain number of Cattle to feed there a certain time, or to aſſign the number of Cattle to ſuch as had Right to feed in the Foreſt) and to receive his Paſnage or Pannage, (that is, the Money due for ſuch Feeding) and to preſerve it, that it ſhould not be diminiſhed. Alſo he commanded, that no Man might agiſt his Woods (that is, put their Cattle into them) within the bounds of his Foreſt, Id. ib.

Foreſt, before their own Woods were agiſted. And it is to be noted, that the King's Agiſtment (or Right of feeding Cattle in the Woods and Foreſts) begins fifteen days before Michaelmaſs, and continues fifteen days after: alſo the King commands, that if his Woods, that were in his own hands, or his Demeſnes were deſtroyed, and his Foreſter could not tell by whom, his Body ſhould be impriſoned. Alſo he commanded, that no Clerk ſhould offend concerning his Veniſon or Foreſts, and that if his Foreſters found them offending, they ſhould take them, and he would warrant their ſo doing. Alſo the King commanded, that all Eſſarts, as well old as new (i. e. places where Underwood and Buſhes had been ſtubbed up, and the Land ploughed and ſown) which were within the Regard or View of the Foreſt, ſhould be viewed once in three Years; and in like manner all Purpreſtures, and waſte in Woods; and that every one of theſe ſhould be inrolled by it ſelf. And the King commanded, that the Archbiſhops, Biſhops, Earls, Barons, Knights, and Free Tenants, and all Men of his Land, ſhould come to his Pleas of the Foreſt, at the ſummons of his maſter-Foreſters. It was alſo forbidden at the Pleas of the Foreſt, that any Cart or Waggon ſhould go out of the way in the Foreſt, or any Hogs to be in the Foreſt at the time of Foineſon, that is to ſay, fifteen days before St. John Baptiſt, and fifteen days after: and 'tis to be noted, that he who takes Veniſon in the King's Foreſt, and ſhall be thereof attainted, ſhall be in the King's Mercy, as to the loſing of his Eyes and Teſticles; and he that offended in the King's Foreſt in the Green-hue of Vert, by cutting down Trees, or lopping of the Branches, or by digging Turfs, or flaying, (that is, taking the Green-ſword of the Ground) or by cutting away the under part of Thickets, or by Eſſarts, or new Purpreſtures, or by Hedges or Ditches, or erecting Mills, making new Water-courſes, and erecting ſteep Coates or Lodges, or other Houſes, or by mowing Hay beyond the Hedges and Ditches, ſhall be all in the King's Mercy for his Goods, unleſs he hath the King's Verderers or Foreſters to warrant him. In like manner, he that carried Bows and Arrows, or Dogs uncoupled, through the King's Foreſt, and was thereof attainted, was in the King's Mercy. It was alſo decreed, that once in three Years there ſhould be a view of the Foreſt, and in the regard or view of the Foreſt theſe things were to be obſerved; what old or new Eſſarts were ſown, ſince the laſt review, and with what Grain; the new Eſſarts were to be taken into the King's hand: if the old Eſſarts were ſown with Wheat or Rye, every Acre was to yield the King twelve Pence for the Crop; and every Acre that was ſown with Oats, Barley, Beans, or Peaſe, was to yield the King ſix pence for that Crop.

Advertiſement to the Reader, concerning the Account of the Year of our Lord, which is obſerved in the enſuing Volume.

AS I have in my former Volume followed Bede and the reſt of our Engliſh-Saxon Chronologers, who begin the new Year with Chriſtmaſs-day, or the 25*th* of December; ſo I have purſued the ſame method in this; ſince almoſt all the Authors here made uſe of, follow the ſame Account with thoſe who wrote before the entrance of the Normans: ſo that I could not well depart from it, without altering the Chronological Calculation of thoſe Writers from whom this Volume is chiefly collected.

Not that I am inſenſible that even during this Period, which I have here given you, there were ſome other Accounts of Time made uſe of by ſome Authors, tho of no great Note: For Gervaſe a Monk of Canterbury, who lived and wrote in King John's Reign, at the * beginning of his Introduction to his Chronicle, expreſly mentions divers " different Accounts of the Year of our Lord, which were then ob- " ſerved, and which he ſays bred a great deal of Confuſion in the " Church, whilſt ſome begin the Year of our Lord from the † An- " nunciation, ſome from the Nativity, and others from the Paſſion of " our Lord Jeſus Chriſt. Now which of theſe ſhall we take? The " Solar Year, according to the Roman Tradition, and the antient cu- " ſtom of God's Church, begins at the Kalends of January, or on the " day of our Lord's Nativity, that is, at the end of December; how " then can both theſe Accounts be true? When the one begins the " Year of the Incarnation from the beginning, and the other from the " end of the Solar Year, and yet both Parties call their Years by the " ſame Title, ſince they both reckon from ſuch or ſuch a Year of our " Lord's Incarnation.

* Col. 1336.

† i. e. Lady-day.

Then in the two next Columns he thus concludes; " Yet I call all " theſe ſeveral ſorts of Years above-mention'd, Years of Grace, for that " we find Grace and Truth in all the Works of Chriſt: Yet becauſe " that the Grace of our Lord and Saviour, which from the Incarnation " lay hid in the Womb of the Virgin, now manifeſtly appeared at his " Nativity, and at which ſacred Solemnity, Glory to God, and good Will " towards Men was proclaimed by the Angels; therefore I here put an end to the old Year, and begin the New from that Feſtival: for which, as alſo for another Reaſon there given (needleſs here to be inſerted) he farther tells us, " That ſince all thoſe who have written Chronicles be- " fore him, have begun their Years from the Nativity of Chriſt, he like- " wiſe is reſolved to follow his Predeceſſors in the ſame Calculation. I thought fit to give you this Paſſage from ſo exact a Writer, that you may ſee how generally the old Engliſh way of beginning the Year at Chriſtmaſs-day obtain'd in that Age: In which he was alſo ſucceeded by all the Hiſtorians who wrote during King John's Reign, or that of his Son Henry the Third; but eſpecially by Rog. of Wendover, and Matthew Paris, who tranſcribed and added to that Work which Wendover had begun. And the same method we find pursued by Matth. Westminster, who wrote during the Reign of Edward the Third. †Yet I cannot but observe that tho Will. Rishanger (M. Paris's Continuator) takes upon him to follow the same Account; yet towards the latter end of his Work he forgets himself, and without giving the Reader any notice of the Change, often begins the Year at our Lady-day, by which means he sometimes puts things done at the beginning of the Year, in the latter end of it; and has thereby led divers of our Modern Historians that make use of his Account of Time, into many Mistakes, which I have in great part observed in the ensuing History. Yet I must own, that there are some few Historians that write in the Reigns of King Edward the Second and Third, who in their Chronicles begin the Year at our Lady-day, according to our present Account, such as are Thomas Wikes and Walter Hemingford, to which I could likewise add some others of less note, which since they are not many, either in Number or Authority, in comparison of those that follow the old Account from Christmas-day, I would not for their sakes deviate from the Method I had at first resolv'd to pursue throughout this Volume; from which if I vary in the next (if I shall put out another) it shall be upon very good Reasons and Considerations, which shall likewise be communicated to the Reader.

THE General History OF ENGLAND BOTH Ecclesiastical and Civil.

VOL. II. BOOK VII.

Containing the Reign of King John.

KING Richard being thus suddenly taken off at most in the Prime of his Years, (his only Surviving Brother and Successor, John Earl of Mortaign presently sent over Hubert, Archbishop of Canterbury, and William le Mareschal, Earl of Strigul, (or Chepstow,) into England, that they, together with Geoffrie Fitz-Peter, the Justiciary under the late King, might keep the Nation in Peace, till he could come over, and set the Things himself; then he went to Chinon in Touraine, to make sure of his Brother's Treasure, which was at that time in the keeping of Robert de Turnham, who immediately upon his arrival delivered it up to him, as also the strong Castles of Chinon and Saumur, of both which this Robert was then Governor.

But things did not go so well for Earl John's Interest in other Parts, [2]. for the Provinces of Anjou, Touraine, and Main, in a General Assembly of the Chief Men, or Estates of those Countreys, firmly adhered to his Nephew Arthur, Earl, or Duke of Bretaign, as their Liege-Lord, declaring it to be the Right and Custom of those Territories, for the Son of the Elder Brother deceased, to succeed in the Patrimony or Inheritance before the Younger.

In compliance with which Determination, Thomas de Furnes, Nephew to Robert de Turnham, making the contrary Party to his Uncle, delivered up the Castle of Angiers to Arthur, as the other Noblemen

The Castle of Angiers delivered up to Earl Arthur.

Ann. Dom. MCXCIX. did all the reſt of the Provinces above-mentioned, excepting thoſe Caſtles which Earl John had already poſſeſſed himſelf of; whereupon Conſtance, Counteſs of Bretaign, and Mother to Earl Arthur, brought him along with her to the City of Tours, and there delivered him (being then about Thirteen years of Age) to the Cuſtody of Philip King of France, who ſent him to Paris to be there Educated with Prince Lewis his Son; and at the ſame time poſſeſſed himſelf of all the Cities, Caſtles, and ſtrong Places which belonged to Earl Arthur, putting into them Caſtellans, or Governors of his own, reſolving to make this Alteration wholly ſubſervient to his particular Intereſt, as you will by and by perceive.

Who is delivered by his Mother to the K. of France, who ſeizes on all the ſtrong Places that belonged to him.

[3] Id. ib. [3] So ſoon as Earl John heard this Unwelcome News, he thought it high time to put a ſtop to theſe Succeſſes of the French King. Wherefore, marching forthwith into the Province of Main with a ſtrong Force, he ſoon took the City of Mans, and in revenge for their owning Arthur, and to be a Terror to other Places, he demoliſhed the Walls of the City, together with the Caſtle, and all the Stone Houſes, carrying away the Citizens Priſoners, Becauſe that contrary to their Fealty ſworn to him, they had received Arthur for their Lord, which was a Preſage of this Prince's Cruel and Impolitick Reign; for what could a Foreign Enemy have done more than Spoil and Diſmantle One of the beſt fenced Cities in his Dominions, which might have been much better ſecur'd by a ſtrong Gariſon, as his Father and Brother had done before in ſuch like Caſes?

Earl John takes the City of Mans, and pulls down the Walls.

[4] Id. ib. When [4] Earl John had thus diſpatched his Affairs in thoſe Parts, and kept his Chriſtmas at Beaufort in Anjou, he went from thence into Normandy, and coming to Rouen, was on the 25th of April (being St. Mark's Day) in the Cathedral Church, girt with the Sword of the Dutchy of Normandy, having alſo a Coronet (adorned with Golden Roſes round about) put upon his Head by Walter Archbiſhop of that City; and then he took an Oath upon the Holy Goſpels and Reliques of the Saints, in the Preſence both of the Clergy and Laity, That he would Preſerve Holy Church, with her Dignities (or Privileges) and Adminiſter true Juſtice, Abrogate Evil Laws, and ordain Good ones; which Oath is almoſt Word for Word with our antient Engliſh Coronation-Oath.

Earl John is inveſted with the Dutchy of Normandy, by the Archbiſhop of Rouen. When he alſo took an Oath almoſt the ſame with the Engliſh Coronation-Oath.

[5] Id. ib. Whilſt [5] theſe Affairs were tranſacting beyond Sea, Hubert Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and William the Earl Mareſchal, cauſed all the Freemen of the Kingdom, both of Cities and Boroughs, as alſo the Earls, Barons, and Free Tenants, to ſwear Fealty to John Duke of Normandy, Son of King Henry Fitz-Empreſs againſt all Men; Nevertheleſs all the Biſhops, Earls, and Barons, who had Caſtles, Fortified, and ſtored them with Victuals and Ammunition; which ſhews, that they were either not ſatisfied with King John's Right by Inheritance, or elſe ſuſpecting his Fickle and Imperious Humour, they reſolved in time to provide as well as they could againſt it. But whatever might be the Reaſon of this Proceeding, when Archbiſhop Hubert, and the Earl Mareſchal, with Geoffry Fitz-Peter Juſticiary of England, knew it, they met at Northampton, and there ſummoned before them thoſe of the Nobility, whom they ſuſpected moſt likely

Then [1] William King of Scots, taking advantage of this ſudden Change, and the Unſettledneſs of Duke John's Affairs, ſent his Envoys into England, to demand Northumberland and Cumberland with their Dependancies, (which they called their Maſter's Patrimony) and which, if reſtored, they promiſed on his behalf that he ſhould then ſwear Fealty and Faithful Service to Duke John againſt all Men; but the Archbiſhop, and William the Earl Mareſchal, with Geoffry Fitz-Peter, wiſely conſidering the great Conſequence of their Demands, and the Danger of giving them a poſitive Denial in ſo ticklish a Time, would not permit them to go over into Normandy, but warily diſmiſs'd them home, ſending with them Earl David his Brother, with this Meſſage, That he ſhould patiently wait for an Anſwer, till Duke John came into England, who alſo ſent him the like Meſſage by Euſtace de Veſcie, King William's Son in Law, promiſing, That upon his own arrival here, he would in all things comply with his Deſires, if in the mean time he well obſerved and maintained the Peace he had formerly agreed to in his Brother's Reign.

The Archbiſhop, &c. returns a Wiſe, but Dilatory Anſwer to their Meſſage.

Affairs [2] being as well ſettled in Normandy and the other Countreys beyond the Seas, as the ſhortneſs of the Time would permit, Duke John reſolved to go over, and take poſſeſſion of the Crown of England, and on the 25th of May landing at Shoreham in Suſſex, the next Day he went to London, in order to be Crown'd the day following; where met him the Archbiſhops of Dublin, and Ragiſa, (who it ſeems was then in England about ſome Affairs not mentioned by our Author) there alſo appeared the New Biſhop of London, with moſt of the Biſhops, Earls, and Barons of England, who all attending the Duke to the Abby-Church at Weſtminſter in ſolemn Proceſſion, Hubert, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, ſtanding in the midſt of them (as Matt. Paris relates) ſpoke to this Effect. "All here preſent hearken to me, your Wiſdoms may underſtand, that no Man "ought to ſucceed to the Kingdom upon any previous Conſiderations, unleſs he be firſt Unanimouſly E L E C T E D for the Excellency of his Manners, (the Grace of the Holy Spirit being firſt implor'd) by the General Body of the Kingdom, and Anointed King after the Example of Saul, whom God ſet over his People, tho' he was neither a King's Son, nor deſcended of Royal Blood; ſo in like manner after him David the Son of Jeſſe, the One, becauſe he was Valiant, and fit for the Royal Dignity; the Other becauſe he was Pious and Humble; that ſo he who ſurpaſs'd others in Virtue, might alſo excell them in Dignity and Power; therefore if any One of the Family of the Deceaſed King, do excell the reſt, we ought indeed moſt readily and willingly to conſent to his Election; and we have ſaid this, in reſpect to the [2] Id. Duke John arrives in England, and is met by the Biſhops and Nobility.

The Archbiſhop's Speech at the Coronation of Duke John.

Anno Dom. MCXCIX. "Noble Duke John here preſent, the Brother of our Illuſtrious King "Richard, who deceaſed without any Heir of his Body; This Duke "being Prudent and Valiant, We all, as well in reſpect of his "Deſerts, as of his Royal Blood, (with the Invocation of the Holy "Spirit) do unanimouſly Elect King: Which Propoſition was a-greed to by all there preſent.

Our Author's Character of this Archbiſhop.

Upon whoſe Speech the Duke is Elected King.

Now you muſt obſerve, (ſays my Author) That the Archbiſhop was a Man of a deep Foreſight, and was ſuch a ſteady Pillar of Conſtancy and Wiſdom, that none durſt diſpute what he ſaid, knowing that he had not without good Cauſe thus determin'd this Matter; with which Speech Duke John and all there preſent readily acquieſced, and ſo Unanimouſly Electing and Receiving him for their King, Cryed out, Long may the King Live! But the Archbiſhop being afterwards queſtion'd, why he had thus ſpoken? He anſwered, "That he clearly foreſaw, being aſſured by certain Prophecies* or "Preſages, that King John would ſometime ſpoil the Kingdom and "Crown of England, and bring it into great Confuſion; therefore "leſt he might take an unbridled Licenſe of doing what he would, "he had affirm'd, That he ought to be Elected, and not to ſucceed "by Hereditary Succeſſion.

The Archbiſhop's Reaſon for his making this Speech.

* Oraculis.

Whether the Archbiſhop ſpoke this purely out of Policy or Conſcience, I will not determine; but this much is certain, that either he did not believe any Hereditary Succeſſion to the Crown, or if he did, it was ſuch a One as our Law does not acknowledge at this Day. But ſince I intend to ſpeak more amply on this Subject in my Introduction to this Volume, I ſhall ſay no more of it in this Place: Only that the Clergy and People of England are not ſo much to be blamed for thus preferring Earl John to his Nephew Arthur, ſince this was according to the antient Engliſh Saxon Cuſtom, whereby the Uncle did always ſucceed before the Nephew; beſides this, Earl John was a Man of ripe Age, and a Native of this Kingdom, whereas the Latter was but a Minor of 12 or 13 Years of Age, and a Foreigner, born in Bretaigne. But I will not take upon me to Excuſe the Partiality of the Queen-Dowager Eleanor, who contrary to the Cuſtom of moſt Grandmothers, was fonder of her Son John, than Grandſon Arthur; which whether it proceeded from the little Knowledge ſhe had of him, who had been always bred up with his Mother, the Counteſs of Bretaigne, or out of pure Emulation to her, whom the Queen found would govern all Affairs during the Young Prince's Minority, I will not take upon me to determine, after ſo many Ages.

The Reaſons why the Clergy and People of England preferr'd John before his Nephew Arthur.

[3.] R. H. But to proceed to this King's Coronation, (from which our Author has made a Digreſſion) [3] after this Election was over, the Archbiſhop placed the Crown upon the King's Head with the uſual Ceremonies, notwithſtanding Philip Biſhop of Durham appeal'd againſt it, [4.] becauſe of the Abſence of the Archbiſhop of York; Then the Coronation-Oath was Adminiſtred, conſiſting of theſe Three Heads, (being the ſame with that taken by his Brother) viz. That he would cheriſh Holy Church, and all the Clergy, and would Preſerve her ſafe from the Violence of her Enemies; That all Evil Laws being abrogated, he would eſtabliſh Good Ones, and would exerciſe true Juſtice, throughout the Kingdom of England; and he was farther adjured by the Archbiſhop, that he ſhould not preſume to undertake this Dignity, unleſs he reſolved to fulfill what he had now ſworn, to which he anſwered, That he would by the help of God obſerve in good Faith, all thoſe things he had promiſed, and on the next Day (having received the Homages and Fealties of his Nobility) he went to pay his Devotion at St. Alban's Shrine. Anno Dom. MCXCIX.

It is alſo worth our obſerving [5.] (what R. Hoveden farther relates) that on the Day of his Coronation he girt William the Earl Mareſchal with the Sword of the Earldom of Strigoil, and Geoffry Fitz-Peter with that of the Earldom of Eſſex; for tho' they were before called Earls, and had the Adminiſtration of their Counties or Earldoms, yet were not ſolemnly Inveſted with them; from whence we may obſerve, that the antient Cuſtom of creating Earls by Inveſting them with the Sword of the County they were to govern, was ſtill in uſe. [5.] P. 451. William Earl Mareſchal, and Geoffry Fitz Peter inveſted with the Earldoms of Strigoil, and Eſſex.

The [1.] ſame day he alſo made Hubert Archbiſhop of Canterbury his Chancellor, which was then looked upon as a Diſparagement to his Archiepiſcopal Dignity, for when he ſeemed to glory of his New Office, and his great Favour with the King, Hugh Bardulf a bold Baron, thus anſwered him, My Lord, with your good leave, if you would well conſider the Great Power and Dignity of your Spiritual Function, you would not undertake this Yoke of Lay-Servitude: With which Reproof the Archbiſhop being corrected, remain'd ſilent. [1] Id. ib. Hubert the Archbiſhop is made the King's Chancellor.

In the mean time, the King of Scots by three Priors of his own Nation, renewed his Demand of Northumberland and Cumberland, and made the ſame Promiſes as before; King John anſwered them prudently, that when their Lord the King of Scots, his Dear Couſin, came to him, he would do what was Juſt concerning that, and all his other Demands, and ſo ſent Philip Biſhop of Durham to meet him, expecting his coming; having alſo ſent Roger Biſhop of St. Andrews, and Hugh Maleville before, to invite him; then the King went himſelf to Nottingham, where he arrived on Whitſunday, and ſtaid ſome time in thoſe Parts in expectation of him, but he came not at all; only he ſent back the Meſſengers with the ſame Demand of the two Counties, and to let the King know, That if he denied his Demands, he would endeavour to acquire them by Force, and expected his Anſwer within Forty days: In the mean time, King John committed Northumberland and Cumberland, with their Caſtles, to the Keeping and Defence of William Stutevil, and ſo returned into the South of England. [2.] Id. ib. (b) The King of Scots by certain Priors renews his Demand of the above mentioned Counties; to which the King returns a prudent Anſwer. The K. ſends Philip Biſhop of Durham to meet the Scottiſh King, who comes not at all. The King being fruſtrated of his Expectations, returns into the South.

[3.] Having thus diſpatched his Affairs in England, the King paſſed into Normandy, landed at Diepe, and arrived at Rouen on Midſummer-day, where came in to him great numbers of Soldiers both Horſe and Foot; but preſently there was a Truce made between him and the King of France, until the 16th of Auguſt; and here Philip Earl of Flanders did homage to King John, but it is not there ſaid for what. Then the King's Natural Brother Geoffry Archbiſhop of York, having diſpatched his Affairs at Rome, return'd to the King, and was Joyfully received by him. [3.] Id. ib. And ſo paſſes over into Normandy, where great numbers of Men flock in to him; and a Truce is made between him and the King of France for a ſhort time.

About

Anno Dom. MCXCIX.

About [4] the ſame time Henry Earl of Namur, Brother to Philip Earl of Flanders, Peter of Doway a Famous Soldier, and his Brother the Biſhop Elect of Cambray, were taken by ſome of the French King's Soldiers, and delivered to him; whereupon Cardinal Peter of Capua, and the Pope's Legate Interdicted France for the Detention of the Elect of Cambray, as alſo Normandy for the Impriſonment of Philip Biſhop of Beauvois; but becauſe he was taken in Arms, he ſoon after gave King John 2000 Marks (M. Paris ſays 6000.) for his Ranſom, and ſo was ſet at Liberty, upon his taking an Oath never to bear Arms againſt Chriſtians.

[4] Id. p. 452. (a) The E. of Namur and his Brother, the Biſhop Elect of Cambray, taken Priſoners. The Biſhop of Beauvais ranſomed.

Not [5] long after, Philip King of France Knighted Arthur Earl of Bretaigne, and received his Homage for that Province, as alſo for thoſe of Normandy, Anjou, Poitou, Tourain, and Bretaigne: On the morrow after the Aſſumption of St. Mary or (Auguſt the 16.) the two Kings treated two days by their Commiſſioners, between Bonvant and Gaillon, and the Third day they confer'd together by themſelves in Perſon; but the King of France would expreſs no kindneſs to King John, and being afterwards asked, why he had entertain'd ſuch an Averſion for him, his Anſwer was, Becauſe he had poſſeſſed himſelf of Normandy, and the other Territories, without his Licence, whereas he ought firſt to have come to him and demanded them as his Right, and done him Homage for them; ſo much did King Philip now take upon him, above what any of his Predeceſſors had done before; for whereas they thought it ſufficient to own for Duke of Normandy, whomſoever the Eſtates of that Country thought fit to Elect or Recognize, this King now took upon him to determine to whom of Right that Dutchy belonged, which had never been done before.

[5] Id. ib. The King of France receives Homage of Earl Arthur for Bretaigne, Normandy, and the reſt. A Treaty is held between K. Philip and K. John, at which the former ſhews the latter no kindneſs.

At [1] this Treaty the King of France demanded all the Norman Veuxin, that is, all that lies between the Foreſt of Lyons, the Seine, the Iſle of Andeli, and the River Epte, affirming, That Geoffry Earl of Anjou, the Father of the late King Henry, had given it to Lewis the Groſs, late King of France, for his Aſſiſtance in gaining Normandy from King Stephen; and further demanded, that Poitou, Anjou, Tourain, and Main might be render'd to Arthur Earl of Bretaigne, and made divers other unreaſonable Demands, which the King of England could not grant, and ſo they departed upon very ill Terms: Then the Earls and Barons of France, that had adhered to King Richard, became Feudataries of King John, and Swore to him, they would not make any Terms with the King of France, unleſs with his Conſent; and he in like manner Swore to them, he would not make Peace with him, unleſs they were comprehended in it.

They break off upon very ill Terms.

In [2] October the King of France ſeized the Caſtle of Balun, and Demoliſhed it; This was much reſented by William de Raſibus (or de la Roche) General of Earl Arthur's Forces, who Expoſtulating with King Lewis about it, told him, That this was contrary to the Agreement between him and Arthur his Maſter; but the King replied, He ſhould not omit to do what he thought good, with what he had acquired, notwithſtanding his Lord Arthur might not like it; and then went and beſieged Lavardin: but hearing the King of England was coming with his Army to Relieve it, he left the Siege, and marched to Mans; King John followed him, and he alſo quitted that Place; in the mean while William de la Roche had cunningly gotten Arthur out of the Custody of the King of France, and reconciled him to his Uncle King John, to whom he also delivered the City of Mans, of which he was Governor. But notwithstanding, the very same day, it being told Arthur, and the Countess his Mother, (whether on true or false Intelligence, I will not determine) that King John intended to put him in Prison; thereupon he and his Mother that Night made their Escape; but the true Reason of this seems rather to have been, because the Viscount of Touarz, (on whose advice the Countess and her Son then chiefly relied,) had been lately disobliged by King John, out of whose hands he had taken the Command of the Castle of Chinon, and the Seneschally of Anjou; the former of which the King bestowed upon Roger Constable of Chester, till he could resolve how better to dispose of it; wherefore the Viscount above-mentioned, incensing the Earl and his Mother against the King, presently they fled away, together with many other Noblemen, to the City of Angiers, and from thence return'd again to the King of France.

Anno Dom. MCXCIX.

William de la Roche gets Earl Arthur out of the Custody of the French King, and reconciles him to his Uncle King John, but it does not hold. For with his Mother he presently returned back to King Philip, with the Cause of it.

[3] Not long after their arrival, the Countess of Constance having now quite alienated her Affections from Randulph, Earl of Chester, her Husband, was divorced from him, (tho' the Grounds of it are not set down) and then she married Guido, Brother to the said Viscount of Touarz, which tended much to her Dishonour.

[3] Id. ib. Constance, Countess of Bretaigne, is divorced from the E. of Chester, and Marries Guido, Brother to the Viscount of Touar.

In [4] the mean time, the Cardinal of Capua, the Pope's Legat, who had been formerly sent to reconcile the Differences between the late King Richard and the King of France, and at whose instance a five years Truce had been lately made, now laboured all he could that it might still continue between the Two Kings; and so by his Mediation it was agreed between them, That the former Truce should still continue till the Feast of St. Hillary next ensuing; thus all things remain'd for a while in the same state.

[4] Id. ib. The Popes Legat uses his utmost Endeavours to continue the Truce between the two Kings.

About [5] this time also Philip, Natural Son to King Richard, and on whom he had bestowed the Castle and Honour of Cuinac, killed the Viscount of Limoges in revenge of his Father's Death; for it was he who held the Castle of Chalux against King Richard, when he received his Death's wound. This I thought fit to mention, as being the only Action I can find worth the Noting, done by this Philip, who lived ever after in a private Condition.

[5] Id. ib. Philip, Natural Son to King Richard, Kills the Vicount of Limoges.

But to give you some farther account of Foreign Affairs: There had been a late Contest between Otto, Duke of Saxony, and Philip Duke of Swevia, for the German Empire, to which they both pretended; Pope Innocent and all the Romans disclaiming the Latter, owned the Former, Emperor; who being thus confirm'd by the Pope; He also in his favour Excommunicated Duke Philip, and all his Adherents, unless he desisted from his Pretensions; whereupon the Emperor Otto sent Ambassadors to his Uncle King John, not only to give him notice of his good Success, but also to advise him to defer making Peace with the King of France, for that he himself would shortly give him as powerful an Assistance as he could expect.

Id. P 452. (a) After a great Contest between Otto Duke of Saxony, and Philip Duke of Swevia for the Empire, the Pope and Italians disclaim the latter, and own the former.

As

Anno Dom. MCXCIX.

As for Eccleſiaſtical Affairs, there happened this Year no Alterations in the Church, [1] only whilſt Geoffrey Archbiſhop of York ſtayed in Normandy, he referr'd all Differences between him and the Chanons of his Church, to Hugh Biſhop of Lincoln and others; but the Archbiſhop not ſtanding to the Award they had made, and ſtill giving his Chapter further diſturbance, they made their Complaint to Hubert Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and Geoffrey Fitz-Peter, the Juſticiary, who thereupon ſent to the King, adviſing him not to permit the Archbiſhop to return into England, becauſe if he came over, he would bring Diſcord and not Peace along with him.

King John being ſtill in Normandy kept his Chriſtmas at Buers; not long after which, he and the King of France held a Treaty of Peace between Andeli and Gallion, at which they agree; That Lewis the French King's Son, ſhould Marry Blanche, Daughter to Alfonſo the Eighth, King of Caſtile, being King John's Niece, with whom he promiſed to give the City and Earldom of Eureux, as alſo to quit his Claim to all the Caſtles and Strong Places which King Philip held in Normandy at the time of King Richard's Death; and farther engaged to give with her 30000 Marks of Silver, and to Swear, that he would not give any Aſſiſtance to his Nephew Otto either in Men or Money, whereby he might obtain the Roman Empire; but the final Concluſion of theſe Points was delay'd until eight Days after Midſummer following.

Anno Dom. MCC.

This Treaty being thus ended, King John ſent his Mother Queen Eleanor to Alfonſo King of Caſtile, to perſuade him to agree to the Match for his Daughter, as alſo to bring her along with her.

[3] Not long after King John paſſed into England, and took of every Plough-Land throughout the Kingdom Three Shillings for an Aid; but whether the King raiſed this Tax by the conſent of the Common-Council of the whole Kingdom, I will not determine; ſince Rad. de Coggeſhal relates it as a Grievance, that not long after the King's arrival in England, he required an Aid for the Diſcharge of the 20000 Marks for his Niece's Portion, ſo that there iſſued out a Royal Edict throughout all England, That every Plough-Land ſhould pay Three Shillings, which ſevere Exaction did extreamly impoveriſh the People, who had lately payed at his Coronation a Scutage of Two Marks upon every Knight's Fee.

In Lent he went to York, expecting the King of Scots would have met him there, but he came not; then he preſently after returned into Normandy, having firſt kept his Eaſter at Worceſter.

[4] In the mean time, Eleanor the Queen-Dowager, having brought her Grand-Daughter Blanche as far as Burdeaux, and being weary with her Journey, retired to the Nunnery of Font-Everard to refreſh her ſelf; but ſhe ſent the young Princeſs under the Conduct of the Archbiſhop of that City, to the King; and ſo ſoon as ſhe arrived, the two Kings met again at the ſame Place, and at the time before appointed, (being Eight Days after Midſummer) in order to make a full Concluſion of the former Treaty; at which Meeting the King of France ſurrender'd back to King John the City of Eureux with the Earldom, and all the Caſtles, Cities, and Lands he had poſſeſſed himſelf of in Normandy, and the other Dominions of the King of England; and King John preſently became his Liege Man, and did him him Homage, and forthwith gave back all those Territories to Prince Lewis in Marriage with his Niece, as had been before agreed on, and the next day they were solemnly Married in Normandy, by the Archbishop of Bourdeaux, in the Presence of several of the Bishops, Earls, and Barons of France; for the Marriage could not be solemnized in that Kingdom, as being then under the Pope's Interdict, because the King of France had sometime before put away Isemburge, Daughter to the King of Denmark, (for no other reason, but that he did not like her) and had taken to his Bed one Agnes, a German Princess, whom he called his Wife.

[5] So soon as the Wedding was over, Prince Lewis carried his New Bride with him into France, and the same day the Two Kings met again at Vernon (a Town belonging to the French King) where where Duke Arthur did Homage to his Uncle King John by consent of King Philip for Bretaigne and his other Countries, and was again delivered to the King of France, in Tutelage.

And that this Peace might remain the more firm and stable, [1] all the Articles already recited, were some time after reduced into Writing under the Great Seal of both Kings, wherein it was among other things agreed, that divers of the Chief Earls, and Barons of each Kingdom, should stand engaged for the punctual Observance of it, who were also on both sides obliged by Oath, that whosoever of them broke this Agreement, these Guarantees, together with all their Tenants, Estates, should be freed from their Fealty, and have Liberty to quit their own Prince; and tho' the Particulars of this Peace are now of no great concernment to us, yet it shews, what Notions the Princes of that time had concerning the Fealty or Allegiance of their Subjects; which they did not think then so sacred a Thing, but that it might be transferr'd from one Prince to another, in case that either of them broke those Articles to which they had Sworn.

The Articles of this Peace are reduced into two Charters, seal'd by both Kings.

It is also observeable, That in consideration of Thirty thousand Marks, which the King of France then acknowledged to have received from the King of England King Philip did thereupon release and make over to him all his Right to the Fee or Superiority of Bretaign, so that Duke Arthur was for the future to hold Bretaign immediately of the King of England.

This Treaty consisting of two several Charters, or Instruments, that Part which was Seal'd by the King of France (as you may find in [2] Roger Hoveden) remain'd with the King of England; and that Part which the King of England executed, remain'd with the King of France, which is also to be found in the First Volume of Norman Writers, put out by [3] Du Chesne; as also in the Learned Monsieur Leibnitz's Codex Diplomaticus, p. 23. to both which I refer the Curious Reader.

This Peace, so Disadvantageous and Dishonourable to King John, was the first demonstration both of his want of Courage and Policy, for had he deferr'd making it, he might by the Assistance of the Emperor, his Nephew, and the Earl of Flanders, have regain'd those Territories in Normandy, and other Countries, which he was now forced to part with for ever, and had also kept the Thirty thou-

[4] Id. p. 457. (a) K. John reduces Aquitain to his Obedience.

[4] Immediately after the Concluſion of this Peace, King John marched with a ſtrong Army into Aquitain; where finding none able to reſiſt him he ſoon reduced that Province to his Obedience; not long after, being grown weary of his Wife Hawiſe, or Avis, Daughter to William late Earl of Gloceſter; He was divorced from her by Elias, Archbiſhop of Bourdeaux, and Two other Biſhops appointed by the Pope for that Purpoſe, becauſe they were Couſins in the Third Degree; which Exception had been taken long before againſt the Marriage by Richard, late Archbiſhop of Canterbury, when it was firſt Conſummated; but it was then carried againſt him, becauſe King Richard would have it ſo, and that King John was then either very fond of her, or elſe of her great Eſtate: But, having been married to her above Nine years without any Iſſue, he was reſolved to be rid of her, and marry ſome Younger Lady; wherefore being thus divorced, by the Advice of the King of France, he married Iſabel, Daughter of Aymer Earl of Engoleſme, whom her Father had formerly, at the Requeſt of King Richard, betroathed to Hugh le Brun, Earl of Marche: They had been affianced ſome time before; but the Marriage not being Conſummated, becauſe the Lady was thought too Young, her Father now finding King John had a great Kindneſs for her, being very handſom, took her away from the Earl againſt his Conſent, and beſtowed her upon the King; ſo that they were ſoon after Married at Engoleſme, by the Archbiſhop of that Place; but this Injury was ſo deeply reſented by the Earl of Marche, that he reſolved to be revenged of it, and did King John a great deal of Miſchief in the long War that not long after happened between him and the King of France.

Divorced from her, on pretence of Conſanguinity.

He marries Iſabel Daughter to the E. of Engoleſme, tho' ſhe was then betroathed to the E. of March.

[5] Id. p. 458. The E. of St. Giles does Homage to K. John.

[5] Much about this time, the Earl of St. Giles renewed his Homage to King John, for the Lands and Caſtles which King Richard had beſtowed on him in Marriage, with his Siſter the Queen-Dowager of Sicily, from whence the King went to Angiers, and there took 150 Hoſtages for their Fidelity to him, and put them under ſafe Cuſtody.

[1] In the beginning of October following, King John having ſettled his Affairs in Normandy, and his other Territories beyond Sea, return'd into England, bringing with him Iſabella his Wife, and upon the Eighth of the ſame Month, they were both together Crowned at Weſtminſter, by Hubert Archbiſhop of Canterbury, at whoſe Coronation there was alſo held a Common Council of the Kingdom, as appears by a * Charter in the Tower (quoted by Mr. Petyt in his Preface to the Rights of the Commons Aſſerted) where it is recited, That the Queen was Crowned by the Common Aſſent and Unanimous Agreement of the Archbiſhop, Biſhops, Barons, Clergy, and People of England; which I have alſo given you at large, in the Appendix, N. 4.

This Homage being thus perform'd, the King of Scots demanded of his Lord King John, the Counties of Northumberland, Cumberland, with their Appurtenances, as his Antient Right and Inheritance; and when they had long Treated concerning this Matter, but could not agree, the King of England deſired longer time to conſider of it, until Whitſunday; then Early on the Morrow, (being November the 23.) the King of Scots return'd toward his own Country, under the Conduct of the ſame Perſons that brought him into England, being much diſcontented at his Diſappointment.

The Error of Buchanan and other Scotiſh Hiſtorians, concerning this Homage.

Anno Dom. MCC.

ſtorians mention any ſuch thing; ſo King John could not deſire the Scotiſh King to aſſiſt him againſt the French; becauſe there was then a Peace newly made between them: And as for the Homage it ſelf, it muſt certainly be for ſome part of Scotland; for as to Northumberland, and the other County above-mentioned, 'tis plain, that the King of Scots had not then any Part of them; and as for the Earldom of Huntingdon, that King had long before beſtowed it upon his Brother David, who is alſo particularly mentioned by Hoveden under that Title, as one of the Witneſſes of the Homage. So that nothing can be more evident, then that it was not perform'd for any Territories the King of Scots then enjoy'd in England, as Buchanan vainly ſuppoſes, and conſequently muſt have been for Lothian and ſome Parts of Scotland.

But to return again to our Hiſtory, from which this Affair has made us digreſs; King John having diſpatched this difficult Buſineſs with the King of Scots, return'd into the Southern Parts, where having nothing elſe to do, being very much pleaſed with his good Succeſs, he ſpent the reſt of his time in Feaſting and Jollity.

I ſhall conclude this Year with a ſhort Account of Eccleſiaſtical Affairs, that happen'd during the King's Abſence in Normandy.

[5] M. ib. 497. The firſt Synod that was held by the Pope's Legate, notwithſtanding the Prohibition of the Juſticiary.

[5] Hubert, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, as Legate to the Pope, held a General Council or Synod, of all the Biſhops and Clergy of England, at Weſtminſter, notwithſtanding the Prohibition of Geoffery Fitz-Peter the King's Juſticiary; which is one of the firſt Examples of that Arbitrary and Independant Power, the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and other extraordinary Legates from the Pope, ever after Uſurp'd till the Reformation, of holding Eccleſiaſtical Synods, and making Canons by their ſole Authority, without the King's Licenſe or Confirmation; Nay often contrary to his conſent, which had not been practiſed in former times; but as for the Canons of this Council, ſince they only relate to the Reformation of the Clergy, in ſeveral points of Diſcipline and Manners, or concerning the more due and regular Adminiſtration of the Sacraments, (many of which had been already ordain'd in former Synods,) I think it needleſs to ſet them down, and ſhall therefore refer the Reader to R. Hoveden for his further Satisfaction.

[1] M. p. 461. (b) 462. The Death of Hugh Bp. of Lincoln, the Kings of England and Scotland attend at his Funeral.

[1] Some days alſo before the late Interview at Lincoln, deceaſed that Pious Prelate Hugh, Biſhop of Lincoln, who was the great Example of that Age for Piety, Chaſtity, and all other Chriſtian Virtues; and was in ſuch Reputation, that his Body being brought to Lincoln to be Interr'd, whilſt King John came thither to meet the King of Scots, the King himſelf, and Three Archbiſhops with all the Biſhops and Barons that attended at that Solemnity, went out in ſolemn Proceſſion to meet the Corps; nor did that King with his Chief Nobility, think it beneath them to bear it on their Shoulders to the Door of the Church, where the Archbiſhop and Biſhops received it, and carried it into the Choir, depoſiting it there all Night, till it could be buried near the Altar of St. John Baptiſt; where his Tomb is ſhewn at this Day: But as for the Miracles which our Hiſtorians relate to have been performed there, ſuch as that of a Woman who had been Seven Years blind of one Eye, and received her Sight at his Funeral; and of a certain Cut-purſe, who as ſoon as Divers Miracles related to be done at his Tomb.

he

he had got his Booty had his Hands so shrunk up that he could not fill them; so that he was not able to hold what he had taken. I leave them to be told and believed by those who have a greater Faith in such things than my self, nor should I mention them at all, were they not Related by Authors of so good Credit in other things.

Anno Dom. MCC.

I must here also take notice of what was done this Year in France; in Relation to that King, and his Queen Isemburge or Botilda, whom he had put away, and which had been the Cause of the Pope's Interdict upon France, which yet was some time before taken off, upon the Kings promise to receive his Queen again, or else to stand to the Decision of the Pope's Legate. Wherefore the Pope now sent Octavian, Bishop of Ostia to Hear and Determine the Cause; at what time the King of France, who refused to be Divorced from his Queen, alledged, that they were too near of Kin to be Married; which being denied by the Ambassadors of the King of Denmark (who appeared for her) and also because they looked upon this Octavian as the King's Relation, who consequently would be too favourable to him; they appealed from him, to the Pope himself. But Three Days after another Legate came thither, who was more indifferent, and upon hearing the matter over again, found no cause why a Divorce should be pronounced between them. But when he was going to give a definitive Sentence against the King, He being forewarned of it, carried her away along with him on the sudden, and tho' he pretended to take her to him as his Wife, yet he still kept her under a closer Confinement than before, which yet put an end to this troublesome Affair; and indeed the Queens and Princesses of that Age had a very hard time of it, for Dispensations from the Pope being not then in fashion, if a King or a Prince were weary of his Wife, and if he could make himself any way Related to her (tho' it were Three or Four Degrees removed, provided he could gain the Pope's Legate on his Side, it was sufficient to obtain a Divorce. Yet it seems in this Case the Pope thought them too far off Related to grant it; for King Philip and this Queen were only Cousins in the Fourth Degree, by which means tho' she kept the Title of Queen to her Death, and saw Agnes her Rival decease before her, yet did she thereby obtain no better Treatment from the King her Husband?

[1] Id. lib. (b)

The Pope sends a Legate into Fr. to hear and determine the matter concerning the Q's. Divorce.

Another Legate come into France, who will not pass Sentence for the K. Divorce, who thereupon takes away the Q. and puts her under a closer Confinement.

[2] Anno Dom. MCCI.

This [3] Year King John kept his Christmas at Guilford, with great Solemnity, and distributed many rich Cloaths or Liveries to his Knights, or Military Men; whilst the Archbishop did the like at Canterbury, as it were vying with him in Magnificence; which very much incensed the King (as very well it might) against that Prelate. Not long after Christmas, the King with his Queen, went on Progress as far as the Borders of Scotland, and in his Journey, he laid great Fines upon those, who had any ways Trespassed in his Forests; when he came to York, he was Reconciled there to Geffrie, the Archbishop; and by the Mediation of Four Bishops, and Four Barons, chosen by both Parties, all Differences were composed between them; and those also whom the Bishop had Excommunicated for performing the King's Commands, were Absolved; notwith-

[3] Id. p. 464 (a)

The K. keeps his Christmas at Guilford, whilst the A. Bp. does the like at Canterbury, and vies with the K. in magnificence.

The K. and Q. go on Progress as far as the Borders of Scotland, and by the way he is reconciled to his Brother Geffrie A. Bp. of York.

Anno Dom. MCCI. notwithstanding the Quarrels between the Archbishop and his Dean and Chapter were again Renewed; as also with the Archdeacon of Richmond concerning the Right of Presentation to certain Churches; who Appealing to Pope Innocent, he writ a very high and angry Letter to the Archbishop: Commanding him to do Right to the Archdeacon, and to Absolve those, whom he had unjustly Excommunicated, or else to Incurr the same Sentence himself.

The Pope threatens to Excommunicate that A. Bp. and upon what occasion.

I have taken notice of this, to let you see the absolute and arbitrary Power which the Pope then Executed over one of the Primates of England, who (tho' the King's base Brother) was threatned to be Excommunicated, without being heard; so great an advantage was it in those Days to complain First; he that Appealed being still most likely to carry the Cause.

[4] Id. p. 466. (b) The K. and Q. are again Crowned at Canterbury.

[4] But now (as if the First Coronation had not been sufficient) on Easter Sunday following the King and his new Queen, being at Canterbury, they were there again solemnly Crowned in the presence of John Archbishop of Dublin and other Bishops in the Cathedral Church, by Hubert the Archbishop; for such was the Superstition of those times, that Princes believed their Crowns could not sit fast enough upon their Heads, unless they were more than once Solemnly put on by the Archbishop of Canterbury. Immediately after this Solemnity, he Commanded the Earls and Barons of England to be Ready with their Arms at Whitsuntide following, to pass over with him beyond Sea, for the Poictovins had Rebelled against their Governors, and had besieged them in their Castles; but Warren de Glapion, Seneschal of Normandy, had by the King's Command besieged the Castle of Driencourt, which King Richard had before given to Ralph de Issodun, Earl of Eu, Brother of Hugh de Brun; but the King of France hearing of King John's coming over, had marched into the Country to his Assistance, and raised the Siege for him, before He arrived in Normandy.

Earls and B's. summoned to be ready to pass over beyond Sea, and on what occasion.

[5] Id. Ib. The Noblemen of England refuse to attend the K. unless he would restore their ancient Rights.

[5] Before the Kings departure, the Earls and Barons of England assembled at Leicester, and there having a Treaty or Conference together, sent the King word, they would not go over with him, unless he would Restore to them their ancient Rights; that is the Liberties that were formerly granted them by his Predecessors; but tho' it might not be so Loyally done of them thus to press the King at such an Exigency, when his Affairs required hast, yet certainly he took much worse Advice, when instead of granting their Request; he presently demanded of them their Castles as Pledges of their Fidelity, and particularly he made William d'Aubeny to deliver up his Castle of Berwoir; yet it seems most of them were at last prevail'd with to go over with him; for our Author tells us, that the Barons of England being assembled at Portsmouth in Whitson-week, to pass over with the King, He took Money of most of them to be excused, and permitted them to go home: Mat. Paris tells us, it was Two Marks on each Knights Fee.

who instead of that seizes on several of their Castles; so that many of them go with him.

[1] Ib. The Earl of Strigul, and other Noblemen are sent before with Men to repel the Assaults of his Enemies.

in [1] the mean time the King sent William the Mareschal, Earl of Strigil before into Normandy with an Hundred Men at Arms, and Roger de Lacy, Constable of Chester with another Hundred, to repell the Attempts of his Enemies on the Borders of Normandy; he he also delivered to Hubert de Burgh his Chamberlain, a Hundred Knights or Horsemen to defend the Borders of England and Wales, and that he might give no cause of Discontent to the Clergy, and yet might raise what Money he could. He fully pardoned his Brother Geoffrie Archbishop of York, and restored him to his Favour, as also to all his Mannors and Free-Tenents, and by his Charter Confirmed all the Liberties of that Church in as ample manner as Roger the late Archbishop had held them, for which confirmation the present Archbishop engaged to pay the King a Thousand Marks in a Year's time, and engaged his Barony to him for Security. Anno Dom. MCCI

He restores the Archbishop of York to his Lands.

[2] Then the King sent Geoffrie Bishop of Chester, Richard Malosse, and Henry de Pudsie to William King of Scots, to desire him, that the Term of returning an Answer to the Request he had lately made concerning Northumberland, and the other Counties already mentioned, which King John had promised to give at Whitsuntide, might be put off, till Michaelmas following; this was Politickly done, to prevent the King of Scots from laying hold of the King's failing to return an Answer at the time appointed, as a pretence to Invade England in his Absence. And thus the King having settled all things at home, as well as He could, and being gone on Shipboard together with his Queen; upon some sudden Business not mention'd, he put in at the Isle of Wight, whilst the Queen continued her Voyage into Normandy; however the King after some Days stay, took Shipping again at Portsmouth, and presently after his arrival on the other side the Water, there was an Interview between him and the King of France, near the Isle of Andelie, where they agreed very well, tho' none were present but themselves: Three Days after, King John at the Invitation of the King of France, went to Paris, and was there magnificently Entertain'd in the King's own Pallace, the French King himself, lying elsewhere: After some stay there, the King of England taking his leave, went to Chinon, where his Sister in Law Berengara, the Queen Dowager met him, whom he fully satisfied concerning her Dower, according to the Testimony of Philip Bishop of Durham, and others who were present at her Marriage; the King then also settled upon her the City of Bayeux (that is the Duties and Revenues thereof) and Two Castles in Anjou, with a 1000 Marks Sterling per Annum, Five Hundred of which were to be Received from the King's Exchequer at London, and the other Five Hundred at Caen in Normandy.

[2] Id. ib. p. 468 (d) The K. sends Ambassadors to the King of Scots, desiring longer time to give his Answer concerning Northumberland, &c. and the reason of it.

The K. follows the Q. into Normandy where there is an interview between him and the K. of France, where they agree very well, and he invites K. John to Paris. Q. Berengara, meets the K. at Chinon.

But notwithstanding all King John's great preparations, I do not find any thing considerable He did against the Rebellious Barons of Poitou, [3] only, that resolving to accuse them of Treason against himself and the late King his Brother; he underhand procured some ordinary Gentlemen of his Subjects, very well skill'd in the Art of Duelling, who as his Champions, were (as soon as those Barons appeared at Court) to accuse them of Treason, and fight them: But they, who being forewarned of it, refused (tho' Summon'd) to come thither, sending him word, that they would Answer none upon that account, but their Peers, and so they became more implacable against him, than they were before, which is another Proof of this King's Pusillanimitie; who when he had a sufficient ficient Force to reduce them to Obedience; would let ſo great an Inſolence go unpuniſhed, which was the cauſe of their taking up Arms againſt him the Year following. [4] The King of France ſeemed ſtill very willing to obſerve the Peace, and to make it more Firm, it was again renewed, and put into Writing, in which it was ſpecified, that whoſoever of the Two Kings firſt broke it, thoſe Barons which were his Fidejuſſors or Security, for the true Obſervation of it, ſhould be diſcharged from their Allegiance, and take part with the injured King againſt their own.

[3] Id. ib. p. 468 (e) K. John does nothing considerable against the Rebellious B. of Poitou, only procures Champions to accuse them, and fight with them.

Anno Dom. MCCI.

[4] Id. Ib. The Peace is again renewed between the two Kings one Covenant of which was that the Barons who were their Securities were to be diſcharged from their Allegiance to that P. who firſt broke the Peace.

[2] In the mean time all things remaining quiet, nothing happened in England worth mentioning; only Hugh Bardolf and other of the Kings Juſtices going to Boſton Fair, with an intent to ſeize to the Kings uſe all Woollen-Cloaths that were not two Ells within the Liſts, according to King Richard's late Aſſize, or Statute; the Merchants ſo prevailed with the Juſtices, that their Cloaths were not ſeized, nor the late Aſſize concerning the Breadth of Cloaths, nor the meaſure of Grain further obſerved; ſo that for the future they might make their Cloaths as broad or as narrow as they pleaſed; for which Licenſe (tho' to the Damage of many) the Juſtices procured a great Sum of Money to the King's uſe, this, tho' there was no expreſs Diſpenſation, but only a bare Connivance of the breach of the late Laws concerning Meaſures; yet, ſerves to let us ſee, how pernicious this Prerogative of diſpencing with wholeſome Law, has been to this Nation in all Ages.

[2] Id. Ib. p. 468 (a) The K. Juſtices goe to Boſton Fair, to ſeize all Cloaths that were not full meaſure; but upon payment of a great Sum of Money by the Merchants, their Cloaths are not ſeized.

Nor can I omit taking ſome notice of what was done in Ireland this Year, [5] where it ſeems the King's Authority was of ſmall account, the great Men of the Kingdom making War upon each other, when they pleaſed; for Walter de Lacy, a powerful Noble Man in Ireland, under the pretence of holding a Treaty with John de Courcie Earl of Ulſter, fell upon him on the ſudden, killed many of his Men, and routed the reſt, but John being in his flight purſued; Hugh de Lacy Brother to Walter, (being his Liegeman) invited him to take ſhelter in his Caſtle, till his Forces could be rallied; which he accepting, and going into the Caſtle, was there detained Priſoner by this Hugh, who deſigned to deliver him up to the King, againſt whom he had then taken Arms; but in the mean time the followers of, and adherents to Earl John, did not ceaſe to waſt the Lands of Walter and Hugh de Lacy, until ſuch time as they would ſet their Maſter Free; as they were ſoon after forced to do.

[5] Id. 468. (a) John de Curcy Earl of Ulſter being put to flight by Walter de Lacy, is ſeized by Hugh de Lacy in his Caſtle.

[1] But the Iriſh Annals further inform us, that on Good-Friday following, when the ſaid Earl John was going unarmed and barefoot on Pilgrimage in a Linnen Garment to a Church, (after the uſual manner of thoſe times) he was treacherouſly taken Priſoner by his own People, for a Sum of Mony, and ſo was again delivered to Hugh de Lacy, who brought him over Priſoner to King John: Whereupon he beſtowed on this Hugh the Earldom of Ulſter, and the Lordſhip of Connaught for this good Service, which before belonged to the ſaid John de Curcy.

In Camdens Britannia ad finem. John de Curcy treacherouſly taken Priſoner by his own Men.

A

As for Eccleſiaſtical Affairs of this Year, [2] the Holy Land being now almoſt all loſt, the Pope wrote an earneſt Epiſtle to the Archbiſhops and Biſhops of England to contribute a Fortieth part of their Eccleſiaſtical Revenues to the Relief thereof; and to take care that the Clerks in every Dioceſs did the ſame; alſo the * Maſter of the Hoſpital of Jeruſalem wrote a lamentable Epiſtle to the Prior and his Brethren in England, moving them very earneſtly for Relief, and that they would induce the King and Great Men to aſſiſt them; [3] then the Pope reflecting ſeriouſly upon their ſad and dangerous Condition, ſent a Cardinal Legate to the Kings of France and England, requiring them to cauſe an Aid or Tax to be raiſed in their Dominions for the Relief of the Holy-Land. Upon which meſſage and requeſt the Two Kings conſented to give the Fortieth part of all their Revenues for one Year, and the King of England would have it levied on all his Revenues, and on the Ward-Lands and Eſcheats in his Hands; and farther Commanded, that all Laymen of his Dominions ſhould Contribute a Fortieth part of all their Rents as an Alms for the Relief of the Holy Land. [3] Whereupon Geoffrie Fitz Peter, then Chief Juſticiary of England, wrote to all the Sheriffs of England, to admoniſh and induce the Earls, Barons and others, in every of their Sheriffwicks, to give a Fortieth part as aforeſaid, and to Collect it from the Earls, Barons, Knights, and Freeholders, and cauſe their Names, with thoſe of the Cities and Towns, together with the Sums that each of them were to Pay, to be ſet down, and return'd by every Sheriff to the Temple at London; much after the ſame manner as our Briefs for Fire or other Charities are at this Day. Therefore you muſt obſerve that This was no Tax, but only a Voluntary Contribution.

[4] Alſo the ſame Year Euſtace, Abbot of Flaye in Normandy, came over into England, and here finding a great Prophanation of the Lords-Day in keeping of Markets, and doing other ſervile Works, He went from City to City, and from Town to Town, Preaching againſt it, pretending no leſs than an Epiſtle from Jeſus Chriſt himſelf, which was ſaid to be found upon the Altar of St. Simeon at Jeruſalem, ſharply reproving the Chriſtians of thoſe Countries, for working on the Lords-Day, and that all the Judgments that had fallen upon them, had been for the breach of this Commandement; which tho' it was but a pious Fraud, yet had then ſo good an effect, that by the Preaching of this Abbot, ſcarce any Man durſt for the future go to Markets, or do any ſervile Work on the Lord's-Day, which was to begin on Saturday at 3 a Clock in the afternoon, and to continue till Sun riſing on Monday morning; being much after the ſame manner as the Jews obſerve their Sabbath at this Day: R. Hoveden has not only given us a Copy of this pretended Epiſtle, but alſo divers ſtories of terrible Judgments which happened to thoſe who preſumed to Work at their Trades after the Hour abovementioned; the Truth of which Relations, tho' they happened in this Author's own time, I ſhall leave to the Reader's diſcretion to believe as he thinks good.

Anno Dom. MCCII.

[5] King John remaining ſtill in Normandy, kept his Chriſtmas at Argenton, and in Lent following near the Caſtle of Guleton, there was alſo not long after an Interview between him and the King of France. But Nicholas Trivet places it between Vernon and the Iſle of Andeli, where the French King ſeeking freſh occaſions of Quarrel, to break the Peace, which he had ſo lately ſolemnly Ratified and Sworn to, is ſaid to have ſummoned the King of England to appear at Paris 15 Days after Eaſter, there to anſwer concerning the Dukedom of Aquitain and Earldom of Poictou: But Matt. Paris is more particular in this Affair, and relates, that the King of France retaining a mortal hatred againſt King John, did then Demand no leſs than a Reſtitution of all the Territories, which he at that time held on that ſide the Sea, to Arthur Duke of Bretaign; In which relation I doubt the Author is miſtaken as to Normandy, ſince he never had demanded that Dutchy in any of the former Treaties, and beſides the French King then held a great part of it by King John's late conceſſion.

[5] M. P. An Interview between the Kings of France and England, where the former again picks a Quarrel with the latter. The King of France makes unreaſonable demands from King John.

But I do not find any Engliſh Author to give ſo particular an account of the Reaſon of this ſudden Alteration of the King of France, as * Ralph, Abbot of Coggeſhal in his Manuſcript Chronicle, where under this Year, he Relates, that the Peace having been for ſome time well obſerved between the Kings of France and England, the former took occaſion to break it on this pretence; King John had lately made War upon Hughle Brun Earl of March, and his Brother the Earl of Engoleſme, becauſe they had begun with him, and defied him; but theſe Lords, being too weak to reſiſt the King, thereupon complained to King Philip, as their Sovereign, or Chief Lord; wherefore King Philip admoniſhed King John to forbear, and to make Peace with them, to which he not thinking fit to yield, King Philip ſummoned the Nobility of France, and among them King John himſelf, as Duke of Aquitain, and Earl of Anjou, to appear at Paris within 14 Days after Eaſter, and there undergo the Judgment of his Court, as that of his Supreme Lord, for the Injuries done to the Two Noblemen above mentioned; upon this the King of England anſwered, that he was alſo Duke of Normandy, and as ſuch, was not at all obliged to appear at Paris, but only on the Borders of his Dutchy, as had been antiently agreed upon between the Dukes of Normandy and King's of France; to which King Philip replied, that it was not Juſt, that he ſhould looſe his Right, as Supreme Lord of Aquitain, becauſe the ſame Man was alſo Duke of Normandy; wherefore the Quarrel between theſe Two Princes daily increaſing, upon this as well as other occaſions, the King of France's Court being again aſſembled, adjudged the King of England to have forfeited all his Right to his Territories in France, becauſe he had for a long time refuſed to perform the Services due for them. But whither this Judgment of the Eſtates of France preceeded this Treatie, or followed it, I ſhall not Determine; but it ſeems moſt probable, (as Mezaray in his Abridgment of the French Hiſtory relates) that after the breaking up of the late Treaty at Gaileon, (as you have heard) King Philip having his Deſign already formed, Summoned King John to appear at his Court, there to Anſwer not only to the Complaints of of Earl Hugh le Brun, but alſo of his Nephew Arthur, for the Countries above-mentioned. [1] But when ever this Arreſt or Sentence of the Peers of France was given againſt King John, it is certain, that upon his refuſal to grant theſe Demands, the Treaty broke off, and they parted highly incens'd againſt each other, which the King of France ſufficiently expreſſed by Invading the King of England's Territories the next Day, and razing to the Ground the ſtrong Caſtle of Butevant, and then marching further, took the Town of Ougi with the Caſtle of Lymir, and many other Places: He alſo beſieged the Caſtle of Radford, or Ratpont, (as Matt. Paris calls it) 8 Days, but hearing of King John's approach, He marched off; and a few Days after turned all his Forces againſt Gorney, and breaking down the head of a large Pool which lay above the Town, a great part of the Walls were overthrown by the violence of the Water, ſo that the Garriſon retiring, the King took the Town without oppoſition. Then returning to Paris, he appointed certain Tutors or Governors for Duke Arthur, and aſſigned him 200 Knights or Horſemen, for his Guard, who were alſo to go with him into Poictou, and help him to ſubdue thoſe Territories; but as he was marching thither in a Grand Military Pomp, it was told them that Queen Eleanor was in Mirabel, which was but a weak Garriſon; therefore turning all their Forces thither, they beſieged the Caſtle, and it not being able to hold out, they ſoon compelled the outward Caſtle to ſurrender: But the Queen and ſome few of the principal Soldiers retiring into a ſtrong inward Tower, they could not ſo ſoon take that; but therefore laying cloſe Siege to it, almoſt all the Noblemen and Knights of Poictou, and principally Hugh le Brun Earl of March, (whoſe Spouſe King John had lately married,) and was therefore his declared Enemy came to Duke Arthur's aſſiſtance, and all together made ſo great an Army, that they were very like to take the Place; but before they did take it, the Queen being put to a great ſtreight ſent Meſſengers to the King her Son, earneſtly deſiring him to come ſpeedily to her Relief; he thereupon marching Night and Day, arrived ſooner than could be expected, and the Iſſue of the matter was, that the French and Poictovins left the Siege to give him Battle. But the King put them to flight, and preſſed ſo cloſe upon them, that he entred the outward Caſtle with them, where there was a ſharp conflict; but it was ſoon ended by the Courage of the Engliſh. In this Fight 200 French Knights were taken Priſoners, with Duke Arthur himſelf, and moſt of the Nobles of Poictou and Anjou, who being put into Fetters, were ſent away in Carts, ſome of them into Normandy, and others into England, there to be kept cloſe Priſoners; but as for Duke Arthur, he was ſent to Falaiſe, and there kept under a ſtrict Guard. In the mean time the King of France had beſieged the Caſtle of Archer, and battered it Fifteen Days with his Engines; but hearing of Duke Arthur's misfortune, he raiſed the Siege, and returning to Paris, did nothing more that Year.

He returns to Paris, and appoints Tutors and a Guard for D. Arthur, who thereupon marches into Poictou, and beſieges Mirabel Caſtle, wherein the Q. Dowager being in it.

Arthur is ſent to Falaiſe to be there kept.

Anno Dom. MCCII.

[2] Sometime after, King John going to Falaiſe, cauſed his Nephew Arthur to be brought before him, and gave him many good words, promiſing him great Honours, if he would quit the King of France, and adhere to him, as his Lord and Uncle; but he anſwered him diſdainfully, and with Threats demanded the Kingdom of England, and all the Dominions King Richard died poſſeſſed of, as his Right by Inheritance, and ſwore he ſhould never enjoy Peace unleſs he reſtored them; King John very much incenſed at his high Demands, ſent him to Rouen to be kept cloſe Priſoner in the New Tower, under the Cuſtody of Robert de Viepont, where he ſuddenly vaniſhed, tho' by what means is unknown; Matt. Paris adds, That it were well, that it had not been as envious Fame reports; That is, That he were not made away by his Uncle's Orders, which tho' he will not ſpeak out, he plainly inſinuates.

[*] M. P. ib. The K. goes to Falaiſe, and tries by fair Words and Promiſes to bring over his Nephew Arthur to his Intereſt, but being repulſed, is ſo incenſ'd, that he ſent him Priſoner to Rouen. Where he ſuddenly vaniſhes, being ſuppoſed to be made away by the K's Orders

A farther Relation of King John's cruel Intentions againſt this young Prince, before he was made away.

But I cannot here omit, what Radulph de Coggeſhal further relates concerning this Unfortunate young Prince; who whilſt he remain'd Priſoner at Falaiſe, the Nobles of Bretaigne and Anjou made great offers for his Liberty, but being refuſed, combin'd afreſh againſt King John; wherefore his Counſellors ſeeing the great Conſtancy of the Britiſh Nobility, who would never be at reſt ſo long as he was alive, or in a Capacity to Govern, they upon this adviſed the King to deprive him of his Eyes and Teſticles, thereby to render him uncapable of Government, or Procreation; wherefore being provoked as well by the Stubborneſs of his Nephew, as the Obſtinacy of his Adherents, he yielded at laſt, that this cruel Advice ſhould be put in Execution, which being committed to Three of the King's Truſty Servants to ſee it perform'd, Two of them abhorring ſuch Cruelty, ſlipt aſide out of the way; but the Third going to Falaiſe, and delivering his Meſſage to Hubert de Burgh the King's Chamberlain, and then Conſtable of that Caſtle, he was highly concerned, as was alſo the whole Garriſon, at this barbarous Sentence, whilſt the Poor Prince could only with Tears bewail his Misfortune; yet at laſt being tranſported with Rage, he with his own hands fell upon him who had brought this Cruel Meſſage, and as they were grappling together, Hugh de Burgh and the Guards ran in and parted them; and ſo putting the Man out of the Room, they not only abſolutely refuſed to execute his Orders, but Comforted, and appeaſed the young Prince, as well as they could.

[3] Id. ib. Hugh de Burgh gives out that D. Arthur is Dead, and the Reaſon of making that Report

Yet Hugh the Conſtable, to mitigate the King's Diſpleaſure, as alſo to take away the Hopes of the Noblemen his Adherents, cauſed it to be diſperſed throughout the Province, that Duke Arthur was dead, by the ſevere Execution of the King's Sentence; ſo that the Bells rung out for him in all Places; but this ſad News was ſo far from appeaſing the Bretaigns, that they were rather the more provoked, Swearing, That for the future, they would never deſiſt from making War upon the King of England, who had commanded ſo horrid a piece of Cruelty to be Executed upon his own Nephew; ſo that to appeaſe them, thoſe that kept Duke Arthur, were forced to tell them truly, that he was ſtill alive; but at laſt the King thinking he ſhould have no quiet ſo long as he lived, (for King Philip and the Bretaigns, ſtill preſs'd for his Delivery) reſolved to diſpatch him privately, ſo ſoon as he was removed to Rouen; ſo that that no Man can certainly tell to this Day how he came by his Death. Anno Dom. MCCII.

But ſince ſome of the French, as well as of our own Writers, have taken upon them to give a more particular Account of the Death of this Unfortunate young Prince, I ſhall give you their Relation of it; without paſſing my word for its Certainty, ſince by the very Circumſtances of the Story, it appears, that very few were truſted with the Secret: But they ſay, that [4] King John ſollicited ſome of his Confidents, and in particular William de Bray, to Murther his Nephew; but none would undertake it, and this very Perſon plainly told the King, He was a Gentleman, and not an Hangman; wherefore the King conſidering the Importance of the Affair, and the great Miſchief and Reproach, that the Diſcovery of it might bring upon him, reſolved to truſt as few with the Knowledge of it as he could; wherefore coming one Night in a Boat to the Foot of the Tower of the Caſtle at Rouen, where Duke Arthur was kept Priſoner, he preſently ordered him to be brought down and put into the Boat; whereupon the Prince apprehending his approaching Fate by his Uncle's Silence, preſently abating his former Fierceneſs, flung himſelf at his Feet, in hopes to obtain Mercy; but the Cruel King without ſaying any thing farther to him, preſently drew his Sword and run him ſeveral times through the Body, till he had diſpatch'd him: Then carrying the Corps ſome Leagues down the Stream, they flung it into the River Seine; to give ſome colour to the Report, they had cauſed to be ſpread abroad, that this Prince thinking to eſcape out of a Window of a Tower, (which ſtood over the River) had fallen into it, and ſo was drown'd.

But [5] the Annals of Margan, printed at Oxford, give us ſomewhat a different Account of the manner of King John's making away with his Nephew, to this Effect; That ſome time after his Impriſonment, the King being much in Drink, came to the Caſtle of Rouen, and there murther'd him with his own hands, and then cauſing a great Stone to be tied about his Dead Corps, had it caſt into the River, out of which not long after it being drag'd by a Fiſherman's Net, it was known by ſome, and privately burried in the Abbey-Church of St. Mary des Prez.

[5] Script. Ang. Vol. 2. Another account of it, from the Annals of Margan.

All which not only differs from the French Relation, but ſeems alſo very improbable; for Rouen being within a few Years after in the hands of the French, they would certainly have very well rewarded that Man, who had found, and ſo charitably Buried that Prince's Body, whereas it was never known to this Day what became of it: But to return to our Hiſtory.

[1] King John not long after this horrid Action, went over into England, where, as ſoon as he arrived, he would needs be again ſolemnly Crown'd at Canterbury, on the 14th of April, by the hands of Hubert, Archbiſhop of that City, which I ſuppoſe was done to confirm his Title to the Crown, his Competitor being now taken out of the way; but it was to little purpoſe, for the King returning ſoon after into Normandy, it was quickly divulg'd throughout all France, that he had murther'd his Nephew; wherefore the Eſteem not only of Foreigners, but the Affections of many of his own People, on this Account, ever after turn'd againſt him, and that deſervedly, for for tho' it was uncertain, how that Prince came by his Death, yet it is plain, it could never have been acted without his Order and Contrivance; and indeed, whoever conſiders this King's Actions after this, will find them ſo byaſs'd by Luxury, Falſhood, and Cruelty, as if God had wholly given him up to a Reprobate Mind. But it is high time to ſee what was the Conſequence of this Cruel Murther, in which the King was very much diſappointed of the Advantages he propoſed to reap by it. For as ſoon as the Report of Duke Arthur's Death came to the Ears of the Dutcheſs of Conſtance his Mother, [2] ſhe immediately went to the King of France, and there made loud Complaints of the unheard of Violence and Cruelty committed by King John upon his Nephew, and her Son; whereupon King Philip aſſembling his Parliament, or Great Council, then conſiſting of all the Peers and Chief Noblemen of France, they ſummoned King John, as Duke of Normandy, to appear before them, and anſwer this Accuſation, at a Day appointed; Upon which, as [3] Matt. Paris relates, (for the French Hiſtorians omit this Circumſtance) the King ſent Euſtace Biſhop of Ely, and Hubert de Burgh, as his Ambaſſadors, to let that King know, That he would willingly appear at his Court, provided he might have ſafe Conduct for his Going and Coming; To which King Philip anſwered with a ſevere Look, He may come in Peace; But the Biſhop replied, And may he return ſo too? But all the King of France would ſay to this, was, Yes, if the Sentence of his Peers permit him; But the Ambaſſadors ſtill inſiſting to have a ſafe Conduct for their Maſter; it ſo incenſed King Philip, that he ſwore, By all the Saints of France, not otherwiſe then according to the Judgment of my Court: Then when the Biſhop laid open the great Dangers that might happen to King John by his coming; ſaying, 'That the Duke of Normandy 'could not attend his Court, but that the King of England muſt be 'there alſo, for one and the ſame Perſon was both King and Duke; 'and that the Baronage of England would not permit it, tho' the 'King himſelf ſhould be willing to come, ſince there appeared ſo 'imminent a Danger either of his Death or Impriſonment at leaſt; to which the King preſently reply'd, And pray, My Lord Biſhop, what is that to me? It is very well known, that the Duke of NORMANDY is my Vaſſal, and if he would conquer ENGLAND, and thereby acquire a Higher Title, ought his Capital Lord to loſe any thing by that? To which I find the Ambaſſadors did not make any Reply; whether becauſe they could not, or elſe would not urge the Matter any further, I will not determine: But to come to the Proceſs and Sentence of this Council, in this great Caſe.

All our [4] own, as alſo the French Hiſtorians agree, That upon King John's Failure of appearing before the Great Court of Peers of France, above-mentioned, he was for his Contempt condemn'd of Treaſon and Murther; and [5] Paulus Æmilius has Recorded the Sentence it ſelf to this Effect, That John Duke of Normandy, being Unmindful of his Oath to King Philip his Lord, had Murthered his Elder Brother's Son, being an Homager to that Crown, and that within the Seigniory of France; whereupon he is judged a Traytor, and, as an Enemy to the Crown of France, to forfeit all his Seigniories which he held by Homage, and that Re-entry be made by Force of Arms. Thus by a Partial tial and Undue Sentence, the King and Peers of France, being at that very time in open Hoſtility with King John, condemned him, tho Abſent, Unheard, and neither Confeſſing, nor Convicted of the Crime, nor had they indeed any Lawful Cognizance of it: But the French having then power ſufficient to put this Sentence in Execution, and England labouring many Years under the Government of this violent Prince, and his weaker Son Henry III. that was always Unſettled, it was no wonder that the Kings of France ſtill kept by Force, what they had by Force acquired: But it is time to purſue our Hiſtory, and to ſee how King John carried himſelf, after his return into Normandy, and that King Philip had declared open War againſt him.

Anno Dom. MCCII. The Injuſtice and Illegality of it.

[1] The King kept his Chriſtmas at Caen in Normandy, where laying aſide all thoughts of Warlike Enterprizes, he Feaſted magnificently with his Queen, and lay in Bed with her every day till Noon: After Eaſter the King of France raiſed an Army, wherewith he took many of his Caſtles; the Places of greateſt Strength he kept up; all the others he levell'd with the Ground. And when King John was told, what King Philip had done, he only reply'd, Let him alone, whatever he now takes, I will quickly have again from him; But when the Engliſh Earls, Barons, and Noblemen, heard this, and obſerved his Inſuperable Sloath, they degred leave to go home; and ſo left but very few Knights or Military Men to tarry with him in Normandy: As for his part, Hugh de Gourney ſurrender'd to the King of France the ſtrong Caſtle of Montfort, with the entire Honour belonging to it, whilſt King John continued all this time, as he thought, ſecure at Rouen; inſomuch that People ſaid, ſure he was Bewitch'd; for he was as Brisk and Merry, as if he had loſt nothing, nor any ill had happened to him.

Anno Dom. MCCIII. [1] M. P. 209. The K. lies uxoriouſly with his Qu. till Noon, whilſt the K. of Fr. invades Normandy, and takes many Caſtles and Places of Strength.

Then the King of France proceeded farther, and ſat down before the Town and Caſtle of Ruil, within the Territory of Rouen with a mighty Force; But Robert Fitz-Walter, and Saher de Quincy, in whoſe Cuſtody it was, baſely delivered up that ſtrong Fortreſs, as ſoon as ever he appeared before it; but King Philip abhoring their Cowardize, commanded them to be kept cloſe Priſoners at Compeigne, where they remain'd in Fetters till they could pay their Ranſoms: So true is that Maxim, That Princes, though they love the Treaſon, yet hate the Traytors.

Id. ib.

[2] Normandy, and the King's other Tranſmarine Dominions, being thus left Naked and without Defence, the King of France paſſed thro divers Provinces without any Oppoſition; and reduced ſeveral Caſtles to his Obedience; He alſo about that time beſieged that ſtrong Caſtle on the Rock of Andeli on Seine, which King Richard had built from the Ground, and call'd it Caſtle Galliard; but that being defended by the admirable Valour and Fidelity of Roger de Lacy (to whom the Cuſtody thereof was committed) King Philip prevail'd little againſt it, ſo that all he could do, was, to block up the Place, and hinder any Proviſions from being brought to it; in this Juncture ſome Normans revolted from the King of England, whilſt others, tho feignedly, adher'd to him.

[3] Id. ib. The K. returns into England, and picks Quarrels with his Nobility for Deserting him, and exacts a great Tax from the Clergy and Laity.

[3] The King at last seeing his own weakness, and that he was left without any Forces, took Shipping, and landed at Portsmouth on the 6th of December: where he was no sooner arrived, but he fell to picking of Quarrels with his Earls and Barons, pretending, that they had Deserted, and left him amongst his Enemies, beyond Sea; and that through their Neglect he had lost his Castles and Territories there; wherefore he took from them the Seventh part of their Moveables, without their Consents; neither did he in this Tax spare even the Conventual or Parochial Churches; for he had (says Matt. Par.) those who severely executed his Rapines, viz. Hubert, Archbishop of Canterbury, upon the Clergy; and upon the Laicks, Geoffry Fitz-Peter, Justiciary of England, who spared no body in this Imposition.

[4] Id ib. The K of Fr. during K. John's absence again invades his Dominions, and Summons several Cities and Towns, on pretence that they were deserted by their Prince.

They obtain one Years Truce to gain Relief, yet surrender before that time is expired.

[4] Then the King of France taking advantage of King John's absence came with a strong Force before several other Cities and Castles of his Dominions; declared to the Citizens and Castellans, that King John had Cowardly deserted them; and that he being chief Lord over those Countries, he was obliged in that Case to preserve the Fee, from Injury and Damage; and therefore friendly required them to receive him for their Lord, seeing they had no Other: But in case they would not submit to his fair Proposal, he swore, if they fought against him, and were subdued, he would either Hang or Flea them all alive. At length, after many Disputes, they unanimously consented to give Hostages for one Year's Truce; and if the King of England relieved them not within that time, they would recognize him for their Lord, and render their Cities and Castles to him. Yet as Nicholas Trivet better informs us, many of the chief Cities in Normandy, as Falaise, Constance, Bayeux, and others, being by Force, or Treachery, quickly reduced under the King of France's Power, King John had nothing left there, except the City of Rouen. Thus we may observe the Policy of the King of France, who urged King John's Desertion of that Province, (tho' forced to it by himself) as a sufficient Reason for their quitting their Prince, and transferring their Allegiance to himself, as their Sovereign.

Anno Dom. MCCIV.

[5] M.P. The K. calls a Council at Oxford, where was granted an Aid of two Marks and ½ on each Knight's Fee.

* Colloquium.

[5] The King continuing still in England, kept his Christmas at Canterbury, where Hubert the Archbishop entertain'd him all the time of that Solemnity: But when it was over, he removed to Oxford, and on the Second of January, He and all the Great Men of England met in a *Common Council, or Parliament, where was granted to the King a Military Aid of Two Marks and an Half of every Knight's Fee; nor did the Bishops, Abbots, or Ecclesiasticks depart without promising the same. From whence we may observe, that the King was now in somewhat a better temper, then when he first came over, and would not again venture to Tax the Nation without its Consent: But notwithstanding this great Aid now given him, I cannot find, that he did any thing worth speaking of with it, either for the Regaining of what he had lost beyond the Seas, or so much as keeping what was left, but spent his time Idly and Luxuriously at Home.

[1] Then

[1] Then after Midlent, he sent the Archbishop of Canterbury, and Bishop of Norwich and Ely, as also William Earl Mareschal, and the Earl of Leicester, as Ambassadors to the King of France, to sound his Inclinations to a Peace, and to propose some new Terms of Agreement, if he would receive them; but King Philip being puffed up, (because all things had succeeded according to his desires) would agree to nothing; for being then assured that Duke Arthur was Dead, he demanded Eleanor his Sister to be given in Marriage to his younger Son, with all the Territories in France: [2] But this being thought unreasonable, was denied; at which King Philip was so incensed that again entering Normandy, he took the City of Rouen, after a long Siege, by the Surrender of the Citizens, and that meerly for want of sending them timely assistance; for the Military Men and Burghers had been ever since the beginning of June under a Truce with the French King, and had entered into divers * Articles with him, and given Forty Hostages for the Performance of the same; to this Effect, That if the King of England did not make Peace with the King of France, according to his liking, or could not remove him from the Place where he was, (lying then before Rouen) within Thirty days, they would deliver the City. These Articles are long, and contain divers things to be performed on King Philip's Part, the Chief of which were, That the City should enjoy all its antient Franchises and Privileges; but as Mezeray very well observes in his French History, This Precaution proved as feeble against absolute Power, as Paper is against Iron; for so soon as ever he had taken it, he demolished its Walls, and would not permit them to be built again; as for the rest, I refer the Curious Reader to the Articles at large; But how this City came to hold out till after Christmas, when it was obliged by the Agreement above-mentioned, to surrender (if not relieved) within 30 Days, I cannot tell, unless our Historians mistake, and make it to have been surrender'd after the time it really was.

[3] Then the Castle, on the Rock of Andeli, was, after almost a Year's Siege, taken, a great Part of the Walls falling down by the Foundations having been undermin'd; besides which, the Besieged wanted Victuals to the last Extremity; but before the Enemy could Enter, Roger de Lacy, Constable of Chester, then Governor, scorning to make Conditions for himself, and resolving either to break thro the Enemy's Guards, or die, he bravely, with Sword in hand, together with divers of his stout Companions, (when they had scarce Meat left for one Meal) mounting their Horses, sallied out, and killing many of the French, maintained an obstinate Fight, before they were taken: After the Surrender of the Castle, Roger was carried into France; yet for the great Courage and Bravery he shewed in the Defence of it, the King commanded he should be a Prisoner at large; this Prince having so much Generosity as to make a Distinction between a Gallant Man, and such Cowards as Robert Fitz-Walter, and Saher de Quincy, who surrendering the Castle of Rhil without striking a Stroke, were clapt in Irons for their Pains; and indeed this Unfortunate Gentleman was worthy to have served a better Master. Some time after this, the Castle of Arches and Vernueil being also render'd, all Normandy was reduced under the Power

[4] But as for the War in Poictou and Aquitain, Ralph de Coggeſhal tells us, that it was carried on with various ſucceſſes, ſince a part of thoſe Countries being under the Command of Robert de Turnham (who had the better of his Enemies in moſt Conflicts) ſtill obeyed the King of England, aſſiſted by Savary de Malleon, who being lately releaſed out of the King of France's Cuſtody, faithfully ſerved King John againſt his Enemies; whilſt another greater and ſtronger party under Hugh le Bruin Earl of March, and William de Roches, who (as the French Hiſtorians relate) having quitted King John, and taken King Philip's ſide, put him not long after in Poſſeſſion of the whole Countries of Anjou, Main, and Tourain, (except ſome few ſtrong Places) alſo Henry Clement Marechal of France Conquered all Poitou with the Cities of Niort, Tonars, and Rochel.

[5] Matt. Paris is very ſhort in this Relation, and only ſays, that the Caſtellans and Citizens who were Subjects to the King of England beyond the Seas, being now reduced to great ſtreights, ſent over to let him know their Condition, that the time of the Truce was almoſt expired, and that they muſt either deliver up the Cities and Caſtles, or permit their Hoſtages to be deſtroyed; whereupon the King told their Meſſengers that they muſt expect no Help from him, and therefore left it to them to do what they thought fit; thus for want of Relief all Normandy, Tourain, Anjou, and Poitou, came under the Dominion of the King of France, except the Places abovementioned.

The K. for all this bad Succeſs ſpends his time voluptuouſly; yet N. Trivet excuſes him.

The King knew all this, yet ſpent his time with his Queen wholly in Pleaſures, as if in her he had enjoyed all the World; only Nicholas Trivet does in ſome part excuſe him, ſaying, that King John diſcouraged by ſo many diſaſters, could not raiſe an Army ſufficient either to defend thoſe Countries, or to recover what he had loſt; for his own Subjects being now generally diſcontented, refuſed to fight for him, and to be learnt by certain (tho' dear bought) Experience, that the true Power and Authority of Princes conſiſts in the Love and Obedience of their Subjects, and when that is gone, a King that does not wholly depend upon an Army of Mercenaries, may bid farewell to any good Succeſs.

The Duke of Brabant and E. of Bologn join in Confederacy to Invade England.

Nor can I omit what Raul. de Coggeſhal further relates, that the Duke of Lovain and Earl of Boloign, having agreed all their old Quarrels, now joined in Confederacy with the French King to invade England, and that King Philip alſo Swore to follow them with his Army, within a Month after their arrival there; by which Reports the whole Kingdom was very much diſturbed, fearing, leſt that King through the Aſſiſtance of ſo many Potent Princes ſhould Conquer it; yet for all thoſe Threats, this intended Invaſion was never put in Execution.

[1] M. W. The death of Eleanor the Q. Mother, and her Character.

Nothing more remarkable happened this Year, except [1] the death of the Queen Mother Eleanor, a ſtirring Princeſs, and of a high and intriguing Spirit, who had met with various Viciſſitudes of Fortune; for having been repudiated by Lewis King of France, ſhe then married the young Duke of Anjou, who by the Acceſſion of of the Crown of England and Dutchy of Normandy, was the greater Prince; but she falling afterwards to ill Terms with him, was kept a Prisoner till his death; yet her Two Sons, King Richard and John succeeding, she had for Fifteen Years lived in great Honour and Respect, being a most indulgent Mother, but a partial Grandmother to Duke Arthur, out of Hatred and Emulation to his Mother, the Dutchess of Bretaigne, as hath been already observed.

Anno Dom. MCCII.

[2] And now, since neither England nor France affords us any thing else this Year worth noting, we will look as far as the utmost Parts of Europe, where the People of Constantinople having lately deposed their Emperour Isaac, and put him in Prison, the French and Venetians Sailed towards Constantinople, with no less than 40000 Men, and made themselves Masters first of the Haven, and then of the City, altho' there were more than 60000 Soldiers within it; then they delivered Isaac the late Emperor out of Prison, who being too old to Govern, they at his Request made his Son Alexis Emperor, the late Tyrant Alexis (of the same Name) with his Brother Theodorus Lascaris escaping over the Walls, retired to Adrianople; but whilst the French Army Wintered about Constantinople, and that the new Emperor endeavoured to satisfie them with the Pay he had promised them, the People upon whom he had imposed great Taxes for that end, first mutinied, and then Rebelled, being headed by one Alexis Ducas, Great Master of the Wardrobe, who seizing upon the new Emperor, strangled him with his own Hands, and then having caused himself to be Proclaimed Emperor, he mustered up what Forces he could, and marched with them out of the City against the Franks, who not only beat them back into the Town, but also besieged the City of Constantinople, which after Sixty Days was taken by storm; great part of it being also set on Fire, was burnt to the Ground, and the Slaughter was so great that the Streets ran down with Blood.

[2] Vid. Murray's French History under this and the former Years.

The Em. Isaac being depos'd by the People of Constantinople, the Fr. and Venetians Invade the City and take it, and makes his Son Alexis Emperor.

Against whom the People Rebelling, he is strangled. The Franks, thereupon again besiege the City and take it.

Then the conquering Army chose Twelve of their principal Commanders, to whom they committed the Power of Electing an Emperor, on this Condition, that if he were a Frank, the Patriarch should be a Venetian, and so vice versa; upon which, tho' Boniface of Montferrat seemed most worthy of that Dignity, yet because he was not grateful to the Venetians, they rejected him, and chose Baldwin Earl of Flanders Emperor, and Thomas Maurofoli, a Noble Venetian, Patriarch. This Empire was of small Extent, by reason that the Marquess of Montferrat had all Thessaly bestowed upon him, with the Title of King, and the Venetians made themselves Masters of Candie, as also divers Greek Princes possessed themselves of several Cities and Provinces in Asia-minor, under the Title of Emperors, as were that of Trebisond, upon the Euxine Sea, and that of Nice in Bithynia, besides some other Principalities of less Extent.

The Franks Commanders chose Baldwin E. of Flanders Emperor.

This Empire of the Franks at Constantinople continued for near Fifty Years, and then the Greek Emperor of Trebisond recovered it, together with all the Adjacent Countries, and thus it continued the Capital City of the Greek Empire, till it was taken by the Turks. I have been the more particular in this Relation, because it gives us an account of some of the greatest and most remarkable Revolutions that ever happened in so short a time, and shews us how much the Greeks were then degenerated from the Valour and Simplicity of their fore-fathers; but to return again to our History.

[3] M. P. King John keeps a short Christmas at Tewksbury, and the occasion of it.

[3] This Year King John kept his Christmas at Tewksbury, but the Festival was very short, lasting but one Day; I suppose because few, if any of his Noblemen (being then highly discontented with his Arbitrary Government) would attend him: But as Ralph de Coggeshal relates, it was upon the News of Robert de Turnham's (who had hitherto defended great part of Poitou) being taken Prisoner by the King of France's Forces, as also of Bernard d' Acies being taken in the Castle of Loches, which he had hitherto valiantly defended: But at this King John was so provoked, that about Whitsuntide following, he raised a great Army in order to pass the Seas; tho' he was hindred from it by the Archbishop of Canterbury, and William the Earl Mareschal, with divers others of the Nobility, who (as the last mentioned Author tells us) dissuaded the King from this Expedition, setting forth the great Dangers and Inconveniencies that might happen from thence to himself and his Kingdom, being now to trust himself in the midst of his Enemies, without any Place of strength to repair to; and that besides all this, the King of France had a far greater Armie, as being now Master of the whole Country, and therefore it was by no means safe to trust the fickle Poictovins, who were upon every turn wont to conspire against their own Princes; and it was yet more hazardous, in respect that the Earl of Boloigne and his Adherents might in the mean time invade England. But the King was not at all moved with their Remonstrances, and seemed resolved upon this expedition, tho' they fell upon their knees before him, beseeching him not to go, adding further, that if he would not consent to their Request, they would detain him by force; At this the King being put into a great confusion, adjured the Archbishop to give him the best Advice he could, who told him, that the likeliest means he could think on to secure his own Safety as well as Reputation, was to send his Brother the Earl of Salisbury, over together with some others of the Prime Nobility with a powerful Army to join with those Poictovins, who it seems then expected his coming over; whereupon the King making as tho' he hearkned to it, dismist the greatest part of his Noblemen and Knights; many of whom having been put to vast Charges for this Expedition, in Expectance of their going over, cursed the Authors of this Advice; and more especially the Mariners, who brought their Ships from the utmost Parts of the Kingdom to carry them over.

The King being provoked at the French King's success raises another Army in order to go into France; but is dissuaded by Archbishop Hubert, and for what Reasons.

The Archbishop advises the K. to send over his Brother the E. of Salisbury into France with an Army.

[4] Id. ib. The K. seems at first well satisfied with the Advice, but soon after repents, and goes for France himself; but presently returning back, extorts a vast Sum from his Subjects.

[4] Then on a sudden the King seeming to have changed his Resolution, went back to Wincheſter; but at length repenting of what he had done, he returned again to Portsmouth, and having there hired a good many Ships, about the middle of July he went on Board, and with a small Retinue put out to Sea; but again changing his Mind (or perhaps never intending otherwise from the beginning) he came back, and landing at Warham in Dorsetshire, he immedi-immediately after his Return extorted a vaſt Sum of Money from all his Subjects as well Eccleſiaſtics as Laics, upon pretence they had refuſed to follow him beyond Sea, that he might recover his loſt Dominions. Anno. Dom. MCCV.

This was the Second time he had thus ſqueezed Money from the Nation by his abſolute Power, without their Conſents; and was one of thoſe Grievances which afterwards caus'd the Barons to take up Arms againſt him; and was alſo one of thoſe particular Heads that are provided againſt by his great Charter, which he was afterwards forced to grant them: Nor does this Year afford any thing conſiderable in Foreign Parts, only as [5] our Author relates, the Earl of Salisbury, paſſed this Summer over into France with a ſtrong Body of Men, and tho' there was a great deal of Money beſtowed in this Expedition, yet little or nothing was done with it; for the ſtrong and almoſt Impregnable Caſtle of Coinon was taken about Midſummer, and in it Hugh de Burgh the King's Chamberlain, the valiant Governor was taken Priſoner, who had defended it for near a Year together, againſt the King of France his Forces, and was now dangerouſly wounded. [5] Rad. de Coggeſhal.

[1] But tho' this Year proves barren as to Civil Affairs, yet it affords us enough of Eccleſiaſtical; for now Hubert Archbiſhop of Canterbury deceaſed a few Days before the King's going laſt to Sea, he was a Prelate of a large and magnificent Spirit, tho' of no great learning, being more addicted to Civil and Military employment, than to the buſineſs of his Function; having been chief Juſticiary and Chancellor, as alſo the Pope's Legate, during great part of the late King Richard's Reign, and was continued Chancellor under King John, until the time of his death; At which the King was not a little glad, having ever ſince his oppoſing his late intended Expedition, ſuſpected his holding private Intelligence with the King of France; but I rather believe, that it was without any juſt cauſe, and that this Archbiſhop as well as others of the Nobility oppoſed that Deſign, not out of any good will to the French, but either for the Reaſons they then gave him, or elſe becauſe they were ſatisfied, that the recovery of the King's Dominions beyond Sea, would be a matter of greater Charge and Trouble than any real Advantage to England. [1] M. B. p. 212. Hubert Archbiſhop of Canterbury dieth of an Ulcer, or Fiſtula, attended with a Feaver.

But the ſudden Deceaſe of this Archbiſhop mightily altered the State of Civil as well as Eccleſiaſtical Affairs; for tho' the News of his death was at firſt (as I ſaid) very grateful to the King, who had of late lookt upon him as his Enemy, yet had he very little reaſon to rejoyce, ſince the double Election of a new Archbiſhop by ſome of the Monks * which not long after followed, produced great Diſturbances to him and the Kingdom, concerning which the ſame Author gives us this account; that before this Archbiſhop was buried, ſome of the Junior Monks of Canterbury privately choſe one Reginald, then their Sub-Prior, Archbiſhop, without the King's Knowledge, and preſently ſent him away to Rome, to procure his Confirmation: But when he came there, and had ſhewed the Pope and Cardinals the Inſtruments of his Election, and Petitioned him to Confirm it; he told the Sub-prior, he would conſider of that till he had more certainty of the manner

The Junior Monks of Canterbury privately choſe Reginald their Sub-prior, A-Bp. whom they ſend preſently to Rome, to obtain the Pope's Confirmation.

Of

Anno Dom. MCCV. of his Election; but that which quite imbroiled this Affair, was, that tho' the Monks had obliged their Sub-prior to Secrecy, yet ſo ſoon as this vain glorious Monk had got into Flanders, he divulged the Errand he went about, telling every body that he was going to Rome to get the Election Confirmed, ſhewing the Inſtrument of the Convent, under their Seal; of which they having notice, and that he had broke his Oath of ſecrecy, were ſo mightily inſenſed againſt him, that they ſent to the King, deſiring his Licenſe to chooſe a new Archbiſhop; whereupon he gave them free leave, without any Condition, but intimated to them, that if they would chooſe John Biſhop of Norwich, they would do him an acceptable piece of Service, ſo the Monks having unanimouſly choſen him in due Form, the King and he went with all ſpeed to Canterbury, where the next Day the Prior in their preſence, as alſo in that of the Convent, declared John de Gray Biſhop of Norwich, duly elected Archbiſhop; then the Monks placed him in the Archiepiſcopal Throne, and the King preſently put him in Poſſeſſion of the Temporalities that belonged to the Archbiſhoprick; and thus all things reſted till the end of this Year, without the Pope's interpoſing either one way or other.

The Monks being incens'd at the Imprudence of their Sub Prior, crave leave of the K. to chooſe another Archbiſhop, which is granted on condition they would chooſe the B. of Norwich.

Anno Dom. MCCVI.

And now, [2] to avoid making any Breach in this Relation, I ſhall, tho' contrary to my uſual method, begin this Year with Eccleſiaſtical Affairs. At this time fell out that which gave the Pope a fair Pretence to make both theſe Elections void: for [2] the King having kept his Chriſtmas at Oxford, not long after ſent ſome of the Monks of the Church of Canterbury to Rome, to obtain the Pope's Confirmation of the laſt Election of the new Archbiſhop he had recommended; when at the ſame time the Suffragan Biſhops of that Province, ſent alſo their Proctors to Rome, who made a grievous complaint to the Pope, that the Monks had preſumed to chooſe an Archbiſhop without them; when they of common Right and antient Cuſtom ought to have been preſent, and to have agreed with the Monks in their Election; for which they Alledged divers Decrees and Precedents, produced wittneſſes, and exhibited Teſtimonials, that the Suffragans together with the Monks had choſen three Archbiſhops; the Monks on the other Hand affirm'd, that by antient and allowed Cuſtom, and by ſpecial Privilege of divers Popes, they uſed to make Elections without them, which they offer'd to prove by ſufficient Witneſſes; thus this Proceſs continued till the Year following, in the mean time the Allegations on both ſides having been heard, and the Witneſſes examined, the Pope appointed the 21ſt of December for pronouncing Sentence, which proved at laſt in favour of the Monks, as you will find hereafter. But now to return to Civil Affairs.

[1] Id. P. 21.

The K. ſends ſome of the Monks to Rome to obtain the Confirmation of the laſt Election of an A. Bp. whither the Biſhops alſo ſend complaining againſt both Elections as Illegal.

Divers Allegations and Precedents produced in their behalf.

[3] Id. Ib. The K. paſſes over into Fr. where he is aſſiſted by the Poictovins, and takes the Caſtle of Mont-Auban.

[3] On the 25th of June, King John with a great Army took ſhipping at Portſmouth, and on the 9th of July landed at Rochel; the Poictovins were glad of his Arrival, and coming in cheerfully to him, promiſed their Aſſiſtance; then after he had ſubdued a conſiderable part of Poicton, he marched againſt the ſtrong Caſtle of Mont-Auban, which he laid Siege to, and after he had battered it 15 Days with his Engines, took it on the firſt of Auguſt, and then wrote to his Juſtices, Biſhops, and Nobility of England, how many ny Great and Illuſtrious Priſoners, and what Horſe and Arms, and what innumerable Spoils he had taken; after this the Religious Perſons of thoſe parts mediating between the Two Kings, on the Feaſt of All-Saints, they procured a Two Years Truce; and then King John returned into England, and landed at Portſmouth on the 12th of December, and thereby loſt all the Advantages he had ſo lately gained. Anno Dom. MCCVI.

Rigord, (an antient French Hiſtorian) ſays, that King Philip hearing King John was landed at Rochel, rais'd a great Army, and marched into Poictou, and Fortified and Garriſoned Mirabel, Loudun, and other Caſtles, which he held in thoſe Parts, and ſo returned to Paris; and that the Viſcount of Touars being then entered to a Confederacy with King John, it cauſed King Philip to return again into Poictou, and deſtroy the Lands of that Viſcount; and then both Armies being ready to Engage, a Truce was made from the Feaſt of All Saints for Two Years; and after this the King return'd into England, and landed at Portſmouth a little before Chriſtmas. * Hiſt. Franc. Vol. 3. p. 206. The French Hiſtorian's Account of this Year's War.

[4] This Feſtival Soleminity he held at Weſtminſter, where moſt of the Great Men of the Kingdom were preſent; then about Candlemas following, he took a 13th Part of all Men's Moveables, and other Goods, as well of the Prelates, as other Eccleſiaſtics; which made them all to murmur, but none durſt at that time contradict it, only Geoffry, Archbiſhop of York, who would not give his conſent to, but openly oppoſed it, and ſo went away privately out of England, but at his departure he Excommunicated all Invaders of the Goods of the Church, and eſpecially thoſe who ſhould preſume to do it in the Province of York; yet the * Record in the Tower (which you will find in Dr. B's Appendix) ſays expreſly, That this Tax was granted by the Common Advice and Aſſent of the King's Great Council held at Oxford, being given for the Defence of his Kingdom, and the Recovery of his Right beyond the Seas; where you may alſo ſee the manner of Aſſeſſing, Collecting, and Paying into the Exchequer. Anno Dom. MCCVII. [4] M. P. W. C. The K. has another great Tax from both Clergy and Laity. * Par. 8, 9. Johan. M. 3. Dorſ. N. 83. Which yet appears to have been granted by the Advice and Conſent of the Common Council of the Kingdom.

But the Annals of the Abby of Waverly will, under this Year, ſerve very well to Explain this Record, and plainly ſhews That this Tax ſaid to have been Taken, or Extorted by King John, and which Doctor Brady ſuppoſes to have been only granted by the King's Privy-Council, was really given by the general Conſent of the Kingdom, tho' they were not able to help it; I ſhall therefore give you the Relation of this Tranſaction word for word, as it is to be found in thoſe Annals, (viz.) That King John after his Return from beyond Sea, having Summoned the Biſhops, Abbots, Priors, Earls, Barons, and Great Men of the Kingdom, Eight Days after New-years-tide to a Council at London. He there moved the Biſhops, and Abbots, that they would permit the Parſons and Beneficed Clercs of Churches to give him a certain Sum out of their Yearly Revenues; which when the Prelates would by no means agree to, it was further deferr'd to the next Common Council, which was to be held at Oxford, on the Octaves of the Purification of our Lady; where a great Multitude of the Prelates and Great Men of the Kingdom being aſſembled, the King again required of the Biſhops, and This farther made out from the Annals of Waverly. This is alſo confirmed by the Clauſe Roll of this Year, M. 6. Or. wherein is mentioned a Summons to the Magnates or great Men of the Kingdom, to give their Advice concerning thoſe things propos'd from the K. of France.

Anno Dom. MCCVII. and Abbots, what he had demanded of them before: But they all both of Canterbury and York, taking Council together, Unanimously answered, That the Church of England could no ways bear that Burthen, which had never been heard of in all former Ages; Then the King, taking better Advice, wholly released that Demand to them; Yet afterwards it was ordained by the Whole Kingdom, that generally all Men by whatsoever Tenure they held, should swear to the Value both of their Real and Personal Estates, and should pay a Thirteenth Part thereof to the King for the Recovery of his Inheritance in Normandy, and his other Dominions.

From whence, (comparing this Historian with the Record before cited by Dr. B.) it plainly appears, That there was a Great Council held this Year at Oxford, which gave the King a Thirteenth Part of their moveable Goods and Revenues; so that what was levied upon the Laiety, being according to Law, all the Violence that was done, was not to them, but to the Bishops, Abbots, and inferior Clergy, who never consented to it; and how far such a Violence upon the Church could create a Prerogative in the King so to do, I leave to the Doctor to determine. I have been the more Particular in this Relation, to remove the Prejudices and Mistakes of those Modern Writers, who would make us believe that the Kings of England, in those times, could legally by the bare Advice of their Privy-Council, raise what Taxes they pleased upon their Subjects; whereas, if they had seriously considered the words Commune Concilium made use of in this Record, as cited by the Doctor, they would find, that it must relate to the Common Council of the Kingdom held at Oxford, (as it is here related by these Annals) and not to the Privy Council: And tho' it is true, that the King exacted this Tax also of the Clergy, yet all Authors agree, That this was an Abuse of his Prerogative, and therefore there can be no Precedent drawn from it.

The Error of those Writers who suppose that the King might in those Times, by the Advice of his Privy Council, raise what Taxes he pleased.

[1] R. C.

[1] I have no more to note concerning this Taxation; but that the Cistertian Monks were the only Order in England, that were exempted from the Payment of it, (which I suppose, was in consideration of the Wrong he had done them two years agone,) and that the King, upon the Departure of the Archbishop of York beyond the Seas without License, seized upon all his Estate.

As for other Ecclesiastical Affairs done in Foreign Parts, which yet had their Effect and Influence here, the only thing considerable that fell out this Year, was, that [2] at Rome the Pope took upon him to Nominate a New Archbishop of Canterbury, by his own Authority, which was never done by any of his Predecessors; the Occasion and Manner of which being very remarkable, I will here set down. The Monks of that Church, who had been some time before sent to Rome, at last came to a solemn Hearing before the Pope, concerning the late double Election at Canterbury; after which those that stood for Reginald, the Sub-Prior, presented him to the Pope, as being first and duly Elected, whilst the other Party who were for the Bishop of Norwich, would have proved the former Election of the Sub-Prior to be void, as being made by Night without the King's Consent, or that of the Greater or more Discreet Part of the Convent; so that after long Disputes between them, the Pope finding they could not agree, judged both of these Elections to be Uncanonical; wherefore by the Advice of his Cardinals dinals he nulled them both; forbidding, by a definitive Sentence, both the late Elects any more to pretend to the Archiepiscopal Dignity: This being done, he then perſuaded the Monks to chuſe Stephen Langton, an Engliſhman, and Cardinal, for their Archbiſhop; to this at firſt they anſwered, That they could not make a Canonical Election without the Conſent both of the King and their Convent; But the Pope told them, they had in themſelves the full Power of the Church of Canterbury; and that in Elections made at the Apoſtolic See, the Conſent of Princes was not expected; and then commanded all thoſe preſent, being (as he ſaid) a ſufficient Number, in virtue of their Obedience, and under pain of a Curſe, to chuſe him Archbiſhop whom he had appointed for their Father and Paſtor. Upon this, the Monks being afraid of the Sentence of Excommunication, tho' very Unwillingly, and with much Reluctance, gave their Aſſent; only one Monk, Elias de Branlefeild, amongſt them all would not conſent to this Election; However, the Pope Conſecrated Cardinal Langton, Archbiſhop, at Viterbo, on the 17th of June. [3] But Roger of Wendover, (from whom Matt. Paris tranſcribed the greateſt Part of his Hiſtory) according to the Sentiments of the Monks of that Age, endeavours to Juſtifie this Election made at Rome as valid; becauſe (as he relates) King John had bound himſelf by a ſolemn Promiſe to own him for Archbiſhop, whom the Prior, and the Twelve Monks that went with him thither, ſhould agree upon; and that they having now choſen Cardinal Langton, by a general Conſent, only one of them refuſing, therefore the King was obliged to accept of him.

Anno Dom. MCCVII.

The Pope after long Diſputes between the Monks, declares both their Elections void, and then commands them to chuſe Card. Langton Archbiſhop.

The Monks at laſt obey the Pope's command, tho' unwillingly, whereupon the Cardinal is Conſecrated A. Bp. by the Pope himſelf.

[3] Id. p. 222. Roger of Wendover juſtifies this Election, & upon what Grounds.

But I do very much doubt the Truth of this Relation; for in the firſt place it plainly appears, by what the Monks then alledged to the Pope, that they had no Power from their Convent to make a New Election; but only to procure the Pope's Confirmation of one of thoſe who had been already choſen: Nor is it at all likely, (nor indeed by any other Author mentioned) that the King ſhould have thus tied up himſelf to accept him for Archbiſhop whom thoſe Twelve Monks ſhould chuſe, ſince he never dreamt of any New Election at Rome, but only of the Pope's Vacating one of the former Elections, and Confirming the other; and therefore this New Election of Cardinal Langton was certainly more Uncanonical then any of the former; only it had the Pope's pretended Authority to back it, which was now arrived to that height, that it might do whatever it pleaſed, eſpecially in England, where the Biſhops and Clergy were wholly at his Devotion.

His Relation of this Affair is not very probable.

[4] The Pope being ſenſible that King John would deeply reſent this his Arbitrary Proceeding, ſent over his Nuntio with a Preſent of four Rings, ſet with precious Stones of four different Colours, and alſo a notable Inſinuating Letter, wherein he ſets forth the great wonderful Myſteries contain'd in the Roundneſs of the Rings, and their various Colours, which muſt needs (forſooth) ſignifie the Four Cardinal Virtues; and might, if his Holineſs had pleaſed, have repreſented any other four things whatever he was pleaſed to conclude, with an Exhortation to follow each of thoſe Virtues thus ſignified; yet would not the Pope only rely upon the King's good Pleaſure, whether his new Archbiſhop ſhould be received or not,

[4] Id. p. 223. The P. being ſenſible that K. John would reſent it, writes him an inſinuating Epiſtle, and ſends him four Rings to pacify him.

Anno Dom. MCCVII.

but (to make ſure work of it) he alſo wrote other Letters, wherein he exhorts him to receive Stephen Langton, a Native of his own Kingdom, and Cardinal of St. Chryſogonus, and who was very well skill'd both in Secular and Spiritual Learning, to be Archbiſhop of Canterbury, ſince his Exemplary Life and Converſation would be a high Advantage both to his Body and Soul: But to make the ſurer work ſtill, he alſo ſent his Command to the Prior and Monks, to receive and obey him as their Archbiſhop, as well in Spirituals as Temporals.

[5] Id. ib. The K. is highly incens'd at the News, and Charges the Monks of Canterbury with Treaſon.

[5] When the King had received the Pope's Letters concerning the Vacating the Election of the Biſhop of Norwich, and the unexpected Advancement of Cardinal Langton, he charged the Monks of Canterbury with Treaſon; alledging, That in prejudice of his Prerogative, they had firſt choſen their Sub-Prior without Licenſe, and then to make him ſome feigned amends had Elected the Biſhop of Norwich; and that tho' they had received Money out of his Exchequer for the Expences of their Journey, to obtain the Pope's Confirmation of the laſt Election, yet they had, as an Aggravation of their firſt Offence, preſumed to chuſe Stephen de Langton his declared Enemy, and had cauſed him to be Conſecrated Archbiſhop; for which cauſe, the King being in great Fury and Indignation, ſent Fulk de Cantelupe, and Henry de Cornebulle, two Cruel and Ill-natur'd Knights, with armed Officers, to drive the Monks of Canterbury out of England, as being Guilty of Treaſon: Theſe Ruffians in purſuance of the King's Commands, went to Canterbury, and there entering the Monaſtery with drawn Swords, they commanded the Prior and his Monks in the King's Name, preſently to depart out of England; and if they refuſed to obey, they ſwore, That they would burn them and their Monaſtery together. The Monks being at this greatly terrified, and acting without good advice, all departed without any Oppoſition, much leſs Violence; and ſo paſſing into Flanders were kindly received in the Abby of St. Bertin, and in other Monaſteries adjoining thereunto; then by the King's Command, ſome of the Monks of St. Auguſtin's Abby, were put in their Places to perform Divine Service, yet under the Overſight of Fulk de Cantelupe above-mentioned, who Seized and Confiſcated all the Goods of the Monks.

And ſends armed Men to drive them out of their Convent.

And not only that, but Baniſhes them out of England, and puts ſome Monks of the adjoining Monaſtery in their Places.

[1] Id. p. 224. The K. thereupon writes to the Pope, ſetting forth the Injury he had lately received at his hands.

[1] When they were thus Expell'd their Monaſtery, the King ſent Meſſengers to the Pope, with Expoſtulary Letters, in which he ſets forth the Injury had been done him in Vacating the Election of the Biſhop of Norwich, and Conſecrating Stephen Langton Archbiſhop; a Perſon altogether unknown to him, and one Educated in France, and who had converſed with his open Enemies, and all this without his Conſent; to the Prejudice and Subverſion of the Rights and Prerogatives of his Crown; affirming, That he would no way recede from the Election and Promotion of the Biſhop of Norwich; and alſo threatning, That if he might not receive a favourable Hearing at Rome in this Matter, he would hinder all Perſons from going thither, by ſhutting up his Ports; leſt his Country being thereby impoveriſh'd, he ſhould not be able to defend it from their Enemies: For ſince he had Archbiſhops, Biſhops, and other Prelates within his own Territories, abounding in all kind of Learning, he would (if

(if he were forced to it) neither seek for Justice, or Judgment, from Strangers out of his own Dominions.

Anno Dom. MCCVII.

[2] Some time after that the Pope had received these Letters, he returned him a very Politick Answer, to this Effect: First he blames the King, for giving so rough an Answer to his humble and kind Letters; He then proceeds to justifie the Election of Cardinal Stephen, as one who had studied long in the University of Paris, and who merited to be made a Doctor not only in the Liberal Arts, but also in Theology; farther telling him, That tho' at Elections made at the Apostolic See, the consent of Princes was not requisite, yet nevertheless Two Monks had been specially deputed to gain his Assent; but they being detain'd at Dover, were not able to perform what was enjoined them; then justifying the last Election, as agreeable to the Canons of the antient Fathers, he concludes, with advising him to submit to his good Pleasure, which would be much for his Honour, and not resist God and the Church in this Cause, for which that blessed Martyr and Glorious Archbishop Thomas (they are the Historian's words) had shed his Blood, especially since his Father and Brother had abjured that evil Custom; by which I suppose he means, that of our King's Nominating Bishops and Abbots: so this Affair rested for a time.

[2] Id. ib. The Pope returns the K. a very Politick Answer, wherein he justifies the late Election, and highly commends Cardinal Langton.

Anno Dom. MCCVIII.

[3] This Year the King kept his Christmas at Windsor, where he bestowed many Festival Liveries upon his Knights, who attended him at that Solemnity; but immediately after, the Pope finding the King was not to be prevail'd upon neither by Persuasions or Threatnings, to receive Stephen Langton for Archbishop, he therefore expressing great Grief for his Contumacy, commanded William Bishop of London, Eustace Bishop of Ely, and Mauger Bishop of Worcester, to go to the King, and discourse him concerning this great Affair of the Church of Canterbury; and if they found him Contumacious, (as hitherto he had been) they were then to declare to him, that his Kingdom should be Interdicted; and if that would not do, but he still persisted in his Obstinacy, the Pope would lay a heavier Hand upon him; he also wrote to the Suffragans of the See of Canterbury, and to the Other Prelates of that Province, to receive and obey Cardinal Stephen as their Archbishop; whereupon the Bishops above-mentioned, in performance of the Trust committed to them by the Pope, immediately repairing to the King, entreated him with Tears, That as he had God before his Eyes, he would recall the Archbishop and Monks to their Church, and Honour and Love them with perfect Charity, that so he might avoid the Scandal of the Interdict; but when the Bishops would have proceeded in their Speech, he fell into a great Passion, and spoke many hard words against the Pope and his Cardinals, Swearing by God's Teeth (his usual Oath) that whoever should presume to Interdict his Territories, he would forthwith send all the Prelates and Clergy of England to the Pope, and also Confiscate their Goods; further adding, That if he found any Romans within his Dominions, he would first put out their Eyes and cut off their Noses, and then send them to Rome, that so they might be distinguished from those of other Nations; he also commanded the Bishops forthwith to depart his Presence, as they valued

[3] Id. The Pope finding the K. not to be prevail'd upon, commands some of the Bishops to admonish him to be obedient, under pain of an Interdict.

Anno Dom. MCCVIII. their Lives: This is Matt. Paris's Account of the Succeſs of the Biſhop's Negociation with the King; in which ſetting aſide his Paſſionate Words and Threatnings, I do not ſee any thing wherein he might not very well be juſtified in thus Diſobeying the Pope's Command. But [4] Dr. Brady, (who does what he can to juſtifie this King's Actions, whether right or wrong) * gives us his Letters Patents, atteſted by ſeven Earls, and three Barons, (dated above two Months before the Interdict) wherein he condeſcended ſo far as he could to Obey the Pope in the great Affair concerning the Church of Canterbury, upon ſuch Terms, as he himſelf, with the Advice of his Council, ſhould think reaſonable; ſaving always to Himſelf and his Heirs, the Right and Dignity of his Crown; and then the Dr. calls all the Fault upon the Biſhops, for not being ſatisfied with the King's reaſonable Propoſals, and that upon their preſſing him further, it put him into ſuch a Tranſport, as cauſed him to ſpeak thoſe hard and paſſionate Words againſt the Pope, already mentioned.

[4] Brady's Hiſt. p. 477. & Append. n. 85.

* Vid. His Appendix, n. 85. Dr. Brady's miſtake of the Privy-Council, for the Common Council of the Kingdom.

Tho' I cannot deny the Authority of the Record which the * Dr. cites, becauſe it is among the Patent Rolls in the Tower; yet this does not prove what he endeavours to make out: for it is evident by the Record it ſelf, directed to the Biſhops of London, Ely, and Worceſter, (the very ſame Biſhops who had been with him before about this Matter) that it was not at the time of their laſt Meeting, but ſome days after, when (upon cooler Thoughts, and by the Advice of thoſe Earls and Barons who were Witneſſes to it) he promiſed that he would obey the Pope's Command in the Buſineſs of the Church of Canterbury; and that by the Advice of his Council, not his Privy Council, (as the Doctor here inſinuates) but that of the Eſtates of the Kingdom when they ſhould meet, as appears by the Words of the Record it ſelf, that is to ſay, Cum Concilio Fidelium Noſtrorum; i. e. By the Advice of our Faithful Subjects; by which Expreſſion, the Great Council of the Kingdom is often underſtood.

But let this Promiſe of the King above-mentioned be made when it would, it is certain, he was then upon ſuch ill Terms with his People, that he durſt never after call a Great Council but when he was forced to it; and therefore it is no wonder if he found no better Succeſs in it, for not taking the Advice and Conſents of his Clergy, Nobility, and People, that they would ſtand by him in this Quarrel with the Pope, it put him upon thoſe ſevere and deſperate Courſes which loſt him the Love and Confidence of his Subjects, and which ended at laſt in a ſhameful Submiſſion to the Pope's Will and Pleaſure, as you will find hereafter. I hope the Reader will pardon this Digreſſion, it being ſo neceſſary for the Illuſtration of the Hiſtory of theſe Times. But to return to where I left off.

[5] M. P. P. 226. The Bps. forſake the K. and pronounce the Sentence of the Interdict.

[5] After theſe threats, the Biſhops above-mentioned, finding no further hopes of Repentance from the King, they forſook him, and in Lent following, on the Two and Twentieth of March, they Interdicted the whole Kingdom of England and Dominion of Wales in Obedience to the Pope's Commands; Whereupon there was immediately a Ceſſation of all Eccleſiaſtical * Rites, except Confeſſion, Baptiſm, of Infants and Adminiſtration of the Euchariſt to

* Sacramenta.

Dying

Dying Persons; so that the Bodies of the dead were carried out of the Cities and Towns, and buried in the High-ways and Ditches, without any Service, or the Ministery of Priests. Whereupon the Day following, the King sent to those Bishops who had pronounced the Interdict his Letter or Writ (which Dr. Brady has also given us at large,) wherein he Commanded them to deliver to his Justitiary Geoffrey Fitz-Peter the Letters Patents he had lately given them, concerning what he had promised in the business of the Church of Canterbury, still saving his Right and Dignity: What was his Intention by this, I am not able to Determine; but it is certain it came too late, for (as I have already said) he never called any Great Council for that purpose, as he ought to have done, if he designed to have this Affair concluded to the general Satisfaction of the Kingdom; but the Three Bishops above-mentioned, who had published the Interdict, as also Joscelin Bishop of Bath, and Giles Bishop of Hereford, fearing some Violence from the King's Displeasure, privately stole away, beyond Sea.

Anno Dom. MCCVIII.

Vid. his Appendix. n. 86.

The Three Bp's. who had Published the Interdict leave the Kingdom.

I cannot omit one other passage, that [1] Dr. Brady has given us from a Writ or Letter, directed to the Kentish Men, wherein he lets them know, that Simon de Langton had lately come to him at Winchester about Mid-Lent last past, and had there before divers Bishops desired him to receive Stephen his Brother as Archbishop of Canterbury; but that when the King spoke to him of preserving the Royal Dignity in this Affair, he replied, that he could do nothing on his Majesty's behalf, unless he would wholly put himself upon his Brother's mercy, with which sawcy answer, the King acquainted them, that so they might know the prejudice he had done him; Commanding them also, to believe those things which Reginald de Cornhul should further tell them on his behalf. From which we may observe the intolerable Pride and Insolence of the Archbishop's Relations, which so exasperated the King, that it was no wonder it rendered him more harsh and obstinate than otherwise he would have been.

[1] P. 471. vid. Appendix. n. 88. An account of the K's Letter to the Kentish-men, setting forth the saucy behaviour of Simon Langton, Brother to the new A. Bishop.

[2] The King much afraid of this Sentence of Interdict, sent his Sheriffs and other Ministers into all parts of England, Commanding with terrible threats, all Prelates and their inferior Clergy, that they should forthwith depart the Kingdom, and repair to the Pope, requiring him to do the King Justice for this Injury: Then he also put all Bishopricks, Abbies and Priories under the Custody of Laymen, Commanding all the Churche's Rents to be Confiscated. But in this Affair the Prelates (that is) the Abbots as well as Bishops were so cautious, that they would not leave their Houses and Monasteries, unless they were expelled by Force; which the King's Officers perceiving, durst not offer them any violence, having had no Command from the King so to do: However they converted their Goods to the King's use, providing for them Food and Raiment, tho' very sparingly out of their own Estates; the Barns of Clergymen were every where locked up by the King's Command, and the Corn seized for his Service.

[2] M. P. Id. Ib. The K. being much afraid of the Clergy banishes them the Kingdom, and seizes their Estates.

But they refuse to leave it, unless expelled by Force.

[3] But that which Plagued them most, was, that the † Concubines of the Priests and Clerks throughout England were imprisoned by the King's Officers, and they forced to pay great Compositions

[3] Id. Ib. Pocaria. The Concubines of Priests imprisoned, and they themselves abused upon the Road.

Anno Dom. MCCVIII.

tions for their Liberty: The Monks and all Men in Orders, who were found Travelling upon the Road, were thrown off their Horſes and robbed and abuſed by the King's Souldiers, nor was there any one durſt Right them: Alſo the Kindred and Relations of the Archbiſhop and thoſe Biſhops who pronounced the Sentence of Interdict, were by the King's Command deſpoiled of their Goods, and caſt into Priſon; yet notwithſtanding all theſe Evils (ſaith Mat. Paris) the aforeſaid Biſhops remained beyond Sea, living in all manner of Delights, not oppoſing themſelves as a Wall of defence for the Houſe of the Lord; but when they ſaw the Wolf coming, they left their Sheep and fled.

[4] Id. ib. The Goods of ſuch of the Clergy, who would not obey the Interdict are reſtored by the King's Writs.

[4] However, for all this Seiſure of the Goods and Temporalties of the Biſhops and Clergy, the King ſometime after reſtored them to ſuch as ſubmitted to him; and to thoſe that Celebrated Divine Service, Adminiſtred the Sacraments, and refuſed to Obey the Interdict; he reſtored their Lands and Goods, and only kept thoſe which belonged to ſuch Abbots, Priors, Clerks and other Religious Perſons as had ſubmitted to the Interdict; nor indeed did he retain the Eſtates of any Religious or Clergymen, but ſuch as had refuſed to Celebrate Divine Service after this Publication, as appears by divers Writs [5] Dr. Brady has given us in the Appendix to his Hiſtory; ſome of which were Iſſued out on the behalf of the Biſhops of Wincheſter and Norwich, directed to the Sheriffs and other Officers of thoſe Counties where their Lands lay, and who had then the Cuſtody of them from the King.

[5] Appendix. n. 89, 90, 91, 92.

[1] Id. Ib. n. 93. The K. iſſues out another Precept againſt abuſing Clergy upon pain of death.

And for the further ſecurity of all Religious Men, i. e. Monks and Clerks; he Iſſued out his Precept, that no Man againſt his Peace ſhould abuſe either Clerks or Religious Perſons in Word or Deed; and if they did, and could be taken, they ſhould be hanged upon the next Tree; likewiſe as by [2] another Writ for their Grain he permitted all Biſhops Priors, Religious Perſons and Clerks (tho' their Barns had been before ſhut up) to ſell it until the Feaſt of St. Catherine, that is, the 25th of November; from which Records we may obſerve the Partiality of the Monkiſh writers of thoſe times, who often repreſent this King more rigorous to the Clergy than indeed he was.

[2] Ib. n. 94. As alſo another giving them leave to ſell their Grain.

[3] Id. ib. The K. finding himſelf ſlighted, and hated by his Subjects, demands Pledges of his Nobility whom he ſuſpected. But the ſame being demanded of the Wife of William de Brauſe, refuſes to deliver her Sons, and her ſharp anſwer, for which ſhe is reproved by her Husband.

[3] Yet for all this King John now finding himſelf not only diſregarded, but hated by his Subjects for his Exorbitant and Tyrannical proceedings, and fearing leſt as a further addition to theſe Evils, the Pope might alſo abſolve them from their Allegiance to him, required all the great Men or Nobility of his Kingdom whom he ſuſpected, to deliver him Pledges or Hoſtages for their future Fidelity; hereupon ſeveral complied with his Injunctions; Some delivered their Sons, others their Nephews, or neareſt Relations to the Meſſengers ſent for that purpoſe, ſome of whom coming to William de Brauſe a Baron of Note, his Wife, a Lady of more Wit than Diſcretion, taking the words out of her Husbands mouth, thus raſhly anſwered them; I ſhall never deliver my Sons to the King to be kept, who killed his own Nephew Arthur whilſt he was in his Cuſtody; which when her Husband heard, he reproved her for ſo rude a Reflection, and modeſtly replied, that if he had offended the King in any thing, he was ready without a-

any Pledges to make him Satisfaction according to the Judgment of his Court, and of the Barons his Peers, at any time and Place aſſigned him; but when the Meſſengers returned to the King, and they had told him what they had heard, he was in ſo great a tranſport of Paſſion, that he ſent ſome of his Officers and Soldiers privately to ſeize upon this William and all his Family, and bring them before him, but this Baron being forewarned by his Friends, immediately fled with his Wife, Children and Relations into Ireland, where you will find this bold Truth coſt this poor Lady and her Children their Lives.

Anno Dom. MCCVIII.

The K. being incenſed at this Reply, ſends to ſeize the ſaid William and his Wife, but they eſcape into Ireland.

About this Time, the King grew ſo Jealous of the Queen, that (if Mat. Weſtminſter may be credited) he accuſed her of Adultery, and commanded her to be kept a cloſe Priſoner; and cauſed ſeveral whom he ſuſpected to have had to do with her, to be Executed; tho' our Author does not give us their Names, nor can I find this Paſſage mentioned in any other Writer of that Time; but it ſeems the Queen did not remain very long under this Diſgrace, for the Year following ſhe was brought to Bed of another Son, as you will find anon.

The K. grows jealous of his Wife, and puts ſeveral Perſons to death whom he ſuſpected to have had to do with her.

Alſo the ſame Author takes notice of a great Eclipſe of the Sun, that happened this Year in the Beginning of March, but does not name the Day.

As for what happened this Year in Foreign parts, I find no more than that Philip Duke of Swevia and Emperor of Germany, who had been for ſeveral Years Competitor with Otto Duke of Saxony, for that Imperial Throne, was murthered in his Bed-chamber by Otto, Count Palatine of Wittolsbach, whereupon the ſaid Duke was Elected Emperor in his ſtead, tho' he did not long enjoy it.

[4] Vid. H. Mutij Chron. ſub hoc anno.

King John this Year kept his Chriſtmas at Briſtol, where he Iſſued out a Precept or Proclamation, forbidding the taking of all ſorts of feathered Game, throughout England, which being the firſt Edict of this kind Iſſued by any King before, I thought fit to take notice of it, as an Act of this King's Arbitrary Power.

Anno Dom. MCCIX.

[5] Id. P. 228. The K. iſſues out a Proclamation forbidding the taking of all ſorts of Game

Not long after there aroſe ſo great Difference between King John and the King of Scots, about his receiving ſome Out-laws who had fled out of England, and alſo for marrying his Daughter to the Earl of Boloigne without his Conſent, that King John raiſed a great Army, and marched toward Scotland; but when he came to Norham Caſtle in Northumberland, the King of Scots being afraid of the Conſequence, met him, and deſired Peace. Upon this King John reproved him for receiving and favouring his Fugitives and Enemies; but by the mediation of Friends to both Nations, they made up this Breach upon theſe Terms, that the King of Scots ſhould pay unto King John Eleven thouſand Marks of Silver, and that his two Daughters ſhould be delivered as Pledges for the better ſecuring of the Peace between them.

Ib. King John marches againſt the K. of Scots, who being afraid, makes Peace with the K. upon his own Terms.

The King in his return from this Expedition did another Act which ſavoured too much of arbitrary Power; for he Ordained, that the Hedges ſhould be Burnt, and the Ditches filled up throughout all the Foreſts of England, and the Corn and Graſs to be every where left to the Deer; upon his coming home, he received Another Act of arbitrary Power committed by the King.

Homage

Anno Dom. MCCIX. Homage of all his Free-Tenants (even Boys of Twelve Years of Age) through the whole Kingdom, whom, after they had done their Fealty, he received kindly, and diſmiſſed them with the uſual Ceremony when Homage is paid, the kiſs of Peace; tho' this was very burdenſome as well to the Rich as Poor; alſo the Welſhmen then came to the King at Woodſtock, and performed their Homage to him, and ſo were ſent home with good Words.

He makes all his Tenants to renew their Homage and Fealty to him.

[1] M. 228. A great diſturbance in the Univerſity of Oxford.

[1] This Year happened an unlucky Accident, which for ſome time was a great prejudice to the Univerſity of Oxford. A certain Clerk, who there followed his Studies, having by chance killed a Woman, made his eſcape, whereupon the Mayor of the City and ſeveral others attending him to the Place, found the Woman ſlain; but not the Murtherer; in whoſe Lodgings they ſeized Three other Clerks that lived in the ſame Houſe, which they had hired together; Theſe being taken and put into Priſon, were a few days after by the King's Order carried out of Town, and hanged, in contempt of Eccleſiaſtical Liberty; upon which near 3000 Scholars, as well Maſters as Pupils, left that Univerſity, ſome going to Cambridge, and others to Reading, ſo that there was ſcarce a Scholar remained in the Town: I mention this to let you ſee, how much Oxford flouriſhed in thoſe times.

[2] Id. ib.

[2] The Interdict had now continued Two Years, when Pope Innocent finding no hopes of King John's amendment, and making ſatisfaction for the violence he had done to all ſorts of Perſons, as well Laicks as Eccleſiaſtics, and reſolving not to ſuffer his Obſtinacy (which our Author calls Rebellion) to go any longer unpuniſhed; wherefore by the Advice of his Cardinals he Commanded the Biſhops of London, Ely, and Worceſter, to pronounce him Excommunicate; that ſo by publiſhing the Sentence every Sunday, and Holiday, in all Conventual Churches throughout England, they might cauſe him to be ſtrictly avoided by all Men; but when thoſe Biſhops would have committed the Publication of the Sentence to their Brother Biſhops and other Prelates that remained in England, they all became like dumb Dogs, either through favour, or fear of the King, and durſt not Bark; but tho' they made a ſhew as if they would Execute what was enjoined them, yet they did not proceed in performing the Pope's Command according to the due Form: However the Sentence was ſo well known every where, that it became the Subject of all Men's Diſcourſe; amongſt the reſt Geoffrie Archdeacon of Norwich, as he ſate in the Exchequer upon the King's buſineſs, conferred with his Aſſociates about the late Sentence pronounced againſt the King, ſaying, it was not ſafe for Beneficed Men to remain any longer in the Service of an Excommunicated King, and ſo he went away without leave; the King having notice of it, ſent William Talbot a Knight after him with a Band of Soldiers, who being taken, and put in Irons into a cloſe Priſon, after a few Days he had by the King's Command a Leaden Cope put upon him, with the preſſure, of which, and for want of Victuals, he died.

The Pope commands certain Bp's. to declare the K. Excommunicated, but they neglect to do it.

Geoffery Archdeacon of Norwich upon the hearing of this Sentence, ſpeaks certain words againſt the K. which he hearing of, orders him to be tormented and ſtarved to death.

[3] Id. Ib. p. 229.

[3] Nor muſt I here omit a Matter, tho' in it ſelf of no great moment, yet, is not amiſs to be inſerted, to ſhew us the Temper of ſome Eccleſiaſtic's of thoſe times, who taking the contrary Extreme, treme flattered the King as much as the others disobeyed him; amongst whom was was one Monſ. Alexander, Sirnamed the Maſon, who had been a famous Reader of Divinity in Paris; yet our Author calls him a falſe or counterfeit Theologue, becauſe by his flattering Sermons the King was not a little moved to Cruelty; for he Preached that this general Plague upon England, did not proceed from any fault of the King's, but from the Sins of the People, affirming, that the King was only the Scourge of God's Anger, and Ordained to Rule his People with a Rod of Iron, and to break them in pieces like a Potter's Veſſel; to bind their Princes in Chains, and their Nobles with links of Iron: And he alſo proved by divers probable Arguments, that it did not belong to the Pope to concern himſelf with the Secular Power of Princes, or the Government of their Subjects, ſince there was no ſuch Power conferred by Jeſus Chriſt on St. Peter, but that which was meerly Spiritual, over the Church and Eccleſiaſtical matters: By which fulſome Sermons, he ſo inſinuated himſelf into the King's favour, that he thereby obtained the Benefices of which others were deprived; but when the Pope heard of it, he after his Reconciliation with the King, turned this Man out of all his Livings, and he was at laſt reduced to ſuch neceſſity, as that in a wretched Habit he begged his Bread from Door to Door.

Anno. Dom. MCCIX.

Gemeticenſis. A Relation of the flattering Sermons of Alexander, Sirnamed the Maſon.

This ſhews us how Princes commonly leave ſuch Flatterers to ſhift for themſelves, when once they have ſerved a preſent Turn.

[4] About this time William Biſhop of Lincoln being dead, ſome Years before, Hugh de Wells the King's Chancellor was choſen Biſhop, who thereupon obtained leave of the King to go into France, under a pretence that he might receive his Conſecration from the Archbiſhop of Rouen, and preſently return home: But he ſerved the King a ſlippery Trick, for as ſoon as he arrived in Normandy, he immediately went to the new Archbiſhop of Canterbury, then Reſiding at the Abby of Pontignie, and was there Conſecrated by him, and performed Canonical Obedience to him; which the King no ſooner heard of, but he found out a way to be even with him: for preſently he ſeized, and confiſcated the Profits of the Biſhoprick, and delivering the Seal to Walter de Gray, made him his Chancellor.

[4] Id. p. 229. Hugh de Wells the K's Chancellor is choſen B. of Lincoln, who pretending he would go to the Archbiſhop of Rouen for Conſecration, goes to him of Canterbury; whereupon the K. ſeizes his Temporalities.

I muſt now mention a remarkable Tranſaction that happened this Year in Eccleſiaſtical matters, which I think I ought not to Omit, tho' I find it mentioned in no other Author, except the Annals of Waverlie, the Compiler of which Part lived in thoſe times; and he relates, that upon the King's going into Scotland, he ſent certain Biſhops, Earls and other Barons, Commiſſioners, to Canterbury, there to meet the Biſhops of London, Ely, and Worceſter, who were ſent for by the King out of France to Treat on the Pope's behalf, concerning a Reconciliation between him and the Archbiſhop, with the reſt of the Clergy; who all meeting at the time and place appointed, in a few Days they ſo far adjuſted all matters, that the Articles being drawn into writing, were Sealed by the Commiſſioners of both Sides; and ſo Returning to the King, he yielded that a Reſtitution ſhould be made to the Archbiſhop, and the Four Biſhops who were laſt mentioned, as alſo to the Biſhop of Hereford, with an Hundred Pounds, besides to each of them an Earnest of an entire Restitution of what had been taken from them; but when the Bishops insisted on this Article on the behalf of all the rest, it much displeased the King; yet these Bishops would not agree to change either that, or any other Article, but wrote him a short Letter, the Contents whereof were, 'That if He and his Ministers would without any delay entirely restore what had been 'taken from all other Churches and Ecclesiastical Persons, they 'would then bring the Archbishop to his See, and not otherwise; but it seems the King not consenting to it, the Bishops went back again, and yet delayed publishing the Sentence of Excommunication against the King's Person, till Eight days after Michaelmas.

The K. not agreeing to an entire Restitution of what had been taken away from the Bps and Clergy, The Treaty breaks off, and the Bps send him a short Letter.

[1] Id. ib. The K. sends for the A.Bp. to Dover, who comes over upon the K's Safe Conduct, together with the Bps last mentioned.

[1] Upon this the King sent for the Archbishop to Dover, with Letters of Safe-Conduct, under the Hands of divers of his Great Men, for he would not trust the King alone; and upon that security, the Archbishop came to Dover with the Bishops of London and Ely, about the beginning of October; and notice being given to the King of it, he came with several of his Nobles, as far as Chilham, and from thence sent Geoffry Fitz-Peter, his Justiciary, together with the Bishop of Winchester, and some other Great Men, as his Commissioners to treat with him, and by them he required of the Archbishop and Bishops, certain Articles, which they would by no means agree to; but resolved to adhere unalterably to the Form of Reconciliation above-mentioned, and so the Treaty broke off, and the Bishops returned to the Place from whence they came.

Where the Treaty is again renewed, but upon the Bps refusal to agree to certain Articles, this Treaty also breaks off, as before.

What these Articles were, which the King required, our Author does not tell us; but it is most likely, that they imported his being excused from making an Entire Restitution, of what he had taken away from them; and if so, then indeed it was only the King's forbid Covetousness that hinder'd this Agreement; for as for owning Stephen Langton for Archbishop, it is certain he had already consented to that; yet after this, the King would have again renewed the Treaty, and offered the Archbishop four thousand Marks, in lieu of what had been taken from him; but neither he nor the rest of the Bishops would come over, which I still suppose was, because the King refused to make an Entire Restitution of the Goods of the Clergy.

[2] The Q is delivered of another Son, named Richard

[2] Nothing else happened considerable in England, but that the Queen was on the Vigil of the Epiphany delivered of a Second Son, called Richard, who was afterwards Earl of Cornwall, and King of the Romans.

Anno Dom. MCCX.

[3] M.P. p. 229. The K. keeps his Christmas at Windsor, where all the great Men and Commons of England attend him.

[3] King John this Year kept his Christmas at Windsor, where all the Great Men of England attended him, and freely conversed with him, notwithstanding the late Sentence of Excommunication; yet that it was more out of Fear than Love appears by our Author, who says, That the King only watched for an Advantage over those who withdrew or absented themselves from his Presence; yet it seems they did not agree to the King's Demands, for the Annals of Waverly further tell us, That not long after, the King, under pretence of recovering Normandy, and his other Territories beyond Sea from the King of France, took an unaccountable Sum of Money from his Subjects,

The K. again extorts a great Sum of Money both from the Clergy & Laity, without their Consents.

Subjects, ſparing neither Clergy nor Laiety, except the Black Monks, whoſe Revenues he had received the Year before; alſo the Knights-Hoſpitallers and Templars were forced about Eaſter to pay a great Fine to the King. [4] Then the Jews of both Sexes were by the King's Command ſeized all over England, and cruelly Treated, till they would ranſom themſelves, according to the King's Pleaſure; ſome of whom were ſo grievouſly tormented, that they gave up all they had, and promiſed more, that ſo they might eſcape ſuch Cruel, and various kinds of Torments.

Anno Dom. MCCX.

[4] M. P. Ib.

Here our Author gives us a Relation of a Jew at Briſtol, who being cruelly Tormented, yet was ſo hard-hearted, that he would not ranſom himſelf with any Money; the King hearing of it, ordered, That his Tormentors ſhould every day pull out one of his Cheek Teeth, till he would pay down Ten thouſand Marks; ſo they pulled out Seven of them in as many Days, but on the Eighth day, when they were about to go on with their work, he relented; and ſo with the loſs of ſeven Teeth, parted with Ten thouſand Marks to ſave the reſt; yet am I not ſatisfied that the King extorted all this Money from the Subjects contrary to the Law, ſince it appears from the Patent Roll of this Year, that the Archbiſhops and Great Men gave the King an Aid, for the Defence of the Kingdom and Recovery of his Territories from the King of France.

A Jew of Briſtol tho' cruelly tormented, yet would part with no Money till 7 of his Teeth were pull'd out.

[5] But inſtead of this, the King having raiſed a powerful Army, paſſed over with it into Ireland, in the beginning of June; and when he was come to the City of Dublin, there met him more than Twenty Petty Kings and Princes of that Country, who being all ſtruck with a Pannick Fear, did him Homage and Fealty; and there were very few remain'd at Home, except thoſe who inhabited the inacceſſible Parts of the Kingdom.

Magnates Regni. [5] M. p. 230.

The K. raiſes an Army and paſſes into Ireland, where all the Kings and Princes did him Homage, except ſome few.

Then the King cauſed the Engliſh Laws and Cuſtoms to be there Eſtabliſhed, placing Sheriffs and other Officers who were to govern the People of that Kingdom, according to the Laws of England; He alſo made John de Grey, Biſhop of Norwich, his Chief Juſticiary, who cauſed Money to be there Coin'd of the ſame Weight and Fineneſs with that of England; ſo that the like Money might be common in both Kingdoms. When theſe things were diſpatch'd, the King marching with a powerful Army, took a great many of his Enemy's ſtrong holds, and ſubdued the Province of Connaught, and took Cathol, King thereof, Priſoner; He alſo ſeized the Lands and Caſtles of Walter de Lacy (a Nobleman then in Rebellion) who with many others flying before him, dreaded nothing more than to fall into his Hands; then coming into the Province of Meath, he there took Maud the Wife of William de Bruſe, and her Son William together with his Wife, in a certain Caſtle; who being all brought before the King, laden with heavy Fetters, he ſent them over into England, to be kept cloſe Priſoners in the Caſtle of Windſor, where not long after they all, by the King's Order, periſhed with Hunger; only William de Bruſe the Husband, eſcaping out of Ireland in Diſguiſe into France, died not long after, near Paris.

The K. cauſes the Engliſh Laws to be Eſtabliſhed, and makes the Bp of Norwich Juſticiary, who coined Money there, of the ſame Value with that of England

The K. marches into the Country, and ſubdues Connaught, and ſeizes the Lands and Caſtles of ſeveral Noblemen in Rebellion.

He takes the Wife and Son of Will. de Bruſe, Priſoners, who are ſtarved to Death in Windſor-Caſtle.

[1] King John having thus reduced the greateſt Part of Ireland to his Obedience, made haſt to return into England, becauſe he heard that the Welſh, who were Confederates of Hugh Lacy and William de Bruſe,

[1] Id. ib.

The K. haſtes to return into England; and why.

Anno Dom. MCCX. Brauſe, were about to Invade England; wherefore the King embarking, landed in Wales on the 30th of Auguſt, and making great haſt to London, cauſed all the Prelates and Clergy, and Religious Orders of England, to appear before him; upon which General Summons there came all the Abbots, Priors, Abeſſes, Knights-Templars and Hoſpitallers, with the Guardians of the Citercian Order, and other Tranſmarine Aliens of what Order ſoever; who were all forced to make ſuch great Fines, that it was reported, the Sum amounted to an Hundred Thouſand Pounds Sterling; for the White Monks alone were forced to pay to the King 40000 l. of Silver, beſides what he took from other Orders. The Annals of Waverly, (notwithſtanding their Exemptions) alſo tell us, That he exacted from the Ciſtercian Order alone, the Sum of above Three and Thirty thouſand Marks; by which Exaction, they were ſo much impoveriſhed, that they were diſperſed through the Monaſteries of all the other Monks in England; and the King was ſo great an Enemy to this Order, that he forbad any of them to paſs over beyond Sea, or to come over hither.

As ſoon as the K. arrives he Summons all the Clergy & Religious Orders before him, whom he makes to pay vaſt Fines.

The Ciſtercian Order are ſo impoveriſh'd, that they were forced to quarter upon other Orders.

But Walter of Coventry gives us the Reaſon, why the King was more ſevere to the Monks of this Order, than to any other, becauſe that they relying upon their great Privileges, would by no means conſent to contribute to the Taxes, which all others of the Clergy then paid; ſo that to be revenged of them, he Confiſcated their Goods, nor would permit them to hold any General Chapter of their Order, till at laſt they were forced to part with a great Sum of Money, to pacify the King's Diſpleaſure againſt them. Theſe things (ſaith my Author) were the more eaſily done, becauſe many of the Biſhops, whoſe Duty it was to ſtand up for the Liberties of the Church, were now abſent beyond Sea, and thoſe that ſtayed here, loved rather to enjoy their Eſtate in Quiet, than to oppoſe the King; but as for the Biſhop of Wincheſter, he was ſo far from oppoſing it, that he was the Chief Inſtrument the King made uſe of in all his Exorbitant Actions. And here, were I only to follow Mat. Paris, I need ſay nothing farther concerning the New Archbiſhop of Canterbury; but the Annals of Waverly have given us an Account of another Tranſaction between the King and him, which I can find no where elſe, viz. That King John now ſent him Letters of Safe-Conduct, under the Seals of divers of his Nobility, as he had done the laſt Year, inviting him to come over, and meet the King at Dover; for which end he came thither in Perſon; but the Archbiſhop hearing that none of thoſe Nobles whoſe Lettres he had received, were come thither with him, would not venture over; and ſo the King return'd Home, much more enraged againſt him than before.

The Reaſon of the K's great Severity to this Order.

The K. invites the A Bp to meet him at Dover, but he refuſes to come, and for what Reaſon.

As for Foreign Affairs, I find nothing worth remarking, but that the [2] Emperor Otto having been the Year before ſolemnly Crown'd at Rome by Innocent, then Pope; he now notwithſtanding quarrelled with him, becauſe the Emperor had poſſeſſed himſelf of Sicily, and had taken divers Caſtles, and other Territories belonging to the Empire, which had been Uſurped by the Pope and Frethericke, late King of Sicily, during the laſt Vacancy of the Imperial Throne; the Emperor alledging, that he was bound by his Coronation-Oath to recover them, and the Pope aſſenting that they did not belong to him him, and thereupon Excommunicated him, and Abſolved all his Subjects from their Oaths of Allegiance to him.

King John kept his Chriſtmas at York, his Earls and Barons attending him there; [3] after which he went to Whit-Church in Shropſhire, and being there met by a very great Army, he marched into the furthermoſt Parts of Wales, as far as Snowdun; ſo that the Petty Princes and Nobles ſubmitted without any Oppoſition; and then to ſecure their future Subjection, he took of them 28 Hoſtages, and ſo return'd with Honour and good Succeſs to Whit-Church the 15th of Auguſt; and going from thence to Northampton, there met him Pandolf, who (tho but a Sub-Deacon, yet) being much in favour with the Pope, was come over hither as his Legate, accompanied with one Durand a Knight-Templar as an Aſſiſtant, they being ſent on purpoſe into England to make Peace between the King and the Eccleſiaſticks; then at their Requeſt and Mediation the King freely granted, that the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and the Monks, and all the Proſcribed Biſhops might return in Peace and Security to their own Palaces; but becauſe the King would not make Satisfaction for the Goods of the Archbiſhop and Biſhops, which were Confiſcated, and for the Damages he had done them, the Treaty came to nothing, and the Nuntio and his Aſſiſtant returned into France.

Pandolf the Pope's Legate meets the K. at Northampton, where the K. agrees to receive the A. Bp, and the reſt of the Bps, but breaks off upon the old Article of Reſtitution.

But the Annals of the Monaſteries of Burton and Waverly, (the former under this, and the latter under the Enſuing Year) have given us an Account of a long Dialogue between the King and the Legate; and becauſe it may ſerve to ſhew you the Obſtinate Humour of this King, as alſo the Inſolent Pretenſions of the Pope over the Kings and Princes of that Age, I ſhall here give you an Abſtract of it, being to this Effect:

An Account from the Annals of Burton and Waverly, of what paſſed between the K. and the Legate at this Meeting.

'The Pope's Nuntio being admitted into the King's Preſence, were aſked by him the Cauſe of their Coming? They told him, 'That it was to Reconcile him to the Church, and prevail upon 'him to Swear to reſtore whatſoever he had taken from it, and alſo 'to receive the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and his fellow Biſhops in 'Peace; to all which the King freely anſwered, 'I will reveal to 'you the Secrets of my Heart, you may make me Swear what you 'pleaſe, yet I will never give him ſuch a Safe Conduct, but that I 'may cauſe him to be Hanged whenever he enters my Kingdom. 'Hereupon, they told him, It was very well they knew his Mind, 'and then asking him if he would ſay any thing further, he anſwered, he had ſpoken what he had to ſay; whereupon they replied, that they hoped he would have ſaid ſomething to prove 'the Juſtice of his Cauſe, or elſe to give the Pope ſome Satisfaction, 'whereas all they had hitherto heard him ſay, tended rather, to 'make them confirm the Interdict, than releaſe it.

'The King being moved at this, replied, That he granted the 'Pope to be his Spiritual Father, and, as St. Peter's Succeſſor, he 'ought to obey him in Spiritual things, but not in Secular, which 'concerned his Crown; and then he proceeded to ſhew the great 'Breach of Truſt committed by thoſe 14 Monks of Canterbury, who 'at his own Expence had been ſent to Rome, by whom indeed he had 'written to the Pope, that whomſoever they ſhould Elect for Arch-

'biſhop

Anno Dom. MCCXI.

'biſhop (provided he were an Engliſhman) he would own him; 'but that thoſe Monks had ſurprized him in Vacating the Election 'of the Biſhop of Norwich, and Chuſing Cardinal Stephen; then he 'ſet forth the antient Rights of his Anceſtors, who had always No-'minated the Archbiſhops of Canterbury, and that St. Wulſtan had re-'ceived his Croſier at the Hands of Edward the Confeſſor; yet that 'the Pope would now deprive him of all thoſe Liberties which his 'Predeceſſors had enjoy'd.

'To which Maſter Pandolf replied, That whereas he alledged, the 'Pope had only power in Spiritual Things and not in Temporal, he 'would have him to know, That he ought to obey the Pope in 'Temporal, as well as in Spiritual Things; (and then preſſed him 'with his Coronation-Oath, as if by Swearing he would protect the 'Rights of the Church, there was included a tacite Obedience to the 'Pope in all things whatſoever; Then they proceeded to give a long 'Account to Juſtifie the laſt Election made by the Monks at Rome, 'urging againſt him his own Letter to the Pope, by which he had 'authorized them to chuſe any Engliſhman Archbiſhop, which could 'not well conſiſt with the Election of the Biſhop of Norwich; then 'as to what he urged concerning the Rights of his Predeceſſors in 'conferring the Archbiſhoprick; they replied, That he was not Heir 'to Edward the Confeſſor, but to King William the Baſtard, who (as 'likewiſe himſelf and all his Progenitors) always endeavoured to 'deſtroy the Church; and that he rather now preferred the Wick-'ed Laws of William the Baſtard, than the Good and Juſt Laws of 'Edward the Confeſſor; but as for what he alledged concerning the 'King his Father's Nominating Thomas Becket to be Archbiſhop, 'that after the Archbiſhop's Martyrdom, King Henry had by his 'Charter granted to the Monks of Canterbury, a full Power for the 'future to Elect an Archbiſhop without the Conſent of the Biſhops; 'and that thereupon the ſaid Monks then Elected Richard, Prior 'of Dover, Archbiſhop; to which (tho' Falſe in matter of fact) the 'King replied nothing; but that his Father could not do it, to the 'Prejudice of his Succeſſors; Then Pandolf anſwered, but You your 'ſelf have agreed to it, and ſworn to obſerve what they have grun-'ted, and have thereby confirmed it, wherefore then ſhould you 'not obſerve it? Then after ſome Silence the King offer'd, That out of 'reſpect to the Pope, he would conſent, that if he would deprive 'this New Archbiſhop, and Nominate any other Perſon, he would 'receive him; to which the Legate returned, That the Holy Church 'could not degrade an Archbiſhop without manifeſt Cauſe, but 'would rather humble Kings and Princes than proved Rebels to her; 'Then the King repl'd, You only threaten; You ſuppoſe ſo to ſubject me to You as you have done the Emperor OTTO, my Nephew; which 'the Legate granted to be true, and ſaid, That his Lord, the Pope, 'very well knew, that as he had made him Emperor, ſo he had al-'ſo depoſed him; ſo could he alſo Humble the King as well as any 'other Prince; who thereupon replied, That they could ſpeak more 'ill, than they were able to perform; the Legate to this replied, 'That as the King had diſcovered to them the Secrets of his Heart, 'ſo they would do the like to him, and therefore they would let 'him know, That the Pope had already Excommunicated him,

'altho' the Execution of the Sentence was ſuſpended till their coming into England; that therefore ſince he continued Contumacious, he was further to know, That he now ſtood Excommunicated; Then the King asking him, what they could do more? The Legate to this return'd, That he was further to take Notice, That whoever for the future kept him Company, ſtood likewiſe involved in the ſame Sentence; and upon the King's repeating the ſame Queſtion, he added, That they now (that very Day) Abſolved all Earls, Barons, Knights, and all Clergy-men, and Free Lay-men from their Fealties and Homages in which they ſtood obliged to him, and would leave the Biſhops of Wincheſter and Norwich to ſee it perform'd; and that they would Abſolve all thoſe who would take up Arms againſt Him. Nor was this any hard Matter, becauſe divers Princes, Dukes, Earls, and Barons, had two years ſince offer'd the Pope to Invade the Kingdom, and ſubdue it for whom he ſhould pleaſe to beſtow it; pretending alſo, that whenever the Pope ſent his Army into England, all the People ſhould reſort to his General, or elſe ſhould be reduced to perpetual Servitude; but when the King asked again, what they could do more? The Legate plainly told him, That neither He nor any Heir of his, ſhould from that day forward wear the Crown; at which the King replied with ſome concern, that tho' they had pretended to come over to Promote his Cauſe, yet he now plainly ſaw, that it was only to Depoſe him. Then he ſwore By him who rules all Things, That if they again entred his Kingdom, he would make them and theirs Ride for a Year. What the King meant by this I know not, but the Legate took it in that Senſe, as if he would order them both to be Hang'd; yet told him, That they had hitherto promoted his Cauſe, and had come over at his Command, hoping, that he would obey God and the Pope, and make Satisfaction to the Church; but he had deceived their Expectations, and in return for the love they bore him, was now about to do all the Miſchief he could to himſelf and his Kingdom, which they had forewarn'd him to avoid; but they called God to Witneſs, that they had come hither upon no other Errand, than to ſuffer Death if there were occaſion, for the Cauſe of the Church; neither did they expect any other Reward at the King's Hands. Anno Dom. MCCXI.

This is the Sum of the Diſcourſe, which theſe Annaliſts relate to have paſſed between the King and the Pope's Legate. How far this was real, I will not determine; but it ſeems not to agree with Matt. Paris's Relation, who places the definitive Sentence of King John's Depoſition in the Year following; but theſe Monks further relate, That then the King, to terrifie the Legate, Commanded his Sheriffs and Foreſters, to bring before him ſuch as were in Priſon, (I ſuppoſe for Offences done in his Foreſts) ſome of whom he commanded to be Hang'd, ſome to have their Eyes put out, and others to be Diſmember'd; among theſe there was a certain Clerk, who was a †Notorious Forger of Writings, whom the King commanded to be Hanged; which when the Legate heard, he threatned to Excommunicate all thoſe, who ſhould preſume to do it, and called for a *Taper for that purpoſe; which the King perceiving, he ordered the [4] M. P. p. 230 Prince Llewelyn makes new Incursions into England, but is repuls'd with Loss.

[4] For it seems Llewelyn Prince of Wales had some time before made fresh Incursions into England, but was Repulsed with Loss, and made to submit to the King's Pleasure; tho' the Welsh Chronicles give us a quite different Account; and perhaps this was the very same Submission which they place under the preceding Year.

[5] Id. Ib. Reginald Earl of Boloign is expelled his Earldom by the K. of France.

[5] As for what happened in forreign Parts, Reginald Earl of Boloign was this Year Expelled his Earldom, and deprived of all his Estate by the King of France, who gave it to his own Son Philip, in perpetual Right, with the Daughter and Heir of that Earl, who now came into England, and was honourably received by King John, from whose Bounty he received 300 l. a Year in Land, and did Homage and Fealty to him.

[1] P. 231. The Pope Solemnly absolves the Subjects of England from their Allegiance to the King.

As for Ecclesiastical Affairs, [1] Matt. Paris defers the Pope's Solemn absolving the King's Subjects from their Allegiance till the latter end of this Year; when he tells us, that being further incensed at his Obstinacy in refusing the Admonitions of his Nuncio, he now Absolved all his Subjects, High and Low, from their Fidelity and Subjection to him; strictly injoyning all manner of Persons under the Pain of Excommunication, to avoid him in private and in Publick, both at his Table, and in Council, and even in common Conversation; for the King had at the time of this Interdict divers Counsellors about him, whom our Author does not scruple to Name; such as were William Earl of Salisbury, the King's half Brother, Aubery de Vere, Earl of Oxford, Geoffery Fitz-Peter, Justitiary of England, Hugh de Nevil, Chief Warden of his Forests, William de Brotham, Warden of the Cinque Ports, and divers other Noblemen, all whose Names it would be too tedious to Relate; besides Three Court Bishops, viz. Durham, Wincheſter, and Norwich, with Richrd de Marisco, the King's Chancellor; who all striving to please him in all things, were supposed not to give him Council according to Law or Reason, but his own Humour.

The Names of such as were then look'd upon as his Evil Counsellors.

Anno Dom. MCCXII. [2] King John now kept his Christmas at Windsor, and in Lent following held a great Feast at Clarken-well, where he Knighted Prince Alexander, only Son and Heir to the King of Scots, who then returned home with the Applause and Congratulations of both Kingdoms; so that it seems the King was not, for all the Pope's Excommunication, so far abhorred by Neighbouring Princes, as to make them avoid his Conversation. But Walter of Coventry gives us the true Reason of this more than ordinary Confidence of the King of Scots in King John, viz. because being now pretty well in Years, and finding the further Parts of his Kingdom much disturbed with Intestine Seditions, he implored the Assistance of the King of England, and had sent to him his only Son, and committed him to his Care entirely; but he then Returned him back again with Honour and large Promises of his future Kindnesses and Protection.

Not

Not long after this the Welſh made ſeveral Hoſtile Incurſions, and taking ſeveral Caſtles in England, put thoſe that defended them to the Sword, burnt many Towns, and returned with great Spoils into their own Country: The King being much provoked at this Action, levied a great Army of Tenents by Knights Service, beſides ordinary Horſe and Foot, reſolving to harraſs all Wales, and Root out the Inhabitants; and in Revenge, hanged up the Twenty eight Hoſtages which had been delivered to him the Year before: But when he was ready for this Expedition, he received Letters from the King of Scots, and his Natural Daughter, Wife to Prince Llewelin, of a Trayterous Conſpiracy formed againſt him, which at firſt he ſlighted, and ſo marched forward to Cheſter, but there he again received other Letters to the ſame effect, that if he went on, he ſhould either be ſlain by his Noblemen, or delivered up to his Enemies: At theſe repeated Advices he ſeemed much concerned, but when he underſtood that the Great Men of England were abſolved from their Obedience and Fealty to him, he gave more Credit to the Letters; and then changing his Deſign, Disbanded his Army, Returned to London, and ſent his Commiſſioners to all the Great Men he ſuſpected, to ſend him Pledges, that thereby he might know who were ready, and who refuſed to obey him: Then upon this they who durſt not oppoſe the King's Commands, ſent their Sons, Nephews and neareſt Relations, that ſo they might in ſome meaſure appeaſe his Indignation; but Euſtace de Veſcie, and Robert Fitz-Walter, being accuſed of Treaſon, fled out of England; Euſtace into Scotland, and Robert into France.

Anno Dom. MCCXII.

The Welſh make freſh Incurſions, take ſeveral Caſtles; upon which, the K reſolves to make War upon that People.

But upon notice from the K. of Scots, and the Wife of Llewelyn, of a Treaſonable Conſpiracy againſt him, he Returns home.

Dr. Powel's Chronicle juſtifies this Inſurrection of Prince Llewelyn, as that not being able to endure the injuries his Subjects ſuffered from the King's Gariſons in North-Wales, he called to his Aſſiſtance Gwenwyn-wyn, Lord of Powis-Land, Maelgon ap Rees from South-Wales, Madoc ap Gryffyth from Brome-Field, Meredyth ap Robert from Cydewen, and to theſe, who were then the Chief Lords and Princes of Wales, he declared their miſerable Condition; how they, who were wont to have a King of their own Nation, were now by their own private Diſcords brought into Subjection by Strangers, to which he added in few Words, that if they would but agree among themſelves, they might yet defend their antient Rights: Which when they had all promiſed to do, and had Sworn Fealty to Prince Llewelyn, they forthwith gathered an Army, and won all the Caſtles in North-Wales and Powis, except Ruthland and Diganwy; and then marching further into Powis, they laid Siege to the Caſtle of Mathreval, which Robert de Vipont had lately built; but when the King heard this, he levied an Army, and marched thither to raiſe the Siege, which he quickly did, and cauſed the Caſtle to be Demoliſhed (as not worth keeping;) but then having greater Affairs in Hand, he returned Home. Yet, being a little afterwards at Nottingham, and hearing that the Prince of Wales ſtill deſtroyed the Marches, he Commanded the Hoſtages to be Executed, as has been already ſaid; who were moſt of them hopeful Youths, being the Sons of the Chief Men of Wales: To which this Author alſo adds, that the ſaid Robert de Vipount cauſed Rees the Son of Maelgon to be hanged at Shrewsbury by the King's Order, being a Child of not Seven

Seven Years old; ſo much did King John exceed his Father in Cruelty; who was ſatisfied with only putting out the Eyes of his Welſh Hoſtages. And indeed it was a deplorable Object to ſee theſe Innocents ſo cruelly put to death for the offences of their Relations; tho' it muſt be owned, that their Levity and Treachery can no ways be excuſed, who gave the King ſo great a provocation thus to exert his Cruelty upon their Children and Relations.

[3] M. P. p. 232. Peter a Hermite foretels that K. John ſhould not be K. by Aſcenſion-day following. For which the Hermite is ſeized, and brought before the K. where he juſtifies what he had ſaid, and is thereupon committed to Cuſtody.

[3] Sometime after this, Peter a Hermite of Wakefield in Yorkſhire, who had often taken upon him to foretell things to come; he Prophecied that by Aſcenſion-day following, King John ſhould not be King; but on that Day the Crown ſhould be transferred to another; which when he heard, he cauſed the Hermite to be ſeized and brought before him, and then asked him, whether he was that day to die, or elſe by what other means he ſhould be deprived of his Crown; but all the King could get from the Hermite was, to bid him aſſure himſelf that on that day he ſhould not be King, and if he were convicted of a Lye, he might then deal with him as he pleaſed; to whom the King replied, it ſhould be according to his own offer, and ſo committed him to the Cuſtody of William de Harecourt to be kept cloſe Priſoner, till it was ſeen what would be the Iſſue of his Prediction: In the mean while this was firmly believed by the People, as if it had been a voice from Heaven; ſo eaſie and credulous have the Engliſh vulgar always been obſerved in the belief of Prophecies.

[4] Id. p. 232. The K. had now highly incenſed the Nobility againſt him, and for what cauſe.

[4] Here our Author farther adds, that the King being a Prince of Inſatiable Luſt and Cruelty, had now highly provoked divers of the Noblemen of the Kingdom by debauching of their Wives and Daughters, or by Baniſhing their Relations, or elſe by Reduceing them to Poverty through his illegal Exactions, ſo that he had thereby made himſelf almoſt as many Enemies as there were Noblemen in the Kingdom; and our Monk further tells us, that when they knew themſelves to be abſolved from their Fidelity by the Pope, they exceedingly rejoyced: For if common Fame might be credited, they had every one of them Sign'd and Seal'd a certain Charter which they ſent to the King of France, aſſuring him, he might ſafely come into England, obtain the Kingdom, and be Crowned with Honour. From whence the Reader may obſerve, that it is no new thing for the Nobility of England, when their Kings have broken the Conditions of Government expreſs'd in their Coronation Oath, to ſeek the Protection of a Foreign Prince, in Hopes of finding better Uſage from him; but of this you will hear more a few Years hence.

Many of them hearing they were abſolved from their Allegiance, Seal a Charter to the K. of France.

The ſad effects of the K's. jealouſie of his Subjects.

Walter of Coventry is more exact in ſetting forth the ſad effects of this King's fear and ſuſpicion of his Subjects; for he ſays, that after he had baniſhed a great many Noblemen, he had the reſt in ſuch ſuſpicion, that he never went abroad but well Armed, and ſurrounded with a Guard; and moreover he often clapt up ſome of thoſe, that before ſeemed very intimate with him, and ſuddenly taking the ſtrong Places of divers of the Earls and Barons into his own hands, the whole Kingdom was thereupon in a general Commotion. Wherefore many of the great Men, being either conſcious of ſome Crime, or elſe fearing the King's Diſpleaſure, ſtole away way into Scotland or France, as particularly Euſtace de Veſcie, and Robert Fitz-Walter, whoſe Lands and Goods the King had ſeized, and alſo demoliſhed a Caſtle in London, belonging to this Lord Robert, called Baynard's Caſtle, as likewiſe ſeveral other Places of ſtrength. Anno. Dom. MCCXII. Baynard's Caſtle.

[5] But when the King was rid of theſe Great Men, he began to carry himſelf more mildly towards the reſt of his Subjects, and amongſt his many ſevere Actions, did this one good one, that finding the Nation much oppreſt by the cruel Exactions of his Foreſters, and having compaſſion upon the ſufferings of the People, he Remitted the Fines they had unjuſtly Exacted; and farther made all Officers of Foreſts to take an Oath, that for the future they would not demand any thing from the People, but what had been wont to be paid in his Father's Reign. At the ſame time alſo he Remitted ſeveral Exactions which had been lately laid upon the Sea-ports, on pretence of guarding them from Foreign Enemies, and alſo in divers other matters, ſeemed very kind and favourable to the Petitions of poor Widdows and others that were any ways oppreſs'd; but all this was Interpreted as done meerly out of Fear, and to obtain the Favour of the Common People. [5] Id. ib. After their departure, the K. grows more merciful to the common People.

About this time, [1] Stephen Archbiſhop of Canterbury, William Biſhop of London, and Euſtace Biſhop of Ely, went to Rome, and informed the Pope of the many Enormities King John had committed ſince the Interdict; lifting up (as they termed it) the Hand of Oppreſſion and Cruelty againſt God and Holy Church; and therefore humbly beſought him in this Extremity to Commiſerate and Aſſiſt the Engliſh Church. [1] M. P. p. 232 The A. Bp. with ſome Bps go to Rome to excite the P. againſt King John; whereupon a Sentence of Depoſition is Iſſued out againſt him.

The Pope ſeem'd very much Concerned, when he had heard their Complaints, and by the Advice of his Cardinals, Biſhops and other Great Men, pronounced the Sentence of Depoſition or Deprivation againſt King John, and farther reſolved that a more worthy Perſon ſhould ſucceed him: And therefore to this end the Pope wrote to Philip King of France to put this Sentence in Execution; and to render him the more willing to undertake it, he granted to him Remiſſion of all his Sins, together with the Kingdom of England to himſelf and his Succeſſors in perpetual Right, when once he had Dethroned and Expelled the preſent Poſſeſſor. The Pope writes to the K. of France, to put this Sentence in Execution, and grants him great Indulgences for ſo doing.

He alſo wrote to the Great Men, Knights and other Warriors of divers Nations, that they ſhould undertake this War, Signing themſelves with the Croſs (as if it were for that of the Holy-Land) for the Dethroning of King John; and that they ſhould follow the King of France as their General in this Expedition, and labour to vindicate the Injury done to the Catholick Church; and farther Decreed, that whoſoever ſhould contribute either Money, or other Aſſiſtance towards the ſubduing of this Contumacious King, ſhould be ſecure not only in their Goods and Perſons, but alſo as to their Souls, through the Prayers of the Church: And that they ſhould enjoy the ſame Priviledges with thoſe who Viſit the Sepulchre of our Lord.

[2] With this large Commiſſion, the Pope ſent Pandulph his Nuntio with the Engliſh Biſhops for England; firſt giving him Inſtructions, that every thing ſhould be punctually put in Execution, according [2] The Pope's private Inſtructions to his Legate.

Then the Legate, when the Company were all withdrawn, privately asked the Pope, what he ſhould do, if the King of England ſhould Repent, and make Satisfaction to God and the Roman Church, and all others concerned in this Buſineſs? Whereupon the Pope preſcribed certain Conditions of Peace, to which if the King would Aſſent, he might yet obtain the Favour of the Apoſtolick See.

[3] Ib. 233. R. C. A great Fire in Southwark, by which St. Mary Overy's Church is burnt, with London Bridge, and great part of the City.

Nothing elſe happened remarkable this Year, [3] but that a great Fire beginning in Southwark; the Church of St. Mary Overy's was burnt, and the Fire going on to London Bridge, not only a great part of that, but alſo of the City it ſelf was conſumed to Aſhes; and which was worſe ſtill, a great number of People periſhed by this means; for whilſt they ran over the Bridge, ſome to behold, others to help to quench the Flames, the Houſes on the North End thereof took Fire, and preſently after the other End of it alſo; ſo that the Multitude being thus Encloſed both behind and before, many of them were forced to leap into the River, whilſt others, crowding into the Boats that came to their Relief, were the cauſe of their own Deſtruction, the Boats and People ſinking together; ſo that what with the Fire, and what with the Water, near 3000 Perſons were ſuppoſed to have periſh'd by this unfortunate Accident, which happened on the 10th of July.

Near 3000 Souls periſhed either by Fire or Water.

Anno Dom. MCCXIII. [4] This Year King John kept his Chriſtmas at Weſtminſter, being very ſlenderly attended by his Nobility; and about the latter End of January, the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, with the Biſhops of London and Ely, Returned from Rome into France, where they held a Council, and made known to King Philip and the Biſhops and Clergy of that Kingdom, the Sentence that had been Solemnly pronounced at Rome againſt King John for his Contumacy; and beſought them, as well for the ſake of the Pope, as for the Remiſſion of their own Sins, unanimouſly to Invade England, and Depoſe King John, by the Authority of the Apoſtolick See, and to ſet up another more Worthy Perſon in his Room.

[4] M. P. Ib. The Bp's of England Return from Rome into France, where they held a Council, and acquaint that K. and his Bps with the Pp's Sentence againſt K. John. And excite K. Philip to depoſe him. Who thereupon raiſes a great Army.

Upon this the King of France, now ſeeing what he had ſo long deſired, was cometo paſs, preſently prepared himſelf for the Expedition, and Commanded all his Subjects, Dukes, Earls, Barons, and Knights with their * Eſquires, to be ready at Rouen with their Horſes and Arms, on pain of Culvertage, and of incurring the Crime of Treaſon, (which was then termed Felony.) He likewiſe cauſed all his own Ships, with as many as he could muſter together, to be very well ſtored with all ſorts of Proviſions and Ammunition.

* Servientes. Culvertage, Du Freſne in his Gloſs, interprets, Confiſcation of Goods and Eſtate.

† But notwithſtanding this great preparation, Pandulph the Pope's Legate, being now arrived in France, would not permit that King to Invade England, till ſuch time as he had once more gone over, and tried whither King John, being allarmed with theſe preparations, could not be brought to Repentance, and ſo make Satisfaction for the Injuries he had done to the Archbiſhop of Canterbury and the Clergy.

[5] In the mean time, King John being certified by his Spies, what was doing beyond Sea, conſidered with himſelf how he ſhould prevent theſe Deſigns; and therefore in the Month of March, He iſſued out a Writ directed to all Bayliffs of Sea-Ports, &c. thereby Commanding that all Ships of whatſoever Ports through England, which could carry Six Horſes or more, to be liſted, and the Maſters and Mariners to be ready at Portſmouth by Mid-Lent following, and the Bayliffs were to Return up to the King a Liſt of the ſaid Ships; and having now made this Proviſion for his Defence by Sea, he likewiſe took the ſame Care at Land, by directing other Writs or Commiſſions much of the ſame Nature to all Sheriffs of the Kingdom, ſtreightly Commanding them that they ſhould Summon all the Earls, Barons, Knights, Freemen and Eſquires, (whoever they were, and of whomſoever they held) that ought, or could have Arms, and who had done Homage and Fealty to him, to be ready with their Horſes and Arms at the cloſe of Eaſter; and that none ſhould remain at Home who could bear Arms under the like Penalty of Culvertage, which it ſeems was then a like Term for this Fault as well in England as in France; and thoſe who had no Land, and yet could bear Arms, were likewiſe to appear at Dover, and enter into the King's Pay: and the Sheriffs were alſo to Return a Liſt to the King of thoſe that freely left their ſeveral Bailywicks, as well as of thoſe who refuſed to ſtir: They were alſo to Command all Markets adjoining to follow the King's Camp, and not to be held elſewhere.

Anno Dom. MCCXIII.

[4] M. p. 233. The K. to prevent theſe deſigns, ſends out Writs to Preſs all the Ships he could.

Vid. the Writ at large in Matt. Paris And likewiſe iſſues other Writs to the Sheriffs to Summon all the Military Tenants of the Kingdom, And that none ſhould remain at home upon pain of Culvertage.

I have been the more particular in giving an account of this Writ or Commiſſion of Array, becauſe the Reader may draw divers uſeful Obſervations from thence, concerning the Militia in thoſe times; as firſt that the Sheriff was then the only Chief Officer, as well Civil as Military of each County: As alſo that the ordinary Militia of England, (conſiſting of the Tenants by Knights Services) were then the only Forces for the Defence of the Kingdom; no conſtant ſtanding Armies being at that time in faſhion, either in England or France.

[1] But to return to our Hiſtory; upon theſe Writs, in divers Places upon the Sea-Coaſts, eſpecially about Dover, Feverſham, and Ipſwich, (where it was moſt ſuſpected the Enemy might Land) vaſt Multitudes of all ſorts and conditions of Men preſently Liſted themſelves, who feared nothing more, than the Reproach of Culvertage; which ſeems to have been then not only a Penalty, but alſo a Term of reproach for Cowardize: But their Numbers being ſo great, that they began to want Victuals, the Commanders ſent home Thouſands of the unarmed Rabble, and retained the Knights, Eſquires, Freemen, Croſs-bow-men and Archers.

[1] Id. ib. Upon theſe Writs great Multitudes liſt themſelves on the Sea-Coaſts of England. Which growing too numerous, many of the meaner ſort are ſent home.

[2] The Biſhop of Norwich alſo about this time Landed out of Ireland with 500 Foot Soldiers, and many Horſe to attend the King, and was kindly Received by him: Inſomuch that the whole Force that was then Muſtered upon Barham-Down, conſiſted of Sixty Thouſand Stout and well appointed Men; upon which our Author very juſtly obſerves, that if they had been then all of one mind, mind, there had not been any Prince in the World could have withſtood the King of England: But indeed the Miſchief of it was, that all the Clergy, who at that time had a large ſhare in the Government of Men's Conſciences, were highly incenſed againſt the King; nor can I ſay the Laiety were leſs diſcontented, by reaſon of the vaſt arbitrary Taxes they had paid, and all to ſo little purpoſe.

[2] Id. ib. The Bp. of Norwich comes over out of Ireland with 500 Foot, beſides Horſe; which made up an Army of 60000 Men.

[3] Id. ib. The K. finding himſelf ſtrongeſt at Sea, reſolves to fight the French with his Fleet.

[3] However, the King finding himſelf ſtronger at Sea than the French, (tho' they were then near 1700 Sail, conſiſting chiefly of ſmall Veſſels) reſolved to meet and Fight them on that Element; from whence our Author obſerves, that the greateſt hopes King John had of ſubduing his Enemies, lay in the advantage he had over them by his Fleet: So that it appears, whilſt a King of England is Maſter at Sea, he need not fear any Foreign Enemies.

Of all the great Feudataries to France, none refuſed to aſſiſt that K. but the Earl of Flanders; So that King makes War upon him, and takes divers of his Towns.

But now let us ſee how the Nobility of France behaved themſelves; in the mean time Rigord the old French Hiſtorian, as alſo our own Walſingham Relates, that of all the Princes and Great Men, who were Feudataries to the King of France, none refuſed to Aſſiſt him in this Expedition, except Ferrand Earl of Flanders: Wherefore the King reſolved, before ever he Engaged with England, to put him out of a Condition to do him any Hurt; and ſo Invading his Territories, he ſubdued the Towns of Ipre, Caſſel, and all the Country to Bruges, with the Port of Dam; and then laid Siege to Gaunt.

[4] Id. ib. The Engliſh Fleet puts to Sea under the Command of the Earls of Boloigne, and Salisbury. who Block up the French in the Harbour of Dam. The French K. orders his Ships to be burnt, with the Town of Dam.

[4] In the mean while the Engliſh Fleet put to Sea, under the Command of the Earl of Boloigne, (whoſe Dominions the King of France had lately ſeized) and William Longeſpee Earl of Salisbury, the King's baſe Brother, who had taken or burnt all thoſe which lay upon the Coaſt, and kept the Harbour of Dam ſo ſtreightly blockt up, that the French could not get out. Thereupon the King of France raiſed the Siege of Gaunt, and marching to the Sea-Side, beat back the Engliſh to their Ships, and killed Two thouſand of them; nevertheleſs, they being ſtill Maſters of the Sea, and the French Ships being ſmall, and of little Force, durſt not ſtir out; therefore the King of France, after he had cauſed their Tackle and Lading to be taken out, ordered all the Ships to be burnt, and then he fired the Town of Dam, for fear the Enemy ſhould make themſelves Maſters of it; and ſo he returned to Paris.

[5] Id. Ib. Notwithſtanding this good Succeſs, the K. is diſmay'd, and accepts a Treaty with the Legate.

[5] Notwithſtanding this good Succeſs, yet whilſt King John lay upon the Coaſt of Kent, near Dover, with his Army, watching the French King's motions, Pandulf the Pope's Legate, ſent over Two Knights-Templers to let King John know, he deſired to Treat with him, and Offer him Terms of Peace and Reconciliation, tho' he were already Depoſed by the Pope's Sentence. The King thereupon accepting the Meſſage, ſent him Word by the ſame Perſons, that he might if he pleaſed paſs over with ſafety; upon which the Legate immediately came into England, met the King at Dover, and there repreſented to him the great Danger he was in from that vaſt Fleet and Army the King of France had at the Mouth of the River Seyn, ready Equipt to come over for the Conqueſt of the Kingdom; wherein likewiſe would come all the Biſhops, Clergymen, and Laymen, who had been unjuſtly Baniſhed the Realm; who thereupon comes over into England, and frights the K. into a ſubmiſſion to the Pope.

Realm; but (which was above all) the French King boaſted alſo, that he had received Charters or Aſſurances from moſt of the Great Men of England, of their Fidelity and Obedience to him; and therefore adviſed him to ſubmit himſelf, and make his Peace with the Apoſtolick See, before it was too late. We may from hence obſerve, That had not this Unfortunate Prince been now upon very ill terms with his own Subjects, he needed not to have been afraid of what either the Pope, or King of France, could have acted againſt him. Anno Dom. MCCXIII.

But to proceed with our Hiſtory; King John being highly terrified with this News, did upon thoſe and ſome other Conſiderations, [1] which our Author has given us, (tho' needleſs here to be inſerted) at laſt by the Perſuaſion of the Legate, agree (but yet with great Reluctance) to that very Form, or Article of Peace which had been propoſed and drawn up at Rome; and in Confirmation of which the King ſwore upon the Holy Goſpels, that he would obey the Judgment of the Church; and at the ſame time alſo Sixteen of the Chief Earls and Barons of the whole Kingdom, ſwore on his behalf, That if he ſhould happen to depart from what he had agreed to, they would to the utmoſt of their Power compel him to make his Holineſs Satisfaction.

[1] Id. ib. The K. at laſt agrees to the ſame Form of Peace, which had been drawn up at Rome, and he with 16 of the Chief Noblemen ſwear to the Obſervance of it.

[2] Then on the 13th of May following, (being the Monday before Aſcention Day) the King, and Pandulph the Legate, together with the Earls, Barons, and a very great Company met at Dover, where they unanimouſly agreed to a Peace, which was drawn up at large in the Form of a *Charter, under his Seal, in which having firſt recited the Names of four great Barons, (Viz.) William Earl of Salisbury; Reginald, Earl of Boloigne; William, Earl of Warren; and William Earl of Ferrers; they all ſwore on his behalf, that he ſhould truly obſerve the following Articles.

[2] Id. ib. The K. with his Earls and Barons meet the Legate again at Dover, where he Seals the Charter of Agreement.

*See the Charter at large in Matt. Paris.

The Articles of Agreement between the Pope and the King.

Firſt, They Swore to ſtand to the Commands of the Pope, to be imparted by his Legate, or Nuncio, concerning all Matters for which the King ſtood Excommunicated.

Secondly, That he would grant true Peace and Safety to Stephen Archbiſhop of Canterbury, as alſo to the Biſhops of London, Ely, Hereford, Bath, and Lincoln, together with the Prior and Monks of Canterbury, and to Robert Fitz-Walter, and Euſtace de Veſcie, and to all other Clerks and Laicks concern'd in this Affair; Swearing further, That he would do them no hurt, either in their Perſons or Eſtates, but remitting all Anger and Ill Will towards them, would fully receive them into his Favour.

Thirdly, That he would iſſue out Letters Patents, by which he would confirm all theſe Things, and cauſe as many Biſhops and Barons, as the Archbiſhop and Biſhops ſhould chuſe, to ſwear and give their Charters for the Security of the Peace.

Fourthly, That if He or any Others by his Order ſhould violate this Agreement, then thoſe Biſhops and Barons, on behalf of the Church, ſhould adhere to the Pope's Commands, againſt him, and that in ſuch Caſe he would for Ever loſe the Cuſtody of Vacant Churches.

Fifthly, He obliged himſelf to ſend Letters of Safe Conduct and Security for the Performance of theſe Things, to the Archbiſhop and Biſhops, before their return into England; who were alſo (if the King pleaſed)

to

Anno Dom. MCCXIII. to take an Oath, that they would not either by Themſelves, or any Other, attempt any thing againſt his Perſon, or Crown.

Sixthly, He alſo promiſed Reſtitution, and ſufficient Satisfaction for what they (whether Clerks or Laicks) had been endamaged, either in their Goods, or Liberties.

Seventhly, That he would cauſe all Clerks and Laicks who had been kept in Priſon upon the Account of this Quarrel, to be releaſed; and that preſently after the Legate's arrival (who could Abſolve the King) he would pay him, in part of Reſtitution, what had been taken away from the Archbiſhop, Biſhops, and Monks, the Sum of Eight thouſand Pounds Sterling, which was to be divided between them, according to the ſeveral Rates and Proportions therein expreſs'd.

Laſtly, He was forced to renounce and recall for the future the Out-Lawry of all Clergy-men, as not at all belonging to his Juriſdiction; as alſo the Out-Lawry of Lay-men, as far as related to this Matter.

Upon the true Performance of all which Particulars, the Sentence of the Interdict was to be releaſed; and if there remain'd any Doubt or Diſpute concerning theſe Articles, they were to be Judged and Determined by the Pope's Legate: This Charter bears Date at Dover, the 13th Day of May, being the Fourteenth Year of this King's Reign.

[3] Id. ib. The Legate is not ſatisfied with theſe Conditions, unleſs the K. reſign his Crown into his hands for the Pope's uſe, which the K. alſo agrees to.

[3] Nevertheleſs, the Legate was not content with theſe Conditions, but pretended that his Crime was ſo heinous, that nothing could obtain the Pope's Abſolution, but the King's abſolute Reſignation of his Crown: wherefore two days after, (being the 15th of May) the King with the Great Men of the Kingdom, met again at the Houſe of the Knights-Templars near Dover, where humbling Himſelf before the Legate, He (according to what had been before reſolved at Rome) Reſign'd his Crown to the Pope, in the Preſence of Pandulf his Legate; which Reſignation being reduced into due Form, he thereby confirm'd to the Pope and his Succeſſors, the Grant of the ſaid Kingdoms by his *Charter; wherein having firſt acknowledged himſelf to have highly offended God and Holy-Mother the Church, therefore in full ſatisfaction, (not being conſtrain'd by Fear, but of his own Free Will, and by the Common *Advice, or Conſent of his Barons) he granted to God, and to St. Peter and Paul, and to Pope Innocent and his Succeſſors, the whole Kingdom of England and Ireland, for the Remiſſion of his own Sins, and that of his Family, to be held by him for the future as a Feudatary of the Church of Rome. And it likewiſe recites, that he ſwore Homage and Fealty to the Pope and his Succeſſors, before the ſaid Pandulf, obliging his Heirs and Succeſſors to do the like for the time being; and for a further Proof of this his perpetual Obligation, he promiſed to pay a Thouſand Marks by the Year Rent, for all other Services, that is, Seven Hundred Marks for England, and Three Hundred Marks for Ireland, by equal Portions, ſaving to Him and his Heirs the Power of Executing all Juſtice, and creating Juſtices, with all Liberties and Royalties.

The Reſignation is reduced into Writings, and the Contents of it. *See the Charter at large in Matt. Paris. * Conſilio.

There is alſo at the end of the Charter, a Remarkable Clauſe, whereby he obliged Himſelf and his Succeſſors, not to revoke it, which is expreſſed in theſe Terms, That if He or any of them ſhould preſume *presume any ways to contradict it, whosoever he were, unless upon admonition, he repented of it, he should immediately forfeit his Right to the Kingdom; This Charter is Witnessed by the King himself, in the Presence of Henry, Archbishop of Dublin, John Bishop of Norwich, and divers Earls and Noblemen of the Kingdom; whose Names you may find in my Author at the end thereof. Anno Dom. MCCXIII. * Cad. à Jure Regni.

[4] This Charter being Seal'd, the King delivered it to Pandulf to be carried to Pope Innocent, and then in the Presence of them all did Homage to the Pope, as his Supreme Lord, represented by Pandulf, in the most submissive and abject Manner, according to the Forms and Customs of those Times; promising also to keep and defend the Kingdoms of England and Ireland as the Patrimony of St. Peter; and then it was that Pandulf proudly trode under his Feet the Money which the King had offer'd as a Mark or Earnest of his Subjection; which did not a little trouble the Archbishop of Dublin, who at the same time blam'd his haughty Carriage: These things were done on the Vigil of our Lord's Ascension, the above-named Bishops, Earls, and Barons being present. [4] Id. ib. The K. thereupon does Homage to the Pope for the Kingdoms of England and Ireland.

[5] Nor can I here omit taking notice of one great piece of Severity (if not Cruelty) of this King, immediately after his Resignation of the Crown to the Legate: You have already heard of Peter the Hermit's Prophecy, That the King should cease to be so, upon Ascension-Day; This, tho' it was in some measure fulfill'd, by the above-mention'd Resignation of the Crown, and his taking it back again upon those Conditions, whereby the King's Independent and Absolute Dominion was totally given up, yet he would understand none of these Niceties; but Ascension-Day being now past, and he still continuing in the Possession of his Throne, he was resolved to be revenged of this supposed False Prophet; wherefore the King commanded him to be drawn at Horses Tails from Corf-Castle (where he was Prisoner) to the Town of Warham, and there to be Hang'd upon a Gibbet, together with his Son, whose Crime I do not find mentioned; tho' if he were not himself a Partaker of his Father's Crime, it was certainly a great Instance of this King's Cruelly. But how severe soever this Proceeding might be, it stands as a good warning in History to deter pretenders to Divine Revelation from taking upon them to Predict the Fates of Princes. [5] Id. ib. The K. after Ascension-Day orders Peter the Hermite to be Executed, notwithstanding that his Propheſie seemed in some sort fulfilled.

[2] The Legate, as soon as he arrived, presently applied himself to the King of France, who then lay ready with an Army to Invade England, and did all he could to persuade him to desist from his Design, for that now he could not prosecute it without offending the Pope, seeing King John was ready to make Satisfaction to Holy-Church, and to Obey the Pope's Orders. The King who was not well pleased with what he said, reply'd, He had expended more 'than Sixty Thousand Pounds in Arms, Victuals, and fitting out 'of Ships, and had undertaken the Enterprize at the Pope's Com- 'mands, [2] Id. ib. The Legate persuades the K. of Fr. to desist from his Enterprize against England. But he does not agree to it, and the Reason why.

'mands, and for the Remiſſion of his own Sins, all which now 'ſignify'd nothing.

From whence we may obſerve, what Tools Princes were in that Age to the Pope, who could make them Cudgel one another into Obedience to himſelf, and when he had once effected it, he valued them no further.

The difference between M. Paris and the French Hiſtorians, concerning the Time of the Fr. King's Expedition againſt Flanders.

Next to this in time, Matt. Paris places the King of France's Expedition againſt the Earl of Flanders, whoſe not joining with him in his intended Invaſion, he makes to have been the greateſt Obſtacle, why that King durſt not undertake it; whereas the French Hiſtorians affirm with greater Probability, that the Expedition againſt the Earl of Flanders, was undertaken during the time of Pandulf's being in England.

[3] M.P. P. 238. K. John is in hopes, by the Aſſiſtance of the Emp. and E. of Flanders, to recover his Loſſes in Fr. and to that end muſters a great Army, but the Barons refuſe to attend him; and for what Reaſon.

But however, it is certain, that King John being now puffed up with his late ſeeming Succeſs, was in hopes [3] by the Aſſiſtance of the Emperor and the Earl of Flanders, to regain what he had loſt in France; to this end he muſter'd up a great Army at Portſmouth, which being join'd, the Great Men and Barons refuſed to follow him, unleſs he were firſt abſolved from his Excommunication, which hitherto had been deferr'd, under pretence, that the Archbiſhop of Canterbury was to come over to perform it in Perſon on the Pope's behalf. Wherefore the King was forced to ſend for him, and the reſt of the baniſhed Biſhops, and for their greater Honour, there went to conduct them over, Henry Archbiſhop of Dublin, John Biſhop of Norwich, William Earl of Arundel, with two other Perſons of leſs Note, as appears by the King's * Writ or Letter to the ſaid Archbiſhop and Biſhops, ſtill remaining among the Records in the Tower, by which he deſires them to make what haſte they could over, becauſe he had long expected their coming.

The K. ſends in all haſte for the exil'd Bps.

[4] Id. p. 239. The K. ſends the Biſhops a Charter for their greater Security.

[4] Matt. Paris further adds, That for their greater Security the King was alſo oblig'd to ſend them the Charts or Aſſurances of Twenty four Earls and Barons, that they might return with ſafety into England, and receive Satisfaction according to the late Articles of Peace. Whereupon, Stephen Archbiſhop of Canterbury, William Biſhop of London, Euſtace Biſhop of Ely, Hubert Biſhop of Lincoln, and Giles Biſhop of Hereford, together with the other Clerks and Laicks then in Exile by reaſon of the Interdict, through the Mediation of Pandulf the Legate, arrived at Dover on the 16th of July, (being St. Margaret's Day) and went to wait on the King at Wincheſter; who when he knew they were coming, went forth to meet them, and throwing himſelf at the Feet of the Biſhops, beſeeched them with Tears to have Mercy on him, and the Kingdom of England; Upon this, they ſeeing his great Humility, lifted him up from the Ground, not without Tears likewiſe, and led him to the Chapter-Houſe at Wincheſter, where, before he was Abſolved, he took his Oath, 'That he would Love, Defend, and Maintain Holy 'Church and the Clergy, againſt all their Adverſaries, to the utmoſt 'of his Power; that he would Re-eſtabliſh the good Laws of 'his Anceſtors, and eſpecially thoſe of King Edward, and deſtroy 'the Wicked ones; That he would Judge all his Subjects according 'to the juſt Judgment of his Court, and would reſtore to every Man 'his Right: He alſo ſwore, That he would make full Satisfaction

to

'to all concern'd in the Buſineſs of the Interdict, for what had been 'taken from them, before Eaſter next; if not, the Sentence of Ex-communication was to be renewed againſt him; Moreover, He 'ſwore Fealty and Obedience to Pope Innocent, and his Catholick 'Succeſſors, as it was contained in his late Charter: Then the Archbiſhop carried him into the Church, and there ſung Maſs; from whence they went, and Dined at the ſame Table with the King, to the great Joy and Satisfaction of them all. Anno Dom. MCCXIII.

[4] On the Morrow after his Abſolution, the King ſent his Precepts to all the Sheriffs of England; that they ſhould cauſe to meet at St. Albans, on the Fourth of Auguſt, Four Lawful Men, with the Reeve, or Bailiff of every Town, they kept in their own Hands; that ſo by thoſe and their other Officers, he might enquire and be informed, what Damage every Biſhop had ſuſtained, what had been taken from, and what was ſtill due to him. [4] Id. ib. He ſends to all the Sheriffs of England, to enquire what Damages the Biſhops had ſuſtained.

[5] Then the King made haſte to Portſmouth in order to paſs into Poictou, committing the Government of the Kingdom to Geoffry Fitz-Peter, and the Biſhop of Wincheſter, with direction that they ſhould order all the Affairs of the Nation by the Advice of the Archbiſhop of Canterbury: But when the King came to Portſmouth, his *Great Men, Knights, and ſuch as held by Military Tenure, complained, they had been there ſo long in expectation of this Expedition, that all their Money was ſpent; and unleſs he would furniſh them with more out of his Treaſury, they could not go with him; which the King refuſing to do, took Shipping himſelf with his Private Family, and after three Days arrived at Jerſey, while his Lords and Great Men returned Home; at length when he ſaw himſelf thus Deſerted, he came back into England; ſo that nothing was further done in this Deſign. Ralph de Coggeſhal lays the Miſcarriage of this Voyage, chiefly upon the Barons of the North, whom he had ſummoned to go over with him; but they with one conſent denied it, affirming, That they were not obliged to it according to the Tenure of their Eſtates; and further added, That they were already ſo impoveriſhed by the late Expeditions at home, that they neither could, nor would do any more; but who were moſt in fault, whether the King for thus urging their Service, or they for denying it, is hard to Judge at this diſtance of time. [5] Id. p. 239. The K. prepares to go beyond Sea. * Magnates. His great Men excuſe themſelves from going over with him. Ral. de Coggeſhal lays this Miſcarriage on the Barons of the North.

[1] Whilſt the King was abſent, and taken up in this unſucceſsful Affair, his Juſticiaries held a Council at St. Albans, with the Archbiſhops, Biſhops, and Great Men of the Kingdom, where the King's Peace was proclaimed to all Men; and it was firmly enjoin'd on his behalf, That the Laws of King Henry his Grandfather ſhould be obſerved by all Perſons, and that all unjuſt Laws ſhould be abrogated: And there likewiſe it was further order'd, That no Sheriffs, Foreſters, or other the King's Officers, as they valued either their Lives or Limbs, ſhould extort any thing violently from any Man, or preſume to wrong any one; nor that they ſhould make Scotalls in any Part of the Kingdom, as they uſed to do. [1] Id. ib. A Council held by his Juſticiaries at St. Albans, where the K's Peace is proclaimed. Scotalla*; Exactions made by Foreſt-Officers who ſold Ale.

[2] And now the King immediately after his Return, ſuppoſing himſelf deſerted by ſome of the Great Men of the North, rais'd a Powerful Army, that ſo he might force thoſe whom he looked upon as Rebels to the Performance of their wonted Duty and Service; [2] Id. ib. The K. ſeeing himſelf deſerted by his Barons, raiſes an Army againſt them, but is admoniſhed by the A. Bp to forbear making War without the Judgment of his Court.

Anno Dom. MCCXIII. But when he would have marched forward to reduce them, the Archbiſhop came to him to Northampton, and told him, He violated the Oath he had taken at his Abſolution, if he made War upon any one without the Judgment of his Court; Hereupon, the King with a loud Voice anſwered, He would not lay aſide the Buſineſs of the Kingdom for him, who had nothing to do with Lay-matters.

So next Morning early, the King marched towards Nottingham; the Archbiſhop followed him, and threatned, that unleſs he quickly deſiſted, he would Anathematize all thoſe, beſides himſelf, that ſhould take up Arms againſt any Man before the Relaxation of the Interdict; by which means, he cauſed the King to give over proſecuting the Barons by Force, and left them not, untill he had obtained a competent Day for them, to anſwer in his Court, and to be tryed there: Yet we do not find that ever they appeared there at all, for the Pope's Legate and Archbiſhop made their Peace for 'em, as you will find hereafter.

[3] Id. p. 240. A Synod of the Clergy at London, and on what Occaſion.

[3] Then upon the 25th of Auguſt, a Council or Synod met at London, to compoſe all Differences between the King and the Barons; at which time the Biſhops, Abbots, Deans, and ſeveral Barons, being all aſſembled in St. Paul's Church, with the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, he, before they fell to any Buſineſs, ſo far Indulged all Churches, both Conventual and Parochial, That tho' the Interdict was not yet taken off, yet however, they might there Chant over their Canonical Hours, or Prayers, with a low Voice, which was ſome favour, it being not permitted them to celebrate Divine Service any other manner.

The A.Bp gives leave to the Monks & Prieſts to celebrate Divine Service with a low Voice.

After this was over, in the ſame Aſſembly, the Archbiſhop reſolving to keep the King to that Oath he had lately taken at Wincheſter, drew ſome of the Great Men of the Kingdom aſide, and put them in Mind, that when he Abſolved the King there, he had made him to ſwear, That he would aboliſh all unjuſt Laws, and cauſe the good Ones, (that is to ſay, the Laws of King Edward) to be obſerved by all Men in the Kingdom. He farther alſo told them, He had found a certain Charter of King Henry the Firſt, by which, if they would themſelves, they might aſſert the Antient Liberties they had ſo long loſt. Then producing the Charter it ſelf, he cauſed it to be read publickly before them, which was received by them with great Joy and Satisfaction; and being the ſame with that already recited in the beginning of King Henry the Firſt's Reign, I need not repeat here. Only I muſt needs confeſs it ſeems very ſtrange, that this Charter, which is ſaid by this very Author to have been preſerved in all the Counties, and moſt of the Monaſteries in England, ſhould now be grown ſo Obſolete and Forgotten, that none of the Biſhops or Nobility in the ſpace of 100 years ſhould remember any thing of it. Which ſhews, that either the Biſhops and Noblemen were very ignorant of their own Privileges, or elſe, that the Liberties granted by that Charter, had been ſo ill obſerved ſince that time, that they were now grown out of date: But whatever might be the Cauſe, it is certain, they were now ſo well ſatisfied with this Diſcovery, that they all ſwore in the Preſence of the Archbiſhop, That upon a fit Opportunity they would contend even to Death it ſelf for thoſe Liberties; and the Arch-

In this Aſſembly the A.Bp tells the Noblemen, that he has Abſolved the K. and upon what Terms.

And tells them, that he had found the Charter of Henry I. and reads it before them.

The Nobility ſwear to fight to Death it ſelf, in maintenance of their Liberties.

Archbiſhop promiſed them his faithful Aſſiſtance to the utmoſt of his Power; and ſo the Confederacy being firmly concluded, the Conference or Parliament was diſſolved. Anno. Dom. MCCXIII.

This is the firſt League or Confederacy which was ever made by the Barons of England of the Norman Extraction againſt the King, in defence of their Antient Rights and Liberties; and this will not appear ſtrange to the Reader, if he pleaſes to conſider, that tho' in the Reign of King William the Firſt, and his Sons, it might ſeem very advantageous to the Great Men of the Norman Race to join with the King in oppreſſing the Engliſh Nobility; yet in the ſpace of above an Hundred Years, when thoſe very Normans were now become perfect Engliſhmen, and found themſelves Governed after the ſame Arbitrary manner as the Engliſh had been before; I ſay, 'tis no wonder if they deſired ſome eaſe from thoſe Burthens, and now began to contend for the Reſtitution of the antient Laws of King Edward the Confeſſor, and for thoſe Liberties and Priviledges, which had been granted to their Anceſtors by King Henry the Firſt.

But had not the Biſhops and Clergy (being now highly Diſcontented at the King's Oppreſſions) joined with the Lay-Nobility in oppoſing them, the Eccleſiaſticks had then ſo great a Power, that the Laiety alone could never have done any good againſt the King: And hitherto they had been ſo far from concerning themſelves what Burthens the King laid upon the People, that they rather joined with him in it, ſo long as they themſelves felt nothing of them; but ſo ſoon as the King came to Tyrannize over them all alike, the Caſe was altered, eſpecially when the Archbiſhop was become the King's ſecret Enemy, and he and the reſt of the Biſhops now depended wholly upon the Pope.

But to return to our Hiſtory from which this Reflection has made us digreſs, [4] Not long after the breaking up of the above-mentioned Aſſembly, that is to ſay, upon the Second of October, died Geoffry Fitz-Peter, Juſticiary of England, to the great Loſs of the Nation, as being the Chief Stay and Support of the Kingdom; a Man learned in the Laws, and of great Authority, as well by reaſon of his ample Eſtate, as by his Noble Relations. But whither he entered into the late Confederacy againſt the King, our Author does not mention, tho' it is moſt likely he did, ſince he had at the Council at St. Albans joined with the Biſhops and Great Men in Commanding the Laws of King Edward to be obſerved, which was the ſame in Effect with King Henry's Charter above-mentioned: And certainly it could not be for nothing, that our Author tells us, the King ſhould ſo hate and fear him, that he never thought himſelf abſolutely King, till he was dead; inſomuch that when he firſt heard the News of it, he Swore by the Feet of God (his uſual Oath), that now at length he was King of England; and with great rejoicing ſaid to ſome Lords about him; now when this Man comes into Hell, let him Salute the Archbiſhop Hubert, whom certainly he ſhall find there; and ſo from that time forward he took upon him a more abſolute Power of contradicting his own Oaths and Contracts, and of ſetting himſelf looſe from the Bonds of that Agreement he had ſo lately made.

[4] Here

Anno Dom. MCCXIII.

[5] M. P. Id. Ib. Matt. Paris his Hiſtory of K. John's Ambaſſy to the K. of Morocco.

[5] Here our Author proceeds to give us a long Relation of a ſecret Ambaſſy which King John ſent about this time to the Mooriſh King of Spain, and Morocco, whom he calls Admuralius Murmelius, but his true Name was Mahomet Enaſar, and gives us alſo the Ambaſſador's Names, (that is to ſay) Thomas Hardington, and Ralph Fitz-Nicholas, Knights, with Robert of London a Prieſt or Clerk; Theſe it ſeems were to let this Black King underſtand, that if he would give him a powerful Aſſiſtance, their Maſter was willing to ſurrender up his Kingdom into his Power, to be held of him, under an Annual Tribute; and that he would willingly quit the Chriſtian Law, and Embrace that of Mahomet: Then our Author further proceeds to give us a long Account of the manner of the Audience, and of the Converſation that paſſed between that King and the Ambaſſadors; the Summ of which is, to ſet forth how much the Mooriſh King deſpiſed their Maſter, not only for his inconſtancy in Religion, but his meanneſs of Spirit; and how he diſmiſſed them with great Contempt, ſcarce taking notice of any of them, except Robert of London, to whom, finding him to be a very ſharp and ingenuous Perſon, tho' but of an ill Aſpect, he gave large preſents, becauſe he had told him the Truth concerning the Manners and Humour of the King his Maſter.

The truth of this Relation juſtified from thoſe that cry it down.

I confeſs this Relation being found in no other Author, ſeems improbable to ſome of our late Hiſtorians, that King John (whatſoever he thought of the Chriſtian Religion) ſhould dare offer to abjure it, ſince he might be ſure that not only the Pope, but alſo moſt of the Princes of Chriſtendom, together with his own Subjects, would have combined to Dethrone him; tho' on the other Side it ſeems ſtrange that Matt. Paris, who lived and wrote his Hiſtory in this King's Son's Reign, and by his particular Encouragement, ſhould dare to relate it, if there had been no ground for it; beſides that the naming of the Perſons that were ſent then to that Monarch, would have been too notorious a falſhood to be publiſh'd ſo ſoon after the thing done.

But tho' the Subject of their Ambaſſy as this Author relates it, may be doubted, yet can we not agree with Dr. Brady's Opinion, "who will needs have it paſs for a meer Tale or Legend, and a "malicious Calumny raiſed againſt that King, to alienate the affections of his People from him, becauſe he had granted his "Kingdom to the Pope, and received it again as a Feudatary to "him; as alſo becauſe Matt. Paris makes this Robert of London, the "King's own Clerk, and one of his Envoy's to that Emperor; and "in his Diſcourſe with him, to have made the moſt horrid In-"vective againſt his own Prince and Maſter, that perhaps was e-"ver heard. The Firſt of theſe Reaſons might have been omitted, had the Dr. pleaſed to take notice of what our Author expreſly tells us, that it was that very Agreement or Form of Peace the King had lately made with the Pope and Biſhops, that he then repented of, and from which he could find no way to ſet himſelf free, but by imploring the aſſiſtance of that Mahometan Prince. As for the Dr's. Second Reaſon, I think it leſs ſatisfactory than the former, ſince it is not at all improbable that the Envoy he mentions, when left alone with that Prince, might frankly tell him his thoughts thoughts concerning the King his Maſter, ſince there was no body by who would or could tell Tales; and our * Author ſays expreſly, that he related all this to ſome of his Confidents in his preſence, which was not till ſome Years after King John's death: However, I ſhall leave it to every one to judge or believe as he pleaſes concerning this matter. Anno Dom. MCCXIII † Matt. Paris.

[1] The ſame Year, Nicholas Biſhop of Tuſculum (now Fraſcati) being newly made the Pope's Legate in the Room of Pandulf, came about Michaelmas into England, to compoſe by his Authority the Diſſentions between the Secular and the Eccleſiaſtick States; the Archbiſhop of Canterbury with the Biſhops and Great Men of the Kingdom, met him at London: And tho' the Kingdom was ſtill under an Interdict, yet was he received by the Clergy with a Solemn Proceſſion and Singing; and there it was, that in the preſence of the King and this Cardinal, there was a Treaty for Three Days between the King and Clergy concerning the Damages the Biſhops and Abbots had ſuſtained, and what had been taken from them; at which time the King offered an Hundred thouſand Marks to be forthwith paid, as a full Reſtitution to the ſaid Biſhops; yet with this Proviſo, that if it ſhould afterwards appear by Inquiſition, that the Guardians the King had placed in Churches, or his other Officers had taken away more, then that he would before the next Eaſter, according to the Judgment of the Legate and the Biſhops make further ſatisfaction for what had been taken away; and to this he likewiſe Swore with certain Fidejuſſors or Sureties.

[1] Id. p. 246. The Pope's Legate comes into England, and for what purpoſe.

A Treaty held between the K. and the Clergy concerning their Damages, and the K's offer of Reſtitution.

Whereupon the Legate conſented to this Propoſition, and would have had it preſently put in execution, and took it ill that the Biſhops, did not accept of it, which made him a little ſuſpected of ſhewing the King too much favour; and therefore the Biſhops gave a dilatory Anſwer to this propoſal, and only agreed, there ſhould firſt be an Inquiſition made of all the Damages, and of what had been taken from them, and then the Value or Sum total thereof to be preſented to the King, who conſented to this Agreement; and ſo there was no more done that Day.

The Legate aſſents to the K's propoſal, and is therefore ſuſpected of partiality.

[2] On the morrow, they all met again in the Cathedral Church of St. Paul's, where after many various Diſcourſes about the Relaxation of the Interdict, the King before the great Altar, in the ſight of the Clergy and Laiety, renewed his * infamous Subjection of the Crown and Kingdom of England, with the Lordſhip or Dominion of Ireland to the Pope, and the King's Charter which was formerly Sealed with Wax, and delivered to Pandulph, was now * Sealed with Gold, and delivered to the Legate to the uſe of the Pope, and the Roman Church.

[3] But as to the Reſtitution of what had been taken from the Clergy, the Third of November was appointed to Treat of it at Reading; but when they were met there on that Day, the King being abſent, they were appointed to meet again at Wallingford Three Days after, upon the Sixth of that Month, where the King (as he had done before) voluntarily offered to ſatisfie the Biſhops and all others whomſoever; but this ſeemed a ſmall matter to ſuch as had their Caſtles Demoliſhed, their Houſes pulled down, and their Orchards and Woods ſtubbed up; wherefore the King and Biſhops agreed

The K. again offers to make good his firſt propoſal, but is not accepted by the Clergy.

Anno Dom. MCCXIII. to refer the matter to the Arbitration of Four Barons, ſo that the King ſhould make ſatisfaction according to their Judgment.

The matter is referred to the Arbitration of Four Barons. Id. Ib.

After this the King and Legate with the Archbiſhop, Biſhops, and all the Religious Perſons concerned in the buſineſs, met again at Reading on the Sixth of December, where every one produced a Schedule or Inventory of what had been taken from him, with the Value of the Damage he had ſuſtained thereby: But the Legate favouring the King, they were put off, and payment delayed except to the Archbiſhop of Canterbury and ſuch Biſhops who went out of England to him, who received there 15000 Marks of Silver.

N. 103. and 104. It does not appear what was done on this Inquiſition, only that Commiſſioners were again appointed to enquire into the Damages.

I cannot find who theſe Barons abovementioned were, or what they did in this Arbitration, only Dr. Brady has given us in his Appendix Two ſeveral Writs extant upon the Patent Rolls of this Year, directed to certain Commiſſioners in the Counties of Dorſet and Norwich, in purſuance of the aforeſaid Agreement with the Biſhops; to make Inquiſition in every Dioceſſe, before certain Clerks of the Archbiſhop, what had been taken from the Biſhops, Clerks Eccleſiaſtical Perſons and Laicks, and to return it to the King, as and other appears * upon Record in the Tower; where is alſo inſerted the Names of the Commiſſioners for each Dioceſs, tho' the Inquiſitions themſelves are not to be found; which in all probability were the Inventories or Schedules alſo above-mentioned.

The Barons of the North are reconciled to the King.

About this time alſo (as Rad. de Coggeshal relates) the Barons of the North were reconciled to the King, by the mediation of the Legate and the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, with the Biſhops and Barons of England, on this Condition, that they ſhould ſtill enjoy their antient Liberties; which ſeems to refer to the Quarrel, that this Author tells us the King had with them not long before, upon the account of their refuſing to follow him into Poictou.

[4] Id. Ib. The Pope writes to the Legate to fill up the vacant Biſhopricks and Abbeys.

About this time [4] the Pope Wrote to his Legate Nicholas to fill all vacant Abbacies and Biſhopricks with fit Perſons, and wrote to all Convents and Chapters, Commanding them to comply with his Judgment and Determination; and if there were any Rebels, or ſuch as Contradicted him, that he ſhould compel them to Obedience by Eccleſiaſtick Cenſures without any benefit of Appeal.

* Id. Ib.

* The Legate armed with this Power, deſpiſed the Archbiſhop and Biſhops of the Kingdom, and went to the vacant Churches with the King's Clerks and Officers, and placed in them unfit Perſons; all ſuch as Appealed to the Church of Rome he ſuſpended, and ſuffered them not to have one Penny of what was their own to bear their Charges thither. In many Places he gave the vacant Parochial Churches to his own Clerks, without the conſent of the Patrons; ſuch was the effect of the Pope's late uſurped Power in this Kingdom. Nevertheleſs Walter of Coventry, tho' he agrees with Matt. Paris in the reſt of this Relation, yet ſays, that the vacant Biſhopricks of York, Durham, Litchfield, and others, were not now filled up, becauſe the King refuſed to beſtow them but according to the antient Cuſtom of the Kingdom, that is, he would ſtill recommend thoſe whom he would have elected; which the Biſhops oppoſing, thoſe Sees yet remained vacant, till it ſhould be agreed at Rome, between the Pope and the King's Envoys, how far that antient Cuſtom ſhould be obſerved.

The great abuſes committed by the Legate.

Several Vacancies not filled up, and why.

But

But England affording us litle more worth noting this Year, we must see what was done in foreign Parts; and here both our own as well as the French [5] Historians relate, that Peter, King of Arragon having taken into his Confederacy and Protection the Counts of Toulouse, Foix, and Commenge, with the Viscount of Beziers, and others, whose Territories Simon, Count Montfort, had not long before Seized for their Protecting the Albigenses, who, being then declared Hereticks by the Church of Rome, undertook an unfortunate War in their Defence: But Montfort having put a strong Garison into a Town called Muret, the King of Arragon laid Siege to it in the Month of September, his Army consisting of near a Hundred thousand Men: Montfort being then at Castle Naudarie, tho' he could scarce muster up Twelve hundred, yet immediately he cast himself into the Place, from whence he made a furious Sally upon that King; who contemning the smallness of his Numbers, sate himself down to dinner, at the beginning of the Fight. But however before his Troops could be drawn up in any Order to resist the Enemy, they were all cut to pieces, and the King himself then marching out when it was too late, was thrown off his Horse, and killed by the Common Soldiers, that refused to give him Quarter, because they looked upon him as an Apostate; the Victors also carried off his Standard-Royal, which was sent in Triumph to Rome: So that the whole Field being covered with dead Bodies, there was never known a more entire Defeat; the Earl of Toulouse, (commonly called by our Writers the Earl of St. Giles) fled out of this Battle.

Anno Dom. MCCXIII.

[5] Gu. B. Rigord. Olphonse, K. of Arragon undertaking the Protections of the Counts of Thoulouse, Foix, &c. is routed by Count Montfort.

And slain, and his Troops cut all to pieces.

[1] Upon which Blow the City of Thoulouse offered to Submit to what Conditions the Pope's Legate should please to impose; but matters being gone too far to admit of any Reconciliation, it was resolved to strip that Earl of his Estate, and the Citizens of theirs; so that the poor Prince not knowing whither else to flie for Refuge, was forced to come over into England, to his Uncle King John, and not long after was deprived of all his Dominions by the Pope's Authority.

[1] Id. ib. The Earl of Toulouse looses his Earldom, and the Citizens their Liberties.

I have been the more particular in the Relation of this Affair, as being the last Effort which the Princes who favoured the Albigenses ever made in France; from whence being expelled upon the taking this City of Toulouse, they fled to the Mountains of Savoy and Pyemont to those of their own Opinions, who were settled there long before.

[2] King John kept his Christmas this Year at Windsor, where being upon somewhat better Terms with his Nobility than before: He bestowed a great Number of Rich Festival Liveries among them; then after the Octaves of Epiphany, the Archbishop of Canterbury with his Suffragans met at Dunstable, to Treat of the Affairs of the English Church; for it much troubled them that the Legate without their Advice, and in favour to the King's Inclinations, should place insufficient Prelates in vacant Churches, rather by Intrusion than Canonical Election: At length, when the matter had been long and deliberately debated, the Archbishop sent Two Clerks to the Legate then at Burton upon Trent, who, by Appealing to the Pope in the Archbishop's Name, prohibited him to presume ſume to inſtitute Prelates in his Province, to whom of Right it belonged to do it. But the Legate not valuing the Appeal, diſpatches Pandulph (now but a private Perſon) with the King's aſſent to the Court of Rome, that ſo he might defeat the purpoſe of the Archbiſhop and Biſhops; and when he came there, he did not a little blaſt the Credit of the Archbiſhop with the Pope, and ſo much extolled the King that he affirmed, he never heard of a more humble and modeſt Prince, So that he obtained great favour with the Pope: And tho' Maſter Simon de Langton the Archbiſhop's Brother was ſent by the Biſhops to oppoſe Pandulph, yet ſince he now brought over the King's Charters, containing the Subjection and Tribute of the Kingdom of England and Ireland, Simon could not be heard in what he offered againſt him. The ſame Pandulph alſo affirmed, that the Archbiſhop and Biſhops were too Rigid and Covetous in the exacting Reſtitution of what had been taken away in the time of the Interdict; and that they had beyond all Equity depreſſed the King himſelf, and the Liberties of the Kingdom; and thus for ſome time the deſigns of the Archbiſhop and Biſhops were put off.

[3] Id. p. 248. The K. ſends Money to his Commanders in Flanders, who thereupon take ſeveral Towns and Caſtles in thoſe Parts.

[3] In the mean time the King had ſent a great Sum of Money to the Chief Commanders of the Forces in Flanders, that thereby they might be enabled to Invade and waſt France on that Side; which they did, and took ſeveral Towns and Caſtles, and much harraſſed the Country, waſting the Territories of Lewis the French King's Son in thoſe Parts.

[4] Id. Ib. The K. and Q. go over to Rochel with a great Army, where many of the Barons of Poictou ſwear Fealty to him. The K. by Letters gives his Juſtices in England notice of his good ſucceſſes, and of the taking many Places in thoſe Parts. And that the Earl of Marche and other Noblemen had done Homage and ſwore Fealty to him.

[4] And now the King having ſent Envoy's to Rome about taking off the Interdict, He with his Queen took Shipping at Portſmouth upon Candlemas-day, and within few Days after arrived with a great Army at Rochel, whither divers Barons of Poictou came, and ſwore Fealty to him: And preſently after his Landing, there were Surrendred to him many Caſtles then in poſſeſſion of his Enemies, of which he gave his Juſtices in England a large account by his Letters, and for them I refer the Reader to our Author; but the Deſign of them was, to let them know, that the Term of Truce which he had formerly granted to the Earls of Marche and d' Augi being expired, and not finding them diſpoſed to a perfect Peace, he had thereupon Invaded the Territories of Geoffery de Lirenan, (a great Lord of their Party) and taken his Caſtle of Merevent, and that after that, he had alſo beſieged another Caſtle of the ſaid Geoffry, called Novent, which having been battered for a while, both the Nobleman himſelf, and his Sons were forced to ſurrender it to the King's Mercy; and that being at Parthenay on Trinity-Sunday, there came to him the Earl of Marche and the Count d' Augi with Geoffry de Lirenan, who all did Homage, and ſwore Fealty to him; upon which he had alſo agreed to a Marriage between his Daughter Joan and the Son of the Earl of Marche. This Letter bears Date at Parthenay in the Sixteenth Year of his Reign: But his good Succeſs in theſe Parts was but ſhort, as you will find anon.

Another Letter of the K's. to William E. Mareſchal to the ſame effect.

In the mean time, I cannot here omit, that whilſt the King lay at Rochel, he alſo wrote another Letter to William Earl-Mareſchal, wherein he gave him a farther Account of his Succeſs in thoſe Parts, and that preſently after his Landing there were ſurrender'd and quitted quitted to him Twenty ſix Caſtles and Fortreſſes; and whilſt he was beſieging Milleſen-Caſtle, there came to him one Friar William of St. Owen, with the Form of releaſing the Interdict, which he ſent to Peter Biſhop of Winton, his Juſticiary of England, with Inſtruction to the ſaid Earl-Mareſchal, and the reſt of the Earls, Barons, and Great Men of England, (who had alſo the like Letters ſent them) that they ſhould obſerve the Directions of the ſaid Juſticiary concerning this Affair of the Releaſe of the Interdict: This Letter bears date at Rochel the 8th of March, and was formerly only to be found among the Records in the Tower, but it is now publiſhed by Dr. Brady in his * Appendix. Anno. Dom. MCCXIV. Rot. Claus. 15 Johan. parte prima m. 1. Dorſ. N. 106.

[4] About this time, the Pope wrote Letters to Cardinal Nicholas his Legate in England, concerning the aforeſaid Affair, in which he gave him an Account, that the King's Envoys, John Biſhop of Norwich, Robert de Maris, Archdeacon of Northumberland, and one Mr. Adam a Clerk, had agreed with Simon Langton and certain other Clerks, Commiſſioners for the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and the reſt of the Biſhops, in the Pope's Preſence, that it was very much for the Advantage both of the Eccleſiaſticks, and Seculars, that the Interdict ſhould be releaſed; and then with all their Conſents appoints the Form of it, by which he order'd 40000 Marks to be paid to the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and the Biſhops of London and Ely, or their Aſſigns; but yet with a Diſcount of what they had received before; which being paid, and further Security given (as it was directed in the Form it ſelf) the Legate without any more ado was to releaſe the Interdict; yet Caution was given, that the King ſhould bind Himſelf by his Oath, and Letters Patents, with Six others, both Biſhops and Earls, as his Fide-juſſors, or Sureties, for the Payment of 12000 Marks a year, by equal Portions, until the 40000 Marks were fully diſcharged; Theſe Letters are dated at the Lateran Palace at Rome. [4] M. P. p. 249. The P. writes to his Legate, letting him know that the Commiſſioners on both ſides had all agreed, That the Interdict ſhould be Releaſed, and on what Conditions.

[5] 'Tis true, that at the time when Nicholas the Legate received this Authentick Anſwer from the Pope, the King was himſelf beyond Sea, but at his departure from England he left him and William Earl-Mareſchal his Commiſſioners for this Buſineſs; Hereupon the Legate aſſembled a Great Council or Synod at St. Paul's in London, where the Archbiſhops, Biſhops, Abbots, Priors, Earls, Barons, and others, were all aſſembled, about this Affair of the Interdict; and there he propounded to them the Form of Reſtitution for Damages, for what had been taken away from the Biſhops, &c. which had been drawn up by the Pope at Rome, with the Conſent of all Parties; alſo he commanded Certificates of what Money had been paid to the Biſhops and others; upon which it appear'd by a ſtated Account, that the Archbiſhop and Monks of Canterbury, with the Biſhops of London, Ely, Hereford, Bath, and Lincoln, had before their return into England, received by the Hands of Pandolf the late Legate, 12000 Marks Sterling; and in the Council held at Reading, on the 7th of December, after their return, That the ſame Biſhops and Monks had received 15000 Marks more, to be divided among them; ſo that there remained in Arrears only 13000 Marks; for the Payment of which, they had the King's Letters Patents, and the Securities of the Biſhops of Wincheſter and Norwich, [5] Id. ib. The K. at his departure left the Legate and the Earl-Mareſchal his Commiſſioners to act for him. The Former Summons a Synod at St. Pauls, about releaſing the Interdict; and the Conditions of it.

Anno Dom. MCCXIV.

[1] Id. ib. The Sentence of Interdict releaſed, after above 6 years continuance.

[1] ſo that after the Stating and Agreeing all theſe Demands, the Legate on the Feaſt of St. Peter and Paul, publickly releaſed the Sentence of Interdict, after it had continued Six Years, Three Months and Fourteen Days. For this mighty Benefit Te Deum was ſolemnly Sung by the Clergy; and indeed, the whole Nation highly rejoyced, that they were now Reſtored to the Free and Publick Exerciſe of Religious Duties.

A great number of other Eccleſiaſtics require Satisfaction for their Loſſes, but go away without it.

The Interdict being thus releaſed, there came to the Legate a great Multitude of Abbots, Priors, Knights-Templars, and Hoſpitallers, Abbeſſes, and Clerks, all deſiring Satisfaction for the Damages and Injuries they had received from the King during the Interdict; but the Legate anſwered them all alike, that there was no mention made of their Damages and Injuries in the Pope's Letters, and therefore he neither could, nor ought to tranſgreſs the Bounds of his Authority; only he adviſed them to apply themſelves to the Pope, and Petition him to do them Juſtice concerning their Injuries and Loſſes. Upon which anſwer, this whole Body of Eccleſiaſtical Sufferers were forced to return Home hopeleſs of any other Relief, than what might be gain'd by Petitioning the Pope, which never came to any thing.

Thus none but the Rich Biſhops and ſome Abbies received any Benefit by this Agreement, whilſt the Poorer Monaſteries, and others of the Inferior Clergy, received no Satisfaction for all their Loſſes.

Dr. Brady's Excuſe for the King's Violence and Injuſtice to the Religious Houſes, proved inſufficient.

Here Dr. Brady would fain excuſe the King, as if nothing had been due from him to thoſe Religious Houſes, becauſe he had before procured their Charters, teſtifying, That what he had taken from them was freely given: But the Doctor himſelf ſufficiently confutes this Excuſe, when he acknowledges from our Author (tho' under the former Year) that the King, by his ſubtilty, had extorted from thoſe Religious Houſes certain Charters, wherein they acknowledged they had given him gratis whatſoever Money he had violently wreſted from them; and the Doctor muſt needs know, That as well by the Canon as Common Law, Dureſs is always looked upon as a Good Plea againſt any Acts done thereby, eſpecially by Spiritual Corporations, who are always eſteem'd as in a ſtate of Minority; and therefore tho' in the Patent Roll of the 16th of this King, (which the Doctor has given us at large in his Appendix*) this Diſcharge is entred in the Form of an Acquittance from all the Abbots and Convents, by which they acknowledged full Satisfaction, for what the King had received of them during the Interdict; yet this will not do the Buſineſs for which it is brought, but rather ſerves to make the Wrong more apparent, ſince if the King could extort that Money from them, he might likewiſe by the ſame Power exact what Releaſes he pleas'd for it: But it is time to look abroad, and ſee what Succeſs the King's Army now met with in Foreign Parts.

[2] M. P. Ib. The K. marches with his Army into Poictou, and beſieges a ſtrong Caſtle.

[2] About this time the King marched his Army out of Poictou into Bretaigne, and beſieged the ſtrong Caſtle de la Roche au Moine, upon the River Loir between Nants and Angiers; whereupon Prince Lewis, the King of France's Eldeſt Son, came with a great Army to Relieve it; but King John ſending forth his Scouts to diſcover their Numbers and Strength, they upon their return informed him, that they were inferior to him in Both, and perſuaded him to give them

Battel:

Battel: Upon this he commanded his Soldiers to Arm, with a Reſolution to March and Fight the Prince; but the Barons of Poictou refus'd to follow the King, alledging, They were not then prepar'd for a Battel, which made him afraid of their accuſtomed Treachery; ſo that when he was juſt upon the Point of taking the Caſtle, he was forced to raiſe the Siege, and retreat. But Lewis, ſo ſoon as he heard the King was coming towards him, fearing to Engage, retired likewiſe; thus both Armies having ignominiouſly declined an Encounter, ſhamefully turn'd their Backs upon each other, without ever ſtriking a ſtroke. Anno Dom. MCCXIV. But being ready to fight, he is deſerted by the Barons of Poictou, which proves the loſs of the Expedition.

But the French Hiſtorians, (eſpecially Rigord, and others from him) report this Action very partially on their own ſide, for they ſay, That Prince Lewis aſſembled an Army at Chinon Caſtle, and ſet forward towards King John; but ſo ſoon as he heard they were within one Day's march of him, he fled, and left his Engines with which he had batter'd the Caſtle, behind him; and that Lewis afterwards took the Caſtles of Beaufort and Monconter, waſted many rich Places belonging to the Viſcount of Toars, and demoliſhed the New Walls of Angiers, with which King John had encompaſſed it. The Fr. Hiſtorians relate this Action very partially on their ſide.

But this is more certain, that within leſs than a Month after, (that is to ſay) upon the 27th of July, the Famous Battel of Bovines was fought between Tournay and Liſle (in Artois). For at this time the Emperor Otto, the King of England, and Earl of Flanders, with the Dukes of Lovain and Brabant, had made a League againſt the King of France, and invaded his Kingdom, whilſt his Son Lewis was engaged in Poictou and Bretaigne, againſt King John; at this Battel, tho' the Emperor had infinitely the Odds in Men, and the Perſon of the King of France was in great Danger, having been thrown off his Horſe, and trod under Foot; yet at length his Enemies were all Vanquiſhed, the Emperor Otto being put to flight, his Standard, (which was a Dragon, under an Imperial Eagle all Guilt,) taken, and the Chariot that carried it, broken in pieces. There were alſo made Priſoners five Earls; Three whereof were Ferrand Earl of Flanders; Reginald Earl of Bologne; and William Longeſpe, Baſe-Brother to King John; beſides 25 Noblemen that carried Banners: Earl Ferrand was impriſon'd in a Tower at Paris, and Reginald in the ſtrong Caſtle of Perone in Picardy, laden with Irons, and Chain'd to a great piece of Timber; but as for the Emperor, he was forced to flie away into his own Territories in Saxony, where he lived Privately all the reſt of his Days, having been not long before Excommunicated and Depoſed by the Pope, who had beſtowed the Empire upon Fretheric King of Sicily, and not long after he was Crown'd King of the Romans. This great Victory ſo advanced the French King's Affairs, that neither King John, nor any other Prince was able for the future to withſtand him. M. P. Id. ib. p. 251. The Emp. Otto utterly defeated by K. Philip at the Battel of Bovines.

[3] But not long after this Victory, by the Procurement of Ranulf Earl of Cheſter, and the Mediation of Robert the Pope's Legate (ſaith Rigord) and of certain Religious Perſons, (as Matt. Paris relates) a Truce was concluded between King Philip and King John, as appears by thoſe Letters Patents, which our Author has put down at large; in which King Philip recites, That he had granted a Truce to John King of England, and his Subjects, from Thurſday after the Exaltation [1] Id. ib. A Truce is at laſt concluded between King Philip and K. John for five years.

Anno Dom. MCCXIV. Exaltation of the Croſs in September, to laſt for Five Years compleat; and in the mean while, all Things and Perſons were to remain in the ſame ſtate as they were in at the time of the Truce made; which Truce being agreed to, King John return'd into England on the 19th of October: And this was the laſt Expedition that ever he made into Foreign Parts.

[4] Id. p. 251. The Earls and Barons meet at St. Edmunds-Bury, to conſult how to re-obtain King Henry I. his Charter.

[4] About the ſame time, the Earls and Barons, under the Pretence of a Pilgrimage, but really for quite another Purpoſe, met at St. Edmunds-Bury; and when they had for a long while conſulted privately together, the Charter of King Henry the Firſt was produced, which the Barons had lately received from Stephen Archbiſhop of Canterbury at London, as was ſaid before; that contained the Laws and Liberties that K. Edward had granted to the Holy Engliſh Church, and the Great Men of the Kingdom, with ſome other Liberties, which King Henry had added himſelf. From whence we may obſerve, that the Laws of King Edward, and the Charter of King Henry the Firſt, were then looked upon to be the ſame in effect, excepting ſome few Additions; ſo likewiſe was that Charter which King John not long after granted, eſteemed to be the ſame in effect, as the above-mentioned Laws and Charter, only expreſſed more at large.

[5] Id. ib. They all ſwear at the High Altar never to deſiſt making War upon the King till he granted it.

[5] When theſe were all met at the Church of the Monaſtery of St. Edmunds, the Greater Barons began firſt to Swear at the High Altar, That if the King refuſed to grant them thoſe Liberties they demanded, they would make War upon him, and withdraw themſelves from their Obedience, until he ſhould by a Charter, Sealed with his Seal, reconfirm them; and they likewiſe unanimouſly agreed, That after Chriſtmas they would all go to the King in a Body, to demand his Confirmation of the Liberties above-mentioned; and in the mean time they would provide themſelves with Horſes and Arms, that if perchance the King ſhould ſtart from his own Oath, (as they believed by reaſon of his Double-dealing he would) they might then compel him to give them Satisfaction, by taking his Caſtles into their Cuſtody.

The Account the Annals of Waverly give of the Reaſons of this great Diſcontent of the Nobility at this Time.

The Annals of Waverly do alſo under this Year give us the Occaſion of this general Diſcontent of the Engliſh Nobility; affirming, That Peter Biſhop of Wincheſter (being left the King's Juſticiary during his abſence) endeavouring by degrees to Subject the Great Men of the Kingdom to the King's Will, thro' the abuſe of his Power, did but increaſe their Diſpleaſure againſt his Maſter; inſomuch that their fury was not at all pacified when that Author wrote, which ſeems to be about the very time that theſe things happened; his words being, Neque eſt ſedatus furor ille uſque adhuc.

Nicholas, the Pope's Legate, is call'd home, upon which the K. becomes milder to the Clergy.

As for Eccleſiaſtical Affairs, this Year affords little more, but that (according to Walter of Coventry) Nicholas Biſhop of Tuſculum, the Pope's Legate, was, not long after the King's Return out of Poictou, recalled to Rome, becauſe he was accuſed for having carried himſelf with leſs Honeſty and Courage than he ought to have done in behalf of the Church: wherefore, when the King found he was bereft of his Aſſiſtance, he became Milder, and ſhewed more Benignity to the Biſhops and Clergy, to whom he made larger Satisfaction for the Injuries he had done them; beſtowing on ſome, Mannors; Mannors; on others, Immunities and Privileges for their Houſes; and on thoſe that were more Covetous, ready Money.

Anno Dom. MCCXIV.

I can find nothing more Remarkable to have happened this Year, [1] only in December William King of Scots died in the Forty Ninth year of his Reign, and the Seventy Second of his Life; which I mention, becauſe it has been hitherto ſo rare among the Kings of that Nation, either to Live, or Reign ſo long.

[1] C. M. The Death of William K. of Scots, with his Character.

He was a Prince of great Valour and perſonal Worth, and being much lamented by his Subjects, was ſucceeded by Prince Alexander his Son, then a Youth of but Seventeen years of Age.

Anno Dom. MCCXV.

And now I am come to the 17th Year of King John's Reign, [2] when he kept his Chriſtmas at Worceſter, tho' it was but for One Day; and ſo haſtening from thence to London, took up his abode in the New-Temple, which ſtood where thoſe Inns-of-Court now called the Inner and Middle-Temples are ſince built: Thither the Great Men came to him in very pompous Military Accoutrements, and deſired that the Liberties and Laws of King Edward, with other Privileges granted to the Kingdom of England, and Engliſh Church, might be confirmed, as they were contained in the Charters of Henry the Firſt. Moreover they affirmed, That at the time of his Abſolution at Winchester, he promiſed to obſerve thoſe Laws and Liberties, and likewiſe bound his ſaid Promiſe with his Oath: The King hereupon perceiving the Earneſtneſs of the Barons, and their Preparations for War if he denied them, was much ſtartled; but in regard of the greatneſs and difficulty of the Matter, he deſired time to give them a poſitive Anſwer until the Cloſe of Eaſter: Many things were now propounded on both ſides, but at length the King (though unwillingly) found for his Sureties the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, the Biſhop of Ely and William Earl-Mareſchal, that on the Day prefixed he would give them full and reaſonable Satisfaction, upon which all the Great Men return'd home.

[2] M. P. The K. preſently after Chriſtmas comes to London, where all the Great Men of the Kingdom reſort to him, to demand the Confirmation of K. Henry's Charter.

The K. being afraid of the Barons, deſires ſome time to give them an Anſwer, and in the mean while gives Security to ſatisfie them.

About the ſame time alſo, the King granted a Charter under his Seal, for the Freedom of Elections to Biſhopricks, and Abbies, and all other Conventual Churches, to chuſe their Biſhops, Abbots, &c. without any Letters of Nomination or Recommendation of ſuch Perſons as were Faithful to him, &c. and this was contrary to the uſage of his Predeceſſors. Id. p. 263.

This Privilege was not only confirmed by the firſt Clauſe of Magna Charta, but alſo not long after this preſent Charter, made by the Pope's, which you may find at large in our Author. Id. Ib.

So that the antient Prerogative of Nominating to Abbies and Convents, and alſo to Deans and Chapters, fit Perſons to be Elected Biſhops, was never after this time fully reſtored to the Crown till the 25th of Henry VIII. when by a Statute made on purpoſe it was ordain'd, that together with the Conge d'eſtire, ſhould be alſo ſent down a Letter miſſive from his Majeſty, containing the Name of the Perſon, whom he would have choſen Archbiſhop or Biſhop; and if they fail'd to make their Election accordingly, then the King by his Letters Patents might Nominate whom he ſhould think fit.

Anno Dom. MCCXV.

[3] Id. ib. The K. to ſecure himſelf, makes all Men do Homage, and ſwear Fealty to him, and then undertakes the Cruſado

[3] In the mean while, the King, the better (as he thought) to ſecure himſelf for the future, cauſed the Homages to be renewed throughout England, and all Men to be ſworn to himſelf againſt all others; and further ſtill to provide for his own Safety, upon Candlemas-Day he took upon him the Cruſado, i.e. Vowed an Expedition to the Holy-Land, tho' it was thought an Act rather of Fear than Devotion, that ſo thereby he might be more ſafe under the Protection of that Badge.

[4] G. N. T. Other Noblemen take the Croſs at the ſame time.

[4] At the ſame time alſo, that the King took the Croſs from the Hands of the Biſhop of London, the Earls of Cheſter and Derby, with other Noblemen did ſo likewiſe; But this Undertaking (if ever really intended) came to Nothing, the Civil Wars between the King and the Barons breaking out preſently after.

[5] M. P. Ib. The Nobility meet again at Stanford.

For in [5] Eaſter Week, the Great Men met at Stanford with Horſe and Arms, and had drawn almoſt the whole Nobility of England into their Party, ſo that they made up a very great Army; for upon their Muſter they were found to be no leſs than Two Thouſand Knights, beſides other Horſe and Footmen, armed with divers Weapons.

[1] Id. p. 254. Who were the chief Inciters to this Undertaking.

[1] The Chief Inciters to this Undertaking, were, Robert Fitz-Walter, Euſtace de Veſci, Richard de Percy, Robert de Roſs, Peter de Bruis, Nicholas de Stutevil, Saher, Earl of Wincheſter; Robert, Earl of Clare; Roger, Earl Bigod; William de Mumbray, (alias Mowbray) Roger de Creiſſy, Ranulph Fitz-Robert, Robert de Ver; with other Barons, as well of Norman as Engliſh Extraction, whoſe Names being many, and needleſs to be repeated, I refer the Reader curious in ſuch Matters to the Author; and theſe were all Confederate, tho', under hand, Stephen Archbiſhop of Canterbury was their Principal Adviſer.

To which the A. Bp was the Principal Adviſer.

[2] Id. ib. The K. being at Oxford ſends the A. Bp to the Barons, to know their Demands.

At [2] this time the King was at Oxford in expectation of the coming of the Great Men; and on Monday after Eaſter, the abovementioned Barons rendevouzed at Brackley in Northamptonſhire; but ſo ſoon as the King heard of it, he ſent the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and William Mareſchal, Earl of Pembroke, and ſome other Wiſe Men, to know what the Liberties and Laws were, that they ſo earneſtly deſired: Upon which the Confederate Earls and Barons delivered to them a Schedule or Writing, which indeed for the moſt part, contained the Antient Cuſtoms of the Kingdom; affirming, That if the King would not forthwith Grant and Confirm them under his Seal, they would compell him, by ſeizing his Caſtles and Poſſeſſions, until ſuch time as he had given them Satisfaction.

They ſend the K. their Demands in Writing.

The K. upon hearing them read, falls into a Paſſion, and refuſes to grant them.

The Commiſſioners returning to the King with the Schedule, read to him all the Articles therein contain'd; whereupon falling into a great Paſſion, he asked, Why the Barons did not, together with theſe Exactions, demand of him the Kingdom alſo? They are all fooliſh things (ſaid he) and without colour of Reaſon, and ſwore a great Oath, That he would never grant ſuch Liberties as would make himſelf a Slave.

The Annals of Waverly give their Account of the Original of the Barons War.

Thus began this Unhappy War by the Nobility's poſitively inſiſting upon, and the King's as obſtinately refuſing to confirm the Laws of King Edward, and the Liberties and Free Cuſtoms of other preceeding Kings, as the Writer of the Annals of Waverly here very judiciouſly obſerves: To which he alſo ſays, That thoſe Laws had been very much Corrupted and Infring'd, during this King's Father's Reign;

Reign; but chiefly in his Own, who had diſinherited divers of the Great Men without any Judgment of their Peers, and had Condemned others to cruel Deaths, and violated their Wives and Daughters; ſo that his Tyrannical Will was inſtead of a Law. Anno Dom. MCCXV.

To which we may add the further Teſtimony of the Abbot of Dundrainand, one of the Writers of the Chronicle of Mailros, who lived at that very time, and being a Scotch-man, may be ſuppoſed to write impartially concerning the Original of this Quarrel, of which under this Year he gives us this Relation. Another large Account of it from the Chronicle of Mailros.

England (ſays he,) was now in a ſtrange Confuſion, ſo that 'tis wonderful to Relate it; and who hath ever heard the like? For the Body deſired to Rule the Head, the People would Govern their 'King: yet divers Reaſons required it; for he perverted the antient 'approved Cuſtoms and Laws of this Kingdom, and did not Govern 'his People with Equity; but his Will was to him the only Law: 'He oppreſt his own Subjects, and preferred barbarous Mercenaries 'before them; He deſtroyed the Lawful Heirs that were deliver-'ed as Pledges to him, and Strangers enjoyed their Inheritances; and then proceeds to give an Account of the beginning and progreſs of this War, to the ſame effect with our Engliſh Hiſtorians.

I have been the more particular in this Account, to let the Reader underſtand, that it was not without cruel Oppreſſions and great Provocations, and after the King's refuſal to obſerve his own Oath and Engagements, that the greateſt part of the Nobility, Clergy, and People of England then took up Arms againſt Him.

Walter of Coventry alſo Relates, that there were ſeveral Treaties between the King and the Barons, concerning this great Affair; and that the laſt was not far from Brackley, and agrees with Matt. Paris, that [3] When the Archbiſhop and William Mareſchal could not bring the King to conſent to the Barons demands, they returned to them, and gave them an account of what he had ſaid; the Barons hereupon by their Meſſengers defied the King, and renounced their Homages lately made him; and [4] then choſe the Lord Robert Fitz-Walter their General, calling him the Mareſchal of the Army of God, and of Holy Church; and preſently upon this they marched to Northampton, and beſieged that Caſtle Fifteen Days, tho' without ſucceſs for want of Engines to batter it; ſo that they were forced to raiſe the Siege, and went to Bedford Caſtle, where they were kindly Received by William Beauchamp its owner.

[3] Id. ib. The A. Biſhop and Earl Mareſchal carry back the K's refuſal, whereupon the Bp's chuſe R. Fitz-Walter for their General, and then by meſſage defie the King and beſiege the Caſtle of Northampton, but cannot take it.

[4] M. P. p. 254.

[5] Id. Ib. The Citizens of London invite the Barons thither, who immediately march up and ſeize the City.

[5] Thither came alſo to them Meſſengers from the City of London, giving them privately to underſtand, that if they would poſſeſs themſelves of that City they muſt make haſte; whereupon they preſently marched to Ware, and from thence in the Night to London, and on the 24th of May, early in the Morning, at the time of Maſs, without any noiſe entred the City at Aldgate by the favour of ſome of the rich Citizens, the poorer ſort not daring to oppoſe it. On the other Side, the King all this time acting only on the Defenſive part, ſtored his Caſtles with Men and Proviſions; having alſo ſent Meſſengers beyond Sea for foreign Aſſiſtance.

[1] Id. Ib. The Confederate Barons being now Maſters of the City, threaten thoſe of the King's party, that if they did not deſert him, they would treat them as Enemies.

[1] The Barons having poſſeſſed themſelves of London, after they had placed their own Guards at every Gate, and taken Security of the Citizens, diſpoſed of all things therein as they pleaſed; and having now got ready their Engines of Battery, they began to beſiege the Tower; and then ſent their Letters to the Earls, Barons, and Knights that really, or ſeemingly adhered to the King, threatning them, that if they would not deſert that perjured King, and faithfully cloſe with them in aſſerting their Liberties, they would proceed againſt them as publick Enemies, beat down their Caſtles, burn their Houſes, and deſtroy their Warrens, Parks, and Orchards.

[3] Ib. p. 255. The Names of the Earls and Barons who had not Confederated.

[2] The Earls and Barons who had not yet ſworn to maintain the Liberties before mentioned, were William Mareſhcal Earl of Pembroke, Ranulph Earl of Cheſter, William Earl of Salisbury, William Earl of Warren, William Earl of Albemarle, H. Earl of Cornwall, William de Albiney, Robert de Vipont, Peter Fitz-Hubert, Brien de Liſle, G. de Lucy, G. de Furnival, Thomas Baſſet, H. de Braibroke, John de Baſſingborn, William de Cantilupe, Henry de Cornhulte, John Fitz-Hugh, Hugh de Nevile, Philip de Albiney, John Marſchal, William Brewere, moſt of whom upon the Command of the Barons left the King, went to London, and Confederated with them: Here the Manuſcript Copy of Roger of Wendover (in the Cottonian Library) further adds, that now the Pleas of the Exchequer and thoſe of Sheriffs Ceaſed throughout England, becauſe there was ſcarce any Body to be found, who would pay the King his Revenues, or Obey him in any thing; from whence we may obſerve, how general this Defection was, not only of the Nobility, but amongſt the Common People too. Walter of Coventry alſo relates, that whilſt theſe things were Tranſacting in the Southern Parts, many Men being animated by the ſame Spirit, roſe in Devon-ſhire, and took and plundered the City of Exeter; but it ſeems not being able to keep the Field, they afterwards hid themſelves in the Woods; but thoſe who had poſſeſſed themſelves of London, being more Powerful, ſallied out in Troops, and ſpoiled the King's Houſes, and Parks, killing thoſe that offered to reſiſt them: Whilſt, in the mean time thoſe of the Northern Parts, drawing a great many either by fair means or foul into their Party, made an indifferent Army, and therewith took Lincoln in Whitſun-Week, and beſieged the Caſtle, but to little purpoſe.

upon which meſſage moſt of them leave the K. and join with the Barons.

The Pleas of the Exchequer and thoſe of Sheriffs now ceaſe.

Some riſe in the Weſt, and take Exeter, but cannot keep it; whilſt thoſe at London deſtroy the K's Houſes and Parks.

[2] Id. p. 255. The K. counterfeit Letters under the Seals of the B'ps. ſetting forth that the Engliſh were now become Apoſtates, and the King would beſtow their Eſtates on thoſe that would aſſiſt him.

[3] About this time the King, reſolving to conceal his ſecret hatred againſt the Barons, under a fair and plauſible appearance, cauſed the Seals of divers Biſhops to be Counterfeited, and Letters to be written in their Names to all foreign Nations, that the Engliſh were now become Apoſtates, and ought to be deteſted by all the World; for which reaſon the King, by the Conſent and Authority of the Pope, was reſolved to beſtow their Lands and Poſſeſſions on any that would aſſiſt him to puniſh their Infidelity and Rebellion. But when Foreigners had read theſe counterfeit Letters, they would give no Credit to them, becauſe they were well ſatisfied, that the Engliſh were very good Chriſtians.

[4] Id. Ib. The K. ſeeing himſelf deſerted, is forced to agree to the Barons demands.

This paſſage, tho' it may ſeem improbable, yet I find it in Matt. Paris's Additions to Roger of Wendover's Chronicle, and it is not likely he would have inſerted it, had he not had ſome very good ground for it.

[4] And now the King ſeeing himſelf thus forſaken, and that he had ſcarce Seven Knights left him, and fearing leſt the Barons ſhould should seize his Castles, when they found none able to resist them; yet having conceived in his heart an implacable Hatred against them, he so far dissembled as to make Peace with them for a time, in hopes that when he should become stronger, He might be more severely Revenged upon them separately, with whom whilst in a Body he found he was not able to Cope. Anno Dom. MCCXV.

[5] Therefore sending to them William Earl of Pembroke with other trusty Messengers, and making use of the Archbishop's mediation, in whom they much Confided, he let them know, he would grant them the Laws and Liberties they desired, and sent to them also to appoint a Day and Place for a meeting to put a final Conclusion to this Affair. These Messengers coming up to London, faithfully related to the Barons what the King had (tho' deceitfully) charged them with, who being Transported with Joy, appointed a Meeting or Conference in a Meadow between Staines and Windsor called Runnemede; which, as Matt. Westminster observes, signifies the Mead of Counsil, because from antient Times Treaties concerning the Peace of the Kingdom had been often held there. So upon the 15th of June, at that Place the King and all the great Men of the Kingdom met, and both Parties (as Rad. de Coggeshal relates) pitching their Tents asunder in the said Meadow, began to Treat concerning a Peace, and the Liberties above mentioned.

[5] Id. Ib. The K. sends Commissioners to Treat with the Barons.

A meeting is appointed between the K. and them at Runne Mead.

There appeared on the King's Part the Archbishops of Canterbury and Dublin, with the Bishops of London, Winchester, Lincolne, Bathe, Worcester, Coventry and Rochester, and Master Pandulph the Pope's Legate, and Almeric Master of the Knights-Templars in England, and of the Laiety, William Mareschal Earl of Pembroke, the Earls of Salisbury, Warren and Arundel; with these Barons, Alan de Galoway, William Fitz-Gerald, Peter and Matthew Fitz-Herbert, Thomas and Alan Basset, Hugh de Neville, Hubert de Burc, Seneschal of Poictou, Robert de Roppeley, John Mareschal, and Philip de Albiney: But as for those that appeared on the Baron's Side, they were not to be numbred, since the whole Nobility of England, being Collected into one Body, were not easie to be reduced under any certain Account.

where they meet, and Treat of Peace, with the Names of the Commissioners on either Side.

At length when they had variously Treated concerning the Articles, the King without any seeming difficulty granted them the Laws and Liberties in [1] two Charters, because being so many, they could not be contained in one Schedule; the First of them is called Charta Communium Libertatum, or Magna Charta, the Charter of Liberties, or the Great Charter; the Second is called the Charter of the Liberties and Customs of the Forests; both which being very long, you may find at the End of this King's Reign, since they properly belong to the Laws he made.

[1] Id. p. 256, 257 where he agrees to grant the Great Charters of Liberties and Forests.

[2] Here also follow in our Author the Names of the Five and twenty Barons, who were chosen by the rest to see the said Charters faithfully observed: They were the Earls of Clare, Albemarle, Gloucester, and Winchester, with divers other Earls and Barons, most of whom, being already named, I Omit. These Five and twenty Barons took their Oaths by the King's consent, that they would in every particular observe these Charters, and would compel the King (if he should repent of it) to keep them: Then follow the Names of the rest of the Earls and Barons, who swore to obey the Com-

Anno Dom. MCCXV. Commands of the Twenty five above-mentioned, whoſe Names being numerous and of little moment to us at this Day, I refer the Reader, if Inquiſitive in the Hiſtory of Families, to our Author, for further ſatisfaction.

The ſtrange Diviſion of Families at this time, and how it came to be ſo.

For as Walter of Coventry here very well obſerves, many great Families became now divided in Intereſts, the Fathers and Elder ſort adhering to the King, whilſt their Sons and Nephews took part with the Barons, and others, either out of Reſpect to their Relations, or elſe in hopes of Advantage, often changed Sides: But Alexander King of Scots out of Emulation to King John and Llewellin Prince of Wales, hoping to make his Advantage of theſe Diſturbances, favoured the Barons, and when there was occaſion, they both openly aſſiſted them, as you will find hereafter. But this is only by the bye.

We ſhall now ſay ſomewhat more of the Priviledges granted to the Clergy as well as Laiety by this Charter, above-mentioned; but I refer the Reader to Dr. Brady's Engliſh Traſlation of it, which is inſerted at the End of this King's Reign.

[1] M. P. p. 262 The K. ſends his Writs to all Sheriffs, Commanding them to make all Men ſwear to obſerve the great Charter.

[5] Then about the ſame time, viz. June the 16th, King John ſent his Writs under the great Seal into all Parts of England, firmly enjoining all Sheriffs throughout the Kingdom to make all Men within their Bailywicks of whatſoever Condition, to Swear, that they would obſerve the Laws and Liberties contained in the abovementioned Charter, and that they would to the utmoſt compel the King to the performance of all things therein Contained, by the taking of his Caſtles, if he ſhould do to the contrary. This done, many Noblemen of the Kingdom came to the King, requiring Reſtitution to divers Lands, Poſſeſſions, and Cuſtodies of Caſtles, which they ſaid belonged to them by Hereditary Right; but the King deferr'd giving them a juſt Anſwer to theſe their Demands, until it could be proved by the Oaths of lawful Men, what rightly belonged to each of them; and for the better performance of this, he appointed them a Day being the 16th of July, to appear at Weſtminſter; nevertheleſs he reſtored to the Archbiſhop, the Caſtle of Rocheſter, with ſome other things, which of antient Right belonged to his See; and ſo the aſſembly breaking up, the Barons Returned joyfully to the City of London.

Many Noblemen come to the K. and require Reſtitution of their Lands and Caſtles, whom the K. puts off for the preſent with a dilatory Anſwer.

Dr. Brady omits the former Writs to the Sheriffs, and gives us another of leſs moment, tho' upon Record, and the ſubſtance thereof.

Dr. Brady has for ſome Reaſons beſt known to himſelf, thought fit to omit making any mention of theſe Letters-Patents, tho' they are ſet down by Matt. Paris, and inſtead of them he has only given us the Subſtance of a Writ dated at Runne-Mead the 19th of June, whereby the King Signified to all Sheriffs, Foreſters, Warreners, Keepers of Rivers, and his other Bailiffs, or Officers, that there was a firm Peace made between him, the Barons and Freemen of his Kingdom, as appeared by his Charter which he Commanded publickly to be read in their Bailywicks, willing and ſtreightly Charging each Sheriff, that he ſhould cauſe all of his Bailywick according to the Form of the Charter to Swear to the Five and twenty Barons, or their Attorneys conſtituted by their Letters-Patents, at ſuch Day and Place as they ſhould appoint; and alſo willed and Commanded, that Twelve Knights ſhould be choſen in every County, at the next County (i. e. County-Court) which which ſhould be holden after the recepit of theſe Letters, to enquire into the evil Cuſtoms or Practices of Sheriffs and their Miniſters, as alſo of Foreſters, Warreners, and Keepers of Rivers or River-banks, and Toll-gatherers towards the Repairs of Bridges and Banks, and to extirpate ſuch evil Cuſtoms or Exactions. This Writ is on * Record in the Tower, and is Printed at Large in * Dr. Brady's Appendix. Anno. Dom MCCXV.

* Rot. Pat. 17. Johan. M. 23. Dorſ. * No. 118. * Appendix No. 119.

And there he has given us another Writ of this King's (likewiſe on Record) bearing date the 27th of the ſame Month from Wincheſter, directed to the Sheriff of Warwick-Shire, and the Twelve Knights elected in the ſame County, to take away the evil Cuſtoms of Sheriffs and their Officers, and of Foreſters, with all other Officers in the former Writ mentioned; ſtreightly Commanding them, that without any delay, they ſhould ſeize the Lands, Tenements and Chattles of all thoſe in the County of Warwick, who refuſed to ſwear to the Twenty five Barons, or their Attorneys, and to detein them until they did thus Swear, ſince it was ſo provided by the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and Barons of his Kingdom.

* Rot. Pat. 7. Joan. M. 21. Another Writ to the Sheriffs of Counties, Commanding them to ſeize the Lands and Goods of all thoſe that ſhall refuſe to ſwear to the ſaid Charters.

Yet notwithſtanding all theſe fair Conceſſions, the Barons would not truſt to Wax and Parchment alone, but alſo made the King engage, and put into their Poſſeſſion the City and Tower of London, and Covenant with Robert Fitz-Walter, Mareſchal of the Army of God, and of Holy Church in England; Richard Earl of Clare, Geoffrey Earl of Eſſex and Glouceſter, Roger Bigod Earl of Norfolk and Suffolk, Saher Earl of Wincheſter, Robert Earl of Oxford, H. Earl of Hereford, and the Barons following; William Mareſchal the Younger, Euſtace de Veſcie, William de Mowbray, John Fitz-Robert, Roger de Monte Begon, William de Lanvalay, with other Earls, Barons and Free-Men of the whole Kingdom, that they ſhould hold the City of London of the Livery of the King, until the 15th of Auguſt that Year; ſaving to him his Farms, Rents and clear Debts, and that the Archbiſhop of Canterbury ſhould hold the Tower in like manner, for the ſame Term; ſaving to the Citizens their Liberties and Free Cuſtoms, and ſaving to every one his Right in the Guard of the Tower of London, and ſo as the King ſhould not put any Ammunition or new Forces into the City or Tower in the mean time; and further, that within the ſaid Term, Oaths ſhould be given through all England to the 25 Barons, or their Attorneys, according to the ſaid Writs for chooſing Twelve Knights in every County, &c. and alſo that all things which the Earls, Barons, and other Free-Men did require of the King, which he owned proper to be Reſtored, or which ought by the Judgment of the Twenty five Barons or greater part of them, according to the Form of the ſaid Charter, ſhould be Reſtored accordingly; ſo that if theſe things were performed without any moleſtation or hindrance on the King's Part, within the ſaid Term, then the City and Tower of London ſhould be Re-delivered to him; but if they were not done, or that the King obſtructed the doing of them, then the Barons ſhould hold the City, and the Archbiſhop the Tower, until the Covenants were performed; and in the mean time all on both Parts, to repoſſeſs their Lands, Caſtles, and Towns, which they had in the beginning of the War, between the King and Barons.

The Barons will not truſt to the Charters alone, but make the K. engage to leave the City and Tower of London in their Hands, as a Caution for his true obſervance of them, with the ſubſtance of this Charter.

This

Anno Dom. MCCXV.

This is the Subſtance of another very remarkable Covenant or Agreement, between the King and the Barons above-mentioned, which was only to be found upon Record in the Tower, but now is Printed in Dr. B. * Appendix.

*Rot. Claus. 17 Johan. M. 21. Dorſ. No. 120.

[4] M. P. p. 263. ſ. upon the K's. Agreement to all theſe things, there is for a while great hopes of better Times.

[4] Theſe things being thus diſpatched, and ſeemingly approved of by both Parties, all Men rejoiced, hoping that God had touched the King's heart, and that England ſhould now be delivered from that Egyptian Servitude under which it had ſo long groan'd, and the People be in a much better Condition, being under the Protection of the Roman Church; but it fell out quite otherwiſe than was expected, for thoſe wicked * Mercenary Soldiers who always rather deſired War than Peace, were by their Leaders continually whiſpering in the King's Ears, that he was now no longer a King, but the ſcorn of other Princes, and that 'twere better not to be a King at all, than ſuch a one; thereby adding freſh fuel to the Flame; wherefore the King inclining too much to the falſe ſurmiſes of theſe ſort of Men, quite alienated his affection from his own natural Subjects, and confided wholly in them; ſo that immediately after this Agreement, He grew very reſerved and melancholy, walking alone, and giving divers Signs of inward Rage and Diſcontent.

* Ruptarij i. e. Brabanter and other Flemiſh Horſemen.

But the King being perſwaded by his mercenary Officers, reſolves to take other meaſures.

[5] Id. Ib. 264. And thereupon writes to thoſe Foreigners who had the Cuſtody of his Caſtles to new Victual and Fortifie them.

[5] Therefore reſolving again to recover his loſt Power, he wrote Letters to William Le Marc, a Poictovin (then Conſtable of the Caſtle of Nottingham) as alſo to all other Foreigners, (on whom he chiefly relied) that they ſhould new Victual and Fortifie all the Caſtles and ſtrong Places in their Poſſeſſion; but yet ſo privately, that the Barons might not take Notice of it: But ſince there is ſcarce any thing, which at one time or other does not come to light, the Barons having heard an Inkling of it, ſent ſome of the Wiſeſt of their Number to ſound the King's mind concerning this matter; and if they found it as they had been informed, to labour by wholſome Advice to divert him from ſuch precipitate and ruinous Deſigns: But the King cunningly palliating his ſecret Intentions, Swore by the Feet of God, (his uſual Oath) that he thought no Evil againſt them. Nevertheleſs, tho this pacified them a little for the preſent, yet he could not ſo cloſely conceal it, but that they perceived his Heart was averſe to them; from whence they eaſily preſaged what was like to happen from a King, who, wanting Sincerity, had Subjected himſelf to the Roman See, only that he might have the ſurer means to make them Slaves; and ſo taking their leaves of him, they Returned Home.

[1] Id. ib. The K. retires to the Iſle of Wight.

[1] After which, the King being left alone but with a very few Attendance of his own Family, he ſpent that Night at Windſor, and the Day following took his Journey towards the Iſle of Wight. For it is certain he did not ſtay long at Windſor, in regard we find the above-mentioned Writ to the Sheriff of Warwick-Shire, to bear Date the 27th of June at Wincheſter, tho' he had not as yet pull'd off the Maſk: But ſo ſoon as he arrived in the Iſle, being unmindful of the Oath he had ſo lately Sworn to the Barons, he was reſolved both by the Temporal as well as Spiritual Sword, to free himſelf from theſe Obligations; and that he might begin with the former, he ſent Pandulph with others to the Pope, that he might, might by his Apoſtolick Authority, make void what the Barons had done, and fruſtrate all their Deſigns; he alſo ſent Walter Biſhop of Worceſter, Chancellor of England, John Biſhop of Norwich, Richard de Mariſco or Maris, William Gernon, and Hugh de Boves to all the Neighbouring Nations, with Letters under his Seal, to procure Foreign Aſſiſtance, promiſing ſuch as would Arm themſelves for him large Poſſeſſions and ſtore of Money; and if it were needful, they might make Deeds of Gift to ſuch as were willing to come, for their greater Security, of their military Stipends, appointing them to meet him at Dover on Michaelmas-Day, with as many as they could bring over; he ſent likewiſe to all his Caſtellans or Governors of his Caſtles, to Fortifie, Man, and Victual them, as if they were immediately beſieged; and then endeavoured to gain over the Seamen of the Cinque Ports to his Party.

And from thence ſends Pandulf to the Pope, to make void all that the Barons had done.

Anno Dom. MCCXV.

He ſends alſo the Biſhops of Worceſter and Norwich to procure foreign Aſſiſtance.

[2] Thus the King continued privately in the Iſland, ſometimes plying about the Sea-Coaſts, & converſing only with Sea-Men for near Three Months, without any Court or Regal State: In the mean while it was no wonder if his Subjects talked variouſly of this Retirement, and of the Reaſons of it; and indeed he only waited for the Return of his Meſſengers from the Roman Court, and for the Arrival of thoſe Mercenary Soldiers he had ſent for from Foreign Parts.

[2] Id. Ib. The K. ſpends three Months in the Iſle of Wight, expecting foreign Forces.

But to give an impartial Account of the Cauſes of this unhappy Civil War, Walter of Coventry does not (as Matt. Paris) lay the whole fault of its breaking out afreſh at the King's Door, but ſays, that certain of the Northern Barons were much in fault; for they departing from this Aſſembly, under pretence that they had never given their Conſents, ſought ways and means how to break the Peace ſo lately made, and therefore ſtill exerciſed Plunderings, and other Hoſtilities; nor yet indeed did the King ever Confide in the Barons, or had they free Acceſs to him; wherefore ſome of them retired to London, whilſt others fell on Fortifying thoſe Caſtles which the King had lately delivered to them, or elſe, which they had in their Poſſeſſion before; and there were ſome who built new ones.

Walter of Coventry does not lay the whole fault at the K's door, but blames ſeveral of the Northern Barons.

And though the King had ſent Commiſſioners to Swear Men to the Obſervation of the late Charters, yet when he ſent his Officers, or Sheriffs to look after the Buſineſs of his Exchequer, in whatever Parts thoſe unquiet Barons prevailed, thoſe Officers were ſeized on, and abuſed; which, when the King heard, and ſuſpecting that this Oath for the Obſervation of the Charters was intended againſt himſelf, there being a Clauſe expreſsly Inſerted, that he might be compelled by Force to obſerve them; he thereupon ſent Envoys to Foreign Nations (as Matt. Paris has already related) and in particular, Richard de Mariſco to the Pope, becauſe the General Council was now at hand, and for that he believed the Barons had conſpired his Deſtruction.

Alſo he endeavoured by large Promiſes to bring over the King of France to his Party, but all in vain; for the Barons had been there before hand, and prevented him, and beſides there had been from the beginning of the King's Reign too great Quarrels and Animoſities between them to be eaſily reconciled, tho' they ſeemed for the preſent skinn'd over by a Truce.

In

Anno Dom. MCCXV.

[3] Id. Ib. The Barons resolve to keep the City of London. And put off their Juſts for ſome longer time.

[3] In the mean time the Barons that were in London thinking the danger over, appointed to meet at a Torneament or Tryal of Feats at Arms at Stanford: Whereupon Robert Fitz-Walter and other Great Men wrote to William de Albiney, what great conveniency it was for them all to keep in the City of London, which was their Receptacle, and what Diſgrace and Damage it would be to them, if by their negligence it ſhould be loſt; and therefore by Common Advice they deferred the Juſts which were to be at Stanford on the Monday after the Feaſt of St. Peter and St. Paul until Monday after the Octaves of that Feaſt: And that they ſhould be holden upon the Heath between Staines and Hounſlowe; and this they did for the Security of themſelves and the City. And therefore they ſent to, and required them diligently, that they ſhould come ſo well provided with Horſe and Arms to the Tilting, as they might receive Honour, and he that behaved himſelf beſt, ſhould have a Bear which a certain Lady ſhould ſend thither, which it ſeems was the Prize, (tho' a very homely one) they were then to contend for; thus they pleaſed themſelves with theſe idle ſports, being ignorant of the Snares that were preparing for them.

[4] Id. Ib. The K's Envoys complain to the Pope of the Affronts and Injuries of the Barons.

[4] About the ſame time the King's Envoys came unto the Pope, complaining of the Barons, what Affronts and Injuries their Maſter had received at their Hands, and what Rebellions they had raiſed againſt him, exacting from him ſuch wicked Laws and Liberties, as 'were not fit for his Royal Dignity to grant; and that after the 'Diſcord between them, when the King and Barons often met to 'Treat of Peace, he publickly proteſted before them, that the 'Kingdom of England, in reſpect of Dominion, belonged to the 'Roman Church, and that without the Pope's conſent he could 'Ordain nothing New, or Change any thing in his Kingdom to 'his Prejudice; and therefore he had by Appealing, put Himſelf 'and all the Rights of his Kingdom, under the Protection of the 'Apoſtolick See; yet that the Barons, taking no notice of this Appeal, had ſeized the City of London, being treacherouſly delivered, 'to them, and had Armed themſelves, and exacted the aforeſaid 'Liberties by Force; and that the King fearing their Strength, durſt 'not deny what they demanded of him. Then they delivered the Articles of the Charter in Writing to the Pope, which when he had diligently peruſed, he knit his Brows, and ſaid, what! do the Barons of England endeavour to Dethrone a King, who hath taken upon him the Holy Croſs, and is under the Protection of the Apoſtolick See? and would they force him to transfer the Dominion of the Roman Church to Others? By St. Peter this Injury we cannot paſs by unpuniſhed: [5] Then deliberating with the Cardinals, he damned and Caſſated for ever, by a definitive Sentence, the Charter of Liberties ſo often mentioned; and ſent the King a Bull containing that Sentence, which you may alſo find at large in our Author.

At the hearing of which, the Pope is highly diſpleaſed.

[5] Id. p. 266.

But before we ſpeak farther of this matter, 'tis neceſſary to take notice of ſome precedent Records which this Bull refers to; and are not to be found in any of our Hiſtorians; for Dr. Brady whilſt he was keeper of the Records in the Tower, there found out ſome Letters and Declarations relating to the preſent Affair, which becauſe they ſerve very much to prove the Truth of the matters of Fact recited in in the ſaid Bull, I ſhall make bold to Tranſcribe the Subſtance of, as they ſtand in the Dr's Hiſtory, tho' they are Printed at large in the Appendix. Anno Dom. MCCXV.

You are therefore to underſtand, that ſo ſoon as the Barons had appeared in a Warlike poſture before the King at Chriſtmaſs, (as hath been already related) and made their Demands of their Liberties, he gave the Pope notice of it, who upon the Nineteenth of March following * wrote two ſeveral Letters to the Archbiſhop and his Suffragans, (the Biſhops of his Province) and to all the Barons, that they had raiſed new Queſtions and Controverſies a-'gainſt the King, ſuch as were not heard of in the time of his 'Father, or Brother, that they ſhould not enter into Conſpiracies 'againſt him, but humbly and dutifully apply themſelves to him; 'and perform their due and accuſtomed Services, as they had been 'performed to him and his Anceſtors, upon which he would en-'join him for the Remiſſion of his Sins, to deal more mildly with 'his Nobles, and admit their juſt Petitions.

The K. writes to the Pope, giving him notice of the Barons demands.

On the Tenth of May following, the King publiſhed a * De-'claration, that he would not take the Barons or their Men, (that 'is, their Tenants) nor Diſſeiſe them, nor paſs upon them 'by force of Arms, but by the Law of the Land, and Judg-'ment of their Peers in his Court, till things ſhould be determi-'ned by Four Perſons to be choſen on his Part, and Four by the 'Barons, and the Pope to be Umpire between them; and for the 'performance of this, he offered as Security the Biſhops of Lon-'don, Worceſter, Cheſter, and Rocheſter, with William Earl of Warren.

Bp. and B's. as alſo of the Barons dealing with him: upon which Letter the Pope iſſues out his Bull, to annul the Charter of Liberties.

Upon Conſideration of theſe Offers and Declarations, & which the Pope briefly recites in his above-mentioned Bull: He, by the Common Conſent of the Cardinals, damned the late Charter of Liberties, and all Obligations, and Cautions which the King had given, and entred into for the performance of it, and declared them Null and Void, as you have already heard.

[1] By Letters bearing the ſame Date with this Bull, the Pope wrote to the the Barons that they had not well conſidered their Oath of Fidelity, when they thus raſhly perſecuted their Lord the 'King: That all Men deteſted their Proceedings, eſpecially in ſuch 'a Cauſe, where they made themſelves both Parties and Judges; 'when the King was ready to do them Juſtice by their Peers in his 'Court, according to the Laws and Cuſtoms of the Kingdom, or 'to proceed by Arbitrators choſen on both Sides, with a Reference 'to

'to himſelf, if they could not agree: And therefore Commands 'them to renounce that unlawful and unjuſt Compoſition they had 'extorted from him by Fear and Force, and ſatisfie him, and ſuch 'as adhered to him, for the Injuries they had done them, That by 'this means the King might be induced to grant whatſoever of Right 'ought to be granted to them; and further adviſed them to ſend 'their Procurators or Deputies to the next General Council, which 'he intended ſuddenly to call about the Buſineſs of the Cruſade; '(where would be preſent the Archbiſhop, and other Engliſh Bi'ſhops,) and there commit themſelves to his good Pleaſure; for by 'the Grace of God he intended ſo to determine things, as to take 'away all Oppreſſions and Abuſes in the Kingdom, that ſo the King 'being content with his own Right, and Honour, the whole Cler'gy and Laiety might enjoy their juſt Repoſe and Liberty.

[2] Id. ib. The Barons will not deſiſt from what they had undertaken, notwithſtanding the Popes's Letters, but ſend for William de Albiney.

[2] But it ſeems the Pope's Letters had no effect with the Barons; for they purſued what they had undertaken, and ſent for William de Albiney, an Experienced Soldier, to their Aſſiſtance. 'Tis true, they ſent to him ſeveral times before he came; but at laſt, upon a chiding Letter, he having firſt ſecured the Caſtle of Belvoir, or Beevoir, (as we now call it) came to London, where he was received with great joy by the Barons; and their firſt Conſultation with him was, which way to Secure the City of London from being Beſieged; Upon which they reſolved to fortify all the Avenues leading to it, and then raiſing a more conſiderable Force, they and divers of their own number, together with William de Albiney went into Rocheſter Caſtle, of which he was then made Governor, under the Archbiſhop of Canterbury. And it is to this Time, (whilſt the Barons carried all before them, and that the King lay ſtill without Action, expecting the arrival of the Foreign Forces, he had ſent for,) that we may refer what Walter of Coventry farther relates concerning this Affair, viz. That the Archbiſhop and Biſhops beheld with Grief the great Havock that the Barons had made of the King's Houſes, Parks and Foreſts, eſpecially in the Northern Parts, (tho' as yet they ſpared the Country, becauſe of the approaching Harveſt) wherefore the ſaid Biſhops began again to admoniſh ſometimes the Barons, and ſometimes the King, to maintain the Peace; which ſince both of them pretended (at leaſt in words) earneſtly to deſire, it was at laſt agreed, That a Treaty ſhould be held at Oxford, the day after our Lady's Aſſumption, where the King appointed to meet the Biſhops as Mediators; the Barons met at Brackley, and from thence went to Oxford with a great Appearance; but the King did not come according to his promiſe, but ſent certain Meſſengers, to excuſe himſelf, who ſaid, That he had reſigned up all things to them, ſo that he had ſcarce any Refuge left him; and that ſince the late Peace, he had received great Injuries from them without any Satisfaction, and they now appeared in ſuch mighty Numbers, that it was not thought ſafe for him to come to them thither.

The A. Bp and Bps mediate a Treaty between the K. and the Barons.

Which is agreed to be at Oxford; but the K. not appearing, nothing is done.

[3] Id. ib. The K's Meſſengers produce the P's Breve, threatning all thoſe with Excommunication who ſhould reſiſt the King: But the Sentence is deferred for a Time.

[3] Then the Meſſengers produced the Pope's Breve, Threatning all thoſe with Excommunication who ſhould dare to reſiſt the King; ſo the Treaty being protracted for the ſpace of Three days, at laſt it was agreed between the Biſhops and the Barons, That the Sentence tence of Excommunication ſhould be put off for ſome time; and in the mean while, the Biſhops ſhould wait upon the King to ſee if they could prevail with him to Treat with the Barons at London, or elſe at Staines near Windſor. Thus they parted, the Barons returning to London, and the Biſhops ſetting forward in order to attend the King at Portſmouth, who being then juſt going to put to Sea, came again a-ſhore to meet them; But all they could obtain of him was, that he would ſend ſome of his Servants in the Company, and under the ſafe Conduct of the Biſhops, who ſhould in a publick Aſſembly of the Barons make Proteſtation, that it was not his fault, if the Peace lately concluded was not obſerved. Anno Dom. MCCXV.

The Bps again attend the K. but can obtain no poſitive Anſwer from him.

[4] Wherefore about Bartholomew-Tide, the Biſhops and Barons meeting the King's Commiſſioners at the Town of Staines, after ſome deliberation, moſt of the Biſhops ſeeing the Danger that hung over their Heads from the Pope's Bull, publiſh'd the Sentence of Excommunication againſt all thoſe who ſhould preſume to diſturb the Peace of the King and Kingdom; yet this had little or no effect, moſt of the Barons turning this Sentence upon the King's own Head, who (as they affirm'd) was the chief Diſturber of it, and did by his own actions go about to expell himſelf: Wherefore the Barons return'd to London with great Pomp, and preſently diſperſed themſelves into ſeveral Parts of the Kingdom; the Government of Eſſex being committed to Geoffry de Mandeville; That of Northampton, to Robert Fitz-Walter; whilſt Roger de Creſſey undertook the Cuſtody of Norfolk and Suffolk; as Saer de Quincy did that of Cambridge and Huntingtonſhires; William de Albiney that of Lincolnſhire; and Robert de Roſs the Government of Northumberland; ſo that every one was to act as a Juſticiary over the Province* or County aſſign'd him, and to provide for the Peace of the Inhabitants.

[4] Id. Ib p. 269. The K's Commiſſioners meet the Bps at Staines, where moſt of them agree to publiſh the ſaid Sentence of Excommunication, but it had no effect upon the Barons.

The Barons return to London, where they appoint Governors over ſeveral Counties.

[5] But before the Barons had ſufficiently provided for their Defence, I mean, ſo well as they intended, the King after about three Months ſtay in the Iſle of Wight, ſailed from thence to Dover, where he met his Meſſengers whom he had ſent to fetch freſh Forces from Poictou, Gaſcony, Brabant, and Flanders; and theſe being now arrived, he preſently marched to beſiege the Caſtle of Rocheſter.

[5] M.P. p. 268. W. C. The K. leaves the Iſle of Wight, and comes to Dover; from whence (his Foreign Forces being now arrived) he marches to beſiege Rochester-Caſtle.

[1] The Barons had before ſworn to William de Albiney, That whenever the Caſtle ſhould happen to be Beſieged, they would uſe their utmoſt Endeavours to relieve it; ſo they marched as far as Dartford, but then finding themſelves too weak, they retreated to London, becauſe (as Walter of Coventry relates) the King had ſeized upon all the Avenues, and cauſed all the Bridges to be broken down that led thither; notwithſtanding which, the Gariſon defended themſelves with great Courage and Reſolution; but the King making uſe of his Engines of Battery, and they within not having Weapons ſufficient to withſtand them, at laſt, after near Three Months ſiege, were forced to yield at diſcretion; becauſe not only great part of the Walls were beaten down, but likewiſe becauſe they were in mighty want of Victuals.

[3] Whilſt the King was thus employed in the Siege of Rocheſter, the Barons in return Beſieged his Gariſons at Oxford and Northampton, having for this end ſent for Engineers out of France; but they did not meet with the like Succeſs as the King had at Rocheſter.

[4] M. P. p. 268. Hugh de Boves with a great many Foreign Forces, is caſt away in a great Storm.

[4] But about this time, the King received a great Diſappointment in ſome of thoſe Foreign Succours he now expected; for Hugh de Boves (a Stout but Inſolent Commander) having Shipp'd himſelf with a great Number of Mercenary Soldiers at Calice, intending to Land at Dover, the Veſſels met with ſo great a Storm at Sea, that they were all Shipwrack'd in the Paſſage, and their dead Bodies moſt of them caſt on Shore near Yarmouth; at which News the King was ſo diſturbed, that he would not eat a Bit of Bread all that Day till Night. But to ſay ſomewhat of Eccleſiaſtical Affairs.

[5] Id. p. 270. The Pope having declared the Barons Excommunicated, commits the Execution of the Sentence to the Biſhop of Winchester, and others.

[5] The Pope upon notice that the Barons ſtill perſiſted in the Proſecution of the War againſt the King, had ſome time before declared them all Excommunicated, (as you have already heard) and he now committed the Execution of this Sentence to Peter Biſhop of Wincheſter, the Abbot of Reading, and Pandulph his late Legate; in which Bull of Excommunication, he enjoyned the Archbiſhop and Biſhops, by virtue of their Obedience, That they ſhould cauſe the Sentence to be publiſhed every Lord's Day and Holyday, and that with ringing of Bells, and lighting of Candles, throughout all England, untill the Barons ſatisfied the King for the Injuries done to him, and returned to their Obedience.

[1] Id. p. 271. The ſaid Bp and Pandulf attend the A. Bp of Canterbury, commanding him to direct his Suffragans to publiſh this Sentence, which he defers to do. Upon which they ſuſpend him, and publiſh the Sentence themſelves.

[1] Then the Biſhop of Wincheſter, and Pandulph, perſonally attended the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and, in the Name of the Pope, Commanded him to give directions to the Biſhops of his Province to publiſh this Sentence againſt the Barons: But he was then ready to take Shipping to go to the Council at Rome, and therefore deſired reſpite until he ſpake with the Pope; affirming, the Sentence had been obtained by concealing Truth; and for that Reaſon he ſhould by no means publiſh it, till upon diſcourſe with his Holineſs he knew his Mind concerning it. But the Biſhop and Pandulph, when they found the Archbiſhop diſobedient to the Pope's Command, Suſpended him from entering the Church, and celebrating Divine Service.

At the ſame time likewiſe, the Biſhop of Wincheſter declared all the Barons that had endeavoured to drive the King out of the Kingdom, Excommunicated, and continued to do ſo every Lord's Day, and on every Feſtival: But they, becauſe not particularly named in the Pope's Brief, valued not the Sentence, reputing it Null and Void: And thus the Pope, when he had ſubdued the King, and brought him to his own Terms, to make him amends, joined with him to eſtabliſh his Abſolute, Arbitrary Power over the Nation.

[2] Id. p. 272, 273. The K's Procurators accuſe the A. B. of Canterbury, in the Council at Rome, of holding Intelligence with the Barons.

[2] In the General Council now held at Rome, the Procurators or Commiſſioners for the King, That is to ſay, John Abbot of Beaulieu, lieu, with Thomas de Huntingdon and Godfrey de Craucomb, Knights, appeared againſt Stephen Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and accuſed him of holding a Criminal Correſpondence with the Barons, and that by his Favour and Aſſiſtance they endeavoured to Dethrone the King; and that when he received the Pope's Commands to reſtrain the Barons from perſecuting the King by Eccleſiaſtick Cenſures, upon his refuſing to do it, he had been Suſpended. But the Archbiſhop being confounded with theſe Accuſations, ſaid nothing for himſelf, only deſired to be Abſolved from his Suſpenſion: To which the Pope in Anger Swore by St. Peter, That he ſhould not ſo eaſily obtain the Benefit of Abſolution, who had offered ſo many Affronts, not only to the King of England, but alſo to the Roman Church. Then upon Conſultation with the Cardinals they all Subſcribed, and he confirm'd the late Sentence of Suſpenſion againſt the Archbiſhop; which was dated the Fourth of November, and ſent to all the Clerks and Laicks of that Province, to let them know they had ratified what the Biſhop of Wincheſter and Pandulph the Legate had done, commanding ready Obedience to it, as appears by the Pope's Brief, which you may find at large in our Author. Anno. Dom. MCCXV.

Whereupon the Pope confirms his Suſpenſion.

[3] About this time the Canons of York having lately choſe Simon Langton, (Brother to Stephen Archbiſhop of York) preſented him to the Pope for his Confirmation; but inſtead of that he Null'd the Election, and recommended to them Walter de Gray, Biſhop of Worceſter, upon the Account that he was reputed a Pure Virgin ever ſince he was born, whom they accordingly choſe; and he at the receipt of his Pall obliged himſelf to pay Ten thouſand Pounds Sterling to the Court of Rome: From which Relation we may make theſe Obſervations: Firſt, What a rare Virtue Continence was then thought to be amongſt the Clergy, when a Biſhop, (who was very Illiterate) ſhould be thus advanced to an Archbiſhoprick, only becauſe he was not known to have had any Unlawful Communication with Women; which it ſeems was very frequent in that Age to Men of his Order.

[3] Id. p. 271. The Chapter of York chuſe Simon Langton A.Bp. but he being refuſed by the Pope, the Bp of Worceſter is recommended to them, who pays the Pope 10000 l. for his Pall.

You may alſo, Secondly, See what vaſt Sums of Money the Pope in thoſe Days extorted out of England, and what great Riches the Clergy poſſeſs'd, when this Archbiſhop was to pay the Pope ſuch a Sum as would be equal at this Day to above 40000 l.

By this time, [4] the King having received the late Sentence againſt the Archbiſhop, went to the Monaſtery of St. Albans, and there cauſed it to be Publiſhed by that Abbot; and from thence it was ſent to all Cathedral and Conventual Churches throughout England for the ſame Purpoſe. So ſoon as this was granted by the Convent, he went out of the Chapter-Houſe into the Cloiſters, and there adviſed with thoſe few Councellors he had about him, how he might confound thoſe Great Men who were his Enemies, and provide Pay for that Army of Mercenary Foreigners, that were lately arrived: Upon which it was there agreed, That the King ſhould form two Armies, One of which was to repreſs the Excurſions of the Barons, who then held London, whilſt he marched forward to ſubdue the Northern Counties. Theſe Reſolutions were taken at St. Albans, the Twentieth of December.

[4] Id. p. 274. The K. goes to the Abbey of St. Albans, and there cauſes the Sentence againſt the A.Bp of Canterbury to be publiſhed.

He alſo conſults with his Great Men how to carry on the War.

About

Anno Dom. MCCXV.

At the ſame time, [5] the King made his Brother, the Earl of Saliſbury, (who was now releaſed out of Priſon in France by exchange) and Fawkes de Brent a cruel Man (who, tho' of mean Birth, had raiſed himſelf by his military Services to the Degree of a Baron) with Savery de Malleon, another of the ſame ſort, William de Briwere and Walter Buck, Commanders of thoſe Forces he left behind; Savery Commanding the Poictovins, and Walter the Flemmings and Brabanters, who were then noted for all kind of villanies; which done, the King marched from thence toward the North, taking along with him William Earl of Albemarle, Philip de Albiney and John the Mareſchal; and of the Foreigners, Gerard de Sotinie, and one Godeſchal with his Flemmings and Croſs-Bow-men, with others of divers Nations, who neither fear'd God, nor regarded Man.

[5] Id. Ib. He appoints his Brother the Earl of Saliſbury with certain Foreigners Commanders of the Forces he left behind. And then marches toward the North, taking along with him great ſtore of Foreign Officers, and Soldiers.

[1] In his march the King lodging one Night at Dunſtable, ſet forward the next Morning before Day towards Northampton, and detaching divers Parties, burnt the Houſes of the Barons by the way, plundering and deſtroying the whole Country before them; and all Perſons of whatſoever Age or Condition (who not having taken refuge in a Church or Church-yard) that the Soldiers met with, were cruelly tormented, till they had ranſomed themſelves by Money; So true (ſays my Author) is that Verſe of the antient Poet, Quicquid delirant Reges, plectuntur Achivi.

[1] Id. Ib. The K's Forces in their march plunder and deſtroy the Country.

Then the Chaſtellans, who kept the Barons Caſtles, when they heard of the King's coming, quitted their Commands, and fled to places of Safety; and the King putting Governors into thoſe places, marched with all ſpeed to Nottingham.

[2] In the mean time William Earl of Saliſbury and Fawkes de Brent, with the Forces left under their Command at St. Albans, after they had put very ſtrong Garriſons into the Caſtles of Windſor, Hertford and Berkamſted, as well to bridle the Barons in London, as to hinder Victuals from being carried into the City, they marched into the Counties of Eſſex, Middleſex, Hertford, Cambridge and Huntingtonſhires, where they made the like Waſte upon the Barons Eſtates, as the King did Northward, and further deſtroyed their Parks and Warrens, cutting down their Orchards, &c. and at laſt they came ſo near London that they ſet Fire on the Suburbs, and carried off much Plunder: Yet for all this, when the Barons heard their Towns and Houſes were burnt, and their Wives and Children taken and expoſed to Infamy, they bore it patiently, only ſaying, theſe things are done by this dear Son of the Pope, who defends his Vaſſal in thus enſlaving a Free and Noble Kingdom.

[2] Id. Ib. p. 275. The Earl of Saliſbury &c. put ſtrong Gariſons into Windſor Caſtle, Hertford, &c. to curb the Barons, and ſtreighten the City of London. And marching into the adjacent Counties, ſpoil the Barons Eſtates. All which the Barons bear with great Patience.

[3] About the ſame time, Fawkes de Brent burnt the Caſtle of Hanſlape, in Bucks belonging to William Mandit, and demoliſhed it; alſo the ſame Day the ſtrong Caſtle of the Earl of Clare's at Tunbridge was taken by the Garriſon of Rocheſter, and Fawkes likewiſe took the Caſtle of Bedford, having no Relief from William de Beauchamp the Owner of it. Then the King, to recompence this Fawkes for his Services, gave him that Caſtle, and a Noble young Lady, one Margaret de Rivers, in marriage, with all her Eſtate; as alſo the Lands of divers Barons of England, all which did but ſerve to exaſperate them the more againſt the King.

[3] Id. Ib. Fawkes de Brent takes divers ſtrong Caſtles.

[4] For

[4] For in Return of the Outrages committed upon them, a strong Party of the Barons that were at London, sallyed out, and marching into Cambridge-shire, spoiled that Country, and took the Castle of that Town without any difficulty, sending those that kept it, Prisoners to London; and then passing through the Counties of Norfolk and Suffolk, they plundred those Inhabitants, and made the Citizens of Norwich redeem themselves: The like they did at Yarmouth and Ipswich, and the Neighbouring Towns, and in their Return they took the Castle of Colchester, and some time after this, those of Hertford and Berkhamsted, with other Places adjacent.

Anno Dom. MCCXV.

[4] M. W. The Barons in return plunder Cambridge, Norwich, and other Towns.

[5] As for Ecclesiastical Affairs, this Year affords none in England (except what has been already mentioned;) but the Pope held a General Council at Rome, which was chiefly called to renew the Crusado, for the Recovery of the Holy Land; to which he himself then gave Thirty thousand Marks, which remained in his Hands of the Alms of certain pious Persons; He also promised for himself and his Cardinals to pay the Tenth part of their Ecclesiastical Revenues for Three Years, and Taxed all Archbishops, Bishops and other Clergymen a Twentieth part of theirs for the like time.

[1] M. P. Id p. 272. The Pope in the General Council at Rome, renews the Crusado, and gives largely to it, out of other Peoples Purses.

At this Council appeared no less than Four hundred and Twelve Bishops, with the Two Patriarchs of Constantinople and Jerusalem, besides the Ambassadors of the Greek and Roman Emperors, together with those of France and England, and the rest of the King and Princes of Christendom.

[1] This being the last Year of King John's Reign, he kept Christmass-Day at the Castle of Nottingham, and the Day after, he sent and summoned Belvoir-Castle, threatning to starve William de Albiney (the Lord of it) to death, if it were not surrendred without Capitulation. Upon which the Governors, for the safety of their Master carried the Keys thereof to the King, being then at Langar; yet upon Condition, that he should deal mercifully with him, and that they themselves should remain in safety with their Horses and Arms. Accordingly the King took possession of it on St. John's Day, and gave them that were in it his Letters Patents of Indemnity, for the Enjoyment of all their Goods, having first taken an Oath of Fidelity and Obedience from them.

Anno Dom. MCCXVI.

[1] Id. The K. after he had kept Christmass-day at Nottingham, summons Belvoir Castle, which is surrendred to him at Discretion.

[2] In the mean time some of the King's Army came to Deventon, a Castle of John de Lacyes, and finding it deserted, the King Commanded it to be Razed to the Ground. Here our Author, (not Matt. Paris, but Roger of Wendover, who wrote before him,) proceeds to Relate, that the King passing through the North Parts, divided his Army into several Bodies, which every where in their march plundered and burnt the Houses of the Barons, driving away their Cattle, and destroying all things before them with Fire and Sword: And here the Monk is very sharp against these cruel Mercenaries, calling them the Guards of Satan, and Ministers of the Devil; and indeed not without cause, if they were guilty of those barbarous Cruelties he charges them with; which, since they would be tedious and perhaps unpleasant to Relate at large, I shall only give you this brief account of them; as that they spared neither Age, nor

A brief Account of their Cruelties.

Sex; neither Women, Children nor old decrepit People escaping their Cruelties: He farther relates, that they took Priests from the very Altar, with the consecrated Hosts in their Hands, and then tortured, robbed and wounded them; and that to extort Money from Gentlemen and those of meaner Condition, they hanged Some up by the Middle, Others by their Legs and Feet; Some by their Arms, Hands, or Thumbs, spitting into their Eyes Salt mixt with Vinegar; Others they laid upon Trivets and Grid-irons over burning Coales, then put their broiled Bodies under Ice to cool them: So that now all Commerce ceased, and there were no Markets held any where but in Church-Yards.

Dr. Brady endeavours to make these Accounts the false representations of the Monks; but his Reasons seem not sufficient.

Dr. Brady and Others who Write in favour of King John, would fain suppose that these things were invented by the Monkish Writers of these times, purely to blacken his Memory, and one might believe so, if there were only One or Two who wrote this; but Radulph Abbot of Coggeshal gives us the same Account (tho' in fewer words) of these Cruelties; and if we must not believe these Authors, who wrote of things in their own time, because they were Monks and Enemies to King John; we may as well for the same Reason not give them Credit in any thing else: whereas what they relate was done within the memories of divers then alive, who must needs have cryed out on them for notorious lyars, had the matters been otherwise than as they related them; but I shall produce a foreign Writer to justifie the same passages by and by.

The King commits the Custody of the Northern Counties to Hugh de Bailiol, and others.

Thus, whilst the Barons lay quiet at London, the King got possession of almost all their Castles and Estates from the South to the Northern Sea; which with the Lands lying between the River Teyse and Scotland, he committed to Hugh de Bailiol and Philip de Hulecotes, with sufficient Soldiers to defend that Country, as appears by a [3] Writ which Dr. Brady cites from the Tower Records. The Castles and Lands in York-shire were commited to Robert de Vipont, Brien de Lisle, and Geoffry de Lucy, with Forces requisite for their Defence; to William Earl of Albemarle he committed the Castle of Rockingham and Bitham; to Fawkes de Brent, he gave the Custody of the Castles of Oxford, Northampton, Bedford and Cambridge; with the Castle of Hereford he entrusted Walter de Godardvil, a Knight, Retainer of Fawkes de Brent; and to Ranulph the German the Castle of Berkamsted; with commands to all of them, that as they loved their Bodies and all they had, they should destroy all things that belonged to the Barons, their Castles, Houses, Towns, Parks, Warrens, &c. and what could the most Barbarous foreign Enemy have done more!

[3] * Ro. Pat. 18. Joan. M. 7. Dors. n. 66. And the Castles in the South, to the Earl of Albemarle and others.

The K. of Scots invades England.

About this time (as the Scottish Historians Buchanan and others relate, their) Young King Alexander, being Invited by the English Clergy and Barons, who were Enemies to King John, Invaded England; and Norham Castle being surrenderd to him upon Articles, he marched further into the Country, doing what mischief he could to those of the King's Party.

[4] C. M.

[4] When the Scottish King was returned home, after he had taken the Homages of the Barons of Northumberland, (which he then laid claim to) King John with his Army of Mercenaries marched toward Scotland; at what time the Barons of York-shire, who had also Confederated against him, hearing of his coming, fled to the

King

King of Scots for Refuge, and did him Homage at the Abbey of Mailroſs. But the King of England preſently following them, deſtroyed their Towns and Poſſeſſions with Fire and Sword; tho' ſome of thoſe Barons to prevent him, ſet fire themſelves to their own Houſes, together with their Corn, leſt they might prove ſerviceable to the King; ſo that the greateſt part of the Country was laid waſte. Anno Dom. MCCXVI. K. John ſpoils the eſtates of the Barons in York-ſhire.

Then advancing farther, about the beginning of January the Towns of Werk, Alnwick, and Morpeth were alſo burnt; nor did the King ſtop here, but marching into Scotland, in the ſame Month he burnt Roxburgh, with divers Towns and Villages, and about that time likewiſe took the ſtrong Town and Caſtle of Berwick, which was till then thought impregnable. K. John burns divers Towns in Northumberland, and entring Scotland, burns Roxburgh, and takes Berwick.

Here, as the Writer of the Chronicle of Mailroſs (who then lived) relates, the King's Mercenaries exerciſed moſt inhumane Cruelties upon all they could meet with of both Sexes; for hanging up ſome by their Hands, and others by their Feet, they tormented them after a moſt terrible manner, to ſqueeze Money from them: And thus you have another impartial Witneſs of the ſtrange Inhumanity of theſe mercenary Forces in Scotland as well as in England; which ſince the King did not reſtrain by any good Diſcipline, it may be juſtly imputed to his Order or Connivance at leaſt. A farther Account of the Cruelties of K. John's mercenary Army.

From hence the King marching to Hadington, burnt it, and Dunbar, with other Towns in thoſe Parts. Alſo theſe Soldiers or Miniſters of Satan, (as my Author calls them) plundered the Abbey of Coldingham, and then burnt and deſerted the Town of Berwick; the King himſelf giving the example, who (as it is reported) with his own Hands ſet Fire to the Houſe in which he lay. King John marches farther into Scotland, burning ſeveral Towns.

On the other Side, in the Month of February following, the King of Scots raiſing a powerful Army, marched againſt King John, but he being afraid to meet him, retreated towards England; therefore Alexander in Revenge burnt and deſtroyed all the Country as far as Carliſle, and then leading them quite through Northumberland, (as Buchanan relates) came as far as Richmond; but King John preventing his overtaking him by long marches, Alexander returned back through Weſtmorland into his own Kingdom, and ſo concluded his Expedition with ſufficient Honour. The K. of Scots raiſes an Army, and marches againſt K. John, who thereupon retreats, and returns into England.

But notwithſtanding King John now loſt whatever he had got in Scotland, yet this Expedition proved of great advantage to him, ſince beſides the miſchief he did the Scots, [5] he alſo reduced the Northern Counties to his Obedience, ſo that there did not remain any more than Two Caſtles belonging to the Barons in thoſe Parts: Theſe Countries being thus ſubdued, the King returned home by the Borders of Wales; where he likewiſe treated thoſe that reſiſted him very Cruelly, and took divers Caſtles belonging to his Enemies, ſome of which he pulled down, and others he new-Gariſoned with his own Soldiers. [5] M. P. p. 276.

But it is fit we give ſome Account of the Eccleſiaſtical Affairs that were tranſacted this Summer, ſince they had now ſo great an Influence on the Civil.

Anno Dom. MCCXVI

[1] Id. ib. The Pope Excommunicates the Chiefeſt of the Barons who were againſt the K. by Name.

As alſo divers Citizens of London, and puts the whole City under an Interdict.

[1] The Pope having had notice from the King, that the Barons valued not his general Excommunication, he therefore proceeded to Excommunicate the Chiefeſt of them by Name, and committed the Execution of his Breve to the Abbot of Abbendun, the Archdeacon of Poictou, and Maſter Robert, Official of Norwich, by which he not only Anathematized all the Barons with their Aſſiſtants and Favourers, who perſecuted the Illuſtrious King John, Vaſſal to the Roman Church, but further, he Excommunicated and Anathematized all thoſe who helped them to Invade and Poſſeſs the Kingdom, or hindered any Perſon from going to, and aſſiſting the King; and put all the Barons Lands under Interdict; He alſo Excommunicated the Citizens of London, that were principal Actors againſt the King, and One and Thirty Others, by Name, with all their Accomplices, and put the City of London under Eccleſiaſtical Interdict, and all this without remedy of Appeal. This Brief bears date the 27th of the Kalends of January, being December the 16th, 1215.

[2] Id. p. 277. The Pope's Delegates here write to all Cathedral and Conventual Churches, to publiſh this Sentence.

* See their Names in our Author.

[2] The Pope's Commiſſioners, or Delegates, upon the receipt of this Brief, wrote to all Cathedral and Conventual Churches, enjoining them to publiſh this Brief of Excommunication againſt the Barons *therein named, and to order it to be publiſhed in the Pariſh Churches, within their ſeveral Juriſdictions, upon all Lord's Days and Feſtivals, and enjoined them to publiſh Thirty other Barons by name Excommunicated, which were contained in the Sentence drawn up by Peter Biſhop of Wincheſter, Pandulph, and the Abbot of Reading, for whoſe Names I refer you to our Author.

[3] Id. p. 278. The City of London, and the Barons deſpiſe the Sentence, and their Reaſons for it.

[3] Upon the Publication of this Sentence, the City of London ſtood contumacious, and deſpiſed it; and the Barons reſolved not to obſerve it, nor did the Biſhops much urge it; For it was generally ſaid, that thoſe Briefs were obtained by falſe Suggeſtions, and therefore were of no value; and for this alſo more eſpecially, that it did not belong to the Pope to direct and govern in Lay-matters, becauſe only the Power and Diſpoſition of Eccleſiaſtick Affairs was committed by God to Peter the Apoſtle, and his Succeſſors; 'Why 'therefore ſhould the inſatiable Covetouſneſs and Ambition of the 'Roman Court oblige them? Behold (ſaid they) the Succeſſors of 'Conſtantine, not Peter, who do not the Works of Peter, nor are 'they at all like him in Authority: And then after many Invectives againſt the Pope's Uſurers and Simoniacal Miniſters, our Monk concludes with this Exclamation, How unlike to Peter, are thoſe who Uſurpe to themſelves ſo large a ſhare of his Power!

[4] Id. ib. Walter Buck Seizes and Plunders the Iſle of Ely.

* i.e. The ſtation of the Army, and was the Old Fortification where the Conqueror's Army lay.

[4] About the ſame time Walter Buck with his Brabanters entered the Iſle of Ely by Auder's Cauſe-way; or, as our Author words it, he enter'd it on that ſide towards Hereby*, while William Earl of Saliſbury, Faulks and Savarie de Malleon, paſſing over the Ice, got into it on the other ſide by Stuntney-Bridge, and waſted and plundered the whole Iſle; and many that fled thither, as to a Place of Safety, were taken Priſoners, and put to Ranſom: The Cathedral was redeemed from Fire by the Prior, for ſomewhat more than an Hundred Marks of Silver; ſo that theſe Mercenaries made no diſtinction between Perſons or Places, Sacred or Prophane.

[5] Id. ib.

[5] The Barons having now loſt all they had, and being reduced to Deſperation, knew not what courſe to take to recover their Loſſes;

ſes; but for the preſent all the Remedy they had was to curſe the King's Falſhood and Inconſtancy, and ſo fell into very ſharp Invectives againſt him, for ſubjecting his Kingdom to the Pope; Nor ſpared they his Holineſs himſelf, for thus joining with the King to Oppreſs and Enſlave the Nation; which (tho' added by Matt. Paris to Roger of Wendover's Hiſtory, yet) ſeems very likely to have been the General Complaint of the Kingdom at that time. Anno Dom. MCCXVI. The Barons curſe the K's Falſhood, and rail againſt the Pope.

But to come to the Matter, [1] The Barons when they had vented their Spleen, after much Conſultation, at laſt reſolved, that the only way they had left to recover their loſt Eſtates, was, to chuſe ſome powerful Prince for their King, ſuppoſing that None could be more Severe and Tyrannical than King John; nor could they (as they believed) be in a much worſe Condition, let what would befall them: The main Queſtion was, whom they ſhould make choice of; which being for ſome time debated, at laſt they agreed to ſet Lewis, Eldeſt Son to Philip King of France, upon the Engliſh Throne, and one of their chief Reaſons was, becauſe that moſt part of the Forces (which were King John's greateſt Strength) came out of his Territories; ſo that he would be thereby deprived of their Aſſiſtance, and left as it were to their Mercy. This generally pleaſed them; and thereupon they ſent Saher Earl of Winton, and Robert Fitz-Walter, to King Philip, and Lewis his Son, with Letters ſealed with the Baron's Seal, earneſtly imploring the Father to ſend his Son to be King of England; and no leſs importunately requeſting the Son, that he would forthwith come and receive the Crown. [1] Id. p. 279. And agree to make Lewis, Son to K. Philip, their King, and the Reaſons of it. They ſend Ambaſſadors into France to invite him over.

The King of France having peruſed the Barons Letters, told their Commiſſioners, he ſhould not ſend his Son, till, for his greater Security, he had received Twenty four Hoſtages or Pledges, of the moſt Noble Perſons of the Kingdom; whereupon the Barons, having no other Remedy, ſent to him ſo many Hoſtages as he required; and ſo ſoon as they were received, and put into ſafe Cuſtody, Lewis prepared himſelf for the Expedition, which he deſired above all things; but becauſe his coming over could not be immediately, he ſent before him into England the Caſtellans of St. Omars and Arras, Hugh Chacun, Euſtace de Neville, Giles de Melun, and divers other Noblemen of France, with a great Number of Soldiers, to encourage the Barons, who came up the Thames to London, and were received with great Joy on the 27th of February. The French K. requires Hoſtages for his Son's Security if he came, which is granted. Prince Lewis ſends ſeveral of his Great Men, and a great many Soldiers over before him.

But to intermix now ſomewhat of Eccleſiaſtical Matters; [2] About the ſame time Stephen Archbiſhop of Canterbury, having given caution at Rome, that he would ſtand to the Judgment and Determination of the Pope concerning the Things before expreſſed, was abſolved from the Sentence of Suſpenſion, upon condition that he ſhould not return into England, untill there was a firm Peace eſtabliſhed between the King and his Barons. [2] Id. ib. The A. B. of Canterbury's Suſpenſion taken off, on Condition he would not return into England till Peace was made.

To this time I muſt alſo refer what Rad. de Coggeſhal relates, that in Mid-Lent, the King with a great Army beſieged the Caſtle of Colcheſter, which within a few Days was ſurrender'd upon theſe Terms, That all the French Men (who it ſeems were the greater Number) might freely return home with their whole Baggage, while the Engliſh were to be diſmiſs'd, but upon Ranſom; which Agreement, tho' the Earl of Salisbury had confirm'd with an Oath on the King's Colcheſter Caſtle taken by K. John, where the French are diſmiſs'd, but the Engliſh kept Priſoners contrary to their Articles.

Anno Dom. MCCXVI.

King's behalf; yet he ſet none but the French at Liberty, keeping all the Engliſh not only cloſe Priſoners, but alſo in Fetters, under pretence that he could not endure the Breach of their Fidelity: But ſo ſoon as theſe Frenchmen came to London, they were like to be Hanged by the Barons, becauſe they had given up and betray'd their Fellow-Soldiers: But at laſt by the Advice of one Wiſer and more Merciful than the reſt, this ſevere Execution was remitted, and they were to be kept in Priſon till the arrival of Prince Lewis, who was now ſuddenly expected.

The French like to be Hanged by the Barons.

[3] Id. Ib. The King beſtows great Donatives on his Mercenaries to encourage them to beſiege London; but the Citizens, in Contempt of them, ſet open their Gates.

[3] Sometime after this, when the King had taken the Caſtle of Hidingham, belonging to Robert de Vere Earl of Oxford, he diſtributed great Donatives to his Mercenaries, that ſo he might thereby encourage them to beſiege London; which when the Londoners heard, they were ſo far from being afraid of them, that they preſently ſet the Gates of their City wide open, to ſhew they were ready to Encounter the King, if he ſhould offer to ſet upon them; but he perceiving their Courage, and the Multitude of Combatants, thought fit to retreat, without putting it to the Tryal. Yet Savory de Malleon approaching too near the Town, fell into an Ambuſcade of the Londoners, and loſt a great many of his Men, while he himſelf being grievouſly wounded, had much ado to eſcape.

[4] Id. ib. The Londoners take 65 Sail of Pyrates that block'd up the River of Thames.

[4] About the ſame time alſo, the Londoners Ships took and deſtroyed Sixty Five ſail of Pyrate Veſſels, which then block'd up the Mouth of the River Thames, killing and taking Priſoners moſt of the Seamen that were in them; From whence we may Judge of the great Power and Strength of this City, by Sea and Land, in thoſe Days, which could thus ſupport it ſelf againſt the King's Mercenary Forces, who had then over-run all the reſt of England.

[5] Id. ib. The Northern Barons not being able to take York, accept of Money from the Citizens to march off.

[5] Alſo about this time the Northern Barons taking freſh Courage, gathered together an Army, and beſieged York; and tho' they were not able to take it, yet they received more than a Thouſand Marks from the Citizens to march off, which they did for the preſent.

In the mean while, there were cruel Plunderings and Burnings committed in that Province by the King's Soldiers, whilſt the Barons committed the like Devaſtations upon the Lands of their Adverſaries; but when the King heard that Prince Lewis was now reſolved to paſs over into England, he ſent Philip Biſhop of Wincheſter, William Mareſchal the Elder, and ſome others, Ambaſſadors to the King of France, to perſuade him to hinder his Son from this Deſign: But the King ſent them away without ſo much as vouchſafing them an Audience.

K. John ſends Ambaſſadors to the King of France, to hinder his Son Lewis from coming over, but without any Effect.

When King John ſaw there was no good to be done with France by fair means, he preſently viſited the Sea-Coaſts, and putting Gariſons into the ſtrongeſt Places, obliged the Cinque-Ports by freſh Oaths and Pledges to be Faithful to him; then gathering together a great Fleet of Ships from Yarmouth, Lyn, Donwich, and other Ports, and having Mann'd them very well, he reſolv'd to Engage the French in their Paſſage: But a mighty Tempeſt ariſing from the North, broke to Pieces, or Sunk, the moſt part of this Fleet, by which ſad Accident the King was fruſtrated of his hopes of doing any good by Sea.

Whereupon the K. viſits the Sea-Coaſts, and putting Gariſons into the ſtrongeſt Places, ſets out a great Fleet.

Moſt part of which is caſt away by a Storm.

But

But now let us look back to Eccleſiaſtical Matters, and ſee what the Spiritual Sword acted all this while in England. Anno. Dom. MCCXVI.

[1] About Eaſter the Abbot of Abbendun, and his Fellow Commiſſioners, finding the Contumacy of the Barons and City of London ſtill to continue, wrote to all the Conventual Churches, or Monaſteries of England, commanding them to publiſh the Sentence of Excommunication againſt the Deans of St. Pauls and St. Martins, and the Convent of Holy Trinity, for their Contempt to the Pope, in not publiſhing his Sentence of Excommunication againſt the ſaid City and Barons, as Enemies to the King; and alſo Commanded them to Excommunicate the Caſtellan of St. Omar, with all his Company, that came to Invade and Poſſeſs the Kingdom of England, together with all Canons and Clerks within the City of London, upon pain of falling under the Pope's high Diſpleaſure. The Reader may find theſe Letters at large in our Author.

[1] M. P. p. 279. The Pope's Commiſſioners write to all the Conventual Churches to publiſh the Sentence of Excommunication againſt the Deans of St. Pauls, and St. Martins, London, for their Contempt in not publiſhing his Sentence.

[2] At this time alſo Prince Lewis wrote to the Barons and Citizens of London a very kind Letter, wherein he returned them thanks for their valiant Behaviour in his Cauſe, with an Exhortation to them to perſevere in the ſame Courſe, and a Promiſe that he would be at Calais by Eaſter following, in order to come over into England. Not long after, ſome of the Engliſh Barons holding a great Tournament with thoſe Noblemen that came lately out of France, One of them with his Spear mortally wounded Geoffrey de Mandeville, Earl of Eſſex, who died within a few Days after, to the great Grief of thoſe of his Party.

[2] Id. p. 280. Prince Lewis writes to the Barons, and Citizens, to encourage them to take his Part.

Geoffrey Earl of Eſſex is wounded at a Tournament, and Dies.

[3] In the mean while the Pope ſent Wallo, or Guallo his Legate, into France, to prevent the Expedition of Prince Lewis into England, who delivered to King Philip his Maſter's Letters, by which he endeavoured to perſuade him, not to permit his Son to invade England, nor diſturb the King, but rather to Protect and Defend him, as being a Vaſſal of the Roman Church, and whoſe Dominions belonged unto it. To which the King of France immediately replied, 'That the Kingdom of England never was, nor ever ſhould be 'the Patrimony of St. Peter, for King John having ſeveral years 'endeavoured to Dethrone his Brother Richard, he was accuſed of 'Treaſon, and convicted in that King's Court, Hugh de Pudſey, Biſhop of Durham, having pronounced the Sentence againſt him; 'and therefore either he never was a Lawful King, and ſo could not 'give away his Kingdom; or if he ever were ſuch, yet he had been 'already Condemn'd in the Court or Parliament at Paris, for the 'Death of his Nephew Arthur, and for this Fact continued ſtill Sentenced. Laſtly, That no King, or Prince, could diſpoſe of his 'Kingdom without the aſſent of the Barons, who are bound to defend it: And if the Pope would take upon him to maintain this 'Error, it would prove a Pernicious Example to all Civil States. Then likewiſe all the Great Men of France unanimouſly declared, that they would maintain this Point even to Death, That no King, or Prince, by his ſingle Authority, had Power to give away, or make over his Kingdom, and thereby enſlave his Nobility. Theſe things were acted at Lyons about Fifteen Days after Eaſter.

[3] Id. ib. The Pope ſends his Legate to K. Philip, to hinder his Son's coming into England.

From

Anno Dom. MCCXVI. From which Relation we may obſerve, That the King and Nobility of France did not believe, that King John had ever ſurrender'd his Kingdom to the Pope by the Conſent of his Barons, tho' it be otherwiſe recited in that King's Charter, concerning which I ſhall ſay no more, having already ſpoken ſomewhat of it in my Introduction to this Volume.

We may likewiſe obſerve from this Unanimous Judgment of the French Nobility, that they did not ſuppoſe their own King, nor any other Prince in Chriſtendom, was ſo Abſolute, as to have a Power veſted in him of diſpoſing of his Kingdom without their Conſents.

[4] Ib. 280, 281. An Account of the Pleadings on both ſides between the Pope's Legate, and the Proctor or Advocate of Prince Lewis.

[4] The next Day, by means of the King of France, Prince Lewis was preſent at the Conference, where the Legate began to diſſuade him from Invading England, as being the Patrimony of the Roman Church; and alſo again applyed himſelf to his Father, according to the Effect of the Pope's Letter; to whom the King ſaid, 'He always was much devoted to the Pope, and the Roman Church, 'and always effectually promoted their Affairs; nor ſhould his 'Son now, by his advice or aſſiſtance, attempt any thing againſt 'them; but if he challenged any Right to the Kingdom of England, 'he ought to be heard, and what was juſt ſhould be allowed him: Upon which words a Knight ſtood up and argued for his Maſter Prince Lewis, againſt King John and the Pope's Title, alledging, (as King Philip had done before)

The Reaſons of Pr. Lewis's Advocate againſt the Pope's and K. John's Title.

Firſt, That King John had deſtroyed his Nephew Arthur, and was therefore condemn'd to Death by his Peers of France.

Secondly, That afterwards, for many Murthers Manſlaughters, and other Enormities committed in England, he had been Depoſed by the Barons, from Reigning over them.

Thirdly, That without the Conſent of his Barons he had made over the Kingdom of England to the Pope and Church of Rome, to take it again and hold it of them under the Annual Tribute of a Thouſand Marks.

Fourthly, That ſuppoſing he had given away the Crown of England without the Conſent of the Barons, and had quitted and reſigned his Right to it, yet ſo ſoon as he had done it, he thereby immediately Unking'd himſelf, and the Throne becoming vacant, it could not be fill'd, without the Conſent of thoſe Barons; who had now choſen Prince Lewis in right of his Wife, whoſe Mother (the Queen of Caſtile) was the only Child then living of all the Sons and Daughters of Henry the late King of England.

Theſe were the Arguments uſed by Lewis his Advocate, againſt the Titles of the Pope.

[5] Id. ib. The Legate's Reply to the Reaſons brought by Lewis's Advocate.

[5] For all this the Legate ſtill urged, That King John was ſigned with the Croſs, (that is, had undertaken the Cruſado) and therefore according to a Conſtitution of the late General Council, ought to be free from any Diſturbance for Four Years, being under the Protection of the Apoſtolick See; To this Lewis his Advocate replied, That King John, before ever he was ſigned with the Croſs, had made War upon his Maſter, and taken his Caſtles, and waſted his Countries with Fire and Sword; and had made many Knights and others Priſoners, whom he ſtill detained, and was even now in actual War

War against his Master, and therefore the War he intended against him was just, according to the Law of Retaliation.

Anno Dom. MCCXVI.

[1] The Legate hereupon, not satisfied with these Reasons, forbad Prince Lewis under pain of Excommunication to enter England, and the King his Father to permit him to do it. But yet Lewis begged of his Father not to hinder his Design for declaring his Right; since he resolved to hazard his Life to obtain his Wife's Inheritance, and so departed from the Conference. Then the Legate desired a safe Passage from the King of France to the Sea side, which was readily granted him through his own Territories; but he would not undertake to secure him if he should fall into the hands of his Son Lewis his Friends, that guarded the Sea; at which the Legate being much displeased, departed from Court.

[1] Ib. The Legate not satisfied with Lewis's Reasons, forbids him entering England on pain of Excommunication, who regarded not those Threats.

The Legate desires leave to depart.

[2] Prince Lewis on the Morrow after St. Mark's Day, went to his Father, being then at Melun, and once more earnestly besecched him not to hinder his Design: But tho' the King durst not openly encourage it, yet he privately permitted him to go, and dismissed him with his Blessing; After this the Prince sent his Envoys to the Roman Court, to declare to the Pope his Right to the Kingdom of England, and then with all speed came to Calais, with the Earls, Barons, Knights, and others that had sworn to go along with him in this Expedition, that so he might come into England before the Legate. At that Port they found ready to receive them Six hundred Ships, and Fourscore Cogs, a sort of small Transport-Vessels, which Eustace, Sirnam'd the Monk, had gathered together; [3] in which they Embarked with all the speed they could, and Landed at Stanbore in the Isle of Thanet, not far from Sandwich, upon the 21st of May.

[2] Ib. Prince Lewis renews his request to his Father, not to hinder his going over into England, which he privately permitted.

Lewis sends Envoys to Rome to set forth his Right to the Kingdom of England.

[3] Ib. p. 282. Coll. 1868. He arrives and Lands in the Isle of Thanet.

But Prince Lewis, after his arrival in England, having heard that Alexander, Abbot of St. Augustin's at Canterbury, had, amongst other Prelates, received Orders from the Pope to proceed against him by Ecclesiastical Censure, or Excommunication; to prevent this he wrote a Letter to the said Abbot, (still extant in William Thorn*'s History of that Abbey, 'wherein he claims an Hereditary Right to the 'Kingdom of England, by John, (then Earl of Mortaign,) his Con-'demnation for High Treason against his Brother King Richard, (as 'hath been already mentioned), and that by Virtue of this Attain-'der, all the Right to the Crown of England had devolv'd upon 'Eleanor Queen of Castile his Sister, and her Heirs, whose Eldest 'Daughter he the said Lewis had Married; and that this Queen had 'made over to himself and her said Daughter, all her Right to the 'said Kingdom; and further sets forth, that Archbishop Hubert late 'deceased, did, at the time of King John's Coronation, publickly 'in a Speech made for that purpose, declare, that he succeeded to 'the Crown, not by Succession, but by Election; which, as also his 'subsequent Coronation, having been perform'd by Power or Force, 'ought not to prejudice the Right of him the said Lewis. And he 'therein further says, 'That King John having been solemnly Con-'demned in his Father's Court for the Murther of his Nephew Ar-'thur, had thereby lost his Right to the Crown, and had also for-'feited it, by making it over to the Pope contrary to his Corona-'tion-Oath, whereby he swore to maintain all the Rights and Cu-'stoms of the Kingdom, and that this was done without the Con-

'ſent of the Barons; and he moreover ſets forth his great Violence 'and Injuſtice in breaking the Charter he had made to them, and 'in making War upon them without cauſe; and therefore in the 'concluſion of this Letter, he deſires the Abbot, (notwithſtanding 'the Evil Suggeſtions of Guallo the Pope's Legate,) to conſi-'der that he was come over to reſtore the Liberties of the Church 'and Kingdom of England, and for the Common-Weal and Bene-'fit thereof; in the procurement of which, if the ſaid Abbot would 'be any ways aſſiſting to him, he ſhould then look upon him as 'his Friend, and would be no ways forgetful of it hereafter.

I have been the more exact in reciting the Contents of this Letter, becauſe you will here ſee, on what weak Grounds this Prince founds his Title, which certainly could be none at all in Right of his Wife, there being divers Others who had a Precedent, and conſequently a much better Right, as you will find more at large hereafter. But to return to our Hiſtory.

[4] Id. ib. K. John, tho' he lay at Dover, yet could not hinder the French from Landing, and the Reaſon of it.

[4] In the mean while, King John lay at Dover with his Army, which conſiſted of Strangers, and therefore he durſt not attempt to hinder the Landing of the French, leſt his Men ſhould deſert him, and go over to Lewis; From thence he went (leaving Hubert de Burgh Governor of Dover-Caſtle) to Guilford, and ſo on to Wincheſter, whilſt Lewis himſelf Landed near Sandwich, and finding no body to reſiſt him, preſently ſubdued all the Country, except Dover-Caſtle; but in his march he took that of Rocheſter; then coming up to London, was there received by the Barons with all outward demonſtrations of Joy, receiving at the ſame time the Homages and Fealties of all the Barons, and Citizens; and he likewiſe ſwore upon the Holy Goſpels, that he would reſtore to all of them good Laws, as alſo their Loſt Inheritances; which Paſſage Dr. Brady omits in his Hiſtory, and places inſtead of it a Paſſage of King John and the Barons at Runnemead, which is not to be found in that Author, or any where elſe, that I know of; but this by the By.

Lewis ſubdues all Kent, except Dover Caſtle, and is then joyfully received into London.

Where he receives the Homages and Fealties of the Barons and Citizens.

[5] M. P. Ib. Having got Poſſeſſion of great part of the Kingdom, he Summons the K. of Scots and all the Great Men of England to come and do him Homage, upon which many of them come in to him, and their Names.

Thus [5] by the 14th of June Prince Lewis had got poſſeſſion of ſo much of the Kingdom, that he ſummoned the King of Scots, and all the Great Men of England to come and do him Homage, or forthwith to depart the Nation; and with great ſpeed upon this his Proclamation, there came in to him William Earl Warren, William Earl of Arundel, William Earl of Salisbury, the King's Half-Brother, William Mareſchal the Younger, and many others, who deſerted King John, upon a firm Belief, that Lewis would now obtain the Kingdom of England; or (which is more likely) becauſe King John was now grown Odious, even to his beſt Friends and neareſt Relations. At the ſame time alſo, Prince Lewis made Maſter Simon Langton, Brother to the Archbiſhop, his Chancellor, who being before incenſed againſt the Pope by his late diſappointment of the Archbiſhoprick of York, did now by his Preaching perſuade all the Barons and Citizens of London to be preſent at Divine Service, and alſo made Prince Lewis to give conſent to it. Thus you ſee, when the Clergy and People grew once Unanimous, the Pope's Excommunication ſignified nothing.

Lewis makes Mr. Simon Langton his Chancellor.

Guallo

Anno Dom. MCCXVI.

[1] Guallo the Legate followed Prince Lewis into England with all ſpeed, and got ſafe to King John, who was then at Gloceſter; and there calling together as many Biſhops, Abbots, and Clerks as he could, Excommunicated Prince Lewis by Name, with all his Accomplices and Favourers, and eſpecially Simon de Langton; commanding all the Biſhops and Others to publiſh the Sentence againſt them every Lord's Day and Feſtival. But Simon de Langton, and Gervaſe de Hobrugge, Præcentor of St. Pauls in London, alledged, that they appealed for the Right and Title of Prince Lewis, and therefore the Sentence was Null and Void. At this time alſo moſt of the Knights, and Ordinary Soldiers of Flanders, and other Tranſmarine Countries, left King John, (except the Poictovins, and ſome went over to Lewis, and others returned home. From whence we may obſerve, that this Unfortunate King could not depend even upon thoſe very Mercenaries he had Hired, and kept in Pay; but whether for Fear of Lewis, or out of Hatred to King John, our Author does not tell us.

[1] Id. ib. The Pope's Legate follows Lewis into England, and Excommunicates him with all his Adherents.

Simon Langton, and Gervaſe appeal to the Pope on the Prince's behalf.

Moſt of the Foreign Mercenaries deſert King John.

[2] Sometime after this, Prince Lewis leaving London, marched into Kent, and totally ſubdued it, except Dover Caſtle; then going into Suſſex, he took in that Country, with the Towns and Fortreſſes belonging to it; and afterwards paſſing into Hampſhire, took the City of Wincheſter with the Caſtle. None withſtanding him, except one Brave young Gentleman, William de Colingham, who defied Lewis; and refuſing to ſwear Fealty to him, with a Thouſand Archers during the time of Hoſtility kept himſelf in the Woods and Faſtneſſes of Suſſex, and killed ſeveral Thouſands of the French: Hugh de Neville came to Lewis at Wincheſter, and doing him Homage there, delivered the Caſtle of Marlborough into his Hands; So that he was now poſſeſſed of all the Southern-Parts of the Nation, except the Caſtles of Dover and Windſor, which were well Mann'd and Fortified, and prepared to receive him. At the ſame time alſo, William de Mandevil, Robert Fitz-Walter, and William de Huntingfield, by Force brought under his Obedience the Counties of Eſſex, and moſt part of Suffolk.

[2] Id. Ib. Lewis leaves London, and marches into Kent, and reduces it all except Dover-Caſtle. And takes Wincheſter, none reſiſting him except William de Colingham. Hugh de Neville delivers up the Caſtle of Marlborough to Lewis, and is thereupon poſſeſs'd of all the South of England, except two Places Eſſex and Suffolk.

In the mean while, King John took care to Furniſh and Strengthen, as well as he could, with Men, Victuals, and Ammunition, ſeveral Caſtles in the Weſtern-Parts, as Wallingford, Corf, Warham, Briſtol, with the Deviſes, and others.

K. John furniſhes his Garriſons in the Weſt with Victuals, and Ammunition.

[3] In the midſt of theſe Succeſſes, Prince Lewis received an Account from the Meſſengers he had ſent to the Pope, that upon their Application to him, and preſenting his Complement, he told them, Their Maſter was not worthy the return of his Salutation; to which they replied, 'When his Holineſs had heard his Reaſons and Apo-'logy, they doubted not but he ſhould find him a True Catholick 'Prince, and highly devoted to him and the Roman Church; Inſomuch that at length, after many Addreſſes, they found him Wavering and Fluctuating between his Affection to Prince Lewis, and his Inclination to King John, and indeed he well conſidered his Intereſt on both ſides, and what Inconveniencies he might receive, whether the King, or the Prince got the better.

Anno Dom. MCCXVI

[4] Id. Ib. The Reaſons of the Ambaſſadors, with the Pope's Anſwers.

[4] Then the Envoys proceeded to ſet forth at large the Reaſons and Arguments preſented to the Pope on behalf of Prince Lewis againſt King John; the Sum of which were,

Firſt, That the King was adjudged to Death by his Peers for the Murther of his Nephew Arthur; to which the Pope anſwered, That the Barons of France could not Judge him, becauſe he was an Anointed King, and their Superior; and beſides, it was againſt the Canons to Judge an Abſent Perſon, unheard, unconvicted, and who had not confeſſed his Crime: To this the Envoys of Lewis returned, that according to the Law or Cuſtom in the Kingdom of France, their King had all Juriſdiction whatſoever over King John his Liege-Man, as an Earl and Duke; therefore tho' he was a King Anointed in England, yet as he was but an Earl and Duke of France, he was under the Juriſdiction of their Lord the King; ſo that if ſuch an Earl or Duke, committed a Crime in that Kingdom, he might and ought to be judged by his Peers there: Nay, if he were neither Duke nor Earl, nor Liege-man of the King of France, but had committed ſuch a Crime in that Kingdom, even then, becauſe the Crime was committed there, the Barons might Judge him to Death; otherwiſe, if the King of England, becauſe he was an Anointed King, could not be Condemn'd as a Peer of France, he might then without any controul enter the Kingdom of France, and deſtroy the Barons of that Kingdom, as well as he had done his Nephew Arthur; to [5] which the Pope reply'd, That many Emperors and Kings of France are reported in Hiſtories to have deſtroyed ſeveral Innocent Perſons, yet we do not read that any of them were ever condemn'd to Death; and ſeeing Arthur had done Homage and Allegiance to his Uncle King John, and was afterwards taken Priſoner, fighting againſt him, he might juſtly be put to Death, as a Traytor to his Lord the King: So little Senſe the Pope then had of Duke Arthur's Right to the Crown, or of the Horridneſs of the Murther committed upon him.

[5] Id. p. 284.

[1] Id. Ib.

[1] Secondly, 'Twas objected againſt King John, that tho' he was often cited to the Court of the King of France, yet he neither appeared Perſonally himſelf, nor ſent any one to do it for him; to which the Pope anſwered, That this was but a Contumacy at moſt, and not a Mortal Crime, and was otherwiſe to be puniſhed; and therefore the Barons could not Judge him to Death: But Lewis his Meſſengers replied, That it was the Cuſtom of France, if any one was accuſed of Murther, and appeared not, but ſent his Excuſe, he was adjudged as if he were Convicted in all points, and his Iſſue barred from Inheriting: To this the Pope anſwered again, That ſuppoſing King John had been judged to Death, and his Iſſue barred (which could only be for his Territories in France) yet did it not follow, that Blanche, the Wife of Lewis, ought therefore to ſucceed; but either the Siſter of Arthur, or elſe Otto, Son of Henry Duke of Saxony, by King John's Eldeſt Siſter; or if it be ſuppoſed that the Queen of Caſtile ought to ſucceed, or her Daughter Blanche in her Right, that is a Miſtake, becauſe the Male-Iſſue, viz. the King of Caſtile her Brother, or elſe the Queen of Leon her Eldeſt Siſter: To this Lewis his Envoys rejoin'd, That their Miſtreſs had a colourable Title, which was to hold good, until ſome other more Rightful plainly plainly appeared, and if any nearer to it afterwards claimed, their Maſter then might do what he thought fit, or what he ought. Anno Dom. MCCXVI.

[2] Then the Pope urged, That the Kingdom of England was his Property, and that Lewis ought not to deprive King John of it, who held it as his Feudatary; To this Lewis his Commiſſioners anſwered, That the War was begun before the Pope could pretend to it, for William Longeſpee, Earl of Salisbury, had long ſince invaded Prince Lewis his Territories with an Army, and therefore his War was juſt againſt the King of England that ſent them. To this the Pope anſwered, That Lewis ought not to make War for what his Vaſſal had done, but to make his Complaint to himſelf, as his Superior Lord; To which Lewis his Commiſſioners replied, That it was the Cuſtom of France, when ever any Vaſſal made War upon another, by authority of his Lord, he might make War upon him again, without complaining to his Lord. Then the Pope urged further, That the Engliſh Barons were Excommunicated, with all their Adherents, by which means Lewis would incur the Pain of Excommunication too, if he joined with them: To this his Commiſſioners ſaid, He did not favour the Barons of England, but only proſecuted his own Right; and that he believed neither the Pope, nor Council, would Excommunicate any Man Unjuſtly, ſince at the time of declaring the Sentence, they knew not what Right their Maſter might have to the Kingdom of England. [1] Id. p. 285.

Upon hearing the whole Matter, the Pope ſaid, he would then determine nothing concerning it, untill he heard from his Legate Guallo. This was the Sum of the Diſcourſe between the Pope and Prince Lewis's Envoys, with their mutual Objections, Anſwers and Replies, which tho' long, and perhaps may ſeem tedious to ſome, yet ſince it contains the clear ſtate of this Controverſie, and many curious Points in the Feudal Law of that Age, I thought fit to ſet it down here at large.

[3] In the mean while, Prince Lewis made a great Incurſion into the Eaſt of England, viz. the Counties of Eſſex, Norfolk, and Suffolk, and miſerably waſted them, putting a Gariſon into the Caſtle of Norwich, which Thomas de Burgh had deſerted: This done, the French returned with great Booty and Spoils to London; where Gilbert de Gant came in to Lewis, and by him was girt with the Sword of the County of Lincoln, and made Earl thereof; and then was ſent to block up the King's Forces in the Caſtles of Nottingham and Newark, for they had burnt all the Great Houſes of the Barons in thoſe Parts. [3] Id. p. 285. Prince Lewis makes an Incurſion into Eſſex, Norfolk, and Suffolk, and puts a Gariſon into Norwich-Caſtle.

[4] At the ſame time, Robert de Ros, Peter de Bruis, and Richard de Percie, reduced the City and County of York to Prince Lewis's Obedience; whilſt Gilbert de Gant, and Robert de Ropelley took the City of Lincoln, with the County round about, except the Caſtle, and put them under Contribution: They alſo plundered Holland, and made it Tributary. [4] Id. Ib. Several Barons reduce Yorkſhire and Lincolnſhire to Prince Lewis's Obedience.

[5] In July the King of Scots invaded England afreſh with his whole Army, and beſieged the City of Carliſle, and took it about the beginning of Auguſt, all but the Caſtle, which he could not make himſelf Maſter of at that time. [5] G. M. The King of Scots again invades England, and takes Carliſle, but not the Caſtle.

Anno Dom. MCCXVI.

[1] M. P. p. 286. Then marches into Northumberland, and ſubdues it for Prince Lewis.

[1] Then marching forward into Northumberland, he ſubdued the whole County for Prince Lewis, excepting ſome Caſtles which Hugh de Baliol and Philip de Hulecotes Manfully defended; ſo that all theſe Counties were now become Subject, and had ſworn Fealty to the Prince.

[2] Id. ib. Lewis being reproved by his Father for not taking Dover-Caſtle, he marches again to beſiege it.

But it was ſo well defended by Hugh de Burgh, that he could not take it.

And therefore blocks it up.

[2] About the Nativity of St. John Baptiſt, Prince Lewis being reproved by his Father, as if he were Unskilful in matters of War, becauſe he had hitherto left Dover-Caſtle untouch'd, (being then accounted one of the ſtrongeſt Fortreſſes in the Kingdom) he therefore marched with a ſtrong Force to beſiege it, having before ſent to his Father for a great Engine, (which the French called a Mal-voiſin) to caſt Stones, with which, as well as with other Engines, the French were inceſſantly battering the Walls. But Hubert de Burgh with about an Hundred and Forty Knights and their Eſquires, defended the Place with ſo much Courage, that they deſtroyed many of their Enemies, until the Frenchmen being ſenſible of their Loſs, were forced to retreat to a further Diſtance. But Prince Lewis being cruelly vex'd at this Repulſe, ſwore, That he would never quit the Siege till he had taken it, and Hanged all thoſe that Defended it; and therefore blocking it up built great ſtore of Huts before it, hoping to do that by Famine, which he was not able to compaſs downright by Force.

[3] Id. Ib. The Barons make an Excurſion, take Cambridge, and Plunder Norfolk and Suffolk.

[3] At the ſame time a Party of the Barons made an Excurſion into Cambridgeſhire, waſted the whole Countrey, and took the Caſtle of Cambridge; and from thence they marched into Norfolk and Suffolk, and plundered them, with all the Churches, and forced the Towns of Yarmouth, Dunwich, and Ipſwich, to moſt grievous Ranſoms; and going back by Colcheſter they committed the like Outrages, and ſo returned to London, their old Retreat.

And then beſiege Windſor-Caſtle, but could not take it.

Some time after this, the Barons gathered together a great Force, under the Command of the Count of Nevers, and beſieged Windſor Caſtle, wherein were Sixty Knights with their Followers; at which time the French applied their Battering Engines againſt the Walls, whilſt the Beſieged endeavoured to beat them off.

[4] Id. ib. The K. upon the Barons beſieging Windſor-Caſtle, marches about the Countrey, and deſtroys their Eſtates.

[4] Our Author farther relates, That ſo ſoon as King John knew Dover and Windſor Caſtles were beſieged by the Barons, he, to divert them from it, drew out of his Garriſons a great Army, with which he marched furiouſly up and down the Countries for a Month together, Waſting their Lands, Burning their Houſes, and Deſtroying all their Fruit and Corn: Inſomuch, that at length he made an Incurſion into the Counties of Norfolk and Suffolk, and there laid waſt the Eſtates of the Earl of Arundel, Roger Bigod, William de Huntingfield, and other Great Men.

The Barons raiſe the Siege of Windſor-Caſtle, and march towards Cambridge to ſurprize the K. who thereupon returns to Stamford, and from thence towards Lincoln.

Upon this the Barons perceiving they could not make any great Advance in the Siege of Windſor Caſtle, quitted it in the Night, and leaving their Tents and Engines behind them, marched with all the haſte they could towards Cambridge, in order to ſhut up, and ſurprize the King, who was then harraſſing the Country about the Sea-Coaſt of Suffolk; but he receiving Intelligence by his Scouts of their coming, went back again to Stamford, and from thence marched in great haſte towards Lincoln, the Caſtle whereof was then beſieged by Gilbert de Gant; but upon his approach, he fled with all his Forces as faſt as he could.

The

The Barons having thus miſſed the King, plundered and waſted the Country, and returned to London with their Spoils; and there leaving a ſtrong Gariſon, they marched to Prince Lewis, who was then employed in the Siege of Dover-Caſtle, whither [5] Alexander King of Scots, paſſing through England with his whole Army, came to wait upon him, and there did him Homage for the Lands he held in England, in the ſame Form as the Barons of England had done before; and then Prince Lewis, as well as the other Barons, Swore, That they would never make Peace with King John, without the King of Scot's conſent: But to this Oath they were no Slayes, as you will find hereafter.

Anno. Dom. MCCXVI.

The Barons having plundered the Country, return to London, and thence march to the Siege of Dover-Caſtle.

[5] C. M. P. 287. Where Alexander, K. of Scots meets Pr. Lewis, and does him Homage.

[1] For about this time, the Viſcount of Melun, a French Nobleman that came into England before Prince Lewis, fell ſick in the City of London, and when he found he had not long to live, he called to him ſome of the Engliſh Barons, that were poſted there for the Security of the City; and told them, he was ſorry for the Deſtruction and Ruine that was coming upon them, which they underſtood not, but he would reveal the Secret; and then acquainted them, That Prince Lewis with Sixteen Earls and Barons of France had ſworn, That when he had Conquer'd England, and was Crown'd, he would for ever Baniſh all thoſe that fought for him, and perſecuted King John, as Traytors to the Realm, and would likewiſe deſtroy all their Poſterity; and that they might not doubt the Truth of it, he affirmed upon the Word of a Dying Man, and as he hoped for Salvation, that he himſelf was One of thoſe that had ſworn with Lewis; yet he deſired them not to make any Diſcovery of what he had ſaid, but provide for their Safety as well as they could; and ſo preſently after Died.

[1] M. P. Ib. The Viſcount of Melun upon his Death-Bed, diſcovers to the Barons Prince Lewis's Deſign to ruine them.

[2] When theſe Things were whiſper'd amongſt the Barons, they were highly Incenſed, and not without Reaſon: For if this Relation were true, (as there was no great cauſe to diſtruſt the words of a Dying Man) there cannot be an Inſtance of greater Falſhood and Ingratitude, than this of Prince Lewis and his French Lords; and may ſerve as a Laſting Warning how the Engliſh ever call in too great a Number of Foreigners (eſpecially French) be their Neceſſities never ſo Urgent; ſince it has been (I will not ſay always) the Cuſtom of that Nation, not only to take a Pride in their own Chains, but in reducing their Neighbours to the ſame Condition with themſelves; and indeed the Barons might very well have gueſs'd at Prince Lewis's Intentions, when he put French Governors into all the ſtrong Places he took.

[2] Id. Ib. Upon which the Barons are highly incenſed.

But that which grieved them moſt, was, that he had ſtigmatized them with the odious Character of Traytors; and it added not a little to their Affliction that they were Excommunicated. Some of theſe reflecting upon their miſerable Condition, thought of returning to their old Obedience: and tho' divers of them were afraid they had ſo highly provoked King John, that he would never accept of their Return; Yet the ſame Author relates, that no leſs than Forty of the Barons were about to quit Prince Lewis, and be reconciled to King John, not long before his Death.

Walter

Anno Dom. MCCXVI.

Walter of Coventry repreſents Prince Lewis's Affairs to have been in no very good Circumſtances at the time of King John's Death; ſo that he ſeemed not well pleaſed with his coming over into England, becauſe he found things in a much different Poſture than what he expected: for the Caſtles in the King's Power were many, and thoſe well Fortified, and the greateſt Part of the Kingdom was ſtill under his Dominion; and tho' the King of Scots and the Barons of the North were for Prince Lewis, yet they were ſo divided from the Reſt of their Party, that they could neither help them, nor receive any Aſſiſtance from them; inſomuch that thoſe who ſtill adher'd to the King in thoſe Parts, ſpoil'd their Eſtates at their Pleaſure: Beſides, the Prince found the Engliſh Fickle and Mutable, and that the French he had brought over with him were too few to Gariſon, and Secure ſo great a Kingdom.

Lewis's Affairs but in a bad Poſture before King John's Death, and the Reaſon.

This was the true Reaſon, why he ſtill kept himſelf near the Sea-Coaſts, ſo that if any unexpected Diſaſter ſhould happen, he might find the eaſier Paſſage back again. And thus ſtood Affairs till the ſudden News of the King's Death raiſed the Spirits of thoſe of Lewis's Party, as you will find anon; and therefore Matt. Paris alſo adds, That about this time, the Barons ſeeing themſelves Excommunicated, and like to be deprived of their Honours and Eſtates, grew very Melancholly and Diſcontented; ſo that ſeveral of them thought of returning to their Allegiance to the King; and had actually done it, had they not believed the King's Temper to be ſo implacable as never to pardon them.

But it is high time to return to the ſmall Remainder of this Unfortunate Prince's Reign, and of which it muſt be confeſs'd Dr. Brady gives us the beſt Light from the Patent-Rolls* of this Year; That King John was buſied in the Weſt all this Summer, from almoſt the Beginning of May to the Beginning of September; yet by the Grants, Protections, and other things he then ſigned, we find he was in perpetual Motion, and very ſeldom ſtayed more than Two or Three Days in a Place; as appears by the Teſte's of theſe Patents, where the Place of his Abode is always expreſſed.

* Rot. Pat. 18 Johan.

Dr. Brady's exact Account of the King's ſeveral Gifts during the reſt of his Reign, and Life.

At the beginning of the Summer he was at Wincheſter, at the Deviſes, at Briſtol, Wells, Shirborn, Warham, Corf-Caſtle, Lutgarſhal, Berkeley-Caſtle, and many other Places in the Weſt: And whilſt he was there, Lyn in Norfolk ſerved as a Place of Retreat or Defence to the Barons of his Party in thoſe Countries; and there alſo without doubt he ſecur'd his Treaſure, Crown, and all his Portable Regalia, as appears by the ſequel of the Story.

He ſpends moſt part of the Summer in the Weſt.

We are likewiſe beholding to Doctor Brady for the exact Diſcovery of this King's Giſts, during his frequent Removes from Place to Place, all the reſt of the Summer, and the Autumn following, when he left the Weſt and came to Oxford; where after a ſhort ſtay he went from thence in September, and paſſing through the Counties of Berkſhire, Buckinghamſhire, Bedfordſhire, Cambridgeſhire, and Lincolnſhire, return'd to Lyn, which he had made before his Head-Quarters. Yet there he tarried not long neither, but going from thence by Wisbitch and Sleford, he arrived at Newark-Caſtle before the middle of October, as the Doctor alſo proves by the Patent-Rolls of this Year; ſome of which are mentioned in his Hiſtory, and recited at large in the * Appendix to it. But they not being very material to our purpoſe, I refer the Inquiſitive Reader to the Book it ſelf, and will proceed to finiſh the ſhort Remainder of this King's Reign. Anno Dom. MCCXVI. * No. 137.

And then coming to Oxford, paſſes thence thro' Berkſhire, Bucks &c. as far as Lin.

And from thence in October arrives at Newark.

'Tis very probable, that (as Matt. Paris reports) the Barons might riſe from before Windſor-Caſtle about the Middle of September, and march after the King, from Cambridge to Clare; and from thence to Clivam, and ſo to Bocking in Eſſex, where he was on September the Twenty Firſt; and that Day he might go croſs the Countrey to Royſton, and ſo to Huntington and Stamford, and from thence to Lincoln. The K's Gueſts in Autumn.

The next Day, when he underſtood that the Barons had been withdrawn to London, and from thence to Dover to meet Prince Lewis; he came to Spalding, and ſo over the Waſhes to Lin, to fetch his Carriages and Treaſure which he had laid up there, and to recruit his Army with ſuch of his People that had fled thither. The K. comes to Lin.

Our Author tells us further, That whilſt Lewis in vain beſieged Dover-Caſtle, King John came into the Counties of Norfolk and Suffolk, and miſerably waſted them; and going by Peterburgh and Croyland, plundered thoſe Abbies; and at length, in his paſſage toward the North, he took his way through Lin: tho' this doth no ways agree with the Patent-Rolls, which ſay, He was at Grimsby in Lincolnſhire upon the Fourth of October; at Spalding in the ſame County upon the Seventh; at Lin on the Ninth and Eleventh; and at Wisbetch on the Twelfth; from whence he went back to Lin, and went over the Waſhes on the Fourteenth of October, to Swines-head-Abbey; and this indeed agrees with the latter Part of the Story in Matt. Paris, and the Patent-Rolls alſo.

[3] The King coming to Lin was received with great Joy by the Inhabitants there; but after a few Days ſtay he went away toward the North, and by the way loſt all his Waggons, and Sumpter-Horſes, with their Lading, and all his Treaſure, and his Portable Regalia, which are called by Rad. de Coggeſhal, his Moveable Chapel, (i.e.) the Furniture of it, with many Sacred Relicts, in the River called Well-ſtream: Where (ſays Matt. Paris) the Earth opened in the midſt of the Floods, and they ſunk down into the Gulf, both Men, Horſes, and Carriages, only the King with his Army going before eſcaped: But notwithſtanding this Monk's Tragical Deſcription of this ſad Accident, whereby he would make it a kind of a Miraculous Judgment; Yet in truth it was no more than that King John paſſing with his Carriages over the Waſhes, between a Place called the Croſs-Keys in the Marſhland of Norfolk, and Forſdike in Holland in Lincolnſhire, his Carriages being overtaken by the Tide, were loſt in the Waters and Quickſands, as it is more truly related by the Abbot of Coggeſhal. [1] Id. Ib. The K. leaves Lin to march into the North. And loſes all his Carriages and Treaſure in paſſing over the Waſhes in Lincolnſhire.

[4] The King that Night got ſafe to Swines-head-Abbey, and there Lodged; But with grief and anguiſh of Mind for the Loſs of his Carriages, he fell into a Feaver, which was much heightned that Night, by his Eating too many Peaches, and Drinking New Ale or Bracket: the next Morning he went from thence, but not being able to ride, he was carried in a Litter to Sleford-Caſtle, from whence he proceeded in like manner with great Difficulty as far as Newark, where [4] M. P. Ib. The K. comes to Swines-head-Abbey, and there falls ſick of a Feaver. And at Newark, Dies.

Anno Dom. MCCXVI where falling alſo into a Flux, and his Feaver ſtill increaſing, he Died on the Eighteenth of October, being St. Luke's Day.

I cannot here omit letting the Reader know, that ſome of our Writers give a far different Account of the Manner of this King's coming to his End, which they will needs have to have been by Poyſon: Caxton (our old Chronicler) is the firſt who in Engliſh hath told us this Story, and from him our more Modern ones, ſuch as Speed and Baker have borrowed it, to this Effect; That this King, being at Swines-head-Abbey, and hearing it ſpoken how cheap Corn then was, ſhould ſay, He would e'er long make it to be dear, ſo that a Penny Loaf ſhould be ſold for a Shilling: At this Speech a Monk there preſent took ſuch Indignation, that he went and put the Poyſon of a Toad into a Cup of Wine, and brought it to the King, telling him, There was ſuch a rare Cup of Wine, as he had never drunk in all his Life; and therewithal took the Aſſay of it himſelf, which made the King drink the more boldly of it: but finding himſelf preſently very ill upon it, he asked for the Monk, and when it was told him he was dead; Then (ſaid the King) God have mercy upon me, I doubted as much.

Not Poyſon'd, as ſome relate.

This is a very improbable Story, for a Man to Poyſon himſelf only to be revenged of another: But Walter Hemingford tells it a different way, viz. That the Abbot perſuaded the Monk to Poyſon the King, becauſe he would have lain with his Siſter; and that he did it by a Diſh of Pears which he Poyſon'd, all, except Three, and then making a Preſent of them to the King he bid him firſt taſte them himſelf, which he did, eating only thoſe Three, that he had marked; and ſo the King, eating heartily of the reſt, was Poyſon'd, and the Monk eſcaped. From whence you may obſerve, by the different way of telling this Story, that there was at firſt no other ground for it than an uncertain Tradition, or Report; for beſides the improbability of Poyſoning a whole Diſh of Pears, ſo as not to be taſted nor perceived; I ſay, beſides this, not one of the Hiſtorians, that lived and wrote within Sixty years of that time, mention any ſuch thing; for Thomas Wikes is the firſt who in his Chronicle relates it, and that too only as a Report, without ſaying any thing of the manner how, which Walter Hemingford firſt related at large, and which Ranulph Higden in his Polychronicon, and Henry de Knyghton copied from thence.

I ſhould not have dwelt ſo long upon this Subject, had not ſuch noted Writers, as [5] *Mr. Fox and Mr. Pryn inſerted it in their Hiſtories; who do both make great uſe of this Story to render the Monks as odious for their Treachery, as for their other Vices: But it is not my deſign to load any ſort of Men more than I think they truly deſerve.

[5] Vid. Acts, and Monuments, Vol. 1. p. 256. Pryn's Hiſtory of Papal Uſurpations.

But let the manner of his Death be how it would, moſt of the Hiſtorians agree, That before his Deceaſe he by his Teſtament appointed Henry his Eldeſt Son (then a Child) to ſucceed him; and ordered his Body to be buried in the Cathedral Church at Worceſter, which was done accordingly, tho' with little Funeral Pomp. His Tomb with his Image upon it is ſtill to be ſeen in the Choir of that Church, notwithſtanding the late Civil Wars, which have elſewhere deſtroyed ſo many Noble Monuments of that kind.

Thus

Thus died this Unhappy Prince after Seventeen Years Five Months, and Four Days Reign: Which, tho' not very long, yet must needs seem tedious enough to those that lived under it, who were never without continual Vexations either from Foreign or Domestick Wars; besides other great Grievances, proceeding from his frequent and arbitrary Taxes and Oppressions: Yet notwithstanding all these, he lost more Territories in Two or Three years, than all his Successors ever did in thrice that time; which might be well enough excused, had not those Misfortunes chiefly proceeded from his own want of Courage and Conduct, he scarce ever undertaking any Enterprize in due time, or pursuing it with that Diligence and Application which was requisite: but it would be well if this were the worst that could be said of this Prince; who (besides a comely Outside) had very few good Qualities to recommend him to the Affections of his Subjects, or the Admiration of future times. Anno Dom. MCCXVI.

I shall therefore give you his Character from [1] Sir Richard Baker, as being the shortest, and nearest the Truth, of any I can find, which is to this Effect; Concerning his Conditions it may be said, That his Nature and Fortune did not very well agree; for he Naturally loved his Ease, yet his Fortune was to be ever in Action; He vanquished more of his Enemies by Surprizes than by Battles; He was never so true to his word, as when he threaten'd, because he meant always as cruelly as he spoke, tho' not always so graciously as he promised; and he that would have known what it was he never meant to perform, must have considered what he promised: He was neither fit for Prosperity, nor Adversity, for the One made him Insolent, the Other Dejected; so that a Middle Fortune would have suited best with his Temper: He was all things by fits, sometimes very Religious, as appears by his building a Monastery at a Place called Beau-lieu in the New-Forest, for Cistercian Monks; at other times scarce a Christian, as appears by divers prophane Speeches related of him, amongst which I shall mention but this One; that having been a Hunting, at the opening of the Buck, he said, See how fat this Deer is, and yet I dare swear he never heard Mass. [1] Vid. Baker's Chronicle. His Character.

I should not have taken notice of this Story, had it not been cited by [2] Mr. Fox in his Book of Martyrs, as a very commendable Expression; as if it were a good Character in a Prince or any other Person to ridicule the Religion he profess'd. I shall pass by divers other Stories of the like kind, and go on to the farther Character of him: He was extreme greedy of Money, and tho' it was got with much ill will and clamour from his Subjects, yet it was commonly spent in silence, without any Honour to himself, or Benefit to the Nation: He was very intemperate in his Pleasures, exceeding his Father in his Lust, not sparing the Wives of Men of the best Condition; not that I give credit to all Relations of this Kind, some of which may be invented out of Malice; as that in particular, of his intending to Debauch the Wife of Eustace de Vesci, by means of a Ring he borrowed of him; which tho' it be related in Walter de Hemingford's Chronicle, and is borrowed from him by Henry de Knighton, yet besides that it is not men- [2] Acts and Mon. Vol. 1. p. 256.

tioned by any Hiſtorian who lived near that time, the very Circumſtances of the Story, render it incredible.

To conclude therefore; all I can ſay for him, is, that beſides his own perſonal Failings, he had alſo the Misfortune to Reign at a time, when his Great Adverſary, King Philip of France, was Wiſe, Valiant, and Succeſsful. The Pope, whom he had chiefly to do with throughout his Reign, was Innocent the Third, a Prelate of a High and Ambitious Spirit; and who, by the Means of the King of France, had humbled not only this King, but Otto the Emperor, as you have already heard; and perhaps his Barons, with many of the Biſhops, Clergy and People, were not only provoked by his conſtant Oppreſſions and Illegal Taxations of them, but being alſo ſenſible from his Carriage both in War and Peace, of how mean and unconſtant a Spirit he was, they were from thence the more Emboldened to demand the Confirmation of thoſe Antient Privileges and Liberties, which perhaps they would never preſume to have done, had his Brother King Richard been ſtill alive: and tho' the Monkiſh Writers of his Life and Reign may be too ſevere upon him, as to ſome particular Paſſages, yet we may be pretty well aſſur'd, that the Character we have now given of him is true in the main, as being founded upon clear and indiſputable Matters of Fact.

Of King John's Wives, and Iſſue.

AS for the Wives of this King, you may remember that his firſt was Hawis, or Avis, Daughter and Heir to the Earl of Gloceſter; but being divorced from Her, he then married Iſabel, Daughter to the Earl of Angoleſme, by whom he had Iſſue, [3] Henry, the Eldeſt Son, afterwards King Henry the Third, who was born on Saint Remigius's Day, (that is, the Firſt of October) in the year 1207.

His

His Baſe Iſſue.

HE had alſo by divers Miſtreſſes ſeveral Baſe Children, whoſe Mothers are not particularly mention'd; Richard the Eldeſt, is no where taken notice of (as I know) unleſs by [3] Matt. Paris. As for the Second called [4] Geoffrey Fitz-Roy, I refer you for him to Sanford's Genealogical Hiſtory; as I do alſo for Joane his Baſe-Daughter, that was married to Llewellin, Prince of North-Wales.

Dr. Brady has alſo diſcovered Two other Sons of his, not mention'd by any other Authors, as he proves from the Records in the Tower, (Viz.) Osbert mention'd as King John's Son, in Rot. Pat. 17 Johan. Part 2. *M.*16; as alſo Oliver mention'd as ſuch, in Rot. Clauſ. 1 *Hen.*3. Part 2. *M.*23. and again as King Henry's Brother in Rot. Clauſ. 2 *Hen.*3. Part 1. *M.*9.

His Taxes.

AS for his Taxations, and Ways of raiſing Money, they were ſo many, ſo various, and ſo arbitrary, that it may be almoſt ſaid, his whole Reign was but one continued Taxation and Oppreſſion of his Subjects: But ſince Doctor Brady has given us a more exact Account of them, both from our Hiſtorians and Records, then any other Author, I ſhall make bold to tranſcribe his.

Soon after his firſt Coronation, which was on the Seven and Twentieth of May, Anno Dom. 1199. he had a Scutage-Tax of Two Marks of every Knight's Fee.

The next Year he had of every Plough-Land in England, Three Shillings.

In the Year 1201. he had Two Marks of every Knight's Fee, for Scutage-Service, of ſuch as had his Licenſe to ſtay at home, upon Summons to paſs beyond Sea with him.

In the Year 1203. he took a Seventh Part of all the Earls and Baron's Goods that left him in Normandy.

In the Year 1204. in a Parliament at Oxford, there was granted to him a Scutage-Tax of Two Marks, and Half of every Knight's Fee.

In the Year 1205. he Levied of the Earls and Barons, that would not follow him beyond Sea, according to their Tenures, a vaſt Sum of Money.

In the Year 1207. he took a Thirteenth Part of all the Moveables and other Things, as well of Laicks, as of Eccleſiaſticks and Prelates; all of them murmuring, but none daring to contradict it.

In the Year 1210. he forced from the Abbots, Priors, Abbeſſes, Templars, Hoſpitallers, &c. One hundred thouſand Pound, and from the White-Monks, or Ciſtercians, Forty thouſand Pound more.

In the Year 1211. he had Two Marks Scutage-Service of every Knight's Fee, which furniſhed not out that Service to the Expedition of Wales.

In the Year 1214. he took of every Knight's Fee, of thoſe that went not with him into Poicton, as well of Biſhopricks in his hands, as of Wards and Eſcheats, Three Marks.

His Laws and Ordinances.

AS for the Laws and Ordinances made and enacted by him, ſince they are the beſt Actions of his Reign, they are by no means to be paſſed by.

Fol. 208. The firſt Ordinance we find of this King, is in Matt. Paris*, under the Year 1202. when he cauſed to be proclaimed a Legal Aſſiſe of Bread, to be inviolably obſerved under pain of Pillory, as it was to be Tryed and Approved by the Baker of Geoffrey Fitz-Peter, Juſticiary of England, and the Baker of R. de Turnham; it was to be ſo made, as that the Bakers might gain in every Quarter Three Pence, beſides the Bran and Two Loaves at the Oven, with ſome ſmall allowances for Servants, Salt, Yeſt, Fewel, and other Neceſſaries for the making it up, amounting in all to about Seven Pence: And according to this following Gain and Allowance, when Wheat was at Six Shillings the Quarter, a Farthing White Loaf well Baked, was to weigh Sixteen Shillings; and a Farthing Loaf of the whole Grain, that is Bran and all, as it came from the Mill, was to weigh Twenty Four Shillings: when Wheat was at Eighteen-pence the Quarter, then a Farthing White Loaf was to weigh Sixty Four Shillings; and a Farthing Loaf of the whole Griſt, as it came from the Mill, was to weigh Ninety Six Shillings. This is the Higheſt and Loweſt Price of Wheat mention'd in this Hiſtorian; and the Intermediate Price of Wheat, and the Aſſiſe did riſe and fall, according as the Price of Wheat did, after the Rate of Sixpence in every Quarter; and this Aſſiſe was proclaimed through the whole Kingdom. This is Dr. Brady's Obſervation, and deſerves to be taken notice of, becauſe from the Dearneſs and Cheapneſs of Bread-Corn, the Prices of all other Proviſions do commonly depend.

The Reader is to take notice, ſo that he might have a right Notion of theſe Weights, mention'd in this Aſſiſe, that Silver being then but at Twenty-Pence an Ounce, every Pound, (being indeed a Pound weight) was then at the Value of Three Pound Sterling at this Day.

His favour to the City of London. Vid. Fabian's Chronicle.

He was alſo in the beginning of his Reign very favourable to the *City of London, and gave it the Liberty of altering their Mayor and Sheriffs every Year, which before continued during Life: He alſo gave them leave to chuſe a Common Council of the moſt Subſtantial Citizens; and likewiſe, as * Henry de Knighton relates, he was the Firſt King of England, who granted to the Cinque-Ports the Privileges and Cuſtoms which they now enjoy, and then held, on conſideration that they obliged Themſelves and their

Heirs,

Heirs, to provide the King upon reaſonable Summons Fourſcore able Veſſels at their own Charges, for the ſpace of Forty Days, and after that to receive Wages of the King; but the Original Cauſe of this Grant, was, the great Neceſſity the King had of Shipping to paſs into Normandy that Year he loſt it, which was the Fourth of his Reign.

He alſo cauſed the Engliſh Laws and Cuſtoms to be Eſtabliſhed in Ireland, and placed Sheriffs and other Officers in divers Parts of that Nation, who ſhould Govern and Judge the People according to thoſe Laws; and made John Gray, Biſhop of Norwich, Juſticiary here, who made the Money of Ireland of the ſame Weight with that in England, for the Conveniency of Traffick between the two Nations, as has been already taken Notice of in the Hiſtory of his Reign. He Eſtabliſh'd the Engliſh Laws in Ireland.

But the moſt conſiderable Law made by this King, was, that of the Great Charter of Liberties and Foreſts, which I have reſerved for this Place, and have here tranſcribed Dr. Brady's Tranſlation of it into Engliſh: only having added in the Margin ſuch Additions as the Doctor hath made, which are not in the Latin Original; and whatſoever is printed in an Italian Character, and between theſe Marks [ ] are ſuch Clauſes as not being thought very Material, were omitted in the Great Charter of Nono Henry the Third, and all that follow'd: For though Matt. Paris aſſures us, that they were altogether the ſame, yet certainly he ſaid this without due Conſideration, for they differ'd in divers Particulars, as any one may obſerve, that will but take the Pains to compare them together. But I ſhall here give you the Charter it ſelf at large, as it is Tranſlated by Dr. Brady in his * Appendix. His Magna Charta, and Charta de Foreſta.

King

King John's Great Charter,

* Fol. 255. As 'tis to be found in *Matt. Paris, and divided into Chapters.

JOHN, By the Grace of GOD, King of England, &c. To the Archbiſhops, Biſhops, &c. Know Ye that We, in the Preſence of God, and for the Health of our Soul, and the Souls of all my Anceſtors and Heirs, and to the Honour of God, and the Exaltation of Holy Church, and Amendment of our Kingdom, by Advice of our Venerable Fathers, Stephen Archbiſhop of Canterbury, Primate of all England, and Cardinal of the Holy Roman Church; Henry Archbiſhop of Dublin, William Biſhop of London, Peter of Wincheſter, Jocelin of Bath and Glaſtonbury, Hugh of Lincoln, Walter of Worceſter, William of Coventry, Benedict of Rocheſter, Biſhops; and Maſter Pandulph the Pope's Sub-Deacon, and antient Servant, Brother to the Maſter of the Temple in England, and the Noble Perſons William the Mareſchal, Earl of Pembroke, William Earl of Salisbury, William Earl of Warren, William Earl of Arundel, Alan de Galoway, Conſtable of Scotland, Warin Fitz-Gerard, Peter Fitz-Herbert, and Hugo de Burgh, * Seneſchal of Poicton; Hugo de Nevil, Matthew Fitz-Herbert, Thomas Baſſet, Alan Baſſet, Philip de Albiney, Robert de Ropeſle, John Mareſchal, John Fitz-Hugh, and Others, our Liegemen; have firſt of all granted to God, and by this our preſent Charter confirmed for Us and our Heirs for Ever.

* i.e. Steward.

This Clauſe is wanting in Henry the Third's Charter.

I. That the Engliſh Church ſhall be Free, and Enjoy her whole Rights and Liberties unhurt; [and We will have them to be ſo obſerved, ſo as it may appear that the Freedom of Elections, which was reputed moſt neceſſary for the Engliſh Church, which we granted and confirmed by our Charter, and obtained the Confirmation of it from Pope Innocent the Third, before the Diſcord between Us and our Barons, was of our meer Free Will; which Charter of Freedom we ſhall obſerve, and do will it to be faithfully obſerved by our Heirs for Ever.]

II. We have alſo granted to all our Freemen of the Kingdom of England, for Us and our Heirs for Ever, all the Under-written Liberties, to have and to hold to Them and their Heirs of Us and our Heirs.

III. If any of our Earls, or Barons, or Others, who hold of us in chief by Military Service ſhall die, and at the time of his Death his Heir ſhall be of full Age, and owe a Relief, he ſhall have his Inheritance or Eſtate by the antient Relief; that is to ſay, the Heir or Heirs of an Earl, for a whole Earl's Barony, an Hundred Pounds; the Heir or Heirs of a Baron, for a whole Barony, an Hundred Marks;

Marks; The Heir or Heirs of a Knight for a whole Knight's Fee, an Hundred Shillings; and he that oweth leſs, ſhall give leſs, according to the antient Cuſtom of Fees.

IV. But if the Heir of any ſuch ſhall be under Age, and ſhall be in Ward, his Lord ſhall not have the Wardſhip of him, nor his Land, before he hath received his Homage; and after ſuch Heir ſhall be in Ward, and ſhall attain to the Age of One and Twenty Years, he ſhall have his Inheritance without Relief, or without Fine: Yet ſo, that if he be made a Knight while he is under Age, nevertheleſs the Land ſhall remain in the Cuſtody, or Guardianſhip of the Lord, until the aforeſaid time.

V. The Warden, or Guardian of the Land of ſuch Heir, who ſhall be under Age, ſhall take of the Land of the Heir, only reaſonable Iſſues or Profits, reaſonable Cuſtoms, and reaſonable Services; and theſe without the deſtruction, or waſte of the *Tenents, or things upon the Eſtate: And if we ſhall commit the Guardianſhip of thoſe Lands to the Sheriff, or any Other, that ought to anſwer to us for the Iſſues or Profits of the Land, and he ſhall make deſtruction and waſte upon the Ward-Lands, We will force him to give Satisfaction, and the Land ſhall be committed to Lawful and Diſcreet Tenants of that Fee, who in like manner ſhall be anſwerable to us, as hath been ſaid. *H. minum.

VI. But the Warden, ſo long as he ſhall have the Wardſhip of the Land, ſhall uphold and maintain the Houſes, Parks, Warrens, Pools, Mills, and other things belonging to the Land, with the Profits of the ſame Land, and ſhall reſtore to the Heir, when he comes of full Age, his whole Land ſtocked with Ploughs and all other things, at leaſt whatever he received; and all theſe things ſhall be obſerved in the Cuſtody, or Wardſhip belonging to vacant Archbiſhopricks, Biſhopricks, Abbies, Priories, Churches, and Dignities which do belong to us; except that theſe Wardſhips ought not to be ſold.

VII. Heirs ſhall be Married without Diſparagement; [* ſo that before Matrimony ſhall be contracted, Thoſe who are neareſt to him in Blood ſhall be acquainted with it.] *This is wanting in Henry the Third's Charter.

VIII. A Widow, after the Death of her Husband, ſhall forthwith, and without any difficulty, have her Marriage-Goods, and her Eſtate of Inheritance; nor ſhall ſhe give any thing for her *Dower [or Marriage-Goods] and Inheritance, which her Husband and ſhe held at the day of his Death: and ſhe may remain in the Capital Meſſuage, or Manſion-Houſe of her Husband, by the ſpace of Forty Days after his Death; in which time her Dower ſhall be Aſſigned, if it was not Aſſigned before, unleſs the Houſe ſhall be a Caſtle; and if ſhe departs from the Caſtle, there ſhall be forthwith a Competent Dwelling provided for her, in which ſhe may decently remain until her Dower be Aſſigned, as hath been ſaid; and ſhe ſhall have her reaſonable Eſtovers [i.e. competent Proviſion or Maintenance] *Maritagium.

tenance] in the mean time out of the Common Stock or whole Revenue; and there ſhall be Aſſigned to her for her Dower the Third Part of the whole Land of her Husband, which was his in his Life time, except ſhe was Endowed with leſs at the Church-Door.

IX. No Widow ſhall be diſtreined (i.e. compelled by taking her Goods) to Marry her ſelf, ſo long as ſhe will live without an Husband; yet ſo as ſhe ſhall give Security that ſhe will not Marry without our Conſent, if ſhe holds of us; or without the Conſent of the Lord of whom ſhe holds, if ſhe hold of another Perſon.

X. But We, or our Bayliffs, will not ſeize any Land or Rent for any Debt, ſo long as there ſhall be Chattels (i.e. Goods) of the Debtors upon the Premiſes, ſufficient to Diſcharge it, and that the Debtor be ready and willing to ſatisfie it: Nor ſhall the Sureties of the Debtor be diſtreined, ſo long as the Capital Debtor be able to pay the Debt.

XI. And if the Principal, or Chief Debtor makes default in payment of the Debt, not having wherewithal to ſatisfie it, or will not ſatisfie it when he is able; then the Pledges or Sureties ſhall anſwer it, and they ſhall have the Lands and Rents of the Debtor, until they ſhall be ſatisfied for the Debt they paid for him; unleſs the chief Debtor can ſhew himſelf diſcharged thereof, againſt thoſe Pledges.

These two Chapters concerning Debts to the Jews are omitted in Henry the Third's Charter.

XII. [If any one have borrowed any thing of the Jews, more or leſs, and dies before the Debt be paid, there ſhall be no Uſe paid for that Debt, ſo long as the Heir is under Age, of whomſoever he holds: And if the Debt falls into our Hands, we will take only the Chattle contained in the Charter or Inſtrument.]

XIII. [If any one ſhall die indebted to the Jews, his Wife ſhall have her Dower, and pay nothing of that Debt; and if the Deceaſed left Children under Age, they ſhall have Neceſſaries provided for them according to the Tenement (i.e. the Real Eſtate) of the Deceaſed, and with the Reſidue or Overplus the Debt ſhall be paid; ſaving the Service of the Lords on whom this Tenement is holden: In like manner the Debts due to other Perſons than Jews ſhall be ſatisfied.]

XIV. I will not impoſe or levy any Scutage or Aid in our Kingdom, without the Common Advice or Council of our Kingdom, unleſs to redeem our Body, and to make our Eldeſt Son Knight, and once to marry our Eldeſt Daughter; and for this there ſhall only be paid a reaſonable Aid.

This is not in Henry the Third's Charter.

XV. [In like manner it ſhall be concerning the Aids of the City of London; and] the City of London ſhall have all its Antient Liberties and Free Cuſtoms, as well by Land as by Water.

XVI. Further-

XVI. Furthermore, We Will and Grant, that all other Cities and Burghs, and Towns, and Barons of the Cinque (or Five) Ports, and all other Ports, shall have all their Liberties and Free Customs: and shall have the Common Council, or Advice of the Kingdom concerning the Assessment of their Aids, [*i.e. shall send their Representatives or Commissioners to the Common Council of the Kingdom] otherwise than in the three Cases aforesaid.

Note, This is Dr. Brady's Paraphrase upon this Clause.

XVII. [And for the Assessing of Scutages, we shall cause to be Summoned the Archbishops, Bishops, Abbots, Earls, and great Barons of the Kingdom, singly and personally by our Letters, (i.e. Writs:]

These three next Chapters concerning Assessing Scutages, and Summoning the Tenents in Capite, are omitted in the Charter above mentionrd.

XVIII. [And furthermore, We shall cause to be Summon'd in general by our Sheriffs and Bayliffs, all Others who hold of us In Capite, at a certain Day, that is to say, Forty Days (i.e. before their Meeting) at least, to a certain Place; and in all Writs of such Summons, we will declare the Cause of it.]

XIX. [And Summons being thus made, the Business mentioned in them shall proceed, according to the Advice of such as shall be present, although all that were Summon'd come not.]

XX. We will not for the future Grant to any One, that he may take Aid of his own Free-Tenents, unless to *redeem his Body, and to make his Eldest Son a Knight, and once to marry his Eldest Daughter, and for this there shall only be paid a reasonable Aid.

XXI. No Man shall be distreined to perform more service for a Knight's Fee, or other Free Tenement, than what is due from it.

XXII. Common Pleas shall not follow our Court, but shall be holden in some certain Place: *Tryals upon the Writs of Novel Disseisin, Death of the Ancestor, and of last Presentment [to Benefices] shall not be brought but in their *proper Counties, and after this manner: We, or (if we shall be out of the Kingdom) our Capital or Chief Justiciary, shall send our Justiciaries through every County once in a Year, who with the Knights of the Counties shall hold the aforesaid Assizes in those Counties.

*Recognitions.

*In Civitatibus suis, says Matt. Paris, but falsly.

XXIII. And those things, which, at the coming of the Justices so sent into the Counties, to take or hold the said Assizes, cannot be determined, shall not be determined otherwise in their Circuit or Iter: And those things which for the difficulty of some Articles, cannot be determined by those Justices, shall be referred to our Justices of the Bench.

XXIV. Assizes of the last Presentation of Churches shall always be taken before the Justices of the Bench, and there determined.

XXV. A Freeman shall not be amerced for a small Fault, but according to the manner of the Fault, and for a great Crime, according to the Heinousness of it, Saving his Contenement, (or Livelihood) and after the same manner a Merchant, saving his Ability to Trade or Merchandize.

*Salvo Contenemento suo.

XXVI. And a Villain [i.e. a Ruſtick or Husbandman] of any other then our own, ſhall be amerced after the ſame manner, ſaving his Wainage, [i.e. his Carts and Implements] to Till his Land, if he falls under our Mercy; and none of the aforeſaid *Amerciaments ſhall be ſet, but by the Oath of Twelve Knowing and Lawful Men of the Vicinage, of the County.

* Miſericordiarum.

XXVII. Earls and Barons, ſhall not be amerced but by their Peers, and only according to the Quality of the Crime or Offence.

XXVIII. No Eccleſiaſtick Perſon ſhall be amerced according to the Quantity of his Benefice, but according to his Lay-Tenement, and the Greatneſs of his Offence.

XXIX. Neither a Town, nor any particular Perſon ſhall be di-
* Ad Riparias. ſtreined to make Bridges *over Rivers, unleſs that Antiently and of Right they ought to do it.

XXX. No River for the future ſhall be imbanked [i.e. kept in with Banks] but what was imbanked in the time of King Henry our Grandfather.

* Balivi. XXXI. No Sheriff, Conſtable, Coroner, or other Officer* of ours ſhall hold Pleas of the Crown.

Omitted in Henry the Third's Charter. XXXII. [All Counties, Hundreds, Wapentachs and Tythings, ſhall ſtand at the old Farm, without any Increaſe, except in our Demeſne Lands.]

XXXIII. If any one that holds of us a Lay-Fee dies, and the Sheriff, or our Bailiff, ſhew our Letters Patents of Summons concerning the Debt due to us from the Deceaſed, it ſhall be Lawful for the Sheriff, or our Bailiff, to Attach and Regiſter the Chattels of the Deceaſed found upon his Lay-Fee, to the value of the Debt by the view of Lawful Men, ſo as nothing be removed, untill our whole Debt be paid, and the reſt ſhall be left to the Executors, to fulfill
* i.e. His Executors or Adminiſtrators, as appears by the next Clauſe. the Will of the Deceaſed; and if there be nothing due from him to us, all the Chattels ſhall remain to the *Deceaſed, ſaving to his Wife and Children their reaſonable Shares.

Omitted in the Charter laſt mention'd XXXIV. [If any Freeman dies Inteſtate, his Chattels ſhall be diſtributed by the hands of his neareſt Relations and Friends by view of the Church, [i.e. the Ordinary] ſaving to every one his Debts, which the Deceaſed owed.]

* i.e. Of a Caſtle, by what follows. XXXV. No *Conſtable or Bailiff of ours, ſhall take Grain, or other Chattels of any Man, who is not of the Town where the Caſtle is, unleſs he preſently gives him Money for it, or hath reſpite of Payment from the Seller: But if he be of the ſame Town, he ſhall pay him within Forty days.

XXXVI. No

XXXVI. No Conſtable ſhall diſtrein any Knight to give Money for Caſtle-Guard, if he will perform it in his own Perſon, or by another able Man, if he be hindered by any reaſonable Cauſe.

XXXVII. And if we ſhall lead him, or if We ſhall ſend him into the Army, he ſhall be free from Caſtle-Guard, according to the time he ſhall be in the Army, by our Command, for the Fee, for which he performed his Service in the Army.

XXXVIII. No Bailiff of ours, or Sheriff, or other, ſhall take Horſes or Carts of any one to convey our Goods, unleſs he ſhall pay according to the Rate antiently appointed; That is to ſay, for a Cart and Two Horſes Ten Pence a Day; and for a Cart with Three Horſes Fourteen Pence a Day.

XXXIX. No Demeſne Cart of an Eccleſiaſtical Perſon, or a Knight, or Lady, ſhall be taken by our Officers; neither ſhall We or our Officers, or Others, take any other Man's Timber or Wood for our Caſtles, or other uſes, unleſs by the conſent of the Owner.

XL. We will retain the Land of thoſe that are convicted of Felony but one Year and one Day, and then they ſhall be render'd to the Lord of the Fee.

XLI. All * Weres for the future ſhall be demoliſhed in the Rivers of Thames and Medway, and through all England, unleſs upon the Sea-Coaſt. * Kidells XLII. The Writ, which is called Præcipe, for the future ſhall not be granted to any one of any Tenement, whereby a Freeman may loſe his Cauſe.

XLIII. There ſhall be one Meaſure of Wine and Ale through our whole Kingdom, and one Meaſure of Grain; that is to ſay, the London-Quarter; and one Breadth of died Cloaths, and Ruſſets, and *Haberjets; That is to ſay, Two Ells within the Liſt; and the Weights ſhall be as the Meaſures. * A ſort of Coarſe Cloath.

XLIV. Nothing ſhall be given or taken for the future, for a Writ of Inquiſition, from him that deſires an Inquiſition of Life or Limbs, but ſhall be granted gratis, and not denied.

XLV. If any one holds of us by Fee-Farm, Soccage, or Burgage, and holds Lands of another by Military Service, We will not have the Wardſhip of the Heir or Land, which belongs to another Man's Fee, by reaſon of what he holds of us in Fee-Farm, Soccage, or Burgage: Nor will We have the Wardſhip, or Cuſtody of the Fee-Farm, Soccage, or Burgage, unleſs the Fee-Farm is bound to perform Military Service.

XLVI. We will not hold the Wardſhip of an Heir, nor any Land, which he holds of another by Military Service, by reaſon of any Petit, or ſmall Serjeanty, he holds of us, as by the Service of giving us Daggers, Arrows, or the like.

XLVII. No Bailiff, or Officer for the future, ſhall bring any Man under the Sentence of the Law, nor to his Oath, (i.e. Canonical Purgation by his Oath) upon his ſingle Accuſation or Teſtimony, without credible and honeſt Witneſſes produced to prove it.

XLVIII. No Freeman ſhall be taken, or impriſon'd, or diſſeiſed of his Free-Tenement, or Liberties, or Free Cuſtoms; or Outlaw'd, or Baniſhed, or any way deſtroy'd; nor will we paſs upon him, or commit him to Priſon, unleſs by the Legal Judgment of his Peers, or by the Law of the Land, (i.e. by Legal Proceſs, &c.)

XLIX. We will not ſell to any Man, we will not deny any Man, or delay Right, or Juſtice.

L. All Merchants, unleſs they be publickly prohibited, ſhall have ſafe and ſecure Conduct to go out of, and come into England, and to ſtay there, and to paſs as well by Land as by Water, to buy and ſell by the antient and allowed Cuſtoms, without any Maletolts, (i.e. Illegal Exactions) except in time of War, or when they ſhall be of any Nation in War with us.

LI. And if there be found ſuch [Merchants] in our Land in the beginning of a War, they ſhall be attached or ſecured, without damage to their Bodies or Goods, untill it may be known to us, or our chief Juſticiary, how our Merchants are dealt with in that Nation in War with us; and if Ours be ſafe there, they ſhall be ſafe in our Land.

This Chapter is omitted in Henry the Third's Charter.

LII. [It ſhall be Lawful for any one for the future to go out of our Kingdom, and return ſafely and ſecurely by Land or by Water, ſaving his Faith or Allegiance to us; unleſs in time of War by ſome ſhort ſpace for the common Profit of the Kingdom; except Priſoners and Out-Laws, (according to the Law of the Land) and People in War with us, and Merchants who ſhall be in ſuch condition as aforeſaid.]

LIII. If any Man holds by any Eſcheat, as of the Honour of Wallingford, Bologne, Lancaſter, Nottingham, or by other Eſcheats, which are in our hands, and are Baronies, and dies, his Heir ſhall not give any other Relief, or perform any other Service to us, than he did to the Baron, if the Barony had been in poſſeſſion of the Baron; and We will hold it after the ſame manner the Baron held it; nor will we by reaſon of ſuch Barony, or Eſcheat, have any Eſcheat, or Wardſhip of any of our Men, unleſs he that held the Barony or Eſcheat, held of us in Capite in another Place.

This and the next Chapter are omitted in Henry the Third's Charter.

LIV. [Thoſe Men who dwell without the Foreſt, for the future ſhall not come before our Juſtices of the Foreſt upon common Summons, but ſuch as were concern'd in the Controverſie, or were Pledges for any that were attached for ſomething concerning the Foreſt.]

LV. All

LV. [All Woods that were taken into the Foreſt by King Richard our Brother, ſhall forthwith be laid out again, unleſs they were our Demeſne Woods.]

LVI. No Freeman for the future ſhall give or ſell any more of his Land, but ſo that out of the Reſidue, the Service due to the Lord of the Fee may be ſufficiently perform'd.

LVII. All Patrons of Abbies, who have Charters of the Kings of England of the Advowſon, or by any antient Tenure or Poſſeſſion, may have the Cuſtody of them when void as they ought to have, and as was declared before.

LVIII. No Man ſhall be taken or impriſon'd upon the Appeal of a Woman for the Death of any other Man, than her Husband.

LIX. No County-Court for the future ſhall be holden, but from Month to Month; and where there uſed to be a greater ſpace let it be ſo continued.

LX. Neither any Sheriff, nor his Bailiff ſhall keep his Torne oftner than Twice in a Year, and only in the accuſtomed Place; That is to ſay, once after Eaſter, and once after Michaelmas; and the View of Franc-Pledges, (or Sureties for the Peace of the Freemen one for another) ſhall be held after Michaelmas, * without Oppreſſion, and ſo that every one ſhall have his Liberties, which he had and was wont to have in the time of King Henry our Grandfather, or ſuch as he obtained afterwards. * Sine Occaſione.

LXI. But the View of Franc-Pledge ſhall be ſo made, that our Peace may be kept, and that the Tything be whole and full, as it wont to be.

LXII. And that the Sheriff ſhall not * ſeek cauſes to oppreſs any Man, but he ſhall be content with what the Sheriff was wont to have for making his View in the time of King Henry our Grandfather. * Non quærat.

LXIII. For the future it ſhall not be Lawful for any Man to give his Land to a Religious Houſe, ſo as to take it again, and hold it of that Houſe.

LXIV. Nor ſhall it be Lawful for any Religious Houſe to receive Land, ſo as to grant it to him again of whom they received it, to hold of Him. If any Man for the future ſhall ſo give his Land to a Religious Houſe, and be convicted thereof, his Gift ſhall be void, and the Land ſhall be forfeit to the Lord of the Fee.

LXV. Scutage for the future ſhall be taken as it was uſed to be taken in the time of King Henry our Grandfather; and that the Sheriff ſhall vex no Man, but be content with what he was wont to receive.

LXVI. All

LXVI. All the aforeſaid Cuſtoms and Liberties, which We have granted to be holden in our Kingdom, as much as belongs to us towards our Men of the Kingdom, Our Clerks and Laicks we ſhall obſerve, as much as it ſhall belong to Us, towards all the Men of our Kingdom.

LXVII. Saving to the Archbiſhops, Biſhops, Abbots, Priors, Templars, Hoſpitallers, Earls, Barons, Knights, and all Others, as well Eccleſiaſticks, as Seculars, the Liberties and Free Cuſtoms, which they had before; Theſe being Witneſſes, &c.

King John's Charter of Foreſts,

As it is to be found in Matt. Paris, Folio 250. Tranſlated and Divided into Articles or Chapters, from Dr. Brady's Tranſlation in his Appendix, N°. 113. p. 141.

JOHN, By the Grace of GOD, King of England, &c. Know ye that for the Honour of God, and the Health of our Soul, and the Souls of our Anceſtors and Succeſſors, and for the Exaltation of Holy Church, and the Amendment of our Kingdom, we have of our Free and Good Will given and granted for Us and our Heirs, theſe Liberties underwritten, to be had and obſerved in our Kingdom of England for ever.

I. Firſt of all, Whatſoever Foreſts our Grandfather King Henry made Foreſt or Afforeſted, ſhall be viewed by Knowing and Lawful Men; and if he turned any other than his own proper Wood into Foreſt, to the Damage of him whoſe Wood it was, it ſhall forthwith be laid out again and diſforeſted: And if he turned his own Woods into Foreſt, they ſhall remain ſo, ſaving the Common of Herbage in the ſame Foreſt to thoſe who were formerly wont to have it.

II. They who dwell without the Foreſt for the time to come, ſhall not upon Common Summons appear before our Juſtices of the Foreſt, unleſs they ſhall *be impleaded, or are Pledges or Sureties, for ſuch as are attached or arreſted for any matter concerning the Foreſt: But all Woods that were turned into Foreſt by our Brother King Richard, ſhall be forthwith diſforeſted, unleſs they are our own Demeſns.

* Sint in Placito.

III. The Archbiſhops, Biſhops, Abbots, Priors, Earls, Barons, Knights, and Free Tenants, who have Woods in any Foreſt, ſhall have their Woods as they had them at the time of the firſt Coronation of our ſaid Grandfather King Henry, ſo as they ſhall be diſcharged charged for ever of all Purpreſtures*, Waſtes, and †Aſſarts, made in thoſe Woods, after that time, to the beginning of the Second year of our Coronation, and thoſe who for the time to come ſhall make Waſte, Purpreſture or Aſſart in thoſe Woods, without our Licenſe, ſhall anſwer for them.

* i.e. Encroachments upon the Kings Lands or Highways.

† i.e. Grubling up Wood and turning it into Arable Land without Licenſe.

IV. Our Regarders or Viewers, ſhall go through the Foreſts to make a View or Regard, as it was wont to be at the time of the firſt Coronation of our ſaid Grandfather King Henry, and not otherwiſe.

V. The Inquiſition or View for *Lawing of Dogs, which are kept within the Foreſt, for the future ſhall be when the Regard is made, that is, every three Years, and then it ſhall be done by the View and Teſtimony of Lawful Men, and not otherwiſe; and he whoſe Dog at ſuch time ſhall be found Unlawed, ſhall be puniſhed Three Shillings; and for the future no Oxe ſhall be taken for Lawing, and ſuch Lawing ſhall be according to the Common Aſſiſe or Eſtabliſhment, ſo as therefore the Claws of the Dog's Foot ſhall be cut off, or the Ball of his Foot cut out. And for the future Dogs ſhall not be Lawed, unleſs in ſuch Places where they were wont to be Lawed in the time of King Henry our Grandfather.

* Called in Latin Expeditatio.

VI. No Foreſter or *Bedell for the time to come ſhall make any †Ale-ſhots, or Collect Sheafs of Corn, or Oats, Wheat, or Lambs or Pigs, nor ſhall make any gathering or impoſition whatſoever, but by the view and Oath of Twelve Regarders; and when they make their Regard or View, ſo many Foreſters ſhall be appointed to keep the Foreſts as they ſhall reaſonably think ſufficient.

* i.e. Bayliff in a Foreſt.

† Scotallum.

VII. No Swainmote for the time to come ſhall be holden in our Kingdom oftner than thrice in one Year; That is to ſay, in the beginning of Fifteen days before St. Michael, when the Agiſters come to agiſt the Demeſne Woods, and about the Feaſt of St. Martin, when our Agiſters ought to receive their *Pannage, and in thoſe two Swainmotes, the Foreſters, Verderers, and Agiſters ſhall meet, and no other by compulſion or diſtreſs; and the third Swainmote ſhall be holden in the beginning of the Fifteen days before the Feaſt of St. John Baptiſt, concerning the Fawning of our Does, and at this Swainmote ſhall meet the Foreſters and Verderers, and no others ſhall be compell'd to be there.

* i.e. Money for the feeding of Hogs with Maſt in the King's Foreſts.

VIII. And furthermore every Forty days throughout the whole Year, the Verderers and Foreſters ſhall meet to view the Attachments of the Foreſt, as well of *Vert, as Veniſon, by preſentment of the Foreſters themſelves; and they who committed the Offences, ſhall be forced to appear before them: But the aforeſaid Swainmotes ſhall be holden but in ſuch Counties as they were wont to be holden.

* i.e. The Offences that have been committed in cutting of Wood or killing Deer.

IX. Every Freeman ſhall *Agiſt his Wood in the Foreſt at his pleaſure, and ſhall receive his Pannage.

* i.e. Shall take in Agiſtments of his Neighbour's Cattle.

X. We grant alſo, That every Freeman may drive his Hogs through our Demeſne Woods, freely and without impediment, and may may agiſt them in his own proper Woods, or otherwhere as he will; and if the Hogs of any Freeman ſhall remain one Night in our Foreſt, he ſhall not be troubled for it, ſo as to loſe any thing, (i.e. Pay any thing) for it.

XI. No Man for the time to come ſhall loſe Life or Limb for taking our Veniſon; but if any one be ſeized and convicted of taking Veniſon, he ſhall be grievouſly *Puniſhed, if he hath where-withal; and if he have not, he ſhall lie in our Priſon a Year and a Day: And if after that Time he can find Sureties, he ſhall be releaſed; if not, he ſhall abjure our Kingdom of England.

*i.e. Fined.

XII. Every Archbiſhop, Biſhop, Earl, or Baron, coming to us at our Command, and paſſing through our Foreſt, may Lawfully take one or two Deer by view of the Foreſter if preſent; if not, he ſhall cauſe a Horn to be ſounded leſt he ſhould ſeem to ſteal them; alſo in their return, they may Lawfully do the ſame thing.

XIII. Every Freeman for the time to come may erect a Mill in his own Wood, or upon his own Land, which he hath in the Foreſt; or make a Warren, Pool or Pond, a Marl-pit, or Ditch, or turn ſome of it into Arable, without the Covert in the Arable Land, ſo as it be not to the Nuſance of his Neighbour.

XIV. Every Freeman may have his Woods, the Ayries of Hawks, of Spar-Hawks, Falcons, Eagles, and Herons; and they ſhall likewiſe have the Honey which ſhall be found in their Woods.

XV. No Foreſter for the future, who is not a Foreſter in Fee, paying us Rent for his Office, ſhall take Chiminage*; That is to ſay, for every Cart Two Pence for half a Year, and for the other half Year Two Pence; and for a Horſe that carries Burthens, for half a Year One Halfpenny; and then only of thoſe, who come as Buyers out of their Bayliwick, or Liberty, to buy Underwood, Timber, Bark, or Char-coal, to carry it to ſell in other Places, where they will: And for the future there ſhall be no Chiminage taken for any other Cart, or Horſe-load, unleſs in thoſe Places, where antiently it was wont, and ought to be taken; but they who carry Wood, Bark, or Coal, upon their Backs to ſell, although they get a Livelihood by it, ſhall for the time to come pay no Chiminage: But for Paſſage through the Woods of other Men, no Chiminage ſhall be given to our Foreſters; but only in or from our own Woods.

i.e.* Money for paſſing through the Foreſts.

XVI. All Perſons Outlaw'd for Offences committed in our Foreſts from the time of King Henry our Grandfather, untill our firſt Coronation, may Reverſe their Out-Lawries without Impediment, but ſhall find Pledges that for the time to come they will not forfeit to us, (i.e. Commit any Offence) in our Foreſt.

XVII. No Caſtellan, or Conſtable of a Caſtle, or other Perſon, ſhall hold Pleas of the Foreſt, whether Vert or Veniſon: But every Foreſter in Fee ſhall *Attach Pleas of the Foreſt, as well concerning Vert

i.e* May ſeize the Body or Goods of the Offenders to make them appear.

Vert as Veniſon, and ſhall preſent the Pleas or Offences to the Verderers of the ſeveral Counties, and when they ſhall be inrolled, and wrapped in Wax, under the Seals of the Verderers, they ſhall be preſented to the Chief Foreſter, when he ſhall come into thoſe Parts, to hold Pleas of the Foreſt, and ſhall be determined before him.

XVIII. And all the Cuſtoms and Liberties aforeſaid, which we have granted to be holden in our Kingdom; as much as it belongs to us towards *our Subjects or Vaſſals, all our Kingdom, as well Laicks as Clercs, ſhall obſerve as much as it appertains to them, towards *their Tenents or Vaſſals.

* Noſtros.

* Suos.

There are alſo ſeveral other Clauſes properly belonging to this Charter, which are only to be found in the Originals, in the Cottonian Library, and in the Archives of the Dean and Chapter of Salisbury, or elſe in ſome antient Copies, as that in the Lord Archbiſhop's Library at Lambeth; all which being only temporary, were left out in all the Confirmations of the Great Charter by King Henry III. and were either never ſeen, or elſe were not thought by Matt. Paris worth the inſerting into his Copy of King John's Charter; and for that Reaſon I have alſo omitted them in this Tranſlation: But in the Appendix to this Volume, I have printed this Charter at large from the above-mentioned Original, that the more Learned and Curious Readers may ſee the great difference between this of King John, and thoſe granted by his Son; notwithſtanding * Matt. Paris, or rather Rog. of Wendover's ſo poſitively aſſerting, that the Charters of both Kings *are in nothing found unlike each other: But of the Differences between them I ſhall ſay more, when I come to the end of Henry the Third's Reign: And to which I had once reſolv'd to have referr'd this preſent Tranſlation of the Charter of Foreſts, ſince there is no Original of it now extant, nor any antient MS. Copies to be found, except what are in the Manuſcript of Rog. Wendover in the Cottonian Library, and in the ſeveral antient Copies of Matt. Paris's Hiſtory, both there and elſewhere; but whether thoſe were ever tranſcribed from any Originals, or authentick Copies of any Charters granted by King John may well be doubted; for beſides the Reaſon already given, there is this to be ſaid further, that the moſt conſiderable Clauſes relating to Foreſts are inſerted at the End of King John's Original Charter of Liberties, which had been needleſs to have been put into a Charter on purpoſe, if that the ſame things had been already granted before: But as for that long Clauſe in Matt. Paris at the end of the Charter of Foreſts, concerning appointing Twenty Five Barons to ſee theſe Charters obſerved, and the Power of reſiſting the King which was thereby reſerved to the Community of the Kingdom in caſe he broke them, and being admoniſhed refuſed to amend his Error; Theſe are to be found Verbatim in the Charter of King John in the Appendix, as any one may ſee who will but take the pains to compare Matt. Paris's Copy with that. But be it as it will, ſince I find this Charter of Foreſts in Matt. Paris under King John's Name, and reputed to be his, I have publiſhed it here, without determining any thing poſitively in a Matter ſo doubtful and uncertain.

* P. 321.

* In nullo invenientur diſſimiles.

I ſhall now only warn the Reader, that the Original Charter of King John, which is now in the Cuſtody of the Right Reverend and moſt Learned the Lord Biſhop of Salisbury, is not Magna Charta properly ſo call'd, but only the firſt Draught, or Heads thereof, under his Great Seal, it not being ſo large and particular as that; as any one may ſee who has the Opportunity to compare them.

THE

THE General History OF ENGLAND BOTH Eccleſiaſtical and Civil.

VOL. II. BOOK VIII.

Containing the Reign of K. Henry III.

KING John's unexpected Deceaſe proved a great Advantage to the Young Prince Henry his Son, to whom the Affections of moſt of the Nobility, Clergy, and People of the Kingdom then inclined, not only becauſe of the dying Words of the Viſcount of Melun, already mentioned in the laſt Reign, but alſo becauſe they were weary of the French Inſolence; and I am much of Doctor Brady's Opinion, that one great motive of the Nobilities then returning to their Duty might be, that they ſaw the King had diſpoſed of the Eſtates of thoſe who held of him in Capite to others that had continued his Loyal Subjects; and the Dr. there gives us ſome Examples in his *Appendix, of ſuch Grants which are upon Record in the Tower; yet whether they might not have had a contrary effect upon thoſe whoſe Lands were already diſpoſed of, is not worth diſputing: But to proceed;

Anno Dom. MCCXVI.

The Reaſons why the greateſt Part of the Nation after the Death of K. John joined with Henry his Son, tho' a Child.

*N. 138.

[1] So ſoon as the Death of King John was publickly known, and that the Earls, Biſhops, and Barons who remained firm to the late King, could agree where to meet, (which was by the Summons of the Earl-Mareſchal) they all aſſembled at Gloceſter, whether the Earl had brought Henry, Eldeſt Son to the late King; being but then in the Tenth Year of his Age, and having placed him in the midſt of the Aſſembly, he made a Speech to them, beginning with, Behold our King; and after a ſhort Pauſe went on thus; My dear Friends,

[1] Cron. Wal. Hemingford. L. 3.

The Earls, Biſhops, and Barons, are ſummoned to Gloceſter to the Coronation of the Young King.

Anno. Dom. MCCXVI. The Earl-Mareſchal's Speech to perſuade them to make young Henry their K.

Friends, altho' we have perſecuted the Father of this Child, and that perhaps Juſtly, for his Evil deeds, yet ſince his Son is Innocent from his Father's Faults, and that for every offence none ought to be anſwerable but he that commits it, ſince the Lord hath ſaid, That the Son ſhall not bear the Iniquity of the Father, we ought therefore to have pity upon the tender Age of this Innocent Prince; now inaſmuch as he is the King's Son, and is to be our Lord and Succeſſor of the Kingdom, Come, Let us make him King over us, and let us expell Lewis, Son to the King of France, and his People out of our Country, and ſo let us take away the Reproach of our Nation, by breaking the Yoke of ſo unjuſt a Servitude. This Propoſal (ſays my Author) was at firſt oppoſed by the Earl of Gloceſter, or rather Cheſter, (for the Earldom of Gloceſter was then in the Crown;) but at laſt they agreed, as if they had been divinely inſpir'd, crying, Let him, * Let him be made King: And upon this, they appointed St. Simon and Jude's Day for his Coronation; in which Relation, tho' this Author be out in the Place of this Solemnity, making it to be at London inſtead of Gloceſter, yet he is the only Writer who gives us an Account of the Manner of this King's Election, ſome days preceding his Coronation, which was perform'd in the manner following.

Which is at laſt agreed to by all there preſent.

* Fiat Rex, fiat Rex.

[2] M. Paris, p. 289 A large Account of his Coronation.

[2] On the Eve of St. Simon and Jude, (Eight days after the Death of King John) Guallo the Pope's Legate, Peter Biſhop of Wincheſter, Jocelin Biſhop of Bath, Silveſter Biſhop of Worceſter, Ranulph Earl of Cheſter, William Mareſchal Earl of Pembroke, William Earl of Ferrars, John Mareſchal, and Philip de Albiney, with the Abbots, Priors, and a great Multitude of others, aſſembled at Gloceſter, to advance Henry the Eldeſt Son of King John to the Crown of England. From whence you may obſerve, that Roger of Wendover (from whom Matt. Paris tranſcribed this Relation) did then ſuppoſe, that this Prince was not a compleat King till his actual Coronation, nor could he indeed pretend to any better Title to the Crown than his Father had before, (viz.) the Election of the Clergy and People: for as Arthur Duke of Bretaigne claimed a Right to ſucceed before his Uncle, ſo might his Siſter Eleanor likewiſe have done, had ſhe not been now kept cloſe Priſoner in the Caſtle of Briſtol.

[3] Id. Ib.

[3] But to proceed, the Day after, all neceſſary Preparations being made for his Coronation, Guallo, the Pope's Legate, who highly eſpouſed his Intereſt, accompanied with the afore-mentioned Biſhops and Earls, brought him in ſolemn Proceſſion into the Cathedral Church of Gloceſter, who being then placed before the High-Altar, in the preſence of the Clergy and Laiety, laying his Hand upon the Holy Goſpels and Reliques of Saints, (Jocelin of Bath dictating the Oath) he ſwore, That he would Honour God, and yield Peace and Reverence to Holy Church, and all its Clerks, all the days of his Life; That he would adminiſter due Juſtice to the People; That he would aboliſh all bad Laws and ill Cuſtoms, if any were in his Kingdom, and would obſerve, and cauſe to be obſerved, all good Ones: Then he did Homage to the Church of Rome, and to Pope Innocent, for the Kingdoms of England and Ireland, and alſo engaged faithfully to pay the Thouſand Marks yearly to the See of Rome, which his Father King John had granted to it: After which Peter Biſhop of Wincheſter, and Jocelin Biſhop of Bath, Anointed and Crown'd him King, with the uſual Solemnities nities. The Day after he received the Homages and Fealties of all the Biſhops, Earls, and Barons, and all others who were preſent, they all promiſing him moſt faithful Obedience. Anno Dom. MCCXVI.

But I cannot omit one Circumſtance at this King's Coronation, (which is this;) That [4] for want of a Crown, (which could not be made upon ſo ſhort warning) he was forced to be Crown'd with only a plain Circle, or Chaplet of Gold: But the Reaſon why this King was Crown'd by the Pope's Legate, and not by the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, was, becauſe (as Walter of Coventry obſerves) Stephen Archbiſhop of Canterbury was then at Rome, ſolliciting the taking off his Suſpenſion, and the Legate did not think it ſafe to defer the King's Coronation, till his Return; but whilſt the Biſhops and Lords at Worceſter ſwore Fealty to King Henry, thoſe Barons who ſided with Prince Lewis (to take away all hopes of making their Peace with the Young King) took a ſolemn Oath on the Goſpels never to receive any of the Sons of the late King John; however, this Oath of Abjuration came to nothing, as you will find hereafter.

[4] M. P. Ib. Chron. T. W.

The K. was firſt Crown'd with a Chaplet of Gold, inſtead of a Crown.

The Barons of Lewis's Party take an Oath of Abjuration, not to admit of any of K. John's Sons.

[5] After this Coronation, the Young King (who then wanted One Month of being Ten Years of Age) remain'd under the Protection of William Mareſchal Earl of Pembroke, who being by the common Aſſent of the Prelates and Nobility, choſen to that great Truſt, forthwith ſent Letters to all Sheriffs and Caſtellans of the Kingdom of England, Commanding Obedience to the New King, and promiſing great Rewards to all ſuch as would faithfully adhere to him; whereupon all thoſe Noblemen and Governors of Caſtles, who had continued firm to the Father, ſtuck more Cloſe and Faithful to him, and every one prepared to fortifie their Caſtles as well as they could, and they were the more encouraged to this, when they ſaw that Prince Lewis and all the Barons and others of his Party were every Sunday and Holiday declared Excommunicated by the Pope's Legate.

[5] M. P. Ib.

The King is committed to the Protection of the Earl-Mareſchal.

[1] Then the Protector, together with the Biſhop of Wincheſter, and others of the Council, did all they could to bring over the Rebellious Barons to their Duty to the King; in whoſe name they wrote Letters to ſeveral of them, and (amongſt others) to Hugh de Lacy, a Baron of Note, containing a Safe-Conduct, leaving it to his free choice, if he would come in Perſon, and treat with the King, either to go back again in ſafety if they could not agree, or elſe to ſtay and return to his former Allegiance; which if he did, he was then promiſed the Reſtitution and Enjoyment of all his Eſtate and Privileges: To this Letter the Earl of Pembroke's Name is affixed, as the only Witneſs, and is dated November the Eighteenth, in the Firſt Year of this King's Reign, being upon *Record in the Tower, and we are obliged to Dr. Brady for this Account of it, ſince I doubt not but the like Letters were written to others as well as to this Nobleman.

[1] Id. ib.

The Protector writes in the King's Name to the Barons of Lewis's Party to invite them to return to their Allegiance.

Rot. Pat. 1 H 3. M. 16. Vid. Append. N. 143.

[2] When Prince Lewis, and the Barons who then Beſieged Dover-Caſtle, heard that King John was dead, they were at firſt poſſeſſed with a fallacious Satisfaction, that all England would ſoon be ſubdued; and upon this Lewis ſummoned Hubert de Burgh, Conſtable of the Caſtle, to ſurrender it; telling him, King John was dead, and that he could not defend it much longer; Therefore if he would ſur-surrender the Caſtle, and ſwear Fealty to him, he would not only reward him with Great Honours, but alſo make him one of his Chief Councellors; To whom Hubert gave this Reſolute Anſwer, That although his Maſter was dead, yet he had left Sons who ought to ſucceed him: Nor would he hear of ſurrendring the Caſtle, till he had conſulted his Knights. Theſe all Unanimouſly perſiſted in the Negative, leſt by a ſhamefull ſurrender they ſhould be branded for Traytors; of which when Prince Lewis and the Barons had notice, they reſolved to take in the ſmaller Caſtles firſt, and then to proceed to the Greater; therefore raiſing the Siege, he marched towards London, whereupon the Soldiers that were in that Caſtle ſallied out, and burnt all the Huts and Wooden Fortifications which Prince Lewis had ordered to be made before it.

Which he reſolutely refuſes, with a handſome Anſwer.

[3] Id. p. 290. Lewis beſieges the Caſtle of Hertford, which is at laſt forced to ſurrender.

[3] Wherefore on the Twelfth of November following, he came to Hertford, and beſieged it, which at firſt was well defended by Walter de Godardvill, and many French were ſlain before it; but at laſt it was yielded unto Lewis upon condition, that they might be ſecured of their Goods, their Horſes, and their Arms. Robert Fitz-Walter claimed the Cuſtody of this Town, as belonging unto him by Antient Right; to whom Prince Lewis, by advice of the Frenchmen about him, replied, that Thoſe Engliſh were never to be truſted, who had been Traytors to their own Maſter; However, he promiſed him, that when he had wholly ſubdued the Kingdom, every one ſhould have their Rights reſtored, which they had enjoyed before.

[4] Id. ib. He then beſieges Berkhamſted, and is at firſt repul'ſed.

[4] From thence Prince Lewis advanced to Berkhamſted-Caſtle, and beſieged it; but whilſt the Barons of his Party were pitching their Tents on the North-ſide of the Caſtle towards the Foreſt, thoſe that were in Gariſon ſallied out with great fury upon their Baggage and Carriages, and ſnatching up the Banner of William de Mandevill carried it away with them into the Caſtle; but the ſame Men ſallying out again the next Day, and bearing the ſame Banner before them, were forced to retreat; and ſome days after, (notwithſtanding all the Reſiſtance that Waleran a German, and thoſe that were with him could make) the Caſtle was ſurrender'd about the middle of December, upon condition, that the Beſieged might march out with their Horſes and Arms.

Yet at laſt it is forced to ſurrender upon Conditions.

[5] Id. ib. Lewis comes to St. Albans, and demands Homage of the Abbot, but he refuſing it, he threatens to burn the Abbey, and Town, yet is pacified with Money.

[5] After this, Prince Lewis putting a ſtrong Gariſon in the Caſtle of Berkhamſted) marched forward, ſpoiling the Country, and coming to St. Albans required the Abbot thereof to do him Homage, which he refuſed, unleſs he were firſt releaſed from his Homage to King Henry. Lewis, enraged at this Anſwer, ſwore he would burn both the Abbey and Town, unleſs he did what he required of him; whereupon the Abbot (by the Mediation of Saher Earl of Winton) made a Compoſition for himſelf and the Town, and gave that Prince Fourſcore Marks of Silver to ſpare that Noble Pile, together with the Town, untill Candlemas; then the Prince returned to London: And thus ended the Military Affairs of this Year.

* Memoriale Hiſt. MS. in Bib. Cotton.

As for the Eccleſiaſtical, Walter* of Coventry informs us, that the Pope's Legate having done his utmoſt to confirm thoſe of the King's Party in their Allegiance, and to bring over the reſt that yet ſtood out againſt him, gave all the ſpeedy notice he could to the Pope, of the Death of the late King, and the Coronation of his Son; whereupon upon the Court of Rome reſolved to ſtand by him with all their might, thereby the better to defend the Patrimony of St. Peter, (as they then accounted England to be) and ſo the Legate was not only eſtabliſhed a-new in his Power, but commanded to compel all Prelates and Eccleſiaſtical Perſons, under pain of Excommunication to return to their Duty to the King, putting all the Countries that owned Prince Lewis under an Interdict: But the Prince proteſted againſt the Legate's Authority, prohibiting all Perſons, under great Penalties, to obey his Commands, or own the New King; and required all both Clergy and Laiety to do Fealty to him, as Lord of the Kingdom at a certain ſtated day. But for all this the Legate prevail'd, and holding a Synod of the Prelates and Clergy at Briſtol, he not only confirmed thoſe to the King's Party who were already in it, but alſo hinder'd all others from doing any Homage to Prince Lewis; and he to be revenged of them, ſpoiled and plundered their Goods and Eſtates: Yet this Author relates, that Chriſtmas now approaching, there was a Truce agreed upon during the Holidays, which was to laſt till the Octaves of Epiphany.

Anno Dom. MCCXVI.

The Pope, upon the News of King John's Death, reſolves to ſtand by the young King.

And ſends freſh orders to his Legate to compell all Clergy-men by Excommunication to return to their Allegiance: Whereupon Lewis proteſts againſt his Authority.

The Legate calls a Synod at Briſtol; and what done there.

A Truce agreed on for a few Days.

[1] This Year the Young King kept his Chriſtmas at Briſtol, with Guallo the Legate, and William Earl-Mareſchal the Protector; and about the ſame time there was a great Fluctuation in the Nobility, whether they ſhould ſubmit to Young Henry, or to Prince Lewis, whom they ſecretly hated and deſpiſed, and that chiefly, becauſe contrary to his Oath he had entered upon their Lands and Caſtles, and had filled them with Mercenary Foreign Soldiers; yet at the ſame time they were aſhamed to return to the King, whom they had ſo pittifully deſerted; and being thus perplexed, they could not for a good while tell which Courſe to ſteer.

Anno Dom. MCCXVII.

[1] M. P. p. 292. The Nobility hate Lewis, and the Reaſon why.

But Walter of Coventry gives us a more exact Account than Matt. Paris concerning the Poſture of Affairs in the beginning of this Year; for he tells us, that preſently after Chriſtmas, whilſt the Truce laſted, Prince Lewis and his Adherents held a Council at Grantbridge, (now Cambridge) and the Guardians or Protectors of the King did the like at Oxford; and it was there propoſed, that the Truce ſhould be prolonged; but it being refuſed by Prince Lewis, he preſently fell to beſiege the Caſtle of Odingham, now Odiam in Hampſhire, which was ſhortly render'd to him, as were alſo the Caſtles of Sleford, Norwich, and Colcheſter.

Each Party hold their great Councils, where the Truce being offered to be prolonged, it is by Lewis refuſed.

[2] And about the ſame time, (viz.) the latter end of January, ſeveral Knights and Eſquires went out of Mont-Sorel-Caſtle to plunder the County, but the Gariſon in Nottingham-Caſtle having notice of it, ſent out a Party that engaged them, killed Three of their number, and took Ten Knights and Twenty Four Eſquires, and ſo returned Victorious.

[2] M. P. ib. Several Kts ſallying out of Mount-ſorel-Caſtle, are either killed, or made Priſoners.

[3] About the ſame time alſo, Faukes de Brent, (that old Plunderer) gathering great numbers of Mercenaries from Oxford, Northampton, and other Places, came to St. Albans in the Evening, and falling upon the Town, plundered it, and took many of the Inhabitants Priſoners; and then ſent the Abbot word, that unleſs he would redeem it and his Monaſtery, by paying down an Hundred Pounds, he would burn the whole Town, Abbey and all; which the Abbot being forced

[3] Id. ib. Faukes de Brent with his Mercenaries plunders St. Albans; and makes the Abbot redeem his Monaſtery from burning forced to do, Fawkes return'd with his Priſoners and Spoils to his Caſtle of Bedford; yet being afterwards (it ſeems) frighted by a Dream of a great Stone falling upon him from the Tower of St. Alban's Church, he thereupon, by the advice of his Wife, went back to that Abbey, and then asked Pardon of the Monks for the Injury he had done them, and ſo obtained Abſolution, tho' without reſtoring any thing of what he had taken away.

This I have inſerted to let the Reader ſee, that Mercenary ſtanding Armies are ſtill the ſame things whomſoever they ſerve; ſo it ſeems this Monaſtery ſuffer'd ſufficiently (as Neuters commonly do) from both Parties.

K. Henry grants the ſame Charter of Liberties to Ireland, which he and his Father had already granted to England.

But to intermix ſomewhat of Civil Concerns among ſo many Military Exploits; King Henry, (together with the Pope's Legate, and the Earl-Mareſchal) being ſtill at Gloceſter, he, by the Advice of his Councellors, as well as to teſtify his own Thankfulneſs to his Loyal Subjects of Ireland for their Fidelity to his Father and himſelf, there granted them the ſame Liberties, which had been done already to the Kingdom of England by his Father and Himſelf, and which being now reduc'd into Writing, were ſent to Ireland, under the Seals of Gualo the Legate, and the Earl-Mareſchal Protector, becauſe the King was then under Age, and had as yet no Seal of his own: All which appears by the Writ ſent over with this Charter ſtill on *Record in the Tower of London. But if the Charter it ſelf was entred upon the ſame Roll, it is now loſt, †as is alſo that to England, which is here ſaid to have been granted at the ſame time, viz. Sexto Februarii. But how the Copy of this Charter, which is entred in the Red Book of the Exchequer at Dublin, (and is Mutatis Mutandis, the ſame with our Engliſh Magna-Charta) comes to bear date at Briſtol the 12th of November precedent to this Writ, I do not underſtand, unleſs it be an Error in that Copy, the Original of which is not now Extant: But that King Henry Granted and Confirmed the ſame Charter of Liberties this Year alſo to his Subjects of England, appears from a *Writ upon Record in the Tower, to the Sheriff of Worceſterſhire; commanding him to proclaim the Charters of Liberties granted by the King to the Barons, and all others of England, with the Advice (or Conſent) of the Common Council of the Kingdom, and which the Pope's Legate had alſo confirmed by his Seal; with the ſame Clauſe about the King's not having a Seal of his own, as in the aboveſaid Writ concerning Ireland.

Another confirmation of it in the ſecond Year of this King's Reign.

But tho' the Originals as well as Copies of this firſt Charter be now loſt, yet that the King alſo confirmed theſe Charters in the Second Year of his Reign, appears from ſeveral antient Copies of them ſtill preſerved in private Hands, which are particularly mentioned among the Laws at the end of this King's Reign: And this is alſo farther confirmed by the antient *Manuſcript Chronicle of the City of London, already cited; which ſays expreſly, that this King in the Second Year of his Reign, by his Charter granted and confirmed all the Liberties that had been granted by his Predeceſſors; and then mentions, that becauſe the King was then under Age, and had no Seal of his own, they were Sealed with the Seals of the Pope's Legate, and the Earl-Mareſchal; but that in his Ninth Year he

he again confirmed the ſame Charter, and Seal'd it with his own Seal; and at the ſame Time alſo granted the Charter of Foreſts; which was not mention'd before. Anno Dom. MCCXVII.

[4] About this time Prince Lewis had notice from his Envoys at Rome, that unleſs he departed out of England, the Sentence of Excommunication pronounced againſt him by Guallo the Legate would be confirmed by the Pope himſelf; whereupon a Truce was agreed on between King Henry and Lewis, until a Month after Eaſter; and all things were (till then) to remain in the ſame ſtate as they were at the time when it was made. [4] Id. Ib. Lewis upon notice that the Legate's Excommunication of him would be confirmed by the Pope, agrees to a Truce.

Walter of Coventry is more particular in his Account of the occaſion of this Truce, for tho' divers other Writers impute it only to Prince Lewis's earneſt deſire to go over to ſollicite his Father for freſh Recruits; yet this Author gives us a better Reaſon for it, which is, That about this time a Great Council or Synod was held at Melun in France, by the Pope's Nuncios, who threaten'd to put that Kingdom under an Interdict, unleſs King Philip would recall his Son out of England; upon which the King preſently ſummon'd him to come over, and be himſelf in Perſon at that Council: [5] Wherefore the Prince having declared the Neceſſity of his Abſence for a ſhort time, and ſworn to return before the Expiration of the Truce, he in the beginning of Lent ſet ſail for France. Walter of Coventry's Account of the true Reaſons of this Truce. [5] Id. Ib. Lewis during the Truce goes over into France.

[1] But his Abſence was ill reſented by thoſe Engliſh Noblemen who took his part; for almoſt ſo ſoon as his Back was turn'd, many of them both Earls and Barons, (as William Longeſpee Earl of Salisbury, William Earl of Arundel, William Earl of Warren, and William, Son of the Earl-Mareſchal,) deſerting him, return'd to their Allegiance, and afterwards firmly adhered to King Henry, which very much weakned the French Prince's Party. [1] Id. Ib. As ſoon as he is gone over, the Earl of Salisbury and divers other Noblemen, return to their Allegiance.

The ſame Author further adds, That theſe Noblemen were chiefly brought over by the Legate's perſuaſions, who promiſed them Remiſſion of all their Sins, if they would now engage for the King; and that thoſe that fought in his Quarrel, ſhould have the ſame Privileges, as thoſe that made War in the Holy Land againſt Infidels; whereupon the Legate not only took the Sign of the Croſs upon his Habit, (as it was the manner of thoſe who went to Jeruſalem,) but alſo the Biſhops and Abbots did the like, and preſently marched out with him to the War; the Legate likewiſe again Excommunicated all thoſe who ſtill held with the Barons; moſt of whom deſpiſed the Sentence, ſaying, That the Pope being blinded with Avarice and Ambition, perverted all Right; That his Legate contrary to his Character marched out to War, and under colour of Abſolutions exacted great Sums of Money from thoſe Churches and Monaſteries, which he had never viſited; a great deal of which was indeed too true, yet we may obſerve how deplorable the Eſtate of England was at this time, whilſt it was ſo divided againſt it ſelf. And that upon Religious, as well as Secular Motives.

[2] The Abſence of Prince Lewis highly encouraged and ſtrengthened the Royal Party, ſo that during that time, they recovered the ſtrong Caſtles of Marlbridge, Farnham, Wincheſter, Chicheſter, and other Places, which were many of them demoliſhed; but on the very day whereon the Truce was to expire, Prince Lewis arrived at Sandwich, bringing over with him the Young Earl of Perche, and many [2] Id. Ib. Lewis during his Abſence loſes many Caſtles.

Anno Dom. MCCXVII.

many other Noblemen, beſides Common Soldiers; but he ſuffer'd a great Loſs and Damage in his Paſſage over, for the Mariners of the Cinque-Ports having now declared for the King, ſet upon him, and at Sea took divers of his Ships; wherefore the Prince, as ſoon as he landed, burnt Sandwich in Revenge, and going to London, was received with great ſatisfaction, by thoſe that ſtill continued firm to his Intereſt; and they put him upon undertaking a conſiderable Enterprize, for the doing of which a fair Opportunity now offer'd it ſelf.

He arrives at Sandwich, attended by the Earl of Perche, &c.

But being aſſaulted by the Mariners of the Cinque-Ports, he burns Sandwich, as ſoon as he Landed.

[3] For ſome time after the Feaſt of Eaſter was over, at the Inſtigation of William Earl-Mareſchal the Protector; Randulph Earl of Cheſter, William Earl of Albemarle, William Earl of Ferrars, Robert de Vipont, Brian de Liſle, William de Cantelupe, Philip Marc, Robert de Gaugi, Faukes de Brent, and his Caſtellans, with many other Gariſon Soldiers, muſter'd their Forces to beſiege the Caſtle of Mont-ſorel, whereof Henry Braibroc was Governor, and with whom were Ten ſtout Knights, and many common Soldiers. During the Siege there were ſeveral vigorous Aſſaults made and briskly return'd, but the Beſieged being very hard preſſed, ſent to Saher Earl of Winton, Lord of the Caſtle, who was then at London, for Relief; He applied himſelf to Prince Lewis (now lately return'd) deſiring his immediate aſſiſtance to raiſe the Siege; whereupon they agreed to ſend ſuch a Force, as might not only Relieve the Caſtle, but alſo ſubdue the adjacent Country; and ſtraight there went out of London Six hundred Knights, and above Twenty thouſand Men well arm'd, who were all greedy of Plunder; the Chief of them were the Earl of Perche, Mareſchal of France, (a young Man of great Courage) Saher Earl of Winton, Robert Fitz-Walter, and many others, that were look'd upon as moſt fit for that Expedition; they ſet forth the Laſt of April, and marched firſt towards St. Albans, Burning and Robbing both Towns and Churches, ſpoiling Men of all Ranks and Conditions, and cruelly tormenting them, on purpoſe to force from them exceſſive Ranſoms; [4] Neither did they ſpare the Abbey of St. Albans, notwithſtanding a little before the Abbot had ſatisfied Prince Lewis, as you have heard already. From thence they marched to Dunſtable, where they plunder'd the poor Monks, and with their polluted Hands ſnatched away the Holy Reliques from the Altar; and then after many Spoils and much Rapine, they marched to the Caſtle of Mont-ſorel, and raiſed the Siege without any Oppoſition; and the Earl of Cheſter who commanded there in chief, drew off his Forces to Nottingham; from Mont-ſorel the Barons marched to Lincoln, and ſet down before the Caſtle, which Gilbert de Gant had a long time in vain beſieged, and made many Aſſaults, but was vigorouſly repulſed. [5] In the mean time Prince Lewis took his opportunity again to beſiege the Caſtle of Dover, but he could not take it, becauſe the main ſtrength of his Army was then in the North, employed in the Siege of the Places already mention'd.

[3] M. P. p. 293. The Earl of Cheſter and other Noblemen beſiege Mount-ſorel.

The Gariſon being put hard to it, ſend to Lewis for Relief.

Who thereupon ſends down a conſiderable Army, which commits great diſorder in their march.

[4] Id. ib. p. 294.

The Siege of Mont-ſorel raiſed; and Lincoln-Caſtle beſieged by the Confederate Barons.

[5] Wal. Cov. ib. Prince Lewis again beſieges Dover-Caſtle, but in vain.

[1] While theſe things were tranſacting, thoſe of the King's Party foreſaw the great Loſs they muſt ſuſtain, if Lincoln-Caſtle ſhould be taken by the Confederate Barons; and therefore William Earl-Mareſchal, by the Advice of Guallo the Legate, and Peter Biſhop of Wincheſter, and others who then managed the Affairs of the Kingdom, ſummon'd all the King's Caſtellans and Knights, with thoſe that were in Garriſon in divers parts, to meet at Newark on Whitſun-Tueſday, and go along with them to raiſe the Siege of Lincoln-Caſtle; they all ſhewed a great readineſs to fight with the Excommunicated French (as they call'd them) and very joyfully met at the Place and Day appointed; with them went alſo the Legate, and many other Prelates in Perſon, to ſubdue with their Prayers as well as their Arms, all thoſe that were diſobedient to the King, and Rebels to the Pope; when they were all come together, they made up Four hundred Knights, and Two hundred and Fifty Croſs-bow-men, but Eſquires or Horſemen without number, who if neceſſity required, were able to ſupply the Place of Knights; the Chief were William Earl-Mareſchal, and William his Son, Peter Biſhop of Wincheſter, a Prelate well ſkill'd in Martial Affairs, Ranulph Earl of Cheſter, (and the reſt of thoſe Knights who went with him to Nottingham) William Earl of Salisbury, with many other Earls and Barons, moſt of whom being already named, it would be tedious to repeat them; all theſe with divers Governors of Caſtles, well Exerciſed and Experienced in Military Diſcipline, ſtayed Three days at Newark for the refreſhment of their Men and Horſes, where they were Confeſſed, and (as they ſuppoſed) very well fortify'd themſelves by the receiving of the Euchariſt, as a Guard againſt the Aſſaults of their Enemies.

Anno Dom. MCCXVII.

The Earl-Mareſchal ſummons all the Gariſons to unite their Forces to raiſe the Siege of Lincoln.

Whereupon a great Army is aſſembled at Newark; with the Names of the chief Commanders.

[2] Then on Friday in Whitſun-week the Legate declared to them, the Injuſtice of the Cauſe, in which Lewis and the Barons his Adherents were now engaged, for which they had been Excommunicated, and ſeparated from the Unity of the Church, and at the ſame time he Excommunicated Lewis and all his Accomplices and Favourers by Name, eſpecially all thoſe that then beſieged Lincoln-Caſtle; but to thoſe who had undertaken this Expedition, he gave a full Pardon of all their Sins, with promiſe of Eternal Salvation if they died in this Service, which ſo animated the Army, that they joyfully marched towards Lincoln fearing nothing, but the Enemies flight before they came thither; when the Barons and Frenchmen that were in the City heard of their approach, they received the News with Scoffs and Laughter, thinking themſelves very ſafe; however Robert Fitz-Walter, and Saher Earl of Winton, went out of the City to obſerve the Motions, and Number of the King's Forces; and when they returned, they reported their march to be very orderly, and that they exceeded their own Army in Number, tho' they were indeed miſtaken in their Reckoning, taking thoſe that came up with the Baggage, and thoſe that follow'd the Camp to be all Soldiers; yet this Account gave no ſatisfaction to the Earl of Perch, and the reſt of the French Commanders, who would not believe them to be ſo many; wherefore they ſent out again to take a review of the King's Army, which marched in ſuch cloſe order, that the Scouts were miſtaken in their Obſervation, and returned back alike deceived and uncertain. The Conſults upon this were various, but at laſt it was agreed, that the Gates ſhould be lock'd up, and ſtrict Guards ſet to keep out the Enemy, and every one to be in readineſs to defend it, and in the mean time to Batter and Aſſault the Caſtle, which they thought could not long hold out.

[2] Id. p. 295. The Legate ſhews the Injuſtice of their Adverſaries cauſe, and declares them Excommunicated.

And grants a full Abſolution to all thoſe who undertook this Expedition.

Upon their approach to Lincoln the Confederate Barons ſend out the Earl of Wincheſter to obſerve their Strength.

The French not ſatisfied with his Account, ſend out other Scours; upon whoſe return they reſolve not to leave the Town.

Anno. Dom. MCCXVII.

[3] Id. Ib. Faukes de Brent enters Lincoln-Caſtle by a Poſtern, and aſſiſts the Beſieged.

[3] When the King's Army was come before that Quarter of the City where the Caſtle ſtands, the Governor within preſently by a private Meſſenger gave the chief Commanders an account of the State of the Place; and moreover told them, That if they would, they might enter at the Poſtern-Gate of the Caſtle, which was left open on purpoſe for them; Faukes de Brent accepted the Offer, and entered with his Croſs-bow-men, and the reſt that were under his Command, with their Bows, Arrows, and other Weapons, having firſt from the Caſtle wounded and unhorſed ſome of the moſt forward and valiant Barons that aſſaulted it, and thereby put them into ſome Diſorder; but Faukes thinking to take advantage of this, ſuddenly ſallying out upon the Enemies in the Town, narrowly eſcaped being taken Priſoner: During this Skirmiſh the reſt of the Army ſtormed the City in another Place, and the Beſieged not having the Courage ſo much as to make a Sally, the King's Forces ſeized the next Gate, and ſo got into the Town, though not without great loſs of Men. So ſoon as they were entred, there began a very ſharp Engagement in the Streets, but thoſe of the Baron's Party being ſoon overpower'd, they were all kill'd, or elſe taken Priſoners, ſo that the whole Burthen now lay upon the Earl of Perch and the Frenchmen, who being overcome by Numbers, and refuſing to take quarter of any Engliſh Traytor (as he call'd them) was there ſlain, and a great many were kill'd, by reaſon that the Southern Gate, by which they were to make their Eſcape, was kept ſhut with a great Bar, that but one Man could go out at once, ſo that few eſcaped by flight, and the far greater number were forced to yield themſelves Priſoners at diſcretion, of whom the chiefeſt were, Saher Earl of Winton, Henry de Bohun Earl of Hereford, Gilbert de Gant, (whom Prince Lewis had lately made Earl of Lincoln,) Robert Fitz-Walter, with divers others, for whoſe Names I refer you to my Author; and beſides theſe there were alſo taken near Four hundred Knights, not to mention Eſquires and ordinary Soldiers, and Townſmen of a vaſt Number; this Victory was obtained on the Nineteenth of May, being Saturday in Whitſun-Week.

The reſt of the Army ſtorm the City, and enter, upon which follows a ſharp Engagement for a time; till at laſt the Confederate French Forces being utterly routed, the City is taken.

[4] Id. Ib. The Town is plunder'd, and the K's Soldiers get a great Booty.

[4] The King's Soldiers here found great ſtore of rich Booty, both in Plate and Goods belonging to the Barons and Townſmen, all which fell to their ſhare; for the City being taken by Storm it was totally plundered, not ſparing the very Churches, nor ſo much as the Cathedral, becauſe the Chanons thereof were Excommunicated, for a ſmall Pretence would ſerve turn for Sacrilege, eſpecially when it was allowed of by the Pope's Legate, who was there in Perſon; and you may gueſs at the vaſt Riches of that Church, when one Geoffrey de Dreping the Precentor thereof, complain'd, that he had loſt Eleven thouſand Marks in Silver for his own ſhare.

Now when they had made an end of Plundering the Town, the Earl-Mareſchal commanded all his Caſtellans to return home with their Priſoners, and to keep them under a ſtrict Guard, till they knew the King's Pleaſure, who remain'd during all this Action with the Legate and a ſtrong Guard at Stow, about eight Miles ſhort of Lincoln: The next day the Earl went to give him notice of the Victory, which he received with great Joy, and the day following there came Meſſengers, who alſo brought him News, that the Enemies mies Garison had voluntarily quitted Mont-forel-Castle; whereupon the King commanded the Sheriff of that County with the Men thereof to pull it down, and demolish it, and so it remains a heap of Rubbish to this day. Anno Dom. MCCXVII. Vid. Gem. Bri. in Leicestershire.

[5] Then the King's Party being highly flush'd with this Victory, advanced forward, and subdued those Parts which held out against them, and taking all the Castles and Garisons in their way, marched up to London with a design to besiege it. [5] W. C. The K.'s Army marches towards London to besiege it.

[1] Prince Lewis hearing of this great Defeat, presently left the Siege of Dover-Castle in which he was then engaged, and retreating to *London forthwith sent Messengers to his Father the King of France, and to his Wife the Lady Blanche, to send him speedy Succours; but the King fearing to provoke the Pope if he should publickly assist his Son, who was then Excommunicated, left it wholly to the Princess his Wife, and she speedily sent away Three hundred valiant Knights, with a great many Soldiers, under the Conduct of Eustace, Sirnam'd the Monk, who was also appointed Admiral and Commander in Chief over the Fleet, as well as Land-Forces; but these great Preparations were not unknown to King Henry, and the Earl-Mareschal his Protector, who thereupon appointed Philip de Albiney, and John the Mareschal, with the Ships belonging to the Cinque-Ports, and many other Men of War to guard the Seas, and hinder the landing of the French, after whose embarking a brisk Gale of Wind drove their Fleet toward the Coast of England; the King's Ships (though fewer in number) met with them, but yet durst not set upon them in the Front, being Fourscore great Ships, besides Galleys and smaller Vessels, whereas the English were not above Forty in all; whereupon they resolved to steer another Course, therefore tacking about, and so getting Windward of them, they thereby gain'd a great Advantage; then there began a Bloody Sea-fight on the Coast of Kent, not far from the Isle of Thanet, when Philip de Albiney with his Archers making a great Slaughter of the French, and the English Vessels having the Wind, with their Bow-sprits armed with Iron, ran upon the French Gallies, and pierced them through, whereby many of them were sunk, and the English having a great deal of Quick-Lime in Powder on board, cast it up in the Air, which being carried by the Wind into the Eyes of the French, blinded them; so that the English being more skilful in Sea-Engagements destroyed them all manner of ways; at length the French seeing no hopes of Success, or even of Escape, some desperately leaped into the Water, whilst others yielded themselves Prisoners: Nor durst the French from that time engage with the English in a Sea-fight.

[1] W. G. M. P. p. 297. Lewis upon this ill News quits Dover, and sends to his Father for more Succors; but he not daring, the Princess his Wife sends over Eustace the Monk with a numerous Fleet.

Who being met at Sea by the K's Ships there begins a sharp Engagement.

The French Fleet is destroyed with most of the Men.

[2] Eustace the Monk, their Commander, being taken, offer'd a great Sum of Money for his Life, but Richard a Base-Son of King John calling him Wicked Traytor; told him he should never deceive any Man again with his false Promises, and so cut off his Head: This Man was at first a Monk, and having turned Seaman had been a great Pyrate; yet at last was made Admiral of the French Fleet, and having often changed sides according to Success, was for a long time a Terror not only at Sea, but to the adjacent Shores: There was a great deal of Spoil taken by the Seamen on board these Ships in Gold

[2] Id. p. 298. Eustace the Monk being taken, has his Head struck off by Richard base Son to K. John.

Much Spoil and a great many Prisoners then taken.

Anno Dom. MCCXVII. Gold and Silver, beſides good ſtore of Arms; and the Priſoners being put under ſtrict Guard, Philip de Albiney Commander in Chief in the late Fight, immediately gave the King notice of it, who thereupon return'd ſolemn Thanks to God.

[3] Id. ib. Lewis is much mortified at the News.

[3] When Prince Lewis received the News of this Defeat, it grieved him more than the late Overthrow at Lincoln, ſince it deprived him of the means of going off by Sea: So that from this time the King ſtill prevail'd, and Prince Lewis's Party grew weaker and weaker every day.

[4] Id. p. 298, 299.

[4] After this, the Earl-Mareſchal muſtering up a great Army of Knights and their Dependants marched to London, and began to block it up both by Land and Water; whereupon Prince Lewis finding himſelf reduc'd to great ſtreights, ſignified to the Legate and Mareſchal, That he would ſubmit to their Advice, and conſent to any thing conſiſtent with his own Honour, and without much prejudice to his Friends: And it happen'd well for him, that they on whom the Management of this Buſineſs lay, though they conſulted the King's Safety, yet did not deſire the entire Ruine of that Prince, but only to get him out of England; wherefore they ſent him certain Articles of Peace in Writing, to which if he would conſent, they engaged that he ſhould have free Paſſage and ſafe Conduct out of England; but if not, they would endeavour the deſtruction of him and all his Adherents; whereupon Prince Lewis and his Councellors accepted the Offer, and ſent to the Mareſchal and Legate to fix upon the Time and Place, that a ſpeedy Peace might be concluded between them; they appointed an Iſland in the River Thames, near the Town of Staines, where King Henry, the Legate, and Mareſchal, with many Others on the one ſide, and Lewis, with the Barons on the other ſide, met, and on the Eleventh of September agreed upon the Form of Peace following,

And thereupon offers a Treaty of Peace.

Articles of which are ſent him by the Earl-Mareſchal, and are ſo far accepted by the Prince, as that a Place of Treaty is appointed.

[5] Id. ib. The Articles which they agreed on.

[5] Firſt, Prince Lewis ſwore, that he and all with him that were Excommunicated would ſtand to the Judgment of Holy Church, and for the future would be Obedient to the Pope and Church of Rome; That he would forthwith depart the Kingdom of England, and never more return with any ill deſign during his Life.

Secondly, That he would endeavour what he could to induce King Philip his Father to reſtore to King Henry all his Rights beyond the Seas.

Laſtly, If his Father refuſed to do it, he himſelf would perform it if ever he came to the Crown; and that in the mean time he would immediately deliver to the King all thoſe Caſtles and Territories he had poſſeſſed himſelf of in England during this War.

[1] Id. ib.

[1] And the King of England for his part ſwore upon the Evangeliſts, together with the Legate, and Earl-Mareſchal, that they would reſtore to the Barons of England, and to all others of the Kingdom all their Rights and Inheritances, together with the Liberties they before enjoyed, for which there had aroſe ſo great Diſcord between King John and the Barons; neither ſhould it be any Damage or Reproach to thoſe, that had adhered to the one or to the other ſide: That as to all Priſoners, who had redeemed themſelves before this Peace was made, and had paid part of the Money for their Redemption; what was paid already ſhould not be return'd, turn'd, but what remain'd behind ſhould be remitted; and that all Priſoners either taken at Lincoln, or at Sea, whether of the King's or Prince Lewis's ſide, ſhould without any Difficulty or Ranſom be ſet at Liberty: But the Welſh Princes who had join'd with him, and the Barons being wholly omitted in theſe Articles, were left to the King's Mercy. Yet ſome of the * French Hiſtorians relate, that Lewis had a great Sum of Money paid him for reſtoring the Hoſtages he had taken of the Barons, which is certainly falſe, for Lewis was ſo far from ſtanding upon Terms, that he was glad to agree upon any Conditions; and as for Hoſtages, there could be nothing due from the King on that Account; but from the Barons his Enemies, whoſe Relations they were; but our Writers do not mention any Money paid for them, and therefore it is moſt likely they were delivered gratis, though they are not particularly mention'd.

* Paul. Æmil. in Phil. 2.

Theſe are the Principal Articles of this Peace, though indeed there is another Copy of it by way of Charter in * Dacheries Spicilegium, ſaid to be publiſh'd from an Original in the Chartulary of St. Giles, at Pont-Audomar; which differs in ſome things from that here ſpecified by our Author, as particularly in the three Firſt Clauſes, viz. of Prince Lewis's ſtanding to the Judgment of the Church; of his quitting the Kingdom, and never to return; of reſtoring to the King of England all his Rights beyond the Sea; all which are omitted in that Copy, and ſince this Agreement is no where elſe to be found, and that the Book in which it is printed is very ſcarce in England, I have added it at large at the end of this Work, for the benefit of the Diligent and Inquiſitive Reader.

* Tom 9. p. 171.

Another Copy of theſe Articles, which differ ſomewhat from the former.

[2] After this Prince Lewis coming Barefoot and Ungirt from his own Pavillion to that of the Legate, he and all his Followers were Abſolved, and ſo he returned to London, [3] where having borrowed Five thouſand Pounds Sterling of the Citizens to diſcharge his Debts, (the Poverty of the City being then ſo great, that it could not afford him any more) he was by the Earl-Mareſchal ſafely conducted to the Sea-ſide, and ſo paſſed over into France.

[2] Chron. Mailroſ. Lewis attends the Pope's Legate Barefoot to obtain his Abſolution.

[3] M. P. ib. He returns to London, and there borrows 5000 l. to pay his Debts, and then departs.

Here I cannot but obſerve with Walter of Coventry, that it was next to a Miracle, that the Eldeſt Son to the King of France, who brought ſo many Men over with him into England, and was poſſeſſed of the Capital City, and many of the chief Places thereof, and was alſo aſſiſted by ſo great a Part of the Clergy and Nobility, ſhould be ſo quickly ſent out of England; but it will not appear ſo great a wonder, if, beſides Prince Lewis's late ill Succeſs both by Sea and Land, we alſo conſider, Firſt, The Hatred and Diſtruſt of the Engliſh Nobility againſt the French Nation; Secondly, The Love and Compaſſion many of them had for young King Henry, from whom they hoped better things than from his Father; and Laſtly, The Fear and Terror of the Pope's Excommunication, which not only hinder'd moſt of the Clergy from joining with Lewis, but brought over ſeveral of the Great Earls and Barons to the King's Party; tho' this were indeed a good Effect of a bad Cauſe, the King being then looked upon as the Pope's Vaſſal.

The Reaſons of Lewis's making this Peace.

[4] Id. ib. The King returns to London, and is received with great Joy.

The ſame [4] Author likewiſe tells us, that immediately after Prince Lewis's departure, the King came to London, and was received with as much Pomp, as the State of Affairs would at that time

Anno Dom. MCCXVII. time afford, and then also the Homages and Fealties of the Kingdom were again renewed, and there the King's Guardians, with the Chief Men of the Nation, held frequent Consultations concerning the Settling and Reforming the Kingdom; for it was no easie matter to satisfy so many Men's Desires and Expectations, as also to appease the Rancour and Animosities of different Parties against each other, the remainder of which they now vented in frequent Tornements, wherein between Jest and Earnest they expressed their former Animosities.

As for Ecclesiastical Affairs, [5] notwithstanding the late General Pardon of all Offences during the War, yet all Bishops, Priors, and other the Clergymen who assisted or favoured Lewis and the Barons, and in particular Simon de Langton, and Gervase de Hobrugge, who caused Divine Service to be performed by such as were Excommunicated, were all excepted from the Benefit of this Pardon, and being deprived of all their Benefices were forced to trudge to Rome to seek for Absolution: But soon after Lewis's Departure the Legate sent Inquisitors all over England, and whosoever of the Clergy was found to have been the least engaged, or inclin'd to Lewis and his Party, of what Order and Dignity soever they were, they first suspended them, and then sent to the Legate, who deprived them of all their Benefices, and bestowed them on his Clerks. Hugh Bishop of Lincoln paid to the Pope's use a Thousand Marks, and a Hundred to the Legate, for his Bishoprick; whose Example many of the Bishops and other Religious Persons followed, both of the Regular and Secular Orders, and empty'd their Purses to obtain the Legate's Favour, who thereby heaped up a vast Sum of Money for the use of the Pope his Master, so that he was always sure to gain, whoever lost.

[1] C. M. The King of Scots is also absolved, and delivers up Carlisle for the King's use.

[1] Also towards the End of this Year the King of Scots was Absolved from his Excommunication by the Archbishop of York, and Bishop of Durham, by the Legate's Authority committed to them for that purpose; and then also the Archbishop went to Carlisle, and took possession of it for the King of England: After this the King of Scots going to Northampton was there received by King Henry and the Legate, with great Honour; and on the Saturday before Christmas-Day, did his Homage for the Earldom of Huntington, and the rest of the Territories which his Predecessors held of the Kings of England. And having thus made his Peace with the King and the Legate, he return'd home, though the Interdict was not yet taken off his Kingdom, till the Beginning of the Year following.

That King does Homage to K. Henry.

As for other Ecclesiastical Affairs this Year affords none, but such as being connected with the Civil, have been already related; only [2] Pope Innocent the Third, a Prelate of a Great Spirit and Ambition, and who very well knew how to make the best Use of his Spiritual Thunderbolt of Excommunication for his own advantage, deceased on the Sixteenth of July, and was succeeded by Cardinal Cinsius, under the Name of Honorius the Third.

King

King * Henry now kept his Chriſtmaſs at Northampton, where Faukes de Brent ſupplied him with all Neceſſaries during that Feſtival; not long after which, ſeveral of the Nobility and others, (the chief of whom were William Earl of Albemarle, Robert de Vipont, Brian de Liſle, Hugo de Bailliol, Philip Marc, and Robert de Gaugy,) having in the time of War accuſtomed themſelves to Rapine, could not forbear Exerciſing the ſame in time of Peace; and therefore forcibly held divers Caſtles with the Lands and Poſſeſſions belonging to ſome Biſhops and Great Men, contrary to the King's Will and Command; but eſpecially Robert de Gaugy (though admoniſhed of it ſeveral times by the King) refuſed to yield up the Caſtle and Town of Newark to Hugh Biſhop of Lincoln; whereupon the Earl-Mareſchal at the King's Command, raiſed an Army, and beſieged the Caſtle; and after eight days Siege, Robert de Gaugy capitulated with the Biſhop to deliver the Caſtle to him, upon payment of an Hundred Pounds Sterling for the Victuals that were in it; hereupon the Biſhop with the King's conſent accepted the Terms, and ſo the Siege was raiſed, and every one went to their own Homes.

Anno. Dom. MCCXVIII.

* Id. p. 300. Several of the Nobility having poſſeſs'd themſelves of other Men's Caſtles and Eſtates, would keep them, notwithſtanding the King's Commands to the contrary.

But the Earl-Mareſchal raiſing an Army makes Robert de Gaugy ſurrender the Caſtle of Newark.

This Year [3] on the Eighteenth of February the Protector wrote in the King's Name to all Sheriffs to make Proclamations in their ſeveral Counties, that all Clerks that had adhered to Prince Lewis and were therefore Excommunicated, and not Abſolved, ſhould be Baniſhed, and if they departed not the Realm before Mid-Lent, they were to be impriſon'd; and ſuch as were Abſolved, if they ſtill remain'd Friends to Lewis, they were however to be impriſon'd: The King alſo wrote on the Two and twentieth of the ſame Month to the Sheriffs of the ſeveral Counties, for the better ſatisfying Mens Minds, that they ſhould look to the Obſervation of the Charters of Liberties and the Foreſts, and ſee all Lawful Caſtles rebuilt that were demoliſhed during the War. Theſe Letters are not to be found in our Hiſtories, but remain upon Record in the Tower on the Clauſe * Roll of this Year.

All Clerks who had adher'd to P. Lewis, and not Abſolved, are Baniſhed the Kingdom.

The K. writes to the Sheriffs to ſee the Charters of Liberties and Foreſts ſtrictly obſerved.

Alſo [4] by another * Clauſe Roll of this Year it appears, that on the Sixteenth of March, there was a Treaty of Peace between the King's Commiſſioners, and Llewellyn Prince of North-Wales, who then received into his Cuſtody from Gualo the Pope's Legate, the King's Caſtles of Caermarthen and Caerdigan, with their Lands and all Appurtenances, in the Preſence of Peter Biſhop of Wincheſter, William Mareſchal Earl of Pembroke, and many other Biſhops, Earls, and Barons there named, and others not named, to hold and keep them for the King's uſe, until he came of Age, and then they were freely to be delivered to him: He was alſo to hold the King's Courts in theſe Caſtles and Lands, as the King's Bailiff or Deputy, and do Right to the Engliſh according to the Engliſh Law, and to the Welſh according to their own Laws: And for the Performance of theſe things, he gave Pledges or Hoſtages, Mailgon the Son of Rees, and Rees the Son of Griffin, and Maredue the Son of Ren.

This Record is the more Remarkable, becauſe it gives us a greater Light into the Affairs of Wales, than [5] the Chronicles themſelves of that Country, which now ſuppoſe that Prince Llewellyn having taken the Part of the Barons againſt King John, and carrying on the War againſt King Henry, his Son, was left out of the Peace lately made,

A ſhort Account of the Welſh Affairs.

Anno Dom. MCCXVIII. made, and remain'd ſtill Excommunicated by the Pope, which tho' it be in great part true, (for this Prince had been Excommunicated with the Barons of England) yet he had managed his Affairs ſo cunningly, that having had mighty ſucceſs in South-Wales, and reduced great part of the Country under his Obedience, he obtain'd what Terms he pleaſed, ſo that by the laſt Articles of Peace made by the Mediation of the Biſhop of St. Davids on behalf of the Flemmings in Pembrokeſhire, all the Inhabitants of that Country, as well as of Ros, were to remain that Prince his Subjects; and tho' William Mareſchal Earl of Pembroke, had ſometime before got the Town of Caerleon, and made War againſt the Welſh, yet that Prince continuing ſtill Succeſsful, and winning divers Caſtles, and expelling the Engliſh that dwelt thereabouts, it is certain, that at this time Prince Llewellyn was not only Abſolved from his Excommunication, but alſo made his Peace with the King, and that upon very advantageous Terms, as we may obſerve from this Record, as well as the Welſh Chronicles.

[1] Id. ib.

The ſame Year was held a Common Council of the whole Kingdom, (tho' the exact time is not mentioned) as appears by a [2] Charter ſtill upon * Record in the Tower, commanding that no Letters Patents containing the Confirmation, Alienation, Sale, or Donation of any thing in perpetuity, ſhould be ſealed with the King's Great Seal, untill he were of full Age; and if any ſuch Charter or Letters Patents were ſo made and ſealed, they were notwithſtanding to be void. This Ordinance is witneſſed by Guallo the Pope's Legate, the Archbiſhops of Canterbury and York, the Earl of Pembroke Protector, and Hubert de Burgh, with Thirteen Biſhops, Nine great Abbots, Eight other Earls, and Fifteen Barons; which by the way ſhews the Reaſon why it is particularly mention'd in ſeveral Charters made in the beginning of this King's Reign, that by reaſon of his being under Age, and not having a Seal of his own, he had Seal'd with that of the Earl-Mareſchal his Protector, as may appear by the Records laſt cited.

[3] About the ſame time alſo the new Pope Honorius ſent King Henry a very kind and pious Letter, wherein he exhorts him to fear God in his Youth, that he may thereby encreaſe in all Virtue, and that he may eſpecially reverence Holy Church, and all its Miniſters; and then concludes with wiſhes for the good Government of his Subjects in Peace and Plenty, but eſpecially that he would keep none but Prudent and Virtuous Men about him; the reſt being only matter of Complement, I omit: This Advice is very Good, and it had been well for this Prince if he had always follow'd it.

The Pope writes the K. a very kind and inſtructive Letter.

[4] This Year Guallo the Pope's Legate left England, and returned to Rome in Auguſt or September, with a Great Sum of Money; and Pandulph Elect of Norwich ſucceeded him as Legate, and came to St. Pauls in London on the Monday after the Feaſt of St. Andrew next following: Alſo Stephen Archbiſhop of Canterbury having ſtayed beyond Sea till now, return'd into England.

[5] The King kept his Chriſtmaſs at Wincheſter, where he was provided with all things neceſſary for that Solemnity by the Biſhop of that See; not long after (Peace being now throughly reſtored and eſtabliſhed in England) Itinerant Juſtices were ſent through all Counties to revive the antient Laws, and to cauſe the late Charter of King John to be ſtrictly obſerved, and then Hubert de Burgh was made Juſtitiary of England: About the middle of May following, William Mareſchal Earl of Pembroke, deceaſed at London, whoſe Body was buried in the Church of the Knight's-Templars (now the Temple Church) where his Portraiture in a Coat of Mail is ſtill to be ſeen in the middle of the Round. He was a great Commander in War, which was ſufficiently teſtified by his Valour and Conduct in Ireland and Normandy, but eſpecially in the late Civil Wars in England; and that he was alſo as prudent a Councellor in Peace, the late good Succeſs of the King's Affairs, which was chiefly owing to his Conduct, ſufficiently declares; after his Death Peter Biſhop of Wincheſter was made Protector, and Govern'd with the ſame Moderation for a time.

His Character.

[1] As for the Foreign Affairs, Europe affords little, only Prince Lewis, Son to the King of France, after his Return home (to make the Pope ſome amends for his late Undutifulneſs in England) reſolved to undertake a Holy War againſt the Albigenſes of Tholouſe, and ſetting down before the City with a great Army, he beſieged it a long time, but all to no purpoſe, for after divers Aſſaults the French Army growing weaker and weaker, as well by Famine as a great Mortality of Men and Horſes, and having alſo loſt Simon Earl of Montfort their General, by the Blow of a Stone from an Engine, which ſtruck him on the Head, the Prince was at laſt forced to raiſe the Siege, and ſo return home with no great Reputation.

[1] M.P. p. 309. Lewis, Son to the K. of Fr. makes War againſt the Albigenſes of Thouſe, but returns with Diſhonour.

[2] Nor can I omit giving you ſome account of what was done in the Cruſado, or Holy War, agreed upon near two years ſince in the late Lateran Council. For John King of Jeruſalem, and the Duke of Auſtria, with a great Multitude of People, having the Year before invaded Egypt, and beſieged the Caſtle of Damiata, lying in the Mouth of the River Nile, they at laſt took it, tho' not without much difficulty; then carrying on the Siege to the City it ſelf (notwithſtanding divers endeavours of the Saracens to relieve it) it was taken at laſt in the Month of November by Storm, with a vaſt Plunder of Gold, Jewels, and other rich Commodities, which were all divided among the Soldiers; but the Chriſtians had but a ſmall time to rejoice for this Victory, as you will hear anon.

[2] Id. p. 300. & dein A ſhort Account of what was done this Year againſt the Saracens in Egypt.

I have nothing more to note at preſent concerning this Holy War, [3] but that Saher de Quincie Earl of Wincheſter, Ranulph Earl of Cheſter, William Earl of Arundel, and Robert Fitz-Walter, with divers other Barons, now took upon them the Croſs, and went this Year towards the Holy-Land; the firſt of whom died there, and few of the reſt ever return'd again alive.

Anno Dom. MCCXX.

[4] King Henry kept his Chriſtmaſs at Marleburgh, being ſtill under the Protection of Peter Biſhop of Wincheſter; and at Whitſuntide following (being the Seventeenth of May, and the Fifth Year of his Reign) he was again ſolemnly Crown'd at Weſtminſter, by Stephen Archbiſhop of Canterbury, in the preſence of the Clergy and Laiety of the whole Kingdom: This Ceremony was renewed, becauſe the former Coronation at Glouceſter was not ſo ſolemnly perform'd as it ought to have been, by reaſon of the turbulency of the Times, as alſo for want of a Crown of Gold. But Walter of Coventry farther informs us, that the King was now Crown'd with St. Edward's Crown, and that the Coronation-Oath for maintaining the Laws and Liberties of the Church and Kingdom was again adminiſter'd; after this, at the Feaſt of St. Barnabas, the King went on Progreſs into the North, and met Alexander King of Scots at York, where a Marriage was agreed upon between the ſaid King and Joane, Siſter to King Henry; and ſo a Firm Peace being eſtabliſhed between them, the King of Scots return'd home, but the Marriage was not conſummated till the Year after.

[5] Alſo King Henry this Year by ſurprize ſeized the Caſtles of Rockingham and Sanney, againſt the Will of William Earl of Albemarle who then held them: Walter of Coventry gives us a particular Account of this Action, to this Effect, That the King (with his Governors) now making his Progreſs about the Kingdom, to ſee who would quietly ſurrender the Caſtles which his Father had committed to their cuſtody, found that through all Places of the Kingdom where he went, he was not denied Entrance into any Caſtle, but that of Rockingham, which William, the late Earl-Mareſchal, had committed to the Cuſtody of this Earl of Albemarle; yet the former had repented his doing it, ſince there aroſe ſuch great Complaints before his Death of the Violence done by thoſe that kept that Caſtle, to all ſorts of Men; wherefore the King laid hold of that Opportunity to remove this Grievance: for ſummoning in the Country to his Aſſiſtance, they preſently join'd with him, hoping now to be delivered from their former Oppreſſions; but when thoſe within the Gariſon ſaw themſelves ſtreighten'd, and being unable to hold out long for want of Proviſions, they quietly ſurrender'd it up to the King's uſe. But this, I ſuppoſe, gave the Earl of Albemarle a pretence of falling into a freſh Rebellion, as he did not long afterwards.

[5] Id. p. 310. The K. takes the Caſtle of Rockingham from the Earl of Albemarle; and the Reaſon why.

[1] This Year affords nothing conſiderable in Eccleſiaſtical Affairs, but that Hugh, late Biſhop of Lincoln, who died in the beginning of King John's Reign, was now Canonized for a Saint by the Pope's Bull, in regard of the many Miracles which are ſaid to be done by him.

[3] Sometime after this, the New Building of the Abbey-Church of Weſtminſter, then called the Chapel of St. Mary, was began, the King himſelf Laying the First Stone, which has continued ever ſince to our times. Anno Dom. MCCXX. [3] Ib. M. P. Matt. Weſt.

The Abbey-Church at Weſtminſter began to be new Built.

King Henry at Chriſtmaſs kept his Court at Oxford, with the Earls and Barons in great Solemnity; [4] when William de Forz, Earl of Albemarle, ſeeking to diſturb the Peace of the Kingdom, without the King's knowledge, left the Court, and retired to his Caſtle of Biham in Lincolnſhire; where after ſome few days, having gather'd together many armed Men, he came in a Hoſtile manner to the Town of Tenham and plundered it, and cauſed the Grain of the Chanons of Bridlington to be carried into the Caſtle of Biham; he likewiſe Plundered the Town of Deeping, as alſo ſeveral other Towns in thoſe Parts, and by grievous Torments forced the Inhabitants to redeem themſelves: It was ſaid, That Faukes de Brent, Philip Marc, Peter de Maſon, and Engelard de Athie, were the chief Encouragers of this Action; and privately ſent him Men to diſturb the Publick Peace. Anno Dom. MCCXXI. [4] M. P. Ib.

The Earl of Albemarle fortifies himſelf in the Caſtle of Biham, and does a great deal of Miſchief in the Countrey adjacent.

Faukes de Brent and others ſuppoſed to have excited him to this Action.

[5] In the mean time, the Great Men of England having met the King at Weſtminſter to treat of the Affairs of the Kingdom, the Earl of Albemarle was ſummoned to appear, and pretending to come, he went privately to the Caſtle of Fortheringay in Northamptonſhire, which was then held by the Chief Juſtitiary, and having took it, Gariſon'd it with Soldiers, and then return'd to Biham-Caſtle, which he new Fortified. But ſo ſoon as the King and Council had heard of this Inſolence, a Great Army was raiſed, and preſently ſent to beſiege the Caſtle; and after ſome time, the Beſieged ſeeing no hopes of Relief or Eſcape, ſubmitted themſelves to the King's Mercy on the Eighth of February, who commanded that they ſhould be all kept Priſoners till further Order; at laſt the Earl of Albemarle having before eſcaped out of the Caſtle, and withdrawn himſelf ſomewhere elſe, (being now ſenſible of his Folly) was introduced to the King's Preſence by the Archbiſhop of York, and at the Interceſſion of Pandulf the Legate, the King was reconciled to him, becauſe he had formerly been faithful both to the King his Father and Himſelf; then all the Knights, and other Horſemen or Servants were ſet at Liberty, which afterwards gave Encouragement to others to Rebel, and ſo expect the ſame favour. [5] Id. ib.

The E. of Albemarl is ſummon'd to appear before the K. but inſtead of that, he ſeizes Fotheringay-Caſtle.

The K. raiſes an Army, and beſieges Biham-Caſtle, which is ſurrender'd to Mercy.

The E. of Albemarle ſubmits himſelf, and is reconciled to the K.

Walter of Coventry is ſomewhat more Particular in the Relation of this Rebellion, and ſays, that the Earl had the Confidence upon his Fortifying theſe Caſtles, to ſend his Letters of Safe-Conduct to the Mayors of moſt of the Cities of England, whereby he gave them notice, that all Merchants and Tradeſmen might have free Liberty of paſſing by his Caſtles, and of Buying and Selling at them; but GOD diſappointed his Deſign, for the Legate immediately Excommunicated the Earl and all his Accomplices, which caſt ſuch a Terror, that none of the Diſcontented Nobility durſt join with him; and thereupon the Earl of Cheſter, and other Noblemen, did all they could to mediate a Reconciliation between the King and the Earl, tho' in vain; yet ſeeing himſelf like to be Beſieged, he quitted Biham-

[3] M. P. Ib. William Biſhop of London reſigns his Biſhoprick, and Euſtace de Faukenbrege ſucceeds him.

[3] This Year affords very few Eccleſiaſtical Affairs, only William Biſhop of London reſigning his Biſhoprick, Euſtace de Faukenbrege, Treaſurer of the Exchequer, was choſen Biſhop of that See, on the Twenty Seventh of April. I take notice of this, to let the Reader obſerve, That all the Great Offices of the King's Revenue were now executed by Churchmen.

[5] Id. Ib. A Council held at London to compoſe the Differences between Hubert de Burgh and the Earl of Cheſter.

[5] This Year the King kept his Chriſtmaſs at Wincheſter, where Peter Biſhop of that City entertain'd him during that Feſtival. Immediately after the Octaves of Epiphany, (as Walter of Coventry informs us) Stephen Archbiſhop of Canterbury ſummon'd moſt of the Biſhops and Great Men of England to a Council at London, to compoſe ſome Differences between Hubert de Burgh the King's Juſticiary, and William Earl of Salisbury on the one Part, and Ranulph Earl of Cheſter on the other; for it was much ſuſpected, that ſome Foreigners who loved Civil Diſſentions more than Peace, endeavoured to perſuade the Earls laſt mentioned to diſturb it: Wherefore the Archbiſhop pitying the King's tender Years, and Inexperience, with the Conſent of his Suffragan Biſhops threatned to Excommunicate all thoſe that ſhould offer to break the Peace of the Kingdom; ſo that by his Mediation both Parties were reconciled. I take notice of this, becauſe it ſhews the great Power of the Archbiſhop of Canterbury at that time, who not only took upon him to ſummon the Biſhops, but the Temporal Lords likewiſe to a Council.

[1] M. P. p. 315. A notorious Riot happen'd at London on a ſlight Occaſion.

[1] This Summer a Notorious Riot happen'd in the City of London, upon a very ſlight Occaſion; a great Wreſtling Match was appointed between the Citizens and the Country-People near adjoining, on St. James's Day, wherein the Citizens were Conquerors, which was much ſtomached by the Steward of the Abbot of Weſtminſter; he therefore appoints another Meeting at Weſtminſter on the

the First of August following, where they that got the Better were to have a Ram for their Prize, to which the Citizens flocked in great numbers; but soon found they had somewhat else besides Naked Men to contend with, for the Steward and his Assistants being armed, came upon them unawares, wounded many, and put the rest to flight. Anno Dom. MCCXXII.

[2] Upon this the Citizens returned into the City meditating a Revenge, and met in great Numbers; Serlo, the Mayor, hearing of these Tumultuous Proceedings, came to them, and advised them to make their Complaint of the Injury they had received to the Abbot of Westminster, and if he would punish the Offenders, to take that for sufficient Satisfaction; but one Constantine, Sirnam'd Fitz-Arnulf, a Popular Citizen, opposed this Method, telling them, the Abbot and his Steward deserved to have their Houses pulled down, and levelled with the Ground; this Council was approved of, and endeavoured to be executed by the Rabble, many Houses being pull'd down, which I take the more notice of, because Dr. Brady in his History (misunderstanding this Passage in our Author) writes, as if the Dwelling-House of the Abbot of Westminster, had been destroy'd; whereas our Author (as also Matt. Westminster) only says, they did the Abbot great damage in destroying some of his Houses, or Tenements.

[2] Id. Ib. The Mayor strives to quiet the Tumult, but is opposed by one Constantine a Citizen.

But since the Doctor here omits something I think very material, I shall add what our Author farther relates of this Story, viz. That this Constantine as he led the Mob, cryed with a loud Voice, Mount-joy, Mount-joy, God help us, and our Lord Lewis; which Trayterous Speech very much exasperated the King's Officers, and provoked them to a more severe Punishment of this Offence: For when Hubert de Burgh the Justitiary had notice of these Riotous Proceedings, he came to the Tower with some Troops of Soldiers, and Commanded the Principal Citizens immediately there to appear before him, and inquired who were the Authors of this Sedition, and who they were that durst presume to break the King's Peace; Constantine answered, They had done no less than they ought, and that they would stand by it; it seems he trusted too much to the Oath which had been mutually sworn by King Henry and Prince Lewis, that the Partakers on both sides should be indemnified; but when the Justitiary had heard this insolent Speech of his, he dismissed all the rest besides Constantine and his Nephew, and one Geoffrey, that join'd in Constantine's Proclamation, and these Three he order'd to be hang'd the next Morning; then Faukes de Brent with a strong Guard carried them by Water to the Place of Execution; but when the Rope was about Constantine's Neck, he offer'd Fifteen Thousand Marks of Silver for his Pardon, (for it seems he was very rich) tho' it was to no purpose, the Execution being perform'd without any Noise, or knowledge of the Citizens.

[3] Id. Ib. Constantine makes a Trayterous Proclamation to stir up the Mob.

Hugh de Burgh goes into the Tower, and there enquires into the late Riot.

* Reg. Wen. MS in Bib. Cotton.

Constantine justifying what he had done is ordered to be Hang'd, together with Geoffrey his Nephew, and another Person.

Constantine at his Execution offers 15000 Marks for a Pardon.

Then the Justitiary and Faukes (above-mentioned) with a strong Guard of armed Men went into the City, and whomsoever they found guilty of the late Sedition were clapp'd up in Prison, some of them having either their Hands or Feet cut off, were let go; wherefore many being afraid of the like Punishments, fled out of the City, and never return'd thither any more: Yet the King was not satisfied with all this, but to be revenged upon the Citizens, he turn'd turn'd out all the Magiſtrates, and put in new ones; Matt. Weſtminſter adds, that this over great Severity, and ſudden Execution of ſo many conſiderable Perſons without due form of Law, (though they really deſerved the Puniſhment inflicted on them) render'd the Juſticiary and Faukes juſtly odious to the Citizens ever after.

Anno Dom. MCCXXII

[5] Id. ib. This Execution is afterwards alledged by King Lewis as a Pretence, why he would not obſerve the Oath he had made to K. Henry.

Nor can I omit, what [5] Matt. Paris further inſerts in this Relation, that Lewis, when afterwards King of France, made the Execution of theſe Traytors a Pretence, why he would not obſerve his Oath to reſtore to King Henry his Rights in France, alledging, That by the Articles of Peace, the Partakers of Lewis (among whom he would have had this Conſtantine and his Accomplices included) were to be indemnified, which was a very frivolous Pretence, ſince that Indemnity was intended only to include thoſe who had then taken up Arms againſt King Henry, not whoſoever ſhould Rebel againſt him, or raiſe Sedition for the future.

The K. makes Thirty Perſons to become bound for the good Behaviour of the City of London.

Immediately after this Riot, and Execution of theſe Incendiaries, the King named Thirty Perſons to be Security or Pledges for the Good Behaviour, Peace, and Faithful Service of the City of London, the Community (or Body-Corporate) whereof bound themſelves to the King by Charter, Sealed with their Common Seal, to deliver up thoſe Sureties to the King or Juſticiary, whenever they were called for; and if any of them died, to add others in their ſtead; ſo Arbitrary was the King's Power over the City of London in thoſe times. This is mention'd by no Hiſtorian, but the Recognizance is found upon *Record in the Tower, and is printed at large in the †Doctor's Appendix.

[1] M P. Ib. A Synod held at Oxford, and what was done there.

[1] As for Eccleſiaſtical Matters, Stephen, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, held this Year a General Synod of the Clergy at Oxford, in which many things were decreed for the Reformation of the Engliſh Church and Monaſtick Diſcipline, which being wholly Eccleſiaſtical, I refer the Reader to Sir Henry Spelman's Second Volume of Councils.

[2] Id. ib. Two Impoſtors condemn'd to be immur'd between four Walls.

[2] At this Synod a Man was ſeized and conven'd before them, who had made upon his Body certain Marks or Wounds like thoſe of Jeſus Chriſt, whom he alſo pretended to be; This wicked Impoſtor, being brought before the Biſhops aſſembled in this Council at Oxford, (according to Matt. Weſtminſter, or as Matt. Paris ſays, tho' not ſo likely, at Canterbury) was by them condemn'd to be immur'd till Death between four Walls; as was alſo a Woman who called her ſelf Mary his Mother.

[3] Id. p. 313. An Account of the Defeat of the Chriſtian Army in Egypt.

If we look into Foreign Parts, we find [3] from a Letter which Philip de Albiney (being then in the Holy-Land) wrote this Year to Ranulph Earl of Cheſter, who was now return'd from thence, that after the taking of the City of Damiata, the Chriſtian Army, under the King of Jeruſalem and Duke of Auſtria, would needs go from thence to find out the Sultan of Babylon, who lay Encamped a Day's march up the River Nile, which there divided it ſelf into two Branches, (and was then upon its Increaſe) whereupon the Sultan opening a Chanel that join'd the two Rivers, let the Waters in upon them, inſomuch that they ſtood up above the Knees, whereby their Proviſions were all ſpoiled; and this reducing them to almoſt a ſtarving Condition, the Chriſtian Princes were forced to make a Truce with the Sultan for Eight Years, and to ſet at Liberty all the Slaves

Slaves they had taken; and all the Advantage they received by it, was, that the Sarazens were likewiſe to ſet free their Chriſtian Slaves, and to deliver up that which was ſuppoſed to be part of the True Croſs, into the hands of the Chriſtians; as does further appear by [4] another Letter from P. de Mountacute, Maſter of the Templars, to the Prior of the ſame Order in England. Anno Dom. MCCXXII. [4] Id. p. 312.

[5] This Year the King kept his Chriſtmaſs at Oxford, and on the Thirteenth of January met his Barons in a Council or *Parliament at London; where the Archbiſhop of Canterbury and other Great Men requeſted, That he would be pleaſed to confirm the Liberties and Free Cuſtoms, for which the War was begun with his Father; urging moreover, that when Prince Lewis departed from England, both He and all the Nobility of the Kingdom had ſworn to obſerve, and cauſe to be obſerved all thoſe Liberties, and therefore the King could not in Reaſon and Juſtice refuſe to do it; whereupon William Briwere, one of the King's Councellors, replied, That the Liberties they deſired were violently extorted, and therefore ought not to be obſerved; but the Archbiſhop being much provoked at this reproved him, ſaying, If he loved the King, he would not hinder the Peace of the Kingdom: The King ſeeing the Archbiſhop ſo moved, aſſured him, that he had bound himſelf by Oath to preſerve their Liberties, and what he had ſworn to ſhould be obſerved; and having called his Council, he forthwith ſent his Letters to all the Sheriffs of the Kingdom, to make Enquiry by the Oath of Twelve Knights, or Legal Men in every County, what were the Liberties of England, in the time of King Henry his Grandfather, and to ſend a return thereof to London Fifteen Days after Eaſter; So that if the King had been as Obſtinate and Unadviſed as his Father, this Man's Advice might have produced another Civil War; but ſo long as he hearkned to the Council of this Archbiſhop, all things went well with him: yet when he began to give Ear to ſtrangers, (as he did ſome years after) nothing followed but perpetual Quarrels, which at laſt produced Civil Wars and Confuſion, as you will hear in due time. Anno Dom. MCCXXIII. [5] Id. Ib. *Colloquium. A Council, or Parliament, where the Great Men demand a Confirmation of the Liberties granted by the King's Father. The K. conſents to do it, notwithſtanding the Oppoſition of William Briwere, and thereupon iſſues his Writs to all the Sheriffs of England, to inquire and certifie what they were.

Yet the Contents of the Writ it ſelf (which directs this Inquiſition) do in ſome things differ from this Report of Matt. Paris; for according to this Writ, the Sheriffs were commanded to make Enquiry by the Oath of Twelve of the moſt Legal and Diſcreet Knights of their Counties, in a full County-Court, what Cuſtoms and Liberties King John his Father had granted the day in which the War began between him and his Barons, concerning Lands and other Things, within Burghs and without, and to cauſe them to be proclaimed, and obſerved in their Counties; and ordered this Inquiſition and Writ to be return'd to the King at Weſtminſter, on the Morrow of the cloſe of Eaſter; which Writ is ſtill upon *Record in the Tower. The Writ ſtill extant upon Record gives light to, and confirms the Hiſtory, though it d fer ſomewh from it. *Rot. Clauſ. 7 H. 3. M. 14. Dorſ.

This Year alſo (as Walter of Coventry informs us) there was a Poll-Tax granted in a Common-Council of the whole Kingdom, for the Succours of the Holy-Land; for every Earl Three Marks, for every Baron One Mark, for every Knight Twelve Pence, and from all that had Houſes One Penny. I take the more notice of this, *Vid. Dr. B's App nd. N. 149. The Common Council grant a General Tax for the Relief of the Holy-Land.

this, becauſe it is mention'd in no other Author; but whether this Council were the ſame in which there happen'd that Diſpute about the Confirmation of the Great Charter, I ſhall not determine; though it ſeems more likely to be another more General, and to which the Commons were likewiſe ſummon'd, as appears by thoſe who gave this Benevolence, being all ſorts and degrees of Perſons in England.

[1] M.P. p. 317. Llewellyn Pr. of Wales takes the Caſtles of the Earl-Mareſchal, and uſes great Cruelty to the Engliſh.

[1] Sometime after, whilſt William Mareſchal Earl of Pembroke, (Eldeſt Son of the former, deceaſed) was taken up in making War in Ireland, and ſubduing Hugh de Lacy and others to the King's Obedience, Llewellyn Prince of Wales laying hold of this Opportunity, took two of his Caſtles, and cutting off the Heads of all the Engliſh put Welſhmen into their Places: The Mareſchal having notice of what was done, return'd with great ſpeed into England, and forthwith Beſieged thoſe Caſtles, and retook them, and ſerved the Welſh in the ſame manner as had been done to the Engliſh before, and then marched into Llewellyn's Country, waſting all with Fire and Sword; and totally defeated the Welſh, by killing and taking Priſoners about Nine Thouſand, except a few who made their eſcape by flight.

The Mareſchal returns out of Ireland, retakes his Caſtles, and revenges the Injuries done by Llewellyn.

The Welſh Chronicles give a different Account of this War.

But the Welſh Chronicle (put forth by Dr. Powel) relates this Expedition far otherwiſe, and makes it to have ended much to the advantage of the Prince of Wales; for he ſays, That William Earl Mareſchal coming from Ireland, landed at St. David's with a great Army, and preſently laid Siege to the Caſtles of Abertivie and Caerdigan, and took them without any Reſiſtance, and from thence marching to Caermarden, likewiſe took that; which when Prince Llewellyn heard, he was much diſpleaſed at it, and ſent Griffyth his Son to put a Stop to the Earl's Succeſs; ſo he paſſing the River Tivie at Caermarden, was met there by Griffyth, who gave him Battel; but this proved very doubtful, for it laſted till Night, and then both Parties retreating, left the River between them; and after they had layn ſo for ſome time, Griffyth was fain to return home for want of Proviſions his Army conſiſting of near Nine thouſand Foot; Upon this the Earl went to Kilgarren, and there began to build a ſtrong Caſtle; preſently after which, receiving Letters from the King to come to ſpeak with him, he went away by Sea, and left his Army to finiſh the Work he had begun.

Then the King and the Archbiſhop of Canterbury being at Ludlow, ſent for the Prince of Wales, and would fain have brought him and the Earl to a Reconciliation, but that could not be effected, and ſo they parted; but when the Earl would have paſſed to Pembroke by Land with the Forces of the Earl of Derby, and Henry Pygot, Lord of Ewyas, the Prince ſent his Son to keep the Paſſage at Carmwylhion, and he himſelf came as far as Mabedryd.

The Earl Underſtanding this, return'd back to England, and the Prince went into North-Wales: But I could have wiſhed that ſome of theſe Authors would have told us the Reaſon of Prince Llewellyn's beginning this War, which appears to have been done without any, or but very ſmall Provocation.

But

But it ſeems, for all this relation of the Welſh-Chronicle, this Prince was ſometime after ſenſible of the Injury he had done the King, and ſo at length prevail'd to be reconciled to him, as appears by his Charter ſtill upon * Record in the Tower, and is cited by Dr. Brady, to this Effect, viz. That he had ſworn to give ſatisfaction to his Lord Henry King of England, and his People, within a reaſonable Time, to be prefixed by the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, for the Damage done them by his People, from the Day of the taking of the Caſtle of Kynardeſly unto the Day of his Abſolution; That is to ſay, Saturday the Seventeenth of October, in the Seventh Year of King Henry's Reign; and for the Performance hereof there were bound with him Mareduc the Son of Robert, and ſeveral others; with which Record agrees Walter Hemingford's Chronicle, which ſays, that this Prince Llewellyn finding himſelf too weak to maintain a War againſt King Henry, now deſired Peace, and it was granted him upon condition, that the Great Men of his Dominion ſhould do the King Homage, and that he ſhould quit his Right for ever in thoſe Caſtles with their Appurtenances which William the Earl-Mareſchal had lately taken from him; and alſo he obliged himſelf to make ſatisfaction for the Damage he had done the King's Subjects, and that for the Performance of theſe Articles he gave Hoſtages of the moſt Noble Perſons in his Country.

[2] This Year about the Feaſt of St. Peter ad Vincula, deceaſed Philip II. King of France, of a Feaveriſh Diſtemper, after a long Reign of Forty four Years. He was a Prince of great Prudence, Courage and Conduct, and was an equal Match in all thoſe reſpects with Henry and Richard, late Kings of England; and as much Superior to King John and his Son the preſent King Henry, as a Man perfect in Military and Civil Affairs could be, to the Former that was abſolutely devoted to his own Will and Pleaſure, and to the Other, as he was deſtitute of Prudence, Courage and Power: Therefore it is no great wonder if he extended his Territories farther than any of his Succeſſors were able to do for a long time after.

[2] M.P. p. 317. The Death of Philip King of France: His Character.

For though I grant that divers of them have carried their Conqueſts as far as Italy, Germany, and the Low-Countreys, yet they have for the greateſt part of them proved meer Temporary Acquiſitions, either recovered by Force, or elſe reſtored upon Treaties, to their right Owners, after long and expenſive Wars.

And though the French Writers do give this Prince the title of Auguſtus, yet it is evident that when the Lyon's Skin alone would not ſerve turn, he knew how to make it out with that of the Fox, doing more by Subtilty, Breach of Faith, and taking all manner of Advantages, than by down right Force and Power; which methods of Grandeur have been alſo follow'd by ſome of his Succeſſors, for the truth of which the Reader may conſult the Hiſtories of Antient as well as Modern Times. But to return again to the Subject we were treating of.

[3] Id. Ib. The K. ſends to Lewis the New King of France, to demand Reſtitution of his Dominions there, but receives no ſatisfactory Anſwer.

[3] When the King had notice of Philip's Death, he ſent the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, with Three other Biſhops to Lewis his Son, to demand the Reſtitution of Normandy, with all other his tranſmarine Dominions, according to his Oath when he left England; To this the French King anſwered, That he was juſtly poſ-ſeſſed of Normandy and thoſe other Dominions and Territories, and was ready to make it appear in his own Court, if the King of England would come thither, and ſtand to the Law; adding, That the King of England had alſo violated his Oath in putting thoſe of his Party whom he had taken at Lincoln to a grievous Ranſom; and likewiſe that thoſe Liberties, for which the War was begun, and which were granted and ſworn to at his departure, were not obſerved: Upon this, the Archbiſhops and Biſhops perceiving they could obtain no other anſwer, return'd into England, and gave the King an account of it.

Rad. de Cog. gives ſomewhat a different Account of this Tranſaction.

But Rad. de Coggeſhal gives us ſomewhat a different Account of this Tranſaction; as that upon this Ambaſſy, the King of France deſired time to give his Anſwer to theſe demands, till Eight days after the Feaſt of All Saints; and then at the time appointed, the King ſent two other Biſhops, (viz. Pandulph, the late Legate and now Biſhop of Norwich, and the Biſhop of Ely,) to receive his final Anſwer; but when they came into King Lewis's Preſence, and renewed their Demands, he ſeemed very much diſpleaſed, and alledged, That King John, the Father of Henry, had been deprived of all his Dominions in France for many juſt Cauſes, by the Sentence of all the Peers and Barons of that Kingdom; and alſo added divers Threats againſt King Henry himſelf, if he offer'd to perſiſt in thoſe Demands Which of theſe Two anſwers is neareſt to Truth, I ſhall not diſpute; only it plainly ſhews, that no Oath, though never ſo ſolemnly taken, (particularly when it concerns ſomewhat to be done in a time that ſeems remote) is able to bind Princes to act contrary to their preſent Intereſts, eſpecially when the General Good of their Kingdom is alſo concerned, as it was in this Caſe.

[4] M. P. p. 318. Many of the Great Men are highly diſpleaſed with Hubert de Burgh the Juſtitiary, and on what Grounds.

[4] This Year many of the Great Men of England made mighty Complaints againſt Hubert de Burgh the Juſtitiary, alledging, That he exaſperated the King againſt them, and did not duly adminiſter Juſtice; but that which more eſpecially provoked them, was, that thoſe Meſſengers he had ſent to Rome, were return'd with a Bull from the Pope, directed to the Archbiſhops of England, and their Suffragans, declaring the King to be of full Age, and that all the Affairs of the Kingdom ſhould be managed by Him and his Council; the Bull it ſelf was to this Effect, 'That by the 'Pope's Apoſtolick Authority, they ſhould declare to the Earls, Ba'rons, Knights, and all Others who had the Cuſtody of the King's 'Caſtles, Honours and Towns, that upon ſight of thoſe Letters they 'forthwith ſhould ſurrender them to the King; and whoever refuſed, 'they ſhould compel them by Eccleſiaſtical Cenſures. But notwithſtanding this Bull, the greateſt Part of the Earls and Barons (although admoniſhed by the Biſhops) did not render up their ſeveral Truſts, but conſpired together to put themſelves in Arms, to diſturb the Peace of the Nation, rather than give the King ſatisfaction in the Premiſſes.

Some other Cauſes of the Great Mens Diſpleaſure againſt the Juſtitiary, but chiefly becauſe he had over-reach'd them.

The Abbot of Coggeſhal agrees with this for the moſt part, bnt adds further, That Hubert de Burgh the Juſtitiary, preſuming too much upon the King's Favour, carried himſelf very ſeverely in his Acts and Judgments toward the other Noblemen of the Kingdom, who being ing thereupon extremely incenſed againſt him, did all they could to prevail with the King to remove him from his Place; Whereupon to give them ſome ſatisfaction, he took a Politick Courſe, and preſently demanded of his Juſtitiary the Cuſtody of thoſe Caſtles which he had received from him, ſuch as were that of Dover and the Tower of London, yet on this Condition, that the reſt of the Barons and Conſtables of Caſtles, ſhould in like manner deliver up the Cuſtody of their Caſtles into his Hands; which being ſurrender'd by moſt of them, the King reſtored to Hubert de Burgh all his ſaid Governments, but left the others deprived of theirs: This cauſed ſuch great Heart-burnings in the Barons againſt Him, that moſt of them forthwith withdrew themſelves from Court; which if it were true, though this Undutifulneſs of the Barons is no ways to be juſtified, yet certainly the King contributed very much toward it, by dealing thus Artificially and Partially with them: But this Method produced the like Effects, as ſuch ſeeming wiſe Councils commonly do, to compoſe things for the preſent, and afterwards make them ten times worſe. This Year does not produce any thing elſe conſiderable in England, only that John de Brenne, the Titular King of Jeruſalem, having had ill ſucceſs in Egypt, as you have already heard, came into England, to implore the King's aſſiſtance to recover his Territories in the Holy-Land.

Anno Dom. MCCXXIII.

[5] The next Year the King kept his Chriſtmaſs at Northampton together with the Archbiſhop of Canterbury and his Suffragans, and a great number of Military Men; but the Earl of Cheſter with his Faction kept that Feaſt at Leiceſter, ſwelling againſt, and threatning both the King and the Juſtitiary, becauſe he was commanded to deliver up the Caſtles and Lands he held in his Cuſtody: Whereupon the day following, the Archbiſhop and his Suffragans Excommunicated in general Terms all Diſturbers of the King and Kingdom, and Invaders of the Church, or its Rights, and then gave notice to the Earl of Cheſter and his Accomplices, that unleſs the next Day they reſigned into the King's Hands all the Caſtles and Honours, that belonged to the Crown, they ſhould all be Excommunicated by Name, as the Pope had commanded: Then the Earl, and thoſe that were with him, fearing the King's Power, and dreading the Church's Cenſures, came to Northampton, ſubmitted themſelves, and render'd the Caſtles and Honours that were in their Cuſtody into the King's Hands; However theſe Barons Indignation was not appeaſed, becauſe the Juſtitiary continued ſtill in his Office.

Anno Dom. MCCXXIV.

[5] M.P. p. 319. The Earl of Cheſter and divers of his Faction going about to diſturb the publick Peace, the Biſhops threaten to Excommunicate him with all his Adherents.

Of which Sentence they being afraid, ſubmit themſelves, and ſurrender their Caſtles.

The chief Authors of this Diſturbance were the Earls of Cheſter and Albemarle, John Conſtable of Cheſter, Faukes de Brent with his Caſtellans, Robert de Vipont, and ſeveral other Barons, who, being unwilling to reſign what they had unjuſtly acquired, endeavour'd to diſturb the Peace of the Kingdom.

[1] Lewis King of France being encouraged by theſe Domeſtick Diſſentions, declared War againſt King Henry on this Pretence, (as [2] the French Hiſtorians relate) That whereas Aquitain was held of the Crown of France by Homage, Henry of England being not hinder'd by Sickneſs, nor other neceſſary Occaſions, had neither appeared at K. Lewis's Coronation, nor excuſed himſelf

by

Anno Dom. MCCXXIV. by his Ambaſſadors, as he ought in Duty to have done; yet this was but a Pretence to pick a Quarrel, for he made no ſuch Demand when King Henry's Ambaſſadors were lately with him: But finding indeed that he had him now at an Advantage, he refuſed to reſtore what his Father had unjuſtly Conquered, and raiſing a vaſt Army Invaded Xantoigne, and Beſieged Rochel, offering the Citizens a great Sum of Money to ſurrender the Town, and ſwear Allegiance to him; the Rochellers ſeeing themſelves forſaken by the King of England, conſented to it, and delivered it up to the French King, who placing a Gariſon therein, return'd home without ſhedding one drop of Blood. Thus was that brave City, the Key of that Part of Poictou, loſt, for want of a ſufficient and ſpeedy Relief: Yet ſome of our own (as well as the [3] French) Hiſtorians alſo relate, that Savary de Maleon defended it very gallantly for a long time, and the latter alſo tell us, (what it ſeems ours do not) that he finding himſelf deluded by the Miniſters of the King of England, (who inſtead of Money to pay the Gariſon, ſent him a Barrel full of Old Iron) was obliged to ſurrender the Town on the Twenty Eighth of July, and that afterwards he was like to be queſtion'd, as if he had delivered it by Treachery; but not being willing to anſwer this Accuſation in England, where he had ſo many Enemies, he quitted King Henry's Service, and went over to the King of France, which is alſo confirm'd by ſome of our own Hiſtorians.

And takes Rochel.

[4] M. P. ib. Colloquium. A Parliament at Northampton, where the K. taking advice to recover his loſt Dominions is diſturbed by the Rebellion of Faukes de Brent; with the Occaſion of it.

[4] Then on the Octaves, that is, Eight days after Trinity, the King at a Council or *Parliament at Northampton, met the Archbiſhops, Biſhops, Earls, Barons, and many others, to treat about the Affairs of the Kingdom, as alſo to take the Advice of his Great Men concerning his Dominions beyond Sea, which the King of France had ſeized on, but the following Rebellious practice broke thoſe Meaſures; for at that time Martin de Patteſhulle, Thomas de Muleton, and Henry de Braibrock the King's Juſtices Itinerant, ſitting at Dunſtable upon Pleas of Novel-Diſſeiſin, no leſs than Thirty Verdicts were found againſt Faukes de Brent, in Tryals for Lands unjuſtly taken from their Owners, for which Violences he was Fined an Hundred Pounds to the King; which when Faukes was informed of he was ſo much Incenſed at it, that immediately he Fortified his Caſtle at Bedford, and from thence ſent out his Brother with ſome Armed Men to take the Juſtices, and bring them thither Priſoners; but they having notice of his Deſign, two of them made their Eſcape, only Henry de Braibrock was taken in his Flight, and being cruelly handled was kept Priſoner in the ſaid Caſtle, till it was taken. Matt. of Weſtminſter farther relates, That Faukes de Brent was then in ſecret Confederacy with the King of France, and raiſed this Diſturbance on purpoſe to hinder King Henry's intended Expedition thither; but this is not likely, ſince that King was ſo far from rewarding him for this Action, that he clapt him up in Priſon, ſo ſoon as he came over, as you will find anon.

[5] Id. Ib. The K. and his great Council reſolve to reduce the Caſtle by Force.

[5] But this is certain, That the King and his great Council, being highly Diſpleaſed at this Inſolence and Violence done to his Juſtitiary, unanimouſly reſolved to lay aſide all other Buſineſs, and by force of Arms to reduce the Caſtle; but firſt the King's Meſſengers ſummoned them within to ſurrender it, and were anſwered by

William

William de Brent, (Faukes his Brother, That they did not look upon themſelves obliged to deliver it, unleſs they were Commanded by their Lord ſo to do, becauſe they were not bound by Homage and Fealty to the King: This Sawcy Anſwer ſo highly exaſperated him, that he ordered the Caſtle to be immediately Beſieged, and threatned (if it was taken by Storm) not to ſpare one Man; whereupon the Archbiſhop and Biſhops Excommunicated Faukes and all that were Gariſon'd with him in the Caſtle; but neither the King's Threats, nor the Eccleſiaſtical Cenſures, could for a good while prevail with them to yield: But at laſt after many Attacks and Batteries with Warlike Engines uſed againſt it, and the loſs of a great many Mens Lives on both ſides, the Caſtle was ſurrender'd to diſcretion, after Nine Weeks Siege.

Anno Dom. MCCXXIV.

The beſieged refuſing to deliver it are Excommunicated.

The Caſtle is ſurrender'd after nine Weeks Siege, and Henry de Braibrock is ſet free.

[1] Upon this Henry de Braibrock, who was all this time kept a Priſoner in the Caſtle, was ſet at Liberty; but thoſe that were taken Priſoners, being Four and Twenty in all, both Knights and Eſquires, were hanged for their Rebellion in holding out ſo long, of whom William de Brent the Brother of Faukes was Chief: and then the King cauſed the Caſtle to be razed to the Ground, ſo that of all that Strong and Noble Structure, no ſign except the Mount remains at this Day; but the Scite and Lands about it were reſtored to William de Beauchamp, who lay'd claim to it: As for Faukes's Wife, the Lady Margaret Rivers, ſhe together with her young Son Thomas having no ways conſented to his Crime, was committed to the Cuſtody of the Earl of Warren.

[1] Id. ib.

William de Brent, and ſeveral other Perſons of Quality are Executed.

[2] There happen'd nothing elſe worth noting during this Siege; but that at this Great Council held at Bedford, the King had granted him for his late great Labour and Expences, as well from the Prelates, as Lay-men, throughout England, a Carucage of Two Shillings on each Plough-Land, and then the King granted to the Great Men to take Scutage, (viz.) from every * Knight's-Fee held of them Two Marks; and ſo they all return'd home well enough content.

[2] Id. p. 322.

The K. has a Scutage granted him by the Great Council for late Expences.

* Scuto.

But Walter of Coventry, who is more exact in his Account of this Tax, in Relation to the Clergy, tells us, That Stephen Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and his Suffragans, with all the Abbots, that then appeared, granted out of each Plough-Land of the Biſhops and Abbots that held by Barony, as alſo of their *Tenants, half a Mark; and of each Plough-Land held by Abbots and Priors, who did not hold by Barony, and their *Tenants, Two Shillings; and leſt any undue Cuſtom might ariſe by reaſon of this great Tax, the King granted to them all a Charter under his Seal, wherein he recited the ſaid Grant, and promiſed, That it ſhould not be drawn into Example for the future.

How the Clergy then Taxed themſelves and their Military Tenants.

* Hominum Suorum.

I have been the more Exact in this Relation, becauſe it gives us a great Light into the Manner of giving Taxes and Aids in thoſe Days.

But to give you ſome further Account of [3] this Faukes de Brent; you muſt underſtand, that he had been encouraged underhand by ſome of the Barons, to run into this Rebellion, upon promiſe that they would fall in and join with him; but they failing him, he was at the beginning of the Siege gone into Cheſhire and Wales, to raiſe more Men; nor had thoſe in the Caſtle held out ſo long, had not they expected ſpeedy Aſſiſtance from him; but when he

[3] Id. ib. R. C.

A farther Account of the Cauſe of Faukes's late Rebellion.

Anno Dom. MCCXXIV. he saw he could raise no Forces, and heard that his Castle was taken, he then by the Intercession of Alexander Bishop of Coventry, was introduced into the King's Presence at Northampton, where falling down at his Feet, he emplored his Mercy, urging his great Services to the King and his Father in the late Wars; and thereupon the King, by the Advice of his Great Council, (having first seized all his Castles, Lands, and Goods) committed him to the Custody of Eustace Bishop of London, till further Order, where we shall leave him for a time.

Who at last surrenders himself to the King's Mercy.

Anno Dom. MCCXXV. [4] This Year being the Ninth of King Henry's Reign, he kept his Christmass at Westminster, the Clergy, and *People, with the Great Men of the Kingdom, being all there attending: In this full Assembly Hugh de Burgh the King's Justitiary, declared the Damages and Injuries the King sustained in his Dominions beyond Sea, whereby not only He, but also several Earls and Barons were outed of their Possessions, and seeing many were concern'd, the Assistance ought to be proportionable; therefore told them, the King required their Council and Aid, that the Royalties of the Crown, and their antient Rights, might be recovered; for the retrieving of which, he thought the Fifteenth Part of all Moveables, both of Ecclesiasticks and Laicks might be sufficient: This being propounded, the Archbishops, and all the Bishops, Earls, Barons, Abbots, and Priors, after some deliberation, return'd the King this Answer, That they would readily gratifie his Desires, if he would again confirm their long desired Liberties: Hereupon the King agreeing to the Request of his Great Men, many Charters were forthwith wrote, and Sealed with the King's Seal, and one of them directed to every County in England; and to the Counties wherein were Forests, there were sent two; One, concerning their Common Liberties, the other concerning the Liberties of the Forests. The Tenor of both these Charters (our Author tells us) is to be found in the History of King John, both being exactly alike. But that they differ in divers Particulars, I shall shew when I come to speak further of this Charter, at the end of King Henry's Reign.

[4] M. P. p. 321. *Et Populo cum Magnatibus Regionis.

The K. holds a Great Council, wherein he demands an Aid to recover his lost Dominions beyond Sea.

They grant the K. a Fifteenth of all their Goods, on condition he would confirm the Great Charter, which he agrees to.

I must here take notice of what the Annals of Waverly farther add, viz. That for this Grant and Concession the Archbishops, Bishops, Earls, Barons, Knights, and Freeholders of the whole Kingdom, Gave and Granted to the King a Fifteenth Part of all their Moveables; and that the Monks of the Cistercian Order (of which the Writer of these Annals was) gave the King Two thousand Marks of Silver, as well for the Confirmation of their Liberties, as for his Favour and Good Will; likewise that the Jews in England presented him with Five thousand Marks at the same time.

A farther Account of the manner of granting this Aid to the K.

Walter of Coventry is also very particular in the Relation of this Tax that was now granted in this Council or Parliament, which, was held at London at Candlemass; where met not only the Great Men, but, as he says, a * Larger Assembly of both Clergy and People, who were then summon'd; wherein the King granted the Liberties both of Church and Kingdom, as also those of Forests, as his Charters sent into the several Counties do testifie more at large; and that there was then granted by the Barons, Clergy, and People there there preſent a Fifteenth of all their moveable Goods by their Common Aſſent, beſides thoſe that belonged to Churches. Anno Dom. MCCXXV.

[5] This Affair the Pope himſelf very much promoted, writing a Letter or Brief to the Archbiſhops, Biſhops, Abbots, and other Clergy, commanding them to grant a voluntary Competent Aid to the King; but yet with a Saving Clauſe, that it ſhould not be drawn into Example. Then our Author proceeds to tell us, what Things were excepted out of this Grant, (viz.) their Horſes, Ploughs, Arms, and Houſhold Utenſils; as alſo their Jewels and neceſſary Proviſions for Houſe-keeping; the Clergy alſo excepted their Books, and the Treaſure or Ornaments of their Churches; but that none of any Sex or Condition were excepted from payment, but only the Orders of the Ciſtercians aud Præmonſtrants, with the Knights-Templars and Hoſpitallers; alſo that all *Merchants or Tradeſmen gave a Fifteenth of all their Merchandiſe or Commodities, (their Houſhold Goods and Proviſions only excepted;) Upon this the Archbiſhop and Biſhops Excommunicated all thoſe, who ſhould commit any Fraud in the Raiſing, or Hinderance in Payment of this Fifteenth, the one Moiety of which, was to be paid at the Feaſt of the Holy Trinity, and the other Moiety at Michaelmaſs following.

[5] Id. ib. The Pope himſelf promoted this Grant to the King by the Clergy, with a Proviſo that it ſhould not be drawn into Example.

*Mercatores.

But beſides this Fifteenth, it ſeems before the Year was out, the King had need of a Subſidy from the Clergy, which they being unwilling to grant, Pope Honorius the Third ſent over a Bull (at the King's earneſt Deſire) whereby he commands the Biſhops and Clergy to grant him a ſufficient Supply for his preſent Occaſions, as appears by the Bull it ſelf, which is upon *Record in the Tower; but whether they did then comply with the Pope's Commands or no, I know not; nor can I find any thing more given by the Clergy till near two Years after.

The K. demands another Subſidy from the Clergy, before the End of the Year.

[1] Then a Day was ſet, being a Month after Eaſter, for the Choice of Twelve Knights, (being Legal Men out of each County, that is, ſuch as were fit to be Impanelled on Juries) who upon Oath ſhould diſtinguiſh and ſever the New Foreſts from the Old ones; and whatever Foreſts were found to be made after the firſt Coronation of Henry the Second, were forthwith to be dis-foreſted: The Council being ended, the Great Charters were carried to every County, by the King's Command, and every one ſworn to obſerve them; the way and manner of Levying this Fifteenth was directed by the King; and becauſe it was very particular, and worth noting how Fifteenths were Taxed in thoſe times, I refer the Reader to the *Record it ſelf, as it is printed in Dr. Brady's Appendix, ſince it is too prolix to bear any Abridgment.

[2] On Candlemaſs-Day following the King Knighted his Brother Richard, and Ten Noblemen with him, and then made him Earl of Cornwall and Poicton; in the Spring he ſent him accompanied with William Earl of Saliſbury, Philip de Albiney, and Sixty Knights into Gaſcoigny, and he arriving at Bourdeaux on Palm-Sunday, was honourably received by the Archbiſhop and Citizens there. Then Earl Richard opened to them the King's Letters, in which he deſired all thoſe that bore Allegiance to him in thoſe Countries, to give their Aid and Advice to his ſaid Brother, for the Recovery of his loſt Dominions; upon this a great many Knights and Soldiers reſorted to, and received Wages from him,

He raiſes an Army, and marches into Gaſcoigny, and there reduces ſeveral Caſtles to the King's Obedience.

[3] But an Anonymous Author of K. Lewis the Eighth's Reign, as alſo *Rigord relates this Expedition much otherwiſe, and the latter French Hiſtorians follow them; for they ſay, That Richard, Brother to this King of England, landing at Bourdeaux with Three hundred ſail of Ships, marched out, and beſieged the Caſtle of St. Marcharius, which being taken, he went forward to the Town of La-Reoule; but that making a long and vigorous Reſiſtance, and the King of France being reſolved to raiſe the Siege, he ſent an Army of Mercenary Soldiers, upon whoſe Approach he effected it accordingly, and Earl Richard retreated as far as to the other ſide of the River Dordogne; but the French not being able to paſs any further, becauſe of the River, ſate down, and beſieged the Caſtle of Limric, and brought the Lord of Bragaret under the Obedience of King Lewis; which the Engliſh perceiving, and not daring to meet the French again, they took Shipping, and together with the Earl paſſed over into England.

[3] *Vol. 4. Script. France p. 399.

The French Hiſtorians relate this Expedition more to the Advantage of their own King.

This is the Sum of the Account of the [4] French Authors who lived about that time; but yet they are (for all that) in great part miſtaken as to this Action; for though the Earl of Cornwall met with ill Succeſs, notwithſtanding he had certainly the better at firſt, yet, whatever the French Hiſtorians ſay to the contrary, he did not then leave France; for you will find anon that he remain'd in Gaſcoigny till the Year following.

[4] The French Hiſtorians greatly miſtaken in their relations of this War.

[5] In March the Great Men met the King again at Weſtminſter at a Council or *Parliament, where he commanded them to declare what Sentence ſhould be given againſt his Traytor Faukes de Brent; whereupon the Nobility agreed with the King in this, That becauſe both his Father and himſelf had done faithful Service to the Crown for ſeveral Years, he ſhould neither loſe Life nor Limb, but ſhould for ever hereafter abjure the Kingdom: Upon this the King commanded William Earl of Warren ſafely to conduct him to the Sea-ſide; but as he was going on Ship-board, he adjured the Earl with Tears in his Eyes, to let the King know, That whatever he had done, was by the Encouragement of many of the Great Men of England.

Then he went over into Normandy, attended only with Five Servants or Followers, where as ſoon as he was Landed, he was taken Priſoner, and delivered up to the King of France; by whoſe order he was Sentenced to be Hanged for the Injuries he had done that Nation; yet upon his purging himſelf by Oath, and having vowed to undertake the Cruſado, he was Pardon'd, and ſent forthwith to Rome; where notwithſtanding his demoliſhing of St. Paul's Church, which ſtood too near his Caſtle of Bedford, and his Sacrilege committed upon the Monaſtery of St. Albans, and divers other Religious Houſes, yet he was now repreſented to the Pope as One that had took took the Croſs and highly merited of the Church, and was then much Injured and Oppreſſed by his Enemies in England. Anno Dom. MCCXXV.

Walter of Coventry has given us a large Complaint that he then preſented an Addreſs to the Pope, which, though it be very long and particular, in relating the State of Affairs in thoſe times, yet being no where elſe to be found, and becauſe it gives us a great deal of Light into this Tranſaction, I ſhall here give you the Subſtance of it, [1] which was chiefly to ſhew, 'That there had been a Conſpiracy framed by the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and Hubert the Juſtitiary, to diſpoſſeſs the Faithful Nobility of England, (as he calls them) of the Cuſtody of thoſe Caſtles which had been committed to their Truſt by Guallo the Pope's Legate; but whilſt the King was yet under Age, they had wreſted ſome of thoſe Caſtles from the Barons by falſe Accuſations, and had alſo by their ſubtle Contrivances procured his Holineſs's Letters to the Barons, commanding the ſurrender of the reſt into their Hands, and that in compliance with theſe Letters, though the Earl of Cheſter, and ſeveral other Barons had delivered up their Caſtles to the King, yet Hubert de Burgh and his Creatures, ſtill kept theirs; and that when the Earl and thoſe of his Party had ſent Meſſengers to Rome, to complain of the Injuſtice of theſe Proceedings, they had been ever ſince baniſhed the Kingdom, as if they had been guilty of Treaſon; That as for himſelf he had alſo been by the Procurement of the Juſtitiary accuſed of Treaſon, however not for any late Offence, but for things done Eight years agone.

A large Account of Faukes's Appeal to the Pope.

[1] Id. ib.

'That an Army having been lately raiſed at Northampton, on a falſe Pretence of an Expedition into Poictou, a certain Knight, called Henry de Braibrock, had been ſent with others to ſit as a Juſtice Itinerant near Bedford, where exerciſing his Office Unjuſtly, he had deprived William de Brent the Complainant's Brother of divers Lands and Poſſeſſions, for no other Cauſe than his own private Malice; but that his Brother being provoked with theſe unjuſt Proceedings had indeed ſeiz'd the ſaid Juſtice, yet without the Privity of Faukes, who was then at Northampton, with the other Barons of the Realm; that when he heard of it, he immediately went to the Caſtle of Bedford to releaſe him, but when he came thither, he neither found the ſaid Knight, nor his Brother there, having (as Faukes relates, though falſly) carried him away Priſoner into the Foreſt of Vawberge; and that albeit he had done what he could to make his Brother come in, and ſet the Juſtice free, yet he could not oblige him to do it; that during theſe delays there were two Knights ſent to ſummon Faukes to appear at the Caſtle of Northampton the next day; but he fearing his Enemy's violence had ſent to the King, to be excuſed from appearing, till he could find out and produce his ſaid Brother.

[2] 'That the Cauſes of his then abſenting himſelf, being laid before the King, he ſeemed well enough ſatisfied, yet whilſt the reſt of the Barons were gone home, to their ſeveral Habitations, his Enemies had privately reſolved, that the Army ſhould march and beſiege his Caſtle, which was done the next day, without giving him any timely notice of it; whereupon fearing the violent Perſecution of his Enemies, he was forced to fly into Cheſhire.

[2] Id. ib.

Anno Dom. MCCXXV.

'That it was true, the Archbiſhop and ſome of the Biſhops had 'demanded the Delivery of the Caſtle, but that thoſe within re- 'fuſed it, ſince there was no Law to require it at their hands, 'and that their Lord Faukes having undertaken the Cruſado, he him- 'ſelf, as alſo his Caſtles and Eſtate, were under his Holineſs's Pro- 'tection, and therefore they appealed againſt all things; that might 'be done or attempted againſt them, till a Legate ſhould be ſent 'over from the Pope, before whom the true State of the Kingdom, 'and Merits of the Cauſe, might be fairly laid open.

[3] Id. ib. [3] 'However, Notwithſtanding all this, the Archbiſhop out of 'a partial Affection to the King, and his own Adherents, calling 'together ſome of the Biſhops, immediately iſſued out a Sentence of 'Excommunication againſt Faukes himſelf, and all his Favourers and 'Abettors, which he cauſed to be Publiſhed, and with it a full In- 'dulgence of Pardon of Sins to all thoſe who ſhould aſſiſt at the 'taking of the ſaid Caſtle.

'That whilſt Faukes was thus in expection of the Pope's Prote- 'ction, he ſent a certain Chanon of Selby-Abbey to the King, with 'Letters, wherein he offer'd to ſtand to the Judgment of the Barons 'of the Kingdom, according to the Laws thereof, but that the Cha- 'non hearing he was Excommunicated, never durſt deliver his Let- 'ter; That he had alſo made a like Offers by the Biſhop of Coventry 'and Litchfield, of ſtanding to the Judgment of the King himſelf, 'provided that Three Perſons, whom Faukes looked upon as his 'utter Enemies might not be there preſent; but when the Biſhop 'delivered this Meſſage to the King, and the Archbiſhop, it was re- 'ceived with ſcorn; ſo that Faukes, notwithſtanding his Appa l 'to the Pope, was at laſt over-perſuaded by the Archbiſhop and 'Earl of Cheſter, to ſurrender himſelf to the King at Northampton, 'in hopes of Mercy and Abſolution, which nevertheleſs he could 'not obtain; though he had now wrote to his Men in Bedford- 'Caſtle to deliver up that, together with themſelves, to the King's 'Mercy; but the Archbiſhop had ſo provoked his Youthful Indig- 'nation againſt him, and thoſe that held the Caſtle, by his paſſi- 'onate and ſevere Expreſſions, (which are there ſet down) that 'when the Barons expected to be called to give Judgment in this 'Caſe, the Knights, Eſquires and Soldiers, that had been taken Pri- 'ſoners in the Caſtle, were ſuddenly brought out, and (in reproach 'to Knighthood) immediately hanged; which cruelty ſo incenſed 'even the Common Soldiers of the King's Party, that running out 'of their Tents, they preſently took ſome of them from off the 'Gallows, and ſo ſaved their Lives.

[4] Id. ib. [4] 'That after this, Faukes had been prevail'd with to ſubmit 'to the Archbiſhop's Judgment, who yet would not abſolve him (not- 'withſtanding his frequent Appeals to the Pope) till he had ſtood 'Naked all Sermon-time, whilſt the Archbiſhop preach'd an In- 'vective Diſcourſe pointing at him, and calling on him by Name; 'ſtill after all this, there was a new Accuſation framed againſt him, 'as having been the Cauſe of the Loſs of Poictou, and that there- 'fore he ought to forfeit all his Eſtate in England; which Charge 'he there endeavours to anſwer at large, ſhewing that Poictou could 'not be loſt by his means, ſince the Army raiſed at Northampton was 'never intended for its recovery. [5] 'So

[5] 'So that notwithstanding his late Absolution, his Enemies 'were not satisfied, till they had committed him to Prison, 'from whence he would not have been freed, but for his Holiness's 'Letters to the Archbishop of Canterbury, and the Governors of the 'Realm; yet further, besides all this, he could not get himself 'discharged, though he had lain a long while in Prison, till he had 'sworn to wave his Appeal to the Pope, and immediately go on 'Pilgrimage to the Holy-Land: Then he concludes with an humble 'Request to the Pope and his Cardinals, to consider his Appeal, 'and not to suffer him in contempt thereof to be unjustly deprived 'of his Wife, Children, and Estate; but that he may find a Refuge 'with the Roman See against his Enemies, and particularly the Arch-'bishop of Canterbury, against whose Unjust and Severe Proceedings 'he desired his Holiness's speedy Relief. Anno Dom. MCCXXV. [5] Ib. ib.

This is the Sum of his Plea, which how far it was True, and wherein it was False, is hard to determine at this distance of Time; yet this is certain, that Faukes did not desist from his Appeal, till he had obtained the Pope's Brief directed to the King in his favour, desiring his entire Restitution to his Honour and Estate, in regard of his former Merits and great Services both to the King's Father and Himself; as also out of Reverence to the Character of the Cross, which he had then taken upon him: But what success this long Address had, you will find by and by.

[1] I have nothing else to remark as to English Affairs, only that in pursuance of the late Charter of Forests (above-mentioned) the King having sent Hugh de Nevil and Brian de Lisle, with some others, to cause Twelve Knights, or Free and Legal Men, to be chosen in every County where there were Forests to walk the Bounds of them, and, by their Oaths to set out, which were the Antient Forests, and which the New ones to be dis-forested. The King's Commands were in a short time executed, but not without some Opposition, every one using the Liberties that were granted them; They sold their own Woods, Hunted in them, and Stubbed-up, and Ploughed such of them as were disforested, at pleasure; for the Great Men, Knights, and Free-Tenants, made such good use of the Common Liberties, that not one Tittle commanded in the Charter was submitted to. [1] M. P. p. 334. The King's Commission for the severing the New Forests from the Old, being Executed, the former are dis-forested.

[2] As for Ecclesiastical Affairs, this Year the Pope sent Otto his Legate into England, with Letters to King Henry, concerning great and weighty Affairs of the Church, which when he had read and understood the Tenor of, he answered the Legate, That he neither could, nor ought to determine any thing that generally concern'd the Clergy and Laiety of the whole Kingdom, but by the Advice of the Archbishop; and thereupon he appointed on the Octaves of Epiphany, to meet his Clergy and People at Westminster, to treat about the aforesaid Business. [2] Ib. p. 335. The Pope sends his Legate Otto into England, about great Affairs, which the K. refuses to determine without the Advice of his Great Council.

[3] Then the Pope's Legate at his arrival in England, moved the King in the behalf of Faukes de Brent, on the Consideration already mention'd; but to that the King replied, That his Sentence was passed, and he was condemn'd to perpetual Banishment by the whole *Clergy and Laiety of the Kingdom, by the Judgment of his Court; and since the Care of the Kingdom did more especially be-long [3] Ib. ib. The Legate intercedes for Faukes de Brent, but in vain. Cl. de Pipard.

long to him, he ought therefore to obſerve the Good Laws and Cuſtoms of the ſame. When the Legate heard this, he forbore preſſing the King any further on Fankes's behalf; but did not forget to take, of all Cathedral and Conventual Churches, Two Marks of Silver for Procurations, the greateſt Part of his Errand being to get Money; for (as our Author well obſerves) when this Otto came into England, the Pope had ſent his Nuncios all over Europe, to Extort ſuch undue Exactions; of which alſo he gives us divers other Inſtances, as you will ſee anon.

The Legate takes two Marks of Silver from all Cathedral and Conventual Churches for Procurations.

[4] As for the reſt of the Eccleſiaſtical Affairs of this Year, there came forth a Decree from the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and his Suffragan Biſhops, That the Concubines of Beneficed Prieſts and Clerks within Orders, ſhould be denied Chriſtian Burial, unleſs they repented whilſt in Health, or gave ſuch Teſtimonies of their Penitence at the Hour of Death, as to deſerve Abſolution; and likewiſe ſo long as the Prieſts kept them in their Houſes, or publickly out of their Houſes, they ſhould be denied the *Kiſs of Peace, and †Bleſſed Bread in the Church; and alſo, That after Childbirth, theſe Women ſhould not be Churched, till they had given ſufficient Security to the Archdeacon or his Official, to make ſatisfaction in the next Court after their Churching; alſo all Prieſts, in whoſe Pariſhes any ſuch Concubines dwelt, if they did not give notice to the Archdeacon or his Official, were to be ſuſpended, and not be Abſolved without ſevere Penance; and if it could be proved that a Prieſt had carnally known his Concubine, he ſhould do publick Penance himſelf: And if ſhe were convicted of Adultery, ſhe was to be doubly puniſhed, leſt impunity in ſo great a Guilt ſhould give Encouragement to others to offend in like manner.

[4] Id. p. 324. The former Decrees renew'd againſt the Wives and Concubines of Prieſts and Clerks.

† Panem Benedictum: Bread Bleſſed, but not Conſecrated in the Maſs.

But before we end this Year, we ſhall look a little into Foreign Parts. [5] About this time (as our own, as well as the French Hiſtorians relate) there appeared a Man in Flanders, who took upon him to be Baldwin, formerly Earl of that Country, and who had been many years ſince choſen Emperour of Conſtantinople, (as you have already heard) and being afterwards taken Priſoner by the Bulgars, was ſuppoſed there to have died; yet this Perſon now pretended to have eſcaped from thence, and gave ſuch ſtrange Proofs to make himſelf be acknowledged for Earl, that the Flemings, (who loved the Memory of that Great Man,) gave at laſt ſo much Credit to him, as to put him into poſſeſſion of the greateſt Part of the Country; but the Counteſs Joane, Daughter and Heir of Baldwin, not being ſatisfied that this Man was her Father, and being like to be fruſtrated of her Inheritance, complain'd to the King of France, as her Supreme Lord, who thereupon ſummon'd this Pretended Prince to appear before him, and accordingly he came very boldly; but either Diſdaining, or not being able to Anſwer the Queſtions that were put to him by the King, he was ſo diſſatisfied therewith, that he commanded him within Three days to be gone out of his Dominions; but he being afterwards taken in Diſguiſe, and brought to the Counteſs, ſhe firſt made him endure Cruel Tortures, and then order'd him to be Hang'd for an Impoſtor, and he was Executed accordingly; which made divers People ſtill believe that the Daughter found it eaſier to hang her Father, than reſtore him his Dominions.

A Perſon appears in Flanders, who takes upon him to be Baldwin the Emperour, once Earl of that Province.

Anno Dom. MCCXXVI.

[1] King Henry kept his Chriſtmaſs at Wincheſter, ſome Biſhops and many of the Great Men being there preſent with him: So ſoon as the Solemnity was ended, he went to Marlebridge (now Marleborough) where he was taken deſperately ill, and continued ſo for ſome Days. In the mean while, the Feaſt of St. Hilary being now come, a Counſel of the Clergy and Great Men of the Kingdom met at Weſtminſter, where (as the * Manuſcript Annals of St. Auguſtin of Canterbury relate) the Biſhops, Earls, and Barons being preſent, the King was declared of full Age, tho' he was then but Nineteen Years old.

[2] But the main Buſineſs of this Aſſembly was to return an Anſwer to the late Letters from the Pope; and the Legate declaring the Contents of them, it appeared that the Pope complained, 'it was an Old Scandal and Reproach caſt upon the Roman 'See, That nothing could be tranſacted there, without great Sums 'of Money and many Preſents; and ſeeing that which occaſioned 'this Infamy was its great Poverty, it became Dutiful Children 'to ſupply their Mother's Wants; which might eaſily be done, 'if out of every Cathedral Church Two Prebendaries were ſet 'a-part for that purpoſe, one by the Biſhop, the other by the 'Chapter; and alſo out of every Monaſtery, where there is an 'Abbot and Convent, one Monk's Portion from the Convent, and 'as much from the Abbot; and then the Legate endeavoured to 'perſwade the Prelates to conſent to what the Pope deſired.

[2] M. P. ib. The Pope's Letters are alſo there conſidered.

[3] When the Biſhops and other Prelates had heard this ſtrange Propoſal, after ſome Deliberation, they returned their Anſwer by John Archdeacon of Bedford their Proctor, who in preſence of the Legate warily replied, 'That what was propoſed concerned the 'King in particular, and in general all Patrons of Churches in 'England, and beſides the Archbiſhops, Biſhops, and all the other '* Prelates; and ſeeing the King, upon the account of his Infir-'mity, as alſo ſome Biſhops and others were abſent, they neither 'could nor ought now to give a direct Anſwer, which might 'tend ſo much to their Prejudice. Then came John the Mareſchal, and other Meſſengers from the King, to thoſe Prelates that held Baronies of him in Capite, ſtrictly charging them not to oblige their Lay-Fees to the Church of Rome, leſt he ſhould thereby loſe his accuſtomed Service: Upon this, the Legate deſired that another Day might be appointed in Mid-Lent, and he would take care that the King, and divers Prelates who now are abſent, ſhould be there; but they would not admit of this without the King's Conſent; and ſo they all returned to their own Homes, without doing any farther in the Matter.

[3] Id. ib. To which the Biſhops and Clergy return a prudent Anſwer.

* Note, this Word then comprehended Abbots, Priors, and Deans of Cathedrals.

The K. commands the Prelates not to oblige their Lay-Fees to the See of Rome.

[4] About this time alſo one Romanus was ſent Legate by the Pope into France upon the like Errand, who, upon his calling an Aſſembly of the Clergy at Bourges, and finding the Pope's Demands would be oppoſed by them, craftily diſmiſſed the Procurators of the ventual Churches, imagining that they would find a ready Acceptance among the Archbiſhops, Biſhops, Abbots, and Great Men; but he met with as little Succeſs with them, for after a long Debate about thoſe unreaſonable Demands, and that the Procurator tor of the Archbiſhop of Lyons had anſwered all the Legate's Argumentts, he was at laſt content to depart without doing the Buſineſs he came for. I have inſerted this, tho' it concerns not the Eccleſiaſtick Affairs of this, but of a Foreign Nation, to let you ſee, that England was not the only Country in which the Pope at that time endeavoured to advance his unreaſonable Demands, which indeed were ſo exorbitant, that no Kingdom in Europe could admit them.

[5] Id. p. 330. The Legate is recalled:

[5] Some time after this, Otto the Legate went into the North to collect the Pope's Procurations, that were in Arrear in thoſe Parts, but (by the Procurement of the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, who ſeemed much concerned at theſe Exactions upon the Clergy) he was recalled: And then an Injunction was by the Pope laid upon the Archbiſhop, That the King with all the Prelates of England, being again aſſembled, ſhould give their final Anſwer to the Buſineſs Otto had been lately ſent about, and to tranſmit it to him. Thereupon the King, after conſultation with the Prelates and ſome of the Great Men, returned this Anſwer, 'That ſince 'what his Holineſs required concerned the Church Univerſal, the 'King was ready to follow the Example of other Kingdoms, and 'therefore would firſt ſee what they did; And with this Anſwer the Aſſembly was diſmiſſed.

Yet the Pope again preſſes the King and Prelates for their final Anſwer;

Who decline giving a flat denial to his Requeſt.

I ſhall now take a view of what was done in France, in relation to the like Demand made by the Pope's Legate there, as had been lately done in England; [1] For Otto the Pope's Legate ſaw he could dot ſucceed in his late unreaſonable Propoſal, and reſolving to make the King of France his Maſter's Inſtrument for the execution of his Deſigns, he engaged him in a Cruſado againſt the Count of Tholouſe and his Subjects, as being all infected with the pretended Hereſie of the Albigenſes; This the King of France imprudently undertook, having firſt obtained Letters of Inhibition from the Pope to King Henry, therein forbidding him under pain of Excommunication to invade any of the French King's Territories, whilſt he was employed in the Service of the Church; and ſo King Lewis raiſing a great Army, marched againſt the Earl of Tholouſe; and the City of Avignon lying in his way thither, he ſate down before it, and beſieged that Place, becauſe it refuſed to give free Admittance to his Army; and what Succeſs he had there, you will ſee by and by.

[1] Id. p. 329. The Pope's Legate engages the K. of France in an Expedition against the Count of Tholouſe, as guilty of Hereſie.

[2] Id. p. 331. The K. being forbid by the Pope to make War upon the K. of France, conſults his Great Council thereupon.

[2] In the mean time, the King of England, who deſired to make a Warlike Expedition in Foreign Parts, calling together his Great Council, cauſed the Pope's Inhibitory Letters to be read to them, requiring their Advice what was to be done about them; Upon which, all the Prelates and Great Men thought it beſt to defer that Affair, till it appeared what Succeſs the French King would meet with in ſo difficult an Enterprize.

[3] Id. ib. The King receives Letters from his Brother, that all things ſucceeded well enough in Gaſcoigny.

[3] King Henry was now very ſollicitous about his Brother Earl Richard, and his Affairs in Gaſcoigny, and much deſired to paſs over thither with Forces; and while he was under this Concern, an Expreſs came from his Brother, that he was well, and all things ſucceeded proſperouſly enough there; which if ſo, the French Hiſtorians are much miſtaken, n affirming, that he returned unſucceſsful ceſsful into England ſomewhat before this time, as hath been already obſerved. Anno Dom. MCCXXVI.

Before we end this Year, I cannot omit what the Annals of St. Auguſtin further relate, That the King being now declared of full Age, he laid many heavy Exactions upon the Kingdom; for he then commanded it to be proclaimed through all the ſeveral Counties of England, That all Perſons who claimed any Liberties or Poſſeſſions by Grant from Him, or His Predeceſſors, ſhould apply themſelves to Him before Lent, to have them confirmed under his Seal, otherwiſe they ſhould not be heard; Whereupon divers Biſhops, Earls, Barons, and Abbots, who claimed ſuch Liberties and Poſſeſſions, applied themſelves to the King to have them renewed, who by this means gained a vaſt Sum of Money. The K. being declared of Age, impoſes many heavy Exactions upon his Subjects.

[4] I cannot here omit to mention the deceaſe of ſome Great and Remarkable Perſons, both Secular and Eccleſiaſtical; of the Firſt ſort was William Longe-ſpee, Earl of Salisbury, the King's Uncle, who having ſuffered extreamly in a long and dangerous Paſſage out of Gaſcoigny into England the laſt Winter, was ſomewhat recovered; but being invited to a great Entertainment by Hubert de Burgh the Juſtitiary to make his Peace with him, for recommending one Raymond his Nephew as a Suitor to the Earl's Lady, upon the News of his being Shipwreck'd, he was there ſuppoſed to be poiſoned by Hubert's Contrivance; for he preſently fell into a languiſhing Diſtemper, and returning to the Caſtle of Sarum, died very penitent a few Days after, and was buried in the then new-built Cathedral Church of Salisbury, where his Monument is to be ſeen at this day. He was a vertuous and Gallant Man, and the only ſurviving Iſſue of King Henry the Second. [4] M.P. p. 329. William Longeſpee Earl of Salisbury dies; being ſuſpected to be poiſon'd, and on what occaſion.

[5] The Eccleſiaſtical Great Perſon who deceaſed this Year, was Richard de Mariſco, or de Maris, Biſhop of Durham, who died ſuddenly at Peterborough in his Journey to London, in order to proſecute a moſt unjuſt Suit with the Monks of his Church: he had been one of King John's Courtiers and Chief Councellors in all his Tyrannical Actions, and was in the beginning of this King's Reign elected Biſhop of Durham. To theſe may be added Faukes de Brent, who deceaſed in France by eating of a poiſoned Fiſh; he was juſt before his Death about to return into England, his Peace with the King being obtained by the means of thoſe great Preſents he had made in the Roman Court; of whom, (having made ſo great a Figure in our Hiſtory,) I ſhall ſay ſomewhat farther. He was by Birth a Norman, but Baſe-born, and a meer Soldier of Fortune, yet by his Valour raiſed himſelf to the Degree of a Baron, and was by King John married to Margaret de Redvers a great Heireſs, tho' againſt her Will; and with her he had the Caſtle of Bedford, and ſeveral other large Poſſeſſions; but this unexpected Fortune made him Inſolent, and Rebellious, which procured his Ruine, as you have already heard. [5] Id. p. 332. The death of Richard de Maris Biſhop of Durham; As alſo of Faukes de Brent, with his Character.

I ſhall conclude this Year with a farther Account of the Affairs of France; [1] King Lewis had now beſieged the City of Avignon many Days without any great Succeſs; for the Citizens made ſuch an obſtinate Defence, that great Numbers of the French were deſtroyed [1] Id. p. 334 by their frequent Sallies, as alſo by the Plague, which then raged in the Camp; [2] * yet at laſt the Beſieged were forced to Capitulate with the King, and ſo they admitted him into the City, where he preſently ordered the Towers on their Houſes to be pulled down, and made them give many Hoſtages for their Fidelity; but being forced to leave his Army and return home, by reaſon of an Indiſpoſition taken in the Camp, he fell deſperately ill at the Caſtle of Monpencier in Auverne, being ſuppoſed to be poiſoned by Henry Earl of Champaigne, who was in Love with the Queen.

King Lewis quits his Army, and dies at the Caſtle of Monpencier.

This King deceaſed in the Thirty ninth Year of his Age, and the Fourth of his Reign, leaving the Reputation of a Valiant Prince, though far ſhort of his Father in Prudence, Fortune, and long Life; Lewis his Son (then a Minor) ſucceeded him, (being the Ninth of that Name) who was afterwards Canonized for a Saint.

Anno Dom. MCCXXVII.

[3] This Year King Henry kept his Chriſtmaſs at Reading, but ſoon after came to London, where (as Matt. Weſtminſter obſerves) he began to Tyrannize, accuſing the Citizens of London for lending Five thouſand Marks to Lewis the King of France, upon his departure out of England; and therefore compelled them to pay the like Sum to himſelf: Nor was London the only Town which felt this his ſevere Uſage; for he extorted from the Burgeſſes of Northampton the Sum of Twelve hundred Pounds, beſides the Fifteenth of their Moveables, which all others paid; The Religious Orders and Beneficed Clerks were alſo forced to pay the ſame Tax, as well out of their Eccleſiaſtick as Lay Goods; nor did their Appeal to the Pope avail them any thing; for thoſe whom the King's Authority could not reach, the Papal Power by Eccleſiaſtick Cenſure were forced to pay: And thus the King's exorbitant Actions were then ſupported by the Pope, who cared not how much the other oppreſſed his Subjects, provided he might have his Share in the Spoil.

[3] M. P. p. 336.

The King extorts a great Sum from the City of London very unjuſtly,

As alſo 1200*l.* from Northampton.

And alſo takes a great Tax from the Religious Orders, notwithſtanding their Appeal to the Pope.

Then the King, to proceed in the ſame manner as he had already began, [4] in February following called a Council at Oxford, and declared to them he was then of full Age, and would take the Management of Publick Affairs into his own Hands; and to ſhew he was in good earneſt, He, by the Advice of Hubert de Burgh his Juſtitiary, removed from his Court Peter Biſhop of Winchester, his Protector in his Minority: In the ſame Council, and by the ſame Man's Advice, he alſo cancelled and made void all the Charters of Liberties and Foreſts, which for two Years before had been obſerved throughout the whole Kingdom, ſaying, That what had been then done, was in his Minority, when he had no Power of his own Perſon or Seal, and upon that account was all invalid.

[4] Id. Ib.

The K. holds a Council at Oxford, and there takes the Management of Affairs into his own hands.

And by the Advice of Hubert de Burgh cancels the Charters of Liberties and Foreſts.

Theſe unjuſt and illegal Proceedings occaſioned great Murmurings, every one accuſing the Juſtitiary, and looking upon him as the Author of this Diſturbance, becauſe they ſaw the King was wholly guided by him: Soon after, the Religious Orders, and all others, had notice, That if they would enjoy their Priviledges, they muſt renew their Charters, or otherwiſe the Old ones ſhould be of no Advantage to them; and what they were to pay for ſuch ſuch Renewal, was left to the Diſcretion of the Juſtitiary: Thus as the King changed his Chief Miniſter of State, ſo the Nation paid dearly for it; which perhaps ſometimes ſince too has been little the better for the Change. Anno Dom. MCCXXVII.

The Religious Orders are alſo forced to renew their Charters of Priviledges and pay great Sums for them.

[5] About Eaſter the Archbiſhop of York, the Biſhop of Carliſle, and Philip d'Albiney returned from France; for they had been ſent to the Great Men of thoſe Countries, which of ancient Right belonged to the King of England; and their Buſineſs was to invite them by fair and large Promiſes to receive King Henry, and acknowledge Him for their Natural Lord: But the Young King of France, by his Mother's means, had made Peace with thoſe Barons, and received their Homages before King Henry's Meſſengers could arrive; whereupon they returned without effecting any thing.

[5] Id. Ib. The A. Bp. of York, &c. return from France, without doing any thing in the Buſineſs for which they were ſent.

But to come to Matters of leſs moment; [1] In February Hubert de Burgh the Juſtitiary was created Earl of Kent by the Cincture of the Sword of that County, and the May after the King's Brother Richard returned into England, and was received by Him and the whole Court with great Joy.

[1] Id. p. 337. Hub. de Burgh created Earl of Kent. Earl Richard returns out of France.

[2] Yet did not this good Correſpondence between the King and his Brother laſt long, by reaſon of a great difference that happened upon this occaſion; King John had given to one Waleran a German the Caſtellan of Berkhamſtead, a Mannor that belonged to the Earldom of Cornwal; which when Earl Richard underſtood, he ſeized it, until Waleran ſhould make out by what Right he claimed it; Upon this, ſo ſoon as Waleran had notice of it, he made his Complaint to the King, who immediately wrote to his Brother, That upon ſight of his Letters, he ſhould forthwith render back the Mannor to Waleran; But Earl Richard thought it not convenient to make ſuch great haſte, and therefore went to the King, and pleaded his Right to the Mannor, offering to ſtand to the Judgment of his Court, and of the Great Men of the Kingdom: The King and his Juſtitiary hearing him mention the * Great Men, were highly incenſed at it, and commanded him either to yield up the Mannor, or for ever depart the Kingdom; To which Earl Richard replied, That he would neither part with the One, nor leave the Other, without the Judgment of his Peers, and forthwith made what haſte he could to his own Houſe: The Juſtitiary, when he heard this peremptory Anſwer, fearing he might diſturb the Publick Peace, adviſed the King to ſecure him; but the Earl having Early notice of his Deſign, went immediately to Reading, and from thence to Merleburgh, where he met with his old Friend and ſworn Confederate William the Earl-Mareſchal, to whom he declared what had paſſed between the King and him: Then they went both together to the Earl of Cheſter, and gave him an account of the ſame; and from thence they marched to Stamford, where, in a ſhort time, according (it ſeems) to appointment, met them with Horſe and Arms Randulph Earl of Cheſter, Gilbert Earl of Glouceſter, William Earl of Warren, Henry Earl of Hereford, William Earl of Ferrars, William Earl of Warwick, with divers Barons, and a great Multitude of armed Men, who had all entred into a Confederacy to force the King to make Satisfaction for this Injury

[2] Id. ib. A great difference between the King and his Brother Earl Richard, and on what occaſion.

* Magnates.

The Earl being diſcontented, retires from Court.

He goes to the Earl Mareſchal to give him an account of what had happened; whereupon he, the Earl of Cheſter, &c. take up Arms, Anno Dom. MCCXXVII. that was done to his Brother Earl Richard, which they wholly imputed to the Juſtitiary, as alſo to oblige him to reſtore thoſe Charters which had been lately cancelled at Oxford; and if he refuſed, they declared they would compel him by their Arms to make them competent Satisfaction. Upon this, the King appointed them to meet him at Northampton the Third of Auguſt, where he ſettled his Mother's Jointure on his Brother Richard (all the Great Men moving him to it) as alſo all the Lands that once belonged to the Earl of Bretaigne in England, and which were the Earl of Boloign's lately deceaſed; ſo every one departed well pleaſed for that time. Thus we ſee ſometimes how Fear will prevail more upon ſome Princes than all the Reaſon in the World beſide.

On pretence to oblige the King to reſtore the Charter he had lately cancell'd.

Nothing happened conſiderable this Year in Eccleſiaſtical Matters, but the Death of Pope Honorius the Third, in whoſe ſtead was Elected Hugolin Biſhop of Oſtia, by the Name of Gregory the Ninth.

Anno Dom. MCCXXVIII. [3] This Year the King kept his Chriſtmaſs at York; but ſoon after he came directly to London; and in his Journey finding the Meaſures of Grain, Wine, and Ale to be falſe, he commanded ſome of them to be broken, and the reſt to be burnt, and ordered others of a larger ſize to be made, and the Weight of Bread to be increaſed, and likewiſe the Offenders to be ſeverely puniſhed.

[3] Id. ib. The K. orders new Meaſures to be made.

The Eccleſiaſtical Affairs of this Year were but few, only [4] Stephen Langton Archbiſhop of Canterbury deceaſed the Ninth of July; He was a Prelate well skill'd in the School-Divinity of that Age, and alſo very knowing in the Laws and Conſtitutions of his own Country; and as he did not come in by the King's Nomination or Conſent, ſo having little or no Dependance on him, therefore it is no wonder if he the more ſtoutly maintained the Liberties granted by King John; and indeed it is chiefly owing to his Induſtry, Prudence, and Courage, that they were either granted at firſt, or ever confirmed in this King's Reign.

[4] Id. p. 350. Steph. Langton A. Bp. of Canterbury dies.

Not long after his Deceaſe, [5] the Convent of Chriſt-Church in Canterbury made choice of Walter de Hemeſham (a Monk of their own) whom they preſented to the King; but he refuſed to accept him, both becauſe his Father was hanged upon Conviction of Theft, as alſo becauſe in the time of the Interdict he had appeared againſt King John; Then all the Suffragan Biſhops of the Province of Canterbury refuſed to accept him, becauſe he had corrupted a Nun, and had had Children by her; and likewiſe becauſe he ought not (as they ſaid) to be choſen without their Conſents: Upon this, both ſides applied themſelves to the Pope, One to get his Election confirmed, and the Other to hinder it: When the Pope ſaw both Parties ſo obſtinate in the Proſecution of their Suit, he would determine nothing concerning it either ways, but put it off till the Day after Aſh-wedneſday following, that he might be the better informed; ſo that the Church of Canterbury continued vacant all the reſt of this Year.

[5] Id. Ib.

[1] In Auguſt the Knights and Soldiers that kept Garriſon in Montgomery-Caſtle on the Borders of Wales, by the Aſſiſtance of the Country-People, deſigned to make a Way through an adjacent Wood

[1] Id. ib.

Wood more paſſable and ſecure for Travellers; but whilſt they were at work in cutting down the Thickets, the Welſh on a ſudden ruſhed in upon them, killed ſome, and forced the reſt to retire into the Caſtle, and preſently beſieged it. But ſo ſoon as King Henry was informed of it, both He and the Juſtitiary (to whom the King had lately given the Caſtle) came ſpeedily with a ſmall Army and raiſed the Siege; and when he had received ſome additional Recruits he marched towards the aforeſaid Wood, and having cleared the Way by great Labour and Burning, ſo far as a Religious Houſe called Criddy, (the uſual Receptacle of the Welſh) he commanded it to be ſet on Fire; but the Juſtitiary upon view of the Place, finding it to be of an impregnable Situation, adviſed him to build a Caſtle there: Yet during the time it was building the Workmen were almoſt continually interrupted, and ſeveral of them killed by the Welſh. Then the King, finding that ſo many of his own Army inwardly favoured Llewellyn, was forced to make a diſadvantageous Peace, whereof the Chief Article was, That this Caſtle ſhould be demoliſhed, and Llewellyn ſhould give the King for his Charges Three Thouſand Marks; ſo he returned home with little Honour, having left William de Brauſe, a Noble Baron, behind him Priſoner.

Anno Dom. MCCXXVIII

The Welſh beſiege Montgomery-Caſtle.

K. Henry is fain to make Peace with Llewellyn.

As for Foreign Affairs, this Year affords little worth mentioning, [2] but that the Emperor Fretherick the Second now failing to undertake his Voyage to the Holy-Land by reaſon of either a real or pretended Sickneſs, Pope Gregory thereupon Excommunicated him for the Breach of his Vow, in not purſuing the Cruſado; but the Emperor remonſtrated againſt theſe Proceedings as Unjuſt, and took Shipping not long after for the Holy-Land, where as ſoon as he was arrived, he found a great Army ready to receive him.

[2] Id. p. 345. The Emperor failing to undertake a Voyage to the Holy Land is therefore Excommunicated by the Pope.

[3] This Year the King kept his Court at Oxford, the Great Men attending him: While he was there, the Archbiſhop of Bourdeaux came to him from the Nobility of Gaſcoigny, Aquitain, and Poictou, as alſo Meſſengers from thoſe of Normandy, to ſollicite him to come in Perſon into thoſe Countries, aſſuring him, That they would All be ready with Horſe and Arms to aſſiſt him in recovering his antient Inheritance. The King thereupon by the Advice of his Juſtitiary (whoſe Counſel he ſtill followed in all things) anſwered them, That he could not comply with their Deſires at preſent, but muſt ſtay for a more convenient Opportunity: Upon this, the Meſſengers return'd without any more ado; But the Reaſon why the King did not lay hold of this Offer, I do not find.

Anno Dom. MCCXXIX.

[3] Id. p. 353. The A.B. of Bourdeaux comes to invite the K. into France, with large Promiſes of Aſſiſtance, but receives a dilatory Anſwer.

But ſince the Affairs of the Church and State this Year, are ſo interwoven with each other, that they cannot well be parted, I ſhall here purſue my Author's Method, and give them you as they there lie together.

[4] Alexander Biſhop of Cheſter, (or Litchfield) Henry Biſhop of Rocheſter, and Maſter John de Houghton Archdeacon of Bedford, the King's Envoys at the Court of Rome, according to Appointment attended on Aſh-Wedneſday, for the Pope's Determination concerning the A.Bp. Elect of Canterbury; but finding both his Holineſs and the Cardinals very difficult to be prevailed upon by bare Petitions, they promiſed

[4] Id. p. 355. The King's Envoys at Rome attend in vain the Pope's Reſolution about the A.B. Elect of Canterbury.

Anno Dom. MCCXXIX promiſed on the King's behalf a Tenth of all Moveables from England and Ireland, to be paid the Pope toward his carrying on the War againſt the Emperor, which was now declar'd, John de Brenne King of Jeruſalem being appointed General.)

And are fain to promiſe the Tenth of all Moveables in England.

[5] The Pope now ſtanding in need of King Henry, was the more eaſily prevail'd upon to embrace the Offer, and forthwith cauſed the Election made by the Monks of Canterbury to be declared Void, tho' not ſo much for thoſe Diſabilities objected againſt him on the King's behalf, as for his Notorious Ignorance, he not being able ſo much as to give a tolerable Account of ſeveral Points of Faith, upon which he was then Examin'd by the Pope's Delegates, appointed for that purpoſe, as appears by the Sentence at large in Matt. Paris; whereupon Richard le Grant Chancellor of the Church of Lincoln, was promoted by the Pope to the Archbiſhoprick, without any Election; yet by the Conſent of the King and Biſhops, he being thus confirmed by the Pope, received his Bull declaring him Archbiſhop, and Commanded all the Biſhops and Clergy of his Province to Obey him.

[5] Id. lb.

The Election of the A.B. of Canterbury vacated.

Richard Chancellor of Lincoln is choſen in his ſtead.

This was a New Encroachment, and the firſt Archbiſhop that ever the Pope took upon him to nominate, without a previous Election by the Convent, or Biſhops.

[1] Not long after this, the Pope ſent one Stephen his Chaplain into England, to Collect the Tenths that were lately promiſed towards the defraying the Charges of his War againſt the Emperor: But ſo ſoon as the King underſtood his Meſſage, he cauſed the Archbiſhops, Biſhops, Priors, Templars, Hoſpitallers, Earls, Barons, Rectors of Churches, and all thoſe who held of him in Capite, to meet him at Weſtminſter, to conſult upon the above-mention'd Buſineſs and other Exigencies: And when they were all met [2] both the Clergy and Laiety, with their Tenants, or Vaſſals, Stephen opened and recited to them the Pope's Letters, urging both the Occaſion, and the Neceſſity of it, which required, that what was promiſed by the King's Envoys, ſhould be conſented to and made good.

[1] Id. p. 361. The Pope's Chaplain comes into England to Collect the Tenths, upon which the King calls a great Council to conſult about it.

[2] Tam Clericis quam Laicis, & eorum ſubditis.

When he had ended his Speech, all expected the King would have oppoſed it; but he being tied up by the forementioned Promiſe, was afraid to refuſe the Pope's Demands, and ſo ſeemed by his ſilence to give Conſent; yet the Earls and Barons, with all the Laiety, were not ſo Mealy-mouth'd, but ſtoutly reſolved they would not oblige their Baronies and Lay-fees to the Court of Rome; and therefore had compounded with the Legate for a certain Sum of Money, had they not been betray'd by Stephen de Segrave, who joinied with him, and ſo order'd the Matter, that he obtain'd his Demands; for notwithſtanding this Oppoſition, the Biſhops, Abbots, Priors, and other Prelates of Churches, after Three or Four Days Deliberation, and no ſmall Reluctancy, conſented to it, leſt (if they oppoſed) they ſhould incur the Sentence of Excommunication: Then Stephen ſhewed them the Pope's Letter, whereby he was Commiſſionated to collect the aforeſaid Tenths, which were to be paid out of all their Profits whatever, without any Deductions either for Debts or Expences; and he was thereby Impower'd to Excommunicate all thoſe that refuſed, and likewiſe to Interdict their Churches; and becauſe the

The K. being obliged by his Promiſe to the Pope, conſents to the Nuncio's Demand; yet the Earls and Barons ſtoutly oppoſe it.

The Clergy being afraid of the Pope's Excommunication, agree to the Nuncio's Demands.

the Buſineſs required Speed, he gave notice to the Prelates, that they ſhould forthwith pay down what was due for the Tenths, and afterwards levy it upon every one by way of Tax; which Exaction proved ſo grievous, that they were forced to Sell or Pawn their very Veſtments, Chalices, and other Holy Veſſels belonging to their Churches: Moreover, he exacted the Tenths of the Autumnal Fruits of the Earth, while they were yet growing; all which they were forced to procure and pay, to avoid the Excommunication and Interdict: And for the more ſpeedy raiſing of the Money, he brought along with him certain wicked Uſurers, who ſupplied the Indigent with Money, which they were compelled to borrow, although they were thereby irrecoverably ruined. Thus you may ſee to what a ſad Condition the Clergy and Laiety of this Kingdom were at this time reduced, under a Young and Eaſie King, who if he had but had the Courage peremptorily to have ſaid No, the Legate had never durſt to have taken theſe Tenths at all; for Ranulph Earl of Cheſter, was the only Noble Man that oppoſed this Exaction, and would not permit any Religious Man, or Clerk to pay the above-mentioned Tenths within his Earldom, notwithſtanding they were paid every where beſides in England, Wales, Scotland, and Ireland.

Anno Dom. MCCXXIX.

The Tenths are Exacted with great Rigour.

[3] The moſt conſiderable Affair that happen'd this Year, was the King's intended Expedition into France, but it came to nothing, and it was on this Occaſion; On Michaelmaſs-Day the King cauſed the whole Nobility of England (viz.) the Earls, Barons, and Knights, to meet at Portſmouth with ſuch a vaſt number of Horſe and Foot, that none of his Predeceſſors ever aſſembled ſo great an Army together before, with a Reſolution to paſs over Sea to recover thoſe Dominions his Father had loſt: But when the Chief Commanders and Mareſchals of the Army came to Victual the Ships, there were not enough to be found ready to carry over one Half of the Men; whereupon the King hearing of this, was extremely enraged, and laid the whole Blame upon Hubert de Burgh his Juſtitiary, and openly called him Traytor, reproaching him for having received Five Thouſand Marks from the Queen of France to put a ſtop to this Deſign: Nay, he was raiſed to ſuch a height of Paſſion, that he drew his Sword and would have kill'd the Juſtitiary, had not Ranulph Earl of Cheſter, and ſome others interpoſed and prevented it; by which you may obſerve, That this King, though counted a Man of ſmall Spirit, yet could ſhew his Reſentments when he was throughly provoked. But whether this Failure proceeded from the Careleſſneſs or Infidelity of the Juſtitiary (then the King's Chief Miniſter) is uncertain, only it is evident, that it was the Loſs of the whole Deſign.

[3] Id. p. 363. The K. prepares for an Expedition into France, but it comes to nothing, for want of Ships to Tranſport his Army.

The K. lays all the Blame on Hubert de Burgh his Juſtitiary.

[4] On the Ninth of October following Peter* Earl of Bretaigne Landed in England to conduct the King over Sea, as he was bound by former Agreement and Oath; but he then adviſed him to lay aſide all thoughts of it till the Eaſter following, becauſe it was dangerous Sailing at that time of the Year, and a Winter Voyage might be much to his Loſs. Upon this the King gave every one Liberty to go home again, and the Juſtitiary at Length was reconciled to him: Then the Earl did Homage to the King againſt all Men for Bretaigne,

[4] Id. ib.

Matt. Paris* calls him Henry but by miſtake.

The Earl of Bretaigne comes into England, and perſuades the King to put off his Expedition into France till the Spring.

Anno Dom. MCCXXIX. Bretaigne, upon which the King reſtored to him all his Right in England, and having given him Five Thouſand Marks for the Defence of his own Dominions, he took his Leave of him.

I ſhall conclude this Year with an Account of the Affairs of the [5] Holy-Land, where the Emperor being arrived, met with much better Succeſs than he could have expected, notwithſtanding his late Excommunication by the Pope; for the Sultan of Babylon being now extreamly preſſed by Civil Wars, was content to purchaſe the Emperour's Friendſhip, by giving up Jeruſalem, with all the Land of Paleſtine, except ſome Caſtles on the Borders of Arabia, as the Emperour himſelf then ſignified in a Letter to King Henry under his own Seal, the Copy of which our Author has given us at large, to which I refer the Reader, who deſires further Satisfaction therein.

[5] Id. p. 364. The Emperour's great Succeſs in the Holy Land.

[1] Yet notwithſtanding theſe great Succeſſes, the Patriarch of Jeruſalem, together with the Maſters of the Knights-Templars and Hoſpitallers, did all they could to defame the Emperour, (tho' a Great and Worthy Prince) for holding a Correſpondence with the Sultan of Babylon, to the great Prejudice of the Chriſtians, and that he favoured him more than thoſe Knights, who were of his own Religion; and indeed he had very good Reaſon ſo to do, if what our Author relates be true; viz. That when they knew the Emperour intended to go on Pilgrimage to the River Jordan, to ſee the Place where our Saviour was Baptized, ſome of them gave the Sultan notice of it, that ſo he might fall upon the Emperour by ſurprize, and take him Priſoner, or kill him; which Treaſon the Sultan ſo highly deteſted, that he ſent him notice of it, together with the Letter it ſelf: But the Truth of the Matter was, that the Emperour ſtanding at this time Excommunicated by the Pope, who theſe Knights heard now made War upon him in Europe, it emboldened them to do all the Miſchief they could: This Diſſention proved at laſt the ruine of this unſucceſsful Enterprize, as you will find hereafter.

[1] Id. ib. The Patriarch and Knights Hoſpitallers of Jeruſalem defame the Emperor, and endeavour to deſtroy him.

Anno Dom. MCCXXX. [2] This Year the King held his Chriſtmas at York, where the King of Scots met him, being invited thither by the King; the Archbiſhop of that Place, and many Earls, Barons, and Knights, and a very great Multitude of their Followers being there preſent; and having celebrated this Feaſt with great Joy and Hoſpitality for Three Days, the King of Scots returned into his own Country, and the King of England to London.

[2] Id. ib. The K. and Great Men meet at York.

[3] This Year the Archbiſhops, Biſhops, Abbots, and Priors throughout England, gave the King a great Sum of Money for recovering his Rights, which were taken from his Father beyond Sea; and upon the ſame account the Citizens of London were put to a grievous Ranſom, and the Jews forced to pay the Third part of their Subſtance.

[3] Id. p. 365.

[4] At Eaſter following, the King muſtered a very numerous Army of all the Nobility of the Kingdom that owed him Military Service, at Reading, and marched from thence to Portſmouth the Thirtieth of April, and there took Shipping with the greateſt part of his Forces, and landed at St. Maloes on the Third of May, where he was

was very kindly received by Peter Earl of Bretaigne, who delivered up to him the ſtrong Towns and Caſtles of that Country, and ſeveral of the Nobility did Homage and ſwore Fealty to him; but a Baron, called Andrew de Viteri, with ſome others, refuſed it, and fortified their Caſtles. So ſoon as the King of France heard of this, he raiſed an Army, and came to Angiers, and poſted himſelf there to hinder King Henry's march into Poictou, who continued ſtill at Nants, expecting the reſidue of his Army. Anno Dom. MCCXXX.

[5] About this time there happened a great Diſcord among the French Nobility, many of them (as was reported) being ſecretly Confederated with the King of England, and Earl of Bretaigne, the Chief of whom were the Duke of Burgundy, the Earl of Boloigne, the Earl of Drieux, the Earl of Maſcun, the Earl of St. Paul, the Earl of Bar, Engeram de Curci, and Robert de Courteney; all theſe declared War againſt the Earls of Champaigne and Flanders; who having been forty Days at the Siege of Angiers, they obtained leave of King Lewis, and returned home; who ſeeing he could not keep them there any longer, preſently followed, and endeavoured to make Peace between thoſe Noblemen and the Earls of Champaigne and Flanders, but could not; for they entred Champaigne, and deſtroyed all before them with Fire and Sword: The Earl was ſoon defeated, and put to flight, and they purſued him to the Gates of Paris.

[5] Id. ib. A great Diſcord ariſes among the French Nobility, many of whom ſecretly confederated with K. Henry.

The French Nobility deſtroy Champagne with Fire and Sword.

That which moved theſe Great Men ſo much againſt the Earl of Champaigne, was, that they ſuſpected him to have had a hand in poiſoning the late King Lewis at Avignon, of which they had accuſed him before the young King, and challenged him to anſwer it by Duel; but through the Powerful Influence of the Queen-Mother, he would hear nothing againſt him: Hereupon they left the Court, and occaſioned great Commotions in France, diſdaining to have ſuch a Miſtreſs as was ſuſpected to have proſtituted her ſelf to the unchaſt Embraces both of this Earl and the Pope's Legate. Id. Ib.

[1] About the ſame time Fulco Paganel, and William his Brother, Noblemen of Normandy, came to King Henry in Bretaigne, and ſwore Fealty and did Homage to him, and likewiſe about Sixty Knights, Stout and Powerful Men, who all perſwaded him to enter Normandy with an Army, and he ſhould not in the leaſt doubt of Succeſs: The King liked their Advice very well, but Hubert de Burgh the Juſtitiary would not ſuffer him to follow it, alledging, That the Attempt ſeemed to be every way dangerous: So theſe Noblemen went away miſerably diſappointed, for the King of France forthwith ſeized their Caſtles and Eſtates; but the reaſon why the Juſtitiary thought this Expedition more dangerous than any other, I do not find.

[1] Id. ib. Several Noblemen of Normandy invite the K. into that Province.

But he is diverted by his Council, which proves their ruin.

After this, by the Advice of Hubert de Burgh, the King marched with his Army through Anjou into Poictou, and from thence into Gaſcoigny, where having received their Homages, and ſecured the Country, he returned into Poictou, and received the like of ſeveral of his Vaſſals there; and in this Expedition the King took the ſtrong Caſtle of Mirebel.

Anno Dom. MCCXXX.

[2] In the Month of September, the King of France and the Queen-Regent his Mother met in a * Parliament, or General Assembly, with all the Nobility and Great Men of that Kingdom, who after the death of the King's Father, had made War one upon another, in which Assembly a Peace was concluded on the following Conditions: First, That the Earl of Champaigne (the Principal Author of the late Disturbance) should undertake the Crusado to the Holy Land, and there with an Hundred Knights fight against the Enemies of the Christian Faith: Secondly, That the King of France and his Mother should swear upon the Holy Gospels, to restore to every one his Right, and that they would Judge all Men of that Nation according to the Right, Custom or Law due to every Man.

[2] Id. p. 367. The French K meets all his Nobility in a Parliament.

* Colloquium. Where he makes Peace among the Nobility, the Earl of Champaigne being sent into the Holy Land.

[3] In the mean time, King Henry with his Army lay idle at Nantes, doing nothing but wasting his Treasure: The Earls and Barons seeing Hubert de Burgh would not permit them to fight with their Enemies, Feasted each other according to the English manner, and drank as if it had been at Christmas; so that those Noblemen and Gentlemen who were poor having spent all their Money, sold or pawned their Horses and Arms. At length the King in October, having provided in some measure for the Defence of the Country, and left Five hundred Knights and a Thousand * Stipendiaries, or Footmen, under the Command of Ranulph Earl of Chester, William Mareschal, and William Earl of Albemarl, took shipping, and landed at Portsmouth on the Twenty sixth of that Month: After his departure, the Earl of Chester and Others, whom he had left Commanders in Chief, made an Incursion with the whole Army into Anjou, and took Gontier-Castle, demolished it, and burnt the Town; and presently after invading Normandy in like manner, they burnt the Town, took the Castle of Pontarsu, and razed it; and then returned into Bretaigne with great Spoils, and without any considerable Loss to themselves.

[3] Id. ib. The K. with his Army lies idle in France, and spends his Money vainly.

* Servientes. And then in Autumn is forced to return into England.

After his departure, the Earl of Chester and others make an Invasion into Anjou.

[4] I shall conclude this Year with an Account of the Affairs of Ireland, where during King Henry's absence, about July the King of Connaught, knowing that William the Mareschal and Maurice Fitz-Gerald, were gone over into France, so that Ireland was left without any great Force to defend it, raised a mighty Army, (or rather a great Number of People) and entred into the English Territories, spoiling and burning the Country; the News whereof being brought to Geoffrey de Maris (then Deputy-Justitiary) he calling to his Assistance Walter Lacy and Richard de Burgh, raised a considerable Force, with which he fought and beat the Irish, killed Twenty thousand of them, and took their King Prisoner.

But is defeated by Geoffrey de Maris and others.

[5] This Year the King at Christmas kept his Court at Lambeth, and on the Twenty sixth of January, he met his Prelates and other Great Men at Westminster, where he required a Scutage of Three Marks of every Knight's Fee of all that held Baronies of him, both Laicks and Prelates; but Richard Archbishop of Canterbury and some Bishops opposed it, alledging, That Ecclesiasticks were not to be Taxed by, or with Lay-men: however, all the rest, as well Laicks, as Clerks and Prelates, readily submitted to the King's Pleasure.

Anno Dom. MCCXXXI.

Id. p. 367. The K. holds a great Council, and therein demands Scutage of the Tenants in Capite.

[1] Soon

Anno Dom. MCCXXXI.

[1] Soon after this, the Archbiſhop of Canterbury complained to the King, That Earl Hubert his Juſtitiary had poſſeſſed himſelf of the Caſtle and Town of Tonbridge, and all other Lands which belonged to Gilbert late Earl of Glouceſter deceaſed, from which Homage was due to the Church of Canterbury: But the King replied, That the above-mentioned Earl held of him in Capite, and it was his Prerogative to diſpoſe of the Wardſhips of Earls and Barons, and of their Heirs, to whom he pleaſed, till they ſhould come to full Age. When the Archbiſhop found he could not obtain any other Anſwer, he Excommunicated all thoſe that had entred upon the aforeſaid Poſſeſſions, and alſo every one (except the King) that ſhould converſe with them; and then went to Rome to proſecute his Suit in that Court. The King likewiſe ſent Roger de Cantelupe, with ſome others, to plead his Cauſe before the Pope.

[1] Id. p. 368. The A. B of Canterbury complains to the K. againſt the Juſtitiary, and for what reaſon. Whereupon the K. aſſerts his Prerogative to diſpoſe of Wardſhips. The A. B. excommunicates all thoſe that entred upon his Poſſeſſions, and then goes to Rome to defend his Cauſe.

[2] About Eaſter Earl Richard, the King's Brother, married Iſabel Counteſs-Dowager of Glouceſter, Siſter to William the Mareſchal, Earl of Pembroke, which William died immediately after that Solemnity.

[2] Id. ib. Earl Richard the K.'s Brother marries the Counteſs Dowager of Glouceſter.

[3] This Year in May, the Welſh, under their King Llewellyn, made many Incurſions, and committed great Spoils upon the Borders of Wales, ſparing neither Sacred Perſons nor Places: When the Biſhops and Prelates heard of it, they Excommunicated that Prince, and all his Adherents and Abettors; and the King having raiſed an Army at Oxford, marched ſpeedily into the Marches of Wales, as far as Hereford, to ſuppreſs them: During his ſtay there, the Governour of Montgomery-Caſtle, being over-reached by the Treachery of a Monk of Combermeer-Abbey, (whom Prince Llewellyn had ſuborned for that purpoſe,) marched out with the Soldiers of that Garriſon againſt the Welſh Prince; but he then lying ſtrongly encamped in a Place not far off, encompaſſed with Bogs, the Welſh feigned a Retreat; and the Engliſh being by this Stratagem drawn into the Bog, were there ſet upon by the Welſh, almoſt all cut off, and the reſt taken Priſoners: But when King Henry heard of it, he preſently marched againſt the Welſh, and entring their Country, they fled before him: Then the King rebuilt Maud-Caſtle, which the Welſh had formerly demoliſhed, and placed a ſtrong Gariſon in it to hinder their further Incurſions; and having finiſhed it, in October he returned into England.

[3] Id. ib. The Welſh make Incurſions, and therefore are excommunicated by the Engliſh Biſhops. The K. marches with an Army to the Borders of Wales, where his Forces receive a Defeat. The King rebuilds Maud-Caſtle, and returns home.

As to foreign Affairs this Year, in June the King of France with a great Army deſigned to invade Bretaigne, but was prevented by the Earls of Bretaigne and Cheſter, who had laid an Ambuſh to intercept his Carriages with the Victuals and Engines of War, which met with ſuch good Succeſs, that they took and deſtroyed them all. The French being thus ſurprized and diſcouraged, a Truce was agreed upon, and concluded for Three Years, between the Two Kings; On the King of France's part, by the Archbiſhop of Rhemes and Earl of Boloigne; and on the King of England's part by the Earls of Bretaigne and Cheſter, who ſoon after came into England with Richard the new Earl-Mareſchal, and were kindly received by the King: Then that Earl offered to do Homage, and whatſoever elſe was required of him, as Heir to his Brother William the Mareſchal deceaſed; To whom the King, by the Advice of his Juſtitiary, [4] Id. p. 369. The King of France deſigning to invade Bretaigne, is prevented by the Earl of that Province and the Earl of Cheſter, who ſurprize all his Carriages; whereupon a Truce is made for three Years.

Richard the Earl-Mareſchal offers to do Homage for his late Brother's Eſtate; but is by the K. refuſed, and commanded to depart the Kingdom.

[5] Id. ib. Whereupon the Earl paſſes into Ireland, and reſolves to recover his Eſtate by force. Which makes the K. accept his Homage, and grant him all his Rights.

Anno Dom. MCCXXXI. gave this Anſwer, That he heard his Brother's Wife was with Child, and therefore would not determine any thing till that was certainly known, whether it were ſo or not; adding moreover, that he had confederated with his Enemies in France, and upon that account commanded him to depart the Kingdom within Fifteen Days, and never to return again upon pain of perpetual Impriſonment.

[5] When he had received this harſh Anſwer from the King, he paſſed over into Ireland, and there was kindly received; and having all his Brother's Caſtles delivered to him, had Homage and Fealty done him by his Tenants; alſo Pembroke-Caſtle, with the Honour belonging to it, was yielded to him. After this, he got together a great Number of Armed Men, reſolving (if Neceſſity required) to recover his Inheritance by Force. The King upon this changed his Thoughts, and accepted his Homage and Fealty, and granted him all his Rights, taking only the accuſtomed Relief.

[1] Id. p. 370. The A. B. of Canterbury arrives at Rome, and makes great Complaints to the Pope againſt the King.

[1] As for Eccleſiaſtical Affairs, about this time Richard Archbiſhop of Canterbury arrived at Rome, and in the Pope's Preſence made the following Complaints, (viz.) 'That the King was abſo-'lutely guided by Hubert the Juſtitiary; and that the Affairs of the 'Kingdom were wholly tranſacted by his private Advice, without 'conſulting that of his Great Men; That the Juſtitiary had mar-'ried his former Wife's near Kinſwoman, and had invaded the 'Rights of the Church of Canterbury, and refuſed to reſtore them; 'That the Biſhops his Suffragans had neglected their Paſtoral Care, 'and had betaken themſelves to Try Lay-Cauſes in the Exchequer, 'and gave Judgment in Matters of Bloud; That the Beneficed 'Clerks, and ſuch as were in Holy Orders, had divers Churches 'with Cure of Souls; and, according to the Examples of the 'Biſhops, intruded themſelves into Secular Affairs. On the other ſide, the King's Envoy pleaded many things on their Maſter's and the Juſtitiary's behalf, but to very little purpoſe; for the Pope had Commanded, that the Archbiſhop ſhould have his Buſineſs forthwith diſpatched, according as he deſired: However, in his return home he died at St. Gemma, three days Journey from Rome, and ſo the whole Tranſaction expired with him.

But carries his Cauſe againſt the K.'s Envoys.

And dies in his return home.

This Archbiſhop ſate ſo ſmall a time, that we can make no Character good or bad concerning him, more than that he was a vigorous Aſſerter of the Rights of his See, as appears by his travelling to Rome upon ſo ſlight an Errand as the retaining of a Caſtle, and ſome Eſtate that he claimed during the Nonage of the young Earl of Glouceſter.

[2] Id. ib. The K. would have married the K. of Scots Siſter, but is diſſwaded from it by his Nobility, and for what Reaſon.

[2] In October the King offered to marry the King of Scots Siſter, but the Earls and Barons, and eſpecially the Mareſchal, oppoſed it, alledging, that it was not for his Honour to marry the Younger, when his Juſtitiary had married the Elder Siſter; ſo at length he was prevail'd upon by the Earl of Bretaigne and the Mareſchal to deſiſt from that Deſign. After this, he gave the Earl of Bretaigne Five thouſand Marks of Silver, and ſo he returned into his own Country.

[3] The

[3] The Monks of Canterbury having choſen Ralph Nevil Biſhop of Chicheſter and Chancellor of England, Archbiſhop, they preſented him to the King on the Nineteenth of September, who confirmed their Choice, and forthwith inveſted him with the Temporalties, belonging to the Archbiſhoprick: Then the Monks deſired their Elect to allow them Money for their Expences in their Journey to the Court of Rome, to procure his Election to be confirmed; but he replied, He thought it was Simoniacal, and upon that account would not conſent to allow them one Farthing; However the Monks proceeded in their Journey, and Petitioned the Pope to confirm their Choice; but he being before informed of the Merits of the Perſon by Simon Langton, gave them this Anſwer, That the Perſon they had choſe was an Illiterate Man and a Courtier, and if he were promoted to that Dignity, he would concur with the King and Kingdom to ſhake off that Subjection to the See of Rome, to which King John had long ago ſubmitted it; whereupon the Pope voided the Election, and commanded the Monks to proceed to a new Choice of one who would be Faithful, and Devoted to the Roman Church.

Anno Dom. MCCXXXI.

[3] Id. ib. The Monks of Canterbury chuſe Ralph Biſhop of Chicheſter A. Bp. and preſent him to the K. who confirmed their Choice.

But the Pope voids the Election, becauſe the Biſhop was a Courtier, and illiterate.

[4] This Year King Henry kept his Chriſtmas at Wincheſter, and upon the Seventh of March he met the Great Men, as well Prelates as Laicks at Weſtminſter, to whom he declared That his late Expedition beyond Sea, had involved him in Great Debts, wherefore he was now forced to require of every one a general Aid; to whom Ranulph Earl of Cheſter replied in the Name of all the Great Men, 'That 'the Earls, Barons, and Knights, who held of him in Capite, had 'Perſonally ſerved him, and had been at great Expences to no pur-'poſe, whereby they were reduced to Poverty, and therefore of 'Right they owed the King no further Aid; and then having asked leave of him, all the Laicks departed: But the Prelates anſwered him dilatorily, 'That many Abbots who were Summoned, were 'not yet come up, and therefore deſired it might be deferred for ſome 'time longer, and that a Day might be appointed for all of them to 'meet together, and conſult what ought to be done in that Affair, which was agreed to by the King; and the Quindene, or Fifteenth day after Eaſter was appointed for their next meeting.

Anno Dom. MCCXXXII.

[4] Id. ib p. 372. The K. meets the Great Men both of the Clergy and Laiety at Weſtminſter, and there demands an Aid of them

Which the Earls, Barons, &c. refuſe to grant, and deſire leave to go home.

But the Prelates give a dilatory Anſwer.

[5] This Year many Men of Good Quality, with others of leſs Note, taking Arms violently enter'd the Barns of the Roman, (or Italian) Clergy-Men that were Beneficed in England, and carried away, and diſtributed their Corn, and ſometimes Money, among the Poor. There were about Fourſcore, and ſometimes more, that were the Authors of this preſumptuous Attempt; but one William Witham, (whoſe true Name was Robert Thinge, (alias Twenge) a Knight, was their chief Leader, to whom they paid a moſt ready Obedience. When theſe Diſorders had reach'd the Pope's Ears, he ſent very ſevere Letters to the King, blaming him for permitting ſuch Rapine to be Executed on Clergy-men; and commanding him upon pain of Excommunication and Interdict, to make ſtrict Enquiry after the Authors of this Violence, and to puniſh them according to the heinouſneſs of their Offence; that ſo others might be terrified from committing the like: And by his Letters he Commiſſioned Peter

[5] Id. p. 375. Corn and Money taken from the Italian Clergy-men, and given to the Poor by certain Perſons unknown.

The Pope writes to the K. to make Enquiry into the Authors of this Violence.

Anno Dom. MCCXXXII. Peter Biſhop of Wincheſter, and the Abbot of St. Edmunds-Bury, to make an Inquiſition in the South of England; and in the North, the Archbiſhop of York, the Biſhop of Durham, and John a Roman and Chanon of York, to make ſtrict ſearch, and whomſoever they found Tranſgreſſors in this Kind, that they ſhould forthwith Excommunicate them, and ſend them to Rome to be Abſolved.

The Pope alſo appoints Commiſſioners to make Inquiſition, and to Excommunicate the Guilty.

[1] When the Inquiſition was Executed, and Witneſſes Examined upon Oath, a Great many conſiderable Perſons were found either actually guilty of the above-mentioned Rapine, or at leaſt conſenting to it; in which number were ſome of the Biſhops, and others of the King's Clerks, with ſome Archdeacons and Deans, beſides many Knights and Laymen; ſo that divers High-Sheriffs, their Bailiffs, and other Miniſters, were by the King's Command taken up, and Committed to Priſon; ſeveral through Fear fled and could not be found; Nay, Hubert de Burgh the Juſtitiary, was himſelf accuſed as a Tranſgreſſor, for that he had granted the King's Letters, together with his own, that they ſhould not be hinder'd in their violent Actings; amongſt Others there came to the King the aforeſaid Robert Twenge, and brought with him Five Eſquires, who were his Coadjutors, and openly profeſſed that they had plundered the Roman Clergy, to revenge an Injury which he had formerly received by the Pope's Sentence, whereby 'twas endeavoured by manifeſt Fraud to force from him the only Church he had in his Gift; adding withal, That he had rather for a Time be unjuſtly Excommunicated, than loſe the Patronage of his Benefice without due Judgment: Then the King and Inquiſitors adviſed him to go to Rome, and make out his Right before the Pope, and pray his Abſolution; and the King thereupon gave him Teſtimonial Letters of his Right to the Pope, deſiring him earneſtly for his ſake to give this Knight Audience.

[1] Id. ib. Many conſiderable Perſons are accuſed and impriſon'd.

Robert Twenge comes to the King, and juſtifies what he had done.

[2] Id. p. 376. The Monks of Canterbury chuſe John their Subprior, Archbiſhop.

[2] The Convent of Canterbury having lately choſe John their Sub-Prior, Archbiſhop, he arrived at Rome in Whitſon-Week, and delivering his Letters of Election to the Pope, he commanded ſome of his Cardinals to Examine him, who after Three Days Tryal, profeſſed before the Pope, that they could find no cauſe of Rejecting him; yet however the Pope looked upon him to be too Old and Weak for ſo great a Truſt, and perſuaded him to renounce his Election, which he willingly did, and begg'd leave to go home again; Then the Pope granted Licence to the Monks of Canterbury, and Commanded them to chuſe ſuch an One to whom he might commit the Paſtoral Care.

But the Pope rejects him, and commands the Monks to chuſe another.

[3] Id. ib. The Welſh make Inroads into England, whereupon the King's Councellors upbraid him for ſuffering it.

[3] This Year about Whitſon-Week, the Welſh under the Conduct of their Prince Llewellyn, made ſeveral Inroads into England, and began to Burn and Plunder as they uſed to do: But when Peter Biſhop of Wincheſter and ſome other Councellors, told the King it was a great Reproach to his Crown to ſuffer ſuch an Inconſiderable People as the Welſh were, thus to Rob and Spoil his Subjects; He anſwered, That his Treaſurers told him, his Revenues would ſcarce afford him Meat and Cloaths, and to ſatisfie the accuſtomed Alms*, much leſs any thing for Warlike Expeditions; To which they replied, 'That he made himſelf Poor by giving away the Honours, 'Wardſhips, and vacant Dignities which ought to come into the 'Exchequer,

The K. in excuſe pleads Poverty.

'Exchequer, ſo that he had the Name, but not the Eſtate and Riches 'of a King; adding withal, That his Predeceſſors were ſplendid 'both in Glory and Wealth; and that this proceeded from the 'great Care they took of their Revenues. Whereupon the King took this Hint, and preſently called his Sheriffs and Bailiffs to an Account, and whoever was convicted of Fraud, was removed from his Office, and forced to pay the Whole into the Exchequer with Uſury: He alſo removed Ranulph Breton Treaſurer of his Chamber, from his Office, and Fined him a Thouſand Pounds in Silver; and by the Advice of Peter Biſhop of Wincheſter, (whoſe Councel the King now in all things followed,) Peter de Rivaux his Nephew, a Poictovin, was placed in his Room; by which means the King's Coffers were for a while plentifully ſupply'd.

Anno Dom. MCCXXXII.

The K. calls his Officers to Account, and gets much Money from them.

[4] About this time alſo, by the Advice of the ſame Biſhop, Hubert de Burgh was removed from the Office of Juſtitiary, although (as it was ſaid) he had the King's Patent for it during Life, and Stephen de Segrave placed in his Room, on the Twenty Ninth of July: Some few days after, the King, being very much incenſed againſt Hubert, required him to give an Account of all ſuch Moneys and other Revenues that had paſſed through his Hands, ever ſince he had been Juſtitiary.

[4] Id. Ib. Hubert de Burgh is removed from being Juſtitiary, and called to an Account for what he had received.

To this Hubert anſwered, That he had King John's Charter, whereby he was diſcharged of all Accounts, who having ſo often experienced his Faithfulneſs, would not receive any Account from him: The Biſhop of Wincheſter replied, 'That that Charter was not valid, af-'ter King John's Death, and did not at all bind the preſent King 'from exacting an Account from him: But to this was added, That 'he had been Guilty of ſeveral Treaſonable Practices, and had gi-'ven Treacherous Advice to the King, much to the Prejudice both 'of King and Kingdom: To all which the King required him to an-'ſwer, and ſtand to the Judgment of the Court.

Hubert makes his Defence.

Hereupon Hubert ſeeing himſelf much preſſed and ſtreightned, required ſome time to give in his Anſwer, which was with great difficulty obtained, and the Fourteenth of September following was the Day appointed: In the mean time he took Sanctuary in the Priory of Merton, and being now deſerted by all his Friends, (except the Archbiſhop of Dublin) his Enemies daily increaſed, and many other falſe and improbable Crimes, (too large here to be recited) were laid to his Charge; Namely, That he had procured William late Earl of Salisbury, William Mareſchal late Earl of Pembroke, Faux de Brent, and Richard Archbiſhop of Canterbury, to be Poiſoned; That he had gained the King's Affection by Sorcery and Witchcraft; Others accuſed him of Injuſtice, Extortion, and Rapine; and the Londoners entered their Complaint againſt him for condemning their Fellow Citizen Conſtantine to be Hang'd without Legal Proceſs: All which Crimes were ſo highly aggravated before the King, that he cauſed it to be proclaimed in London, That whoever had any Complaint againſt Hubert, ſhould come to him, and he ſhould have Juſtice done him.

And obtains time till September to put in his Anſwer.

Many other great Crimes are laid to his Charge.

[5] On

Anno Dom. MCCXXXII.

[5] On the Fourteenth of September, the King aſſembled the Biſhops, and other Prelates of the Church, with the Nobles of the Kingdom at Lambeth, by whom the Fortieth Part of all the Moveables of Biſhops, Abbots, Priors, Clerks, and Laicks, were granted to the King, for the Payment of the Debt he owed the Earl of Bretaigne: Then Hubert the late Juſtitiary, being called to anſwer the Articles exhibited againſt him, and fearing the King would put him to ſome ſhameful Death, had taken Sanctuary with the Chanons of Merton, and durſt not appear in the King's Court, to plead to thoſe Articles, until the King ſhould be in a milder Temper; whereupon in a great Rage he ſent to the Mayor of London to force him from thence, and bring him either Dead or Alive: The Londoners, glad of this Opportunity to revenge themſelves upon Hubert, upon ringing the Common Bell, gathered together in great Numbers, (as it was reported about Twenty thouſand of them) but ſome of the more diſcreet Citizens dreading the ill Conſequences of ſuch Tumults, went to the Biſhop of Wincheſter's Houſe in Southwark, and deſired his Advice, who told them, That whatever came of it, they muſt execute the King's Precept; but Ranulph Earl of Cheſter ſuggeſted to the King. That if theſe Tumultuous Proceedings were countenanced, ſuch a Sedition at any time might be raiſed, as could not eaſily be appeaſed; adding further, That it would be a great Reproach to him Abroad, and eſpecially in France, when they heard he thus treated thoſe that had been his Favourites; which ſo prevail'd upon him, that he preſently diſpatched away a Meſſenger, with Letters to revoke his former Precept: At this the Citizens were ſtartled, being diſappointed of their Revenge, yet paying Obedience to the King's Orders, they returned into the City.

[5] Id. p. 377, 378 Proceribus. A Parliament at Lambeth, which grants the K. a Fortieth Part of all Moveables Hubert de Burgh having taken Sanctuary, durſt not make his Anſwer.

The K. ſends the Mayor of London to fetch him out alive, or dead.

The Earl of Cheſter perſuades the K. to revoke his Orders for fear of a Sedition.

[1] After this the Archbiſhop of Dublin prevailed with the King to grant Hubert time till the Octaves of Epiphany to prepare his Anſwer. In the mean time Hubert thinking himſelf ſecure by the King's Letters Patents, deſigned a Viſit to his Wife, who was then at St. Edmunds-Bury; but when the King heard of it, he ſent Geoffrey Craucumbe with Three hundred Armed Men to apprehend him, and bring him Priſoner to the Tower: Upon this, going down, and finding him in Eſſex in a ſmall Chappel with the Croſs in One hand, and the Hoſte (taken from the Altar) in the Other, they wrung them both out of his Hands, and without reſpect to the Place, violently dragg'd him forth; and having Fetter'd and Chain'd his Feet under the Horſe's Belly, they brought him in a moſt reproachful manner to London, and committed him to the Tower.

[1] Id. ib. Hubert has farther time granted till the Octaves of Epiphany to make his Anſwer.

Notwithſtanding which he is drawn out of the Sanctuary by Force, and committed to the Tower.

[2] But Roger Biſhop of London hearing how Hubert had been treated, went in all haſte to the King, and very ſeverely rebuked him for this breach of the Church's Peace; and told him, That if he did not preſently ſet him at Liberty, and ſend him back again to the Chappel from whence he had been taken, he would Excommunicate all that were concerned in this Violation of the Church's Privileges.

[2] Id. p. 379. The Biſhop of London rebukes the K. for it.

[3] The King hereat being terrified, acknowledged his Fault, and him back again to the Chappel from whence he had been taken; but at the ſame time ſent to the Sheriffs of Hertford and Eſſex upon pain of being Hang'd, to go in their own Perſons, with all the Men of both both Counties, and encompass the Chappel, that Hubert might neither make his Escape, nor receive any Victuals from any one: Then Luke Archbishop of Dublin, his only Friend who then stood by him, supplicated the King with Tears to know his Pleasure concerning him. Upon this the King offered him his choice of Three things, either for ever to Abjure the Kingdom, or be condemned to Perpetual Imprisonment, or else to confess himself a Traitor: But Hubert would chuse none of them, being conscious to himself that he had done nothing to deserve so severe a Proceeding; yet to satisfie the King, he said he would be content to quit the Kingdom for some time, but would not abjure it for ever: Yet rather than be starved, he at last yielded himself to the Sheriffs above-mentioned, who brought him up to London fettered and chained, and delivered him Prisoner to the Tower. Anno Dom. MCCXXXII.

He yields in part to the K.'s Offers and renders himself to the Sheriffs.

About this time was collected the Fortieth Part of all Goods lately granted to the King in the Parliament at Lambeth: The Form of the Commission to the Sheriffs of the several Counties, and the manner how it was to be levied and collected, is expressed at large in the Commission to the Collector, and is to be found in * Matt. Paris, f. 380. to which I refer the curious Reader.

The Tax of a 40th part of all Goods now collected.

About the Feast of St. Martin following, [4] the King was informed, that Hubert had much Treasure lodged with the Knights Templars; whereupon he sent for the Master of the New Temple to know the truth of it, who acknowledged the Money, but could not tell the Sum, but however refused to deliver it, unless he was authorized by Hubert himself: Then the King sent his Treasurer, with the Justices, or Barons of the Exchequer, to Hubert, who in the King's Name demanded of him all the Treasure he had lodged with the Templars. To which Hubert replied, He would readily submit himself and all that he had to the King's Pleasure, and presently authorized the Templars to deliver all the Keys of his Treasure to the King, which when he received, he commanded an Inventory to be made, and delivered to him, and the Money to be paid into his Exchequer. His Enemies hearing of this great Treasure, accused him to the King of Theft and Fraud, urging, that he deserved a shameful Death. To whom the King replied, That Hubert had faithfully served his Uncle King Richard and the King his Father, (as he had heard) and if he had done otherwise towards himself, he should never be put to death; for he had rather appear too merciful than too cruel to one who had so often preserved both his Predecessors and Himself in great Dangers: And the King being now softned into Compassion, regranted to him all the Lands which the King his Father had given him, as also those he had purchased: And soon after, Earl Richard the King's Brother, William Earl of Warren, Richard Earl-Marshal, and William Earl of Ferrars, became Sureties for his Good-behaviour; whereupon he was sent Prisoner to the Castle of the Devises, under the Custody of Four of their Knights, and then he appointed Laurence, a Clerk of St. Albans, Steward of the Lands granted him, who had been a faithful Friend, and great Comfort to him in all his Afflictions.

Anno Dom. MCCXXXII.

The Substance of this Composition or Judgment, is also to be found upon * Record in the Tower, though it doth not agree in all Points as to the exact Circumstance of Time, and the Crimes already laid to his Charge: For the Record only recites, 'That 'whereas the Pope having wrote to King Henry to correct the In- 'juries that Hubert de Burgh had done to the Roman Church, and 'the Italian Clerks here in England, that thereupon the King sent 'to Arrest his Body, and bring him to answer before him espe- 'cially for that very matter; and that Hubert having notice of 'this, fled into a Chapel, from whence those that pursued him '(though they had no Order to do it) took him, and carried him 'to London; That when the King heard of this, being desirous to 'maintain the Liberty of the Church, he commanded him to be 'carried back to the same Chapel; in which when he had conti- 'nued several Days, he was asked whether he would remain in 'the Chapel, or go out, and stand Trial in the King's Court con- 'cerning that Offence, whatsoever else should there be objected 'against him by the King and divers others, who had exhibited 'their Complaints; and that at length he voluntarily chose to 'come out, and stand to the Law; yet begged the King's Mercy; 'And that the King's Officers there present had received him, car- 'ried him to London, and delivered him to the Constable of the 'Tower; That the King not satisfied with this, sent Stephen de Sea- 'grave, then Justitiary, John de Lacy Earl of Lincoln, Brian de 'Lisle, and others, to know whether he was forced, or went out 'voluntarily? That his Answer was, He went out freely, and not 'for want of Victuals, or any other thing; and that he was ashamed 'he had staid there so long: That then the King commanded he 'should be out of the Custody of the Constable of the Tower, 'that he might come freely to his Court; and so he came to Cora- 'hul in London upon the Eve of St. Martin, and appeared before 'Richard Earl of Cornwal, William Earl of Warren, Richard the Ma- 'reschal Earl of Pembroke, John Earl of Lincoln, Stephen Segrave 'the Justitiary, Ralph Fitz-Nicholas, and others, the King's Tenants, 'or * Feudataries there assembled; where being accused, he would 'make no Defence, but submitted himself wholly to the King's 'Pleasure, concerning his Body, Lands, and Goods: That the 'King, at the Instance of the Great Men, and the Petition of Hu- 'bert with his Friends and Relations, and by the Consent of his 'Accusers, respited the Judgment, notwithstandin g it was drawn 'up in open Court, and voluntarily granted him these following 'Terms, viz. That having delivered up to the King all his Lands, 'Tenements, and Liberties, which he held of him in Capite, and 'of King John his Father, and all Writings and Instruments that 'concerned them, he should retain and enjoy the Lands and Te- 'nements which descended to him from his Ancestors, with all 'the Lands and Tenements he held of others, except the King; 'yet so as he should answer to all his other Accusers, according to 'the Custom of the Kingdom; and that all his Chattels (whatso- 'ever they were) as well Gold, Silver, Money, or other Goods, 'should be the King's; and his Body to remain at the Castle of 'Devises, in the Custody of Richard Earl of Cornwal, William Earl of Warren, Richard the Mareschal Earl of Pembroke, and John Earl of Lincoln, until he took upon him the Habit of the Friars-Templars, or was delivered by the Common Council of the King, and of all the foresaid Barons his Keepers, and of all the Great Men of the Land: And if he should by any ways or means break, or endeavour to break Prison, or any ways transgress this Agreement, then the First Judgment was to take effect, and wheresoever, or by whomsoever he should be found, he was to be used as an Out-law. This Judgment of the King's proved much more easie, because during Hubert's Confinement in the said Chapel, his great Enemy Randolph Earl of Chester deceased at Wallingford-Castle, and dying without Issue, his Nephew John Son to Earl David, Brother to the King of Scots, succeeded in the Earldom of Chester.

Anno Dom. MCCXXXIII

Toward the latter end of this Year, in December, Prince Llewellyn granted and promised the King to stand to the Determination of Ralph Bishop of Chichester, and Chancellor Alexander Bishop of Lichfield and Coventry, Richard the Mareschal Earl of Pembroke, John de Lacy Earl of Lincoln, Constable of Chester, Stephen de Segrave Justiciary of England, and Ralph Fitz-Nicholas the King's Steward, together with Idenerth, Llewellyn's Steward, Werenve his Brother, Griffith Vaghan, and David the Clerk, concerning what Amends were to be made for all Excesses and Transgressions on both sides, and for the restitution of all Lands and Possessions, and what Money was to be paid for Damages sustained, as appears by Agreement, which is still upon Record in the Tower, and bears Date at Shrewsbury.

Note, In this Record Llewellyn is only stiled Prince of Aberfraw (in the Isle of Anglesey) as being the chief place of his abode.

As for Ecclesiastical Affairs, nothing happened this Year considerable, but that the Pope ordained a General Visitation of all Religious Houses throughout the Western Church, as appears by his Letters or Bull in [5] Matt. Paris, to the Suffragan Bishops of the Province of Canterbury, who were thereby Authorized to visit such Houses of Monks, Nuns, Canons Regular, that lay within their respective Dioceses, and were not exempt from their Jurisdiction: As for those that were exempt, and belonged particularly to the Pope's own Visitation, he appointed them Commissioners for that purpose, who carried themselves so rigorously and insolently in many Places, that they forced divers Abbots and Priors to appeal to the Pope, and after a great deal of Trouble and Money spent, the only comfort they could obtain was, to have new Visitors assigned them.

[5] Id. p. 384. The Pope orders a General Visitation of all Monasteries.

[6] Also in Autumn this Year, Master John Blund, Clerk and Doctor in Divinity in Oxford, was, by the Monks of Christ-Church in Canterbury, chosen Archbishop, and being accepted by the King, went to Rome to obtain the Pope's Confirmation.

Anno Dom. MCCXXXIII

[7] This Year King Henry at Christmas kept his Court at Worcester, where, by the Advice of Peter Bishop of Winchester, as it was reported, he removed all his Natural-born Subjects from their Offices and Places at Court, and put Strangers (being Poictovins) into their rooms, and would trust none but the foresaid Bishop and Peter de Rivaulx his Kinsman; so that the Management of all Publick Affairs was now committed to them: Then many Poictovins and Bretaignes

[7] Id. p. 384. The K. turns out the English, and puts in Foreigners in all Places of Trust.

Anno Dom. MCCXXXII. Bretagnes being invited into England, there came over no less than Two thousand Knights and Esquires, who were all placed in several Castles in Garison, to whom the crafty King committed the Wardships of the Young Nobility, which afterwards much degenerated through their ignoble Marriages with Foreigners: And when any Englishmen complained to the King of their Oppression, they found no Redress, through the powerful Influence of the Bishop of Winchester.

Which gives great discontent; and the Earl Mareschal with others declare it to the K. but without any good effect.

But when Richard Earl Mareschal saw all sorts of Men thus aliened oppressed, and the Laws of the Kingdom manifestly broken, He, as a Lover of Justice, with some other Great Men, went boldly to the King, and told him publickly, That his pernicious Councils he had called in Poitovins and other Strangers, to the great Oppression of his Natural-born Subjects, and Violation of their Laws and Liberties; wherefore they humbly besought him to correct these Disorders in the Government, otherwise the Earl, and the rest of the Great Men would withdraw themselves from his Councels, as long as he made use of Strangers: To whom the Bishop of Winchester, being then present, replied, That the King might call whomsoever he pleased for the Defence of his Crown and also for and so many as might reduce his Proud and Rebellious Subjects to due Obedience. When the Mareschal and the rest heard this Answer, they retired from Court, promising faithfully to stand by each other till Death in this Dispute. From whence we may observe, That under weak Princes, the often change of Chief Ministers of State proves commonly to the Disadvantage and great Oppression of the People; for now the Bishop of Winchester proves much worse than Hubert de Burgh was before.

The Bp. of Winchester replies to this Demand.

[3] Soon after, the King summoned all the Earls and Barons of the Kingdom to meet him at Oxford on the Feast of St. John Baptist, but they refused to obey his Summons, because they feared and hated the Foreigners that were about him, who now disposed of all things: Then he was advised to send out a Second and Third Summons, to try whether they would come or no to Westminster on the Eleventh of July following, promising also by their Counsel to reform whatever was amiss. But when the Great Men heard that upon the King's Invitation many Strangers privately and by degrees (with Horse and Arms) were landed in England, and not seeing any prospect of Accommodation, they laid aside all thoughts of meeting the King on the Day appointed, and by select Messengers declared unto him, That unless the Bishop of Winchester and the Poitovins were forthwith removed from his Councils [illegible] by the Common Council of the Kingdom, from both Houses, and their Counsellors out of the Realm, and from all Offices under the King.

[3] Id. p. 186. The K. summons the Earls and Barons to a Council.

They refuse to come, and send the K. a very sharp Message.

The King and the Court being much startled at this sharp Message, he was advised by the Bishop of Winchester to reduce his Rebellious Subjects by force, and dispose of their Castles and Lands to the Poitovins, who would defend the Kingdom of England from such Traitors. The first Nobleman that fell under the King's Displeasure was Gilbert Basset, who applying himself to the King for a Mannour that had been unjustly taken from him, was called and threatned that if he did not depart the Court, he should be Hanged. The next was Richard Siward a Knight, that had married Gilbert Basset's Sister, or Neice; the King commanded him to be apprehended and brought before him, and from every Noble and powerful Man he suspected, he required Pledges for his Fidelity, and by his Letters ordered them to be presented to him before the beginning of August.

Ann. Dom. MCCXXXIII

The Nobility being highly incensed against these severe Proceedings, on the First of August the Earls and Barons came with a great Number of Armed Men to London to a Conference, or Parliament; at a Day by them agreed on; but Richard Earl-Marshal having received Advice from his Sister Isabel (Wife to the Earl of Cornwall, the King's Brother) that Snares were laid for him to draw him into Wales; but the Earls of Chester, Lincoln, Ferrers, and Richard the King's Brother, with many other Earls and Barons came thither; yet nothing was done, because the Earl-Marshal Gilbert Basset were absent. Then the King, by the Advice of the Bishop of Winchester and Stephen Segrave, summoned all that owed him any Military service to come to Gloucester on the Sunday after the Assumption of the Blessed Virgin, (that is, the Fifteenth day) with Horse and Arms; but Richard the Earl-Marshal, and others confederated with him, refused him to come: upon this, the King (as if they had been Traitors) burnt their Towns, destroyed their Parks and Warrens, and besieged their Castles; and without any Judgment of his Court or their Peers, proscribed them, and disposed of their Lands to the Poitovins, and commanded their Bodies to be taken where-ever they could be found.

The K. summons his Tenants in Capite to appear at Gloucester with Horse and Arms; but upon their refusal, they are proscribed, and treated like Traitors.

The Bishop of Winchester had been so cunning, as that by a Seal and Marks well and seasonably bestowed, the Earls of Chester, Lincoln, and Warren were gained over to the King's side; for the Earl of Warren before left the Marshal, and returned to his Brother the Earl of Surrey, and the Marshal saw himself thus deserted by these Earls, he entered into a Confederacy with Llewelyn Prince of Wales, and other Nobility of that Country, and they all took an Oath not to make any Peace but by General Consent. And now the King had received great Numbers of Forreigners from beyond the Seas, and marched with them down to Hereford, and from [a] thence, by the Counsel of the Bishop of Winchester, he sent the Bishop of S. David's to desire the Earl Marshal, and commanded his Army to march, and besiege his Castles. One of which was to, which the King was afraid he should be baffled and with forced to raise the siege; whereupon he sent some Bishops with Offers, That if he would surrender the Castle he should be given him entirely back again within Days, and farther, That he would correct what was amiss by the Counsel of the Bishops, who should be his Judges. Upon these Conditions the Castle was delivered to him, the day appointed for the performing these things was the [b] When [2] When the Fifteen Days were expired, the Mareſchal, according to the late Agreement, expected the reſtitution of his Caſtles, and ſent to the King to demand it; but he anſwered him, That he would not reſtore it, but would endeavour to ſubdue his other Caſtles. The Mareſchal finding that neither Promiſes nor Oaths were obſerved by the King's Councellors, beſieged the Caſtle, and and without much Difficulty regain'd it.

The Earl demands Reſtitution, according to the Agreement.

On the Ninth of October, the Great Men met the King at Weſtminſter, to reform what was amiſs in the Kingdom, according to appointment, where they all humbly beſeeched him to be reconciled to his Barons and Nobles; alſo the Preaching Friers and Minors (whom the King much Reverenced) exhorted him to extend his Affection to his Native Subjects, and not to baniſh, ſpoil, and deſtroy them without Legal Proceſs, nor to call them Traitors, who procur'd the Publick Peace, and by whoſe Councels the Management of all Affairs of the Kingdom ought to be directed. To this the Biſhop of Wincheſter replied, That there were no ſuch Peers in England as in France, and therefore it was Lawful for the King of England, by ſuch Juſtices as he was pleaſed to appoint, to baniſh any Guilty Perſons out of the Kingdom, and by Judgment to condemn them. When the Biſhops heard this, they unanimouſly threatned to Excommunicate all the King's Principal Councellors by Name, in the Front of which Liſt were Peter Biſhop of Wincheſter, Peter de Rivaux, Stephen Segrave Juſticiary, and Robert Paſſelew Treaſurer. The Biſhop of Wincheſter alledged for himſelf, that he was conſecrated Biſhop by the Pope, and ſo was exempted from their Authority, and therefore to prevent the Sentence, he appealed to the Holy See. Thereupon the Biſhops Excommunicated all thoſe who alienated the King's Mind from his Natural Subjects, and thus diſturbed the Peace of the Kingdom. During this Conference, the King by an Expreſs was certified, that the Mareſchal had taken his Caſtle, at which he was ſo much troubled, that he commanded all the Biſhops to Excommunicate him; but they utterly refuſed, becauſe (as they ſaid) he did thereby only recover what was his Right. Thereupon the King Summoned all that owed him Military Service to meet at Gloceſter with Horſe and Arms, the Day after All-Saints.

The Er. of Wincheſter's Reply.

The Biſhops threaten to Excommunicate him, and the reſt of the K.'s Councellors.

The K. commands the Biſhops to Excommunicate the E. Mareſchal, but they refuſe it.

[3] The King having gathered together a vaſt Army at Gloceſter, marched towards Wales; but the Mareſchal had before-hand waſted all the Forage thereabouts, ſo that in a ſhort time, through want of Proviſion, the King was forced to retire with his Army to the Caſtle of Grosmont (in Monmouthſhire.) The Mareſchal by his Spies underſtanding that the King lodged within the Caſtle, and the greateſt part of his Army quartered without in Tents, he came by Night, entred the Camp, and put the whole Army into ſuch a Diſorder, that they immediately fled, and left their Horſes, and all their Baggage, for a Prey to the Mareſchal, but he would not ſuffer any of the King's Soldiers either to be taken or hurt; by which means only Two of the whole Army (and they too through their own Indiſcretion) fell by the Sword. The King ſeeing himſelf almoſt alone, and encompaſſed with Enemies, that he might prevent the Incurſions of the Welſh, placed the ravaging Poictovins in his Caſtle, under the Command of John de Monmouth, and Randolph de Tony, and ſo returned to Glouceſter.

Anno Dom. MCCXXXIII M. p. 390. The Earl marches towards Monmouth, and is like to be taken in an Ambuſh.

Upon this, [4] the Mareſchal marched towards Monmouth, which which was well fortified and defended by Baldwin de Gyſnes and his Poictovins and Flemings, to whom the King had committed the Town. They underſtanding that the Mareſchal was taking a View of the Town with but a ſmall Number of Soldiers, ſallied out, and almoſt ſurprized him by an Ambuſh they had laid; and he had been taken Priſoner, if his own Valour and the Bravery of ſome that were with him had not reſcued him out of their hands: In this Skirmiſh Baldwin was ſo deſperately wounded, that he was taken up half-dead, which made them leave the Mareſchal, and retire with their Captain into the Town. When the reſt of the Earl's Army heard what had befallen their General, they came with great Fury, and revenged themſelves upon the Strangers, killing and taking Captive moſt of thoſe that came out of the Town.

Here follows in Matt. Paris a long Account of the Propoſals of Peace, that were about this time made to the Earl Mareſchal, whilſt he quartered at the Abbey of Margan in Wales; which ſince they are ſomewhat too long for a place in our Hiſtory, I omit; however, they deſerve the inquiſitive Reader's Conſideration, becauſe they contain not only all that was objected by the King and his Councellors againſt him, but alſo divers curious Points, relating to the Antient Right of the Barons of England to be Judged by their Peers, as alſo the Chief Heads of the Mareſchal's Defence againſt thoſe Accuſations.

Id. p. 388. H. de Burgh endeavours to eſcape, but without ſucceſs.

[5] About this time Hubert de Burgh being ſtill Priſoner in the Caſtle of the Deviſes, had notice by a Friend at Court, that the Biſhop of Winchester his great Enemy: had earneſtly deſired of the King the Cuſtody of that Caſtle, that ſo (as it was ſaid) he might have an Opportunity to diſpatch him out of the way. Upon this Information, Hubert, by the Aſſiſtance of Two Servants that waited on him, made his Eſcape on Michaelmas-Eve out of the Caſtle, and got into the Pariſh-Church; but ſo ſoon as it was known that he had thus given them the ſlip, divers of the Garriſon went out with Lances, Clubs, and other Arms to ſeek him, and they found him in the Church before the Altar, with the Croſs in his Hand; thereupon they beat and banged him ſeverely, leaving him, and the Two that aſſiſted him to make his eſcape, into the Caſtle again, and put him under a ſtrict Guard: But when the Biſhop of Saliſbury heard what was done, he went to the Caſtle, and commanded thoſe that had thus violated the Privilege of the Church, to carry him back, and leave him in the ſame ſtate they found him: But they told the Biſhop, they had rather Hubert ſhould be hanged than themſelves. So upon this peremptory Anſwer, the Biſhop Excommunicated all by Name that refuſed to obey his Commands; and then went with the Biſhop of London and other Prelates to the King, and obtained ſo much Favour for Hubert, that he was ſent back to the Church on the Eleventh of October following; yet the King being ſtill very angry at him, ordered the Sheriff of the County to guard the Church, that ſo he might be ſtarved for want of Proviſions.

He is retaken, and ill uſed Soldiers.

Who are thereupon Excommunicated by the Bp. of Saliſbury.

Hubert is carried back to the Church.

But notwithstanding what Matt. Paris relates concerning this Affair, 'tis certain Hubert was sent back to the Church before the Eighteenth of October, for on the Fifteenth of that Month, the King sent his Writ or Letter (upon *Record in the Tower) to the Good Men of Wiltshire, to let them know, he had sent Ralph de Bray and Ralph de Norwich, as his Justices, to receive Hubert de Burgh's Abjuration of the Kingdom, in case he would not come out of the Church, and stand to the Laws in the King's Court; or else to do him Justice in his Court if he would come out of the Church, and answer there, as he had agreed to do: But if he would do neither, then the Wiltshire Men were commanded diligently to guard the Church and Church-yard, as the Justices should direct.

* Rot. Pat. 17 H. 3. M. 1. Printed in Dr. B's Ap. N. 154.

But it is certain, That on the Thirtieth of the same Month [1] Hubert, by the Assistance of his Friends was taken out of the Church by Force, and being by them Armed like a Common Soldier, made his Escape in that Disguise into Wales, and joined himself to the King's Enemies: Thus he, who, when he was in power, was all for Absolute Obedience to the King's Will, now when the Tide was turned, and he came to be oppressed himself, stood up stiffly then for Self-defence; as is commonly observed in all Men of Arbitrary Principles.

I shall conclude this Year with some Account of Ecclesiastical Affairs. [2] John Blund, Professor of Divinity in Oxon, having been last Year Elected Archbishop of Canterbury, (as you have already heard) his Election was declared void at Rome, because that after his said Election he had received a Thousand Marks in Silver from Peter Bishop of Winchester, as a Present, besides another Thousand he had lent him before upon his Promotion, which was adjudged to be Simony by the Pope.

[2] Id. p. 385. The Election of John Blund to the See of Canterbury, declared void by the Pope, and why.

[3] Yet at last his Holiness was pleased to give those Monks, who came along with the Person now laid aside, leave to chuse Edmund, Chanon of Salisbury, Archbishop, being a Learned Man, and of a very strict Life, which Election being confirmed by the Pope he some time after sent him over the Pall.

[3] Id. ib. The Monks that were sent to Rome, Elect Edmund Chanon of Salisbury Archbishop, who is confirmed by the Pope.

[4] Also some time after Walter Bishop of Carlisle thinking himself injured by the King, took Shipping to pass beyond Sea, but was seized by the King's Officers at Dover, who would not permit him to go out of the Kingdom without first obtaining his License; but Roger Bishop of London arriving there from Rome, and seeing the Affront that was done him, Excommunicated all those that had laid violent hands upon him; from whence going to the King at Hereford, he complained of the Wrong that had been done that Bishop; but having no redress, he renewed the Sentence, upon all those that had done it. The King in the mean time murmuring against it, forbad him to pronounce any such Sentence; yet notwithstanding this, all the Bishops there present agreed with him, and Excommunicated all those that had occasioned this Disturbance; so powerful were the Clergy in those Times.

Those that did it are Excommunicated by the Bishop of London.

I cannot here [5] omit a strange Accident that happened on the Eighth of April this Year; In the Morning about Sun-rising there appeared at once four Counterfeit Suns of a reddish Colour, besides the True one, *being placed in the several Sections of four lesser Circles made upon one great Circle that encompassed the whole Horison, and and passed over the Body of the True Sun: For the Scheme of which Phænomenon, I refer the Curious Reader to our Author, where he may find it exactly delineated. Anno Dom. MCCXXXIII

This Year the King kept his Chriſtmas at Gloucester with a very ſmall Court, becauſe divers of the Great Men, who had ſuffer'd ſo much at the Caſtle of Groſmont, were retired, and could make no Appearance. Anno Dom. MCCXXXIV Id. p. 393.

[1] The Day after Chriſtmas, John de Monmouth having gathered together a great Number of Soldiers, deſigned privily to Attack the Mareſchal; but he was Counter-plotted by the other's Policy, and Defeated, and a great number of his Soldiers ſlain on the ſpot, he himſelf narrowly eſcaping: Then the Mareſchal and thoſe that were Confederated with him, Ravaged, Spoiled, and Burnt the Lands, Goods, and Houſes of the King's Principal Councellors, ſo that nothing eſcaped them from the Borders of Wales to Shrewsbury, which they alſo Burnt. [1] Id. p. 394. The Mareſchal defeats John of Monmouth. And ſpoils the Eſtates of the King's Councellors.

[2] All this while King Henry remain'd with the Biſhop of Winchester at Gloucester, not having ſufficient Force either to oppoſe or repreſs thoſe Devaſtations; from whence he went to Wincheſter, and left thoſe Countries to his Enemies. [2] Id. ib.

Then the Biſhops were inſtant with the King to make Peace with the Mareſchal; but he refuſed it unleſs he would acknowledge himſelf a Traytor, and come in with a Halter about his Neck. The Bps urge the K. to make Peace with the Mareſchal, but in vain.

[3] But when the King's Councellors ſaw their Houſes burnt, their Lands deſtroyed, and their Friends the Poictovins in great numbers ſlain, and themſelves without Remedy, they ſtudied how to ruine the Mareſchal by Treachery, whom they could not Conquer by Force, which at laſt they effected by this wicked Means. They compoſed and wrote Letters in the King's Name, (though without his privity) Sealed with his, and Eleven of their own Seals, and directed them to Maurice Fitz-Gerald (the King's Juſtitiary in Ireland) to Walter and Hugh de Lacy, Richard de Burgh, and Geoffrey March, and ſeveral Others the Earl-Mareſchal's Sworn-Men or Feudataries, ſhewing, That although the Mareſchal was proclaim'd a Traytor, and, by the Judgment of the King's Court, proſcribed, and diveſted of his Paternal Inheritance, yet he ceaſed not to purſue the King with his wonted Malice; wherefore they required them, as the King's Faithful Subjects, to uſe their utmoſt Endeavours, whenever the Mareſchal ſhould come over thither, to take him Alive or Dead, and preſent him to the King, which if they carefully perform'd, all his Eſtate and great Poſſeſſions in Ireland, ſhould be divided among them; for which they gave them the King's Promiſe, and they themſelves would become Sureties for the Performance of it. [3] Id. ib. The King's Councellors contrive the Mareſchal's Deſtruction. They write Letters to the Juſticiaries and Great Men of Ireland.

[4] When the Iriſh Noblemen heard the Tenor of theſe Letters, they ſent private Meſſengers to thoſe Councellors with Letters, aſſuring them, That if they could be ſecured by the King's Charter of what they had promiſed them, they would undertake to effect what he ſo deſired. Then theſe Councellors ſtole the Seal from Ralph Biſhop of Chicheſter the Chancellor, and therewith Sealed a Charter without his knowledge, by which all the Rights and Poſſeſſions of the Mareſchal were to be divided among them; and [4] Id. p. 395. forthwith dispatch'd a Messenger with it to the abovenamed Irish Noblemen, who no sooner received it, but they Confederated and resolved the Destruction of the Mareschal; and in order to it they raised a great Army, with which they enter'd his Lands, took his Castles, and grievously Plunder'd them, that so they might provoke him to come over into Ireland.

[5] Id. p. 395. * Colloquium. The K. at a Treaty or Conference with the Bps, rebukes the Bp of Chester and others of the same Order, for Corresponding with the Mareschal.

[5] On Candlemas-Day the King came to a *Treaty at Westminster, with the Bishops and Nobility; wherein he severely rebuked Alexander Bishop of Chester, and some other Bishops, for keeping Correspondence with the Earl Mareschal, as if they endeavoured to Dethrone him; but the Bishops being highly provoked against those who had thus Calumniated them, Excommunicated all such as had suggested these things to the King. Then Master Edmund, the new Archbishop Elect of Canterbury, (and several Bishops of that Province who were present at this Conference) went to the King, and represented to him the miserable State that both He and the whole Kingdom were brought into, by his following the pernicious Councels of Peter Bishop of Winchester, and Peter de Rievaulx, and their Accomplices, to whose Advice they ascribed all the Evil Events, Wars and Calamities that had happened in this King's time; adding withall, That if he did not very suddenly remove from his Court those Evil Councellors, and receive his Native and Liege-Subjects into his Councels, and the Management of the Affairs of the Reason, (as in the Customs of other Nations,) they must proceed to Ecclesiastical Censures against all Gain-sayers; The King hereupon answered, He could not reform his Councel, untill he had taken their Accounts, and so desired a small Respite; Upon which this Conference was dissolved, and every one went away pretty well satisfied, and full of hopes of a speedy Accommodation.

[1] Id. p. 397. Edmund being Consecrated A.B. of Canterbury, by his Advice, the K. promises to reform his Court and Council.

[1] On the Second of April, Edmund was Consecrated Archbishop of Canterbury, the King being present, and on the Ninth of the same Month, He, together with the Earls, Barons, and the New Consecrated Archbishop and his Suffragans and other Prelates, met at another Conference at Westminster, wherein the King being first admonished by the Archbishop, of the desolate Estate of his Kingdom, and of the Danger impending it; and being again threatned with the Excommunication not only of all such as should oppose the Peace and Reconciliation they now proposed, but also of his own Person in case he took part with them, He promised at last to be directed by their Councils; and some few days after commanded the Bishop of Winchester to retire to his Bishoprick, and mind the Care of Souls, and not concern himself any further with the Affairs of the Kingdom.

[2] Id. ib. Peter de Rievaulx is commanded to give in his Accounts.

[2] He likewise commanded Peter de Rievaulx to give in his Accounts, and yield up his Castles, and depart the Court, assuring him upon his Oath, That if he had not been a Beneficed Clerk, he would have caused his Eyes to be pulled out; He also discharged the Poictovins from his Service, both in his Court and Garisons, commanding them to go into their own Country, and never see his Face more. Thus having purged his Court, and removed his Evil Councellors, and cleared his Kingdom of Strangers, he submitted himself to the Advice and Councels of the Archbishop and Bishops, by

by whom he hoped to reduce his unſettled Kingdom to a proſperous Condition. Anno Dom. MCCXXXIV

[3] Immediately after this, the King ſent Edmund now Archbiſhop of Canterbury, with the Biſhops of Cheſter and Rocheſter, to Llewellyn Prince of Wales, and Richard Earl-Mareſchal to treat about a Peace; but the latter having before received notice of the Spoils and Rapines that were committed upon his Lands and Caſtles in Ireland, and ſeeing the King was gone Southward, and had left off his deſign againſt Wales, he thought he might lay hold of this Opportunity to paſs over into Ireland; ſo taking with him only Fifteen Knights, he went thither. [3] Id. ib. The Mareſchal paſſes into Ireland to ſecure his Lands and Caſtles.

But [4] ſo ſoon as ever he Landed, Geoffrey Marſh, with the other Great Men of the Kingdom, who had privately Confederated againſt him, came to him, and under colour of Friendſhip adviſed him to reduce his Enemies by Force, and that he might thereby eaſily bring all Ireland under his Obedience: The Mareſchal fearing the innate Treachery of the Iriſh, was not willing at firſt to cloſe with this Advice; but Geoffrey having reproached him with this, as if it were for want of Courage, and alſo urging his Antient Right by Lineal Deſcent from Earl Richard Strong-bowe, that had Conquered Ireland; and they all giving him a ſeeming Hearty aſſurance of their Aſſiſtance and Fidelity, he raiſed a Great Army, and at firſt proceeded with ſuch Succeſs, that none durſt withſtand him; for he took the City of Limerick, and the King's Caſtles as well as thoſe of his Enemies: Upon this the Engliſh-Iriſh Noblemen, who had raiſed an Army againſt him, finding they could not prevail by Force, reſolved to try what they could do by Fraud and Treachery; therefore ſending certain Knights-Templars to him, they acquainted him, that though he acted as Traiterouſly againſt his Prince in Ireland as he had done in England, yet nevertheleſs they came to deſire a competent Truce, that ſo they might in the mean time ſend over to the King of England to know his Pleaſure, whether he would defend Ireland or not; for if he declin'd it, they were then reſolved to ſurrender to him the whole Country, without any farther Strife, or Effuſion of Blood; To which Meſſage, the Earl-Mareſchal (having firſt Juſtified himſelf to be no Traytor by the Laws of the Kingdom) replied, That he was willing to meet them the next day in a certain Meadow to treat of Peace; which anſwer being brought to the Engliſh Iriſh Lords, they were over-joy'd at it, becauſe they knew very well their Forces were more Numerous than thoſe the Mareſchal would bring along with him, and therefore were reſolved not to part without Fighting. Hereupon the Mareſchal asking the Advice of Geoffrey de Marſh and the other Knights, what was beſt to be done, this Geoffrey Treacherouſly diſſuaded him not to grant them any Truce; making him to believe, that ſo ſoon as his Enemies ſaw him armed in the Field, they would all turn their Backs and run away. The Earl too much relying upon this Wicked Councel, came the next day as he had promiſed to the Place of Treaty, with a very ſmall Force, where the Knights-Templars mediating between them, they began indeed to treat of Peace; but when the Iriſh Lords heard, that he was come thither with but a ſlender Guard, they ſent him poſitive Word, that unleſs he would immediately agree to a Truce, they defied him; which Proposal the Earl, by the Advice of that Traytor Geoffrey, and others his Accomplices who aimed at his Ruine, indiscreetly rejecting, the Irish Lords immediately marched against him, and the Fight being begun, all the English-Irish Knights, or Vassals, to the Number of above Eighty, either ran away, or went over to the Enemy, together with their Followers, so that no more remained with him but Fifteen Knights of his own Family; yet resolving to die with Bravery rather than basely yield, he rush'd into the midst of his Enemies with those few Men he had with him, and began to break the Ranks of his Adversaries; till being deserted by all the rest, he was at last forced singly to defend his Person, which yet they durst not attack, before they had Hamstring'd his Horse; and then when he was thus dismounted, One of them seeing his Back unarm'd, wounded him there so desperately with a Dagger, that he was taken up half Dead, and carried Prisoner to a certain Castle, which Maurice the Justitiary had a little before got from him; where being kept close, after Fifteen days (when he was thought on the Mending Hand) he departed this Life, though not so much of his Wound, as by the Villainous Roguery of an Irish Chirurgeon, who run a hot Iron into it, which put him into such a violent Feaver, as soon carried him off; and his Body was buried in the Church of the Franciscans in Kilkenny.

And at last dies by the Villany of an Irish Chirurgeon.

Thus died this Gallant Man, who deserved to have lived in quieter Times, and under a King who knew better how to value Men of Worth: [5] Yet when he received the News of his Death, he much lamented the Loss of so brave a Soldier, and so good a Subject, affirming, He had not left his Equal in the Kingdom.

[5] Id. p. 403. The King laments his Death.

[1] The Archbishop and Bishops being now return'd from Prince Llewellyn, to the King at Gloucester, and having informed him, That before he began any Treaty with them, he desired the Noblemen that were Confederated with him, might be received into Favour; the King thereupon sent out his Letters to all those that were proscribed to meet at Gloucester on the Nine and Twentieth of May, to be reconciled unto him, and restored to their Inheritances, the Archbishop and Bishops promising them Safe conduct: The First that came to accept the King's Peace, was Hubert de Burgh, late Justitiary of England and Earl of Kent, whom the King received very Kindly; after him Gilbert Basset and Richard Sward, with divers other proscribed Persons, who were severally received with the Kiss of Peace, (which was the Custom of that Age, and amounted to a Pardon) and thus they were all reconciled to the King, and had their Rights and Inheritances restored to them.

[1] Id. ib. The K. at the desire of Pr. Llewellyn pardons all the proscribed Noblemen.

[2] This being done, he gave Prince Llewellyn *by Letter speedy Notice of it; and also that at the Intercession of the said Archbishop, he had restored to Gilbert, Brother to Richard Earl-Mareschal late deceased, all his Inheritance, both in England and Ireland, and received his Homage; and on Whitsunday following at Worcester he Knighted him, and gave him the Mareschal's-Staff; and also received Hubert de Burgh, Gilbert Basset, and Richard Sward into his Councels.

[2] * Vid. Dr. B's Ap. N. 155. where you will see the Letter at large from the Record. The K. gives the Prince of Wales notice of his having restored to Gilbert the New Earl-Mareschal, his Brother's Inheritance.

Then

Then the [3] Archbiſhop and Biſhops, that were ſent to Treat with Prince Llewellyn, made a Truce with him for Two Years, from the Feaſt of St. James, (or the Five and Twentieth of Auguſt following) upon theſe Conditions; Firſt, That all Injuries done on both ſides ſince the laſt Truce, ſhould be referred to thoſe that made it; Secondly, That all Lands taken from any one in the late War, ſhould be reſtored. Thirdly, That all Men and Tenents that had receded from the Fealty of their Lords, and adhered to the contrary Party, might return again without damage or being queſtioned for it. Of this Truce the King gave notice to his Brother Richard Earl of Cornwall, and Ralph de Fay, that they might be included in it, if they pleaſed, for their Lands in the Marches.

[3] Id. ib. Vid. D. Brady's Appendix, N. 156.

[4] At the ſame Meeting the Archbiſhop produced a Copy of that Treacherous Letter, which was ſent into Ireland againſt Richard the Earl-Mareſchal; whereupon the King, before the whole Aſſembly of the Biſhops, Earls and Barons, proteſted, That through the importunity of the Biſhop of Wincheſter, Peter de Rievaulx, and other Councellors, he conſented that his Seal ſhould be put to thoſe Letters, but aſſured them upon his Oath, he never knew the Tenor of them, though it was an Excuſe only befitting ſuch a Prince.

[4] Id. ib. The K. being ſhewn a Copy of the Letter ſent into Ireland againſt the late Earl-Mareſchal, utterly diſowns it.

Then the King ſummon'd the Biſhop of Wincheſter, Peter de Rievaulx, Stephen Segrave, and Robert Paſſelew, to appear on the Feaſt of St. John Baptiſt to give up their Accounts, and to anſwer to ſuch Crimes as ſhould be objected againſt them, eſpecially for the late Abuſe of his Seal in the Letter above-mentioned, and ſtand to the Law; but they being Conſcious of their Crimes, and not daring to ſtand a Tryal, ſome of them took Sanctuary in Cathedral and Conventual Churches; and Robert de Paſſelew with ſome others fled, (it was believed) to Rome, but indeed hid themſelves in a Cellar in the New Temple.

He ſummons his Miniſters to give up their Accounts, and to anſwer the Law.

[5] Yet the King at the Requeſt of the Archbiſhop, promiſed all thoſe Perſons ſafe Conduct, and appointed them on the Fourteenth of July to appear at Weſtminſter, to anſwer to the Articles exhibited againſt them; where Peter de Rievaulx was the firſt that appeared in a Clerk's Habit, yet with a Dagger at his Girdle, and bowed to the King, at that time ſitting upon the Bench with his Juſtices, who ſo ſoon as he ſaw him, called him Traytor, and accuſed him for his Pernicious Councel, and required him to give an Account of his Treaſuryſhip, as alſo the Wardſhips of young Noblemen and Women, with the Eſcheats and other Profits of the Crown, and then told him, he would commit him to the Tower; but he ſaid he was a Prieſt, and ought not to be impriſon'd, or be in the Cuſtody of Laymen: The King thereupon replied, That he had hitherto behaved himſelf like a Layman, and as ſuch he required what was committed to his Charge; yet ſaid, That the Archbiſhop was preſent, and if He would undertake for him, he ſhould be delivered into his hands; but the Archbiſhop being ſilent, the King ſent him to the Tower, and ſeized all his Lay-Poſſeſſions, becauſe under his Clerk's Habit he had a Coat of Mail, and a Knight's Weapon at his Girdle, which did not become a Clerk; but he remain'd there only Two days, and then was releaſed by the Archbiſhop, carried to Wincheſter, and put into the Cathedral there.

Peter de Rievaulx appearing to anſwer, is ſeverely treated, and threatned by the King.

Peter inſiſts upon the Privilege of his Prieſthood, which the K. would not allow.

[1] Id. ib. S. de Segrave alſo called to account.

[1] The ſame Day alſo appeared Stephen Segrave before the King, who likewiſe called him Traytor; and added, That it was by his wicked Councel that Hubert Earl of Kent was removed from the Office of Juſtitiary, and impriſoned, and that many of the Nobility were proſcribed: He required Him alſo to give an Account of his Juſtitiaryſhip; yet by the Mediation of the Archbiſhop and Biſhops, he gave him time till Michaelmas following to prepare for it. Then the King, upon mature Advice, named Hugh de Pateſhulle a Clerk his Juſtitiary; He was Son of Simon de Pateſhulle, who had formerly managed that Office with great Integrity.

Hugh de Pateſhulle is made Juſtitiary.

[2] Id. p. 406. The K. ſends Aid to the Earl of Bretaigne.

[2] This Year, about the Feaſt of St. John Baptiſt, the Truce between the King of England and France expiring, King Henry ſent over to the Earl of Bretaigne Sixty Knights, and Two thouſand Welſhmen, to enable him to fortifie the weak Places of his Dominions, becauſe the King of France had raiſed a great Army, and actually beſieged one of the Earl of Bretaigne's Caſtles; but he was ſoon defeated by the Engliſh Forces, and many of the French were ſlain there, and all their Baggage taken; which ſo netled that King, that he gathered together what other Succours he could, and was reſolved again to invade Bretaigne. This ſo frightned the Earl, that he deſired a Truce till All-Saints; which was granted him; but it was upon delivery of thoſe Caſtles, and beſides upon condition, That if in that time the King of England came not in Perſon to his Relief, he ſhould deliver all Bretaigne and all his other Caſtles to the King of France. In the mean time, the Earl ſent to the King of England, to deſire him to come over to his Aſſiſtance, or elſe he ſaid he muſt deliver up all Bretaigne to his Brother of France: But King Henry anſwered, The Revenues of his Crown were not ſufficient for the Defence of that Country, as he had found by the Three laſt Years experience; and withal, that he was quite tired with being at ſo great and vaſt an Expence to ſo little purpoſe. So ſoon as the Earl had received this Anſwer, he went directly to the King of France, with a Rope about his Neck, and acknowledged himſelf a Traitor, and then ſurrendred to him all Bretaigne, with its Towns and Caſtles. Upon this, the King of France told him, that he was a wicked Traitor, and as ſuch deſerved a moſt ſhameful Death; yet he would grant him his Life, and the Earldom of Bretaigne to his Son, as long as he lived; but after his Death, it ſhould be annexed to the Crown of France. When King Henry heard what he had done, he ſeized on all the Eſtate and Honours that belonged to him in England: And ſo this miſerable Earl being deſpoiled of all his Honours and Revenues, both by his open Enemy and ſeeming Friend, betook himſelf to the Seas, and became a notorious Pirate.

K. Henry refuſing to give the Earl of Bretaigne any further Aſſiſtance, he ſurrenders himſelf to the K. of France's mercy.

K. Henry ſeizes all his Eſtate and Honours in England; upon which the Earl turns Pirate.

Thus this unfortunate King loſt the beſt and ſureſt Confederate he had, for want of ſupporting him in his great Neceſſity: And this is that Count Peter, on whom the Hiſtorians of Bretaigne beſtow the Nickname of Mau-clerk, or Ill Scholar; for though he had ſtudied in the Univerſity of Paris, yet it ſeems that Place did not prove a very good School for Politicks, or elſe he might have met with better Succeſs.

[3] This Year King Henry kept his Court and Christmas at Westminster, with very many Bishops and Great Men of the Kingdom; and about Candlemas after, Stephen Segrave and Robert Passelewe paid each of them a Thousand Marks for their Ransoms, but were not received into the King's former Favour, as they expected.

[4] In February following, Isabella the King's Sister (a most Beautiful young Lady of about Twenty Years of Age) was Married by Proxy to Frederick the Second Emperor of Germany, with great Pomp and Magnificence, and was conducted thither by the Archbishop of Cologne and Duke of Lovain, who were sent on purpose to wait on her. For this Marriage the King received Two Marks Scutage of every Plough-Land, and out of it he some time after gave the Emperor Thirty thousand Marks, as her Portion: Nor was there ever before so great a Tax laid upon a Plough-Land; and that this Tax was a Scutage, and not a Carucage (as Matt. Paris here calls it) being laid upon all Ecclesiastical as well as Lay-Fees, see the Prior of Coventry's Plea in the Office of the [5] King's Remembrance in the Exchequer.

Nothing hapned considerable this Year in Ecclesiastical Affairs, except that about Easter [1] Peter Bishop of Winchester at the Pope's Command, went to Rome to assist him in his War against the Citizens there (between whom and the Pope there was a very great Feud!) for the Pope well knew the Bishop was very Rich, and also very much experienced in Military Matters, being in his Youth brought up under the late Warlike King Richard, and indeed understood better how to Fight than Preach.

[1] Id. p. 410. Petr Bishop of Winchester is sent for to Rome, to assist the Pope in his Wars.

[2] As for other Foreign Affairs, the most considerable is, That the Ten Years Truce made by the Emperor Frederick with the Sultan of Babylon being now almost expired, Pope Gregory thought fit by a Bull, published for that purpose, again to command a fresh Preaching or Exhortation for the Crusado, with large Indulgences to all those who would undertake it; but this ended with the Pope's getting thereby a great Sum of Money into his own Coffers, as you will perceive in due time. I find nothing else to have hapned this Year relating to Foreign Affairs, but that (according to the * Annals of the Abbey of Abbingdon) the Bishops of Ely and Hereford were sent over into France, to conduct the Daughter of the Earl of Provence into England, the Match having been (it seems) concluded some time before.

[4] On the Nineteenth of the same Month, she was most splendidly and solemnly Crowned Queen at Westminster: *Matt. [5] On the ſame day, after the Coronation was over, the King went from London to Merton-Abbey, where he met his Great Men, and treated with them about the Affairs of the Kingdom: At this Time and Place were made the Laws called the Statutes of Merton, by the Deliberation and Conſent of the Archbiſhop of Canterbury and his Fellow Biſhops, with the Major part of the Earls and Barons of England; but I ſhall ſay no more of theſe Statutes here, but refer the Reader to the End of this Reign, where I ſhall ſhew Dr. Brady's unfair rendring of the Title of this Statute into Engliſh; and where alſo I have given you an exact Abridgment of it.

To this Place came the Emperor's Meſſengers, with Letters from him, to deſire the King without delay to ſend over Richard Earl of Cornwall his Brother, to his Aſſiſtance, againſt the King of France, whereby the King of England might not only recover what he had loſt, but alſo much enlarge the Tranſmarine Dominions; to whom the King, by the Advice of his Great Men, return'd this Anſwer, That he could not judge it ſafe or expedient to permit one that was ſo Young, and the only Heir apparent of the Crown, and the next hope of the Kingdom, to expoſe his Perſon to the hazard of War: But if his Imperial Majeſty would make choice of any other of the Nobility or Great Men of the Kingdom, they were ready to yield to his Commands, and give him what Aſſiſtance they were able; And with this Anſwer the Meſſengers returned to the Emperor.

[1] Notwithſtanding the Solemn Truce that had been made between England and Wales for Two Years, yet during this Time there were ſtill great Plunderings and Robberies committed in the Marches, which they only termed Interceptions or Seizures; for it appears by the Tower [2] Rolls, That on the Sixth of March that Year, Ralph Biſhop of Hereford, with the Dean of that Church, Walter de Clifford, and Walter de Beauchamp, were again conſtituted Arbitrators or Aſſeſſors of the Amends, or ſatisfaction to be made for Damages done on both ſides, and for the Interceptions made (as was ſaid) by Prince Llewellyn of Aberfraw, and Morgan of Caerleon, concerning the Caſtle of Caerleon.

Whereupon Commiſſioners are appointed to aſſeſs the Damages done on both ſides.

And it farther appears from the [3] Rolls of this Year, that after this Arbitration or Determination of what Amends were to be made on both ſides, Edmund Archbiſhop of Canterbury on the Eleventh of July, renewed the Truce for one Year longer, that is, until the Feaſt of St. James in the One and Twentieth Year of his Reign, between King Henry and Prince Llewellyn, and all that were openly concerned on either ſide; whereby it was agreed, the King and Prince ſhould remain in the ſame Poſſeſſion of Lands and Tenements, Vaſſals and Homages, as they were the Day of the making this Truce; ſaving to Morgan de Caerleon his Lands and Caſtles, which Gilbert Earl-Mareſchal had poſſeſſed himſelf of within the time of the Truce. If any Lands or Caſtles had been ſeized during the Truce, no Satisfaction was to be expected for them; but for [4] On the Nine and Twentieth of April the King ſummoned the Great Men of England to meet him at London, to Treat about the Affairs of the Kingdom; at which time they met accordingly, but finding the King to deſpiſe his Natural-born Subjects, and follow the Advice of William Biſhop Elect of Valence, the Queens Uncle, (and a Stranger lately arrived here) more then was fitting, they were much ſurprized at it, and were alſo diſcontented, becauſe that on the firſt Day of the Aſſembly his Majeſty removed himſelf to the Tower of London, but thither none of the Nobility would come at him; upon which he return'd to his Palace at Weſtminſter, where during this Council, many Things were treated on for the Good of the Realm; and one commendable Act eſpecially the King there did voluntarily perform, which was, that he removed all Unjuſt Sheriffs, and thoſe that had taken Bribes in the Execution of their Offices, and ſubſtituted Men of better Quality and Eſtates in their Places, who ſhould keep their Hands clean, and not be corrupted by Preſents and Gratuities; yet notwithſtanding he made theſe to ſwear, that they would not accept of any thing beſides Meat and Drink, and that too but very moderately.

The K. removes all Corrupt Sheriffs, and puts in new ones in their Places.

[5] At this Aſſembly the King of Scots by his Meſſengers required of the King the Reſtitution of ſuch Rights, as belonged to him by Charter and the Teſtimony of many Great Men; but it ſeems nothing was then determined in that Affair. At the ſame time likewiſe a great difference aroſe between Richard Earl of Cornwall, and Richard Sward, which the King endeavoured to compoſe, but could not, and thereupon he baniſhed Sward the Kingdom, He at the ſame time alſo removed Ralph Fitz-Nicholas his Steward, and many other Great Officers of his Houſhold from his Councils, and required the Biſhop of Chicheſter his Chancellor, (who had behaved himſelf moſt unblameably in his Office) to deliver up the Great Seal; but he refuſed, affirming, That he had received it by the Common-Councel of the Kingdom, and could not therefore reſign it up to any one without their Conſent.

[5] Id. ib. The King of Scots demands his ancient Rights.

Several Officers of the Court removed.

The Chancellor refuſes to give up the Seal, and his Reaſons for it.

[1] At this time the Emperor ſent to demand the Money King Henry had promiſed him, as a Portion with his Siſter, which I find was ſtill unpaid, notwithſtanding the late great Tax raiſed for that purpoſe.

[1] Id. p. 431.

Some time in May, Peter de Rievaulx and Stephen Segrave were received into the King's Favour; which ſhews the great Fickleneſs and Inconſtancy of this Prince's Temper, in ſo ſoon receiving into Favour thoſe very Men, whom but ſo lately he had called Traitors.

Anno Dom. MCCXXXVI

And indeed the Kingdom quickly felt the Effects of their ill Miniſtery, for on the Eighteenth of June the King ſummoned the Great Men of England to Wincheſter, where he by virtue of the Pope's Bull, endeavoured to avoid ſome Grants he had made before he was Married, alledging, They were invalid becauſe they wanted the Pope's Confirmation, to whom he acknowledged the Kingdom by Right belonged; the Great Men were very much ſurprized to find the King thus induſtriouſly labouring to Enſlave his Kingdom to ſuch baſe Conditions: but it proved to no purpoſe; for he was now managed again by much the ſame Hands he was in before.

[2] Id. p. 432. The K. meets the K. of Scots at York, and on what occaſion.

[2] This Year the King by the Advice of his Great Men, went to York to compoſe ſome Differences between Him and Alexander King of Scots, the Latter affirming, That he had not only a Charter, but the Teſtimony of ſeveral Biſhops, Earls, and Barons, of King John's Grant of the County of Northumberland to him, upon the Marriage of his Daughter Johanna; adding moreover, That if he would not peaceably reſtore unto him his Right, he would endeavour to recover it by Force. That which emboldened the King of Scots to make ſo high a Demand at this time, was, that he thought Llewellyn Prince of Wales would be eaſily induced to break the Truce with King Henry; and he alſo relied on the Affinity of Gilbert Mareſchal, who had married his Siſter Margaret; beſides the preſent Hoſtilities beyond the Seas, wherefore the King of England having conſulted about the preſent State of his Affairs, and the preſervation of the Peace of his Realm, offered the King of Scots, in lieu of the County of Northumberland, the Yearly Revenue or Penſion of Eighty Marks in ſome other Place; which though it may now ſeem but a very ſmall Penſion for a Prince, yet was accounted a great Sum in thoſe Days, to be paid in ready Money; and therefore it gave a general Satisfaction to them all: But ſince it required time to ſettle it as it ought, the Conference or Treaty was for the preſent diſſolved.

What encouraged the K. of Scots to make ſuch high Demands

The K. to ſatisfie him grants him a Penſion.

[3] Id. p. 431. A ſtrange Prodigy that happen'd in Yorkſhire.

I cannot here omit a ſtrange [3] Prodigy, that happened (as our Author relates) in May this Year, near the Abbey of the Rock in York-ſhire; which was, that for divers Days together ſome Troops of Men on Horſeback appeared to riſe out of the Ground, and dividing themſelves into Parties, ſeem'd to Fight and Skirmiſh one with the other, and at laſt to ſink into the Earth again; the like Apparitions were alſo ſeen this Year in Ireland, only thoſe ſeemed ſometimes to march, as if they had return'd from a Battle, wounded and routed, and leading Horſes without Riders; thoſe that ſaw them, not knowing what they were, ran into Churches and Caſtles for Refuge: This laſt Story our Author ſets down from the Relation of the Earl of Gloucester, who affirmed it to be true.

[4] Id. p. 433. The Fryars go through all England to preach up the Pope's Indulgences for the Holy War, and to abſolve Mens Sins for Money.

[4] This Year affords us few Eccleſiaſtical Matters worth the noting, only the Preaching Fryars and Minors, went now through the Cities, Towns, and Villages in England, offering Plenary Indulgences to any who upon Confeſſion and Penitence, would undertake the Cruſado; Soon after the Pope ſent into England Fryar Thomas a Templar, and one of his Domeſticks, with his Bull, to Abſolve any one from his Vow for that Expedition, upon payment of a certain Sum Sum towards the defraying the Expences of the Holy-War; and whosoever should pay any Money for this end, although he was under no Vow, yet he should have the Benefit of this Indulgence, which raised great Indignation against the Covetousness of the Roman Court.

Anno Dom. MCCXXXVI

This Year the King kept his Christmas at Winchester, [3] from whence he sent out his Writs, Commanding all that belonged to the Kingdom or Government, namely Archbishops, Bishops, Abbots installed, Priors, Earls and Barons, that without fail they should meet at London on the Octaves of Epiphany, (i.e. the Thirteenth of January) to treat about the King's Affairs, and those which also concern'd the whole Realm; the Great Men yielded ready Obedience to this Summons, believing some great and difficult Affairs were to be transacted, and accordingly on St. Hilary's Day, an immense Number of * Nobility, that is, the [1] whole Body of the Kingdom, met at London; and when they were thus met, and seated in the King's Palace at Westminster, William de Kele Clerk, and one of the King's Domesticks, a Discreet Man, and well skill'd in the Laws, arose, and as a Mediator between the King and the Great Men, declared the King's Intention and Desires, and that he was commanded to tell them, That notwithstanding what the King had done hitherto, he would for the future be wholly directed by their Councels, who were his Natural and Faithful Subjects, that those that had been his former Treasurers, had unfaithfully Executed that Office; and that the King's Necessities at this time pressed him to require a further Aid of them; but he would now consent, that whatever was granted should be both Collected and Disposed of for the necessary Uses of the Kingdom, by Persons whom they should chuse and name for that purpose: To which they replied, 'That they had very often granted, and paid sometimes a Twentieth, 'sometimes a Thirtieth, and at other times a Fiftieth Part of their 'Estates to the King; yet he could never be prevailed with, to remove or punish any one of the Enemies of the Kingdom; That he 'had never enlarged, but rather lessened his Dominions; and for 'the Assistance of others, had Extorted very frequently great Sums 'of Money from his own Subjects, as from the Meanest Slaves: To this the King answered, That the Payment of his Sister's Portion to the Emperor, and his own Wedding, had very much emptied his Pocket, but yet if they would now grant him a Thirtieth Part of their Goods, he offered them upon Oath, that he would never again Injure or Oppress the Noblemen of the Kingdom; But they replied, 'That these things were 'done without their consent, and seeing they were free from the 'Fault, they ought not to partake of the Punishment.

their better Security, commanded the ſame Sentence that Stephen late Archbiſhop of Canterbury had denounced againſt the Infringers of that Charter to be again ſolemnly publiſhed, that that ſo the Violators thereof might be the more inexcuſable. After this, he added the Earl of Warren, William Ferrars, and John Geoffry to his Council, who ſwore they would never be corrupted by Gifts to deviate from Troth, but would always give the King good and wholeſom Advice. Then a Thirtieth Part of all Moveable Goods was granted to the King, excepting every Man's Gold and Silver, with his Horſes and Arms, which were to be uſed for the Benefit of the Commonwealth.

Whereupon a 30*th* part of all Moveables is granted to the King.

[3] Id. ib. See the manner of collecting it in the Record laſt cited.

[3] And for the due Collection of the aforeſaid Thirtieth Part for the Year following, Four Truſty Knights were to be choſen in every County of England, to whom the King was to add one Clerk, and they all to be ſworn duly to collect and ſecure the Money in ſome Abbey, Church, or Caſtle; that ſo, if the King ſhould recede from his Promiſe, it might be reſtored to every one again; ſo that when the Collectors came to levy it, 'twas paid on this Condition, That from thence-forward the King ſhould reject the Counſels and Advices of Foreigners and Strangers and adhere to thoſe of his Faithful and Natural Subjects. When this was done, the Council broke up, and every one went home reaſonably well ſatisfied, that the King was at laſt prevailed upon to adhere to good Council: So powerful an Advocate is a Prince's Neceſſity, to make him do that which other Perſuaſions could not.

[4] Id. ib. Llewellyn Pr. of Wales put himſelf under the K.'s Protection, and for what Reaſons.

[4] About this time alſo Llewellyn Prince of Wales being wearied out with continual Wars and likewiſe taken with the Palſie, and which was ſtill worſe, perplexed with the Rebellions of his own Son Griffyn, ſent Meſſengers to the King to deſire a Continuation of the League that was between them; and alſo to put himſelf and all his under his Protection, and that he would moreover hold his Lands of him in Fealty, and by an indiſſoluble League promiſed to aſſiſt him in all his Expeditions, with Men, Horſes, and Money; as far as his Ability would reach. The King accepted theſe his Propoſals, and thereupon ſent the Biſhops of Hereford and Cheſter to confirm them.

[5] Id. p. 437. H. de Burgh again incurrs the K.'s diſpleaſure, but is ſoon reconciled to him.

[5] This Year Hubert de Burgh Earl of Kent again incurr'd the King's Diſpleaſure, in marrying Richard Earl of Gloucester (being then his Ward) to his Daughter Margaret, without the King's Conſent; but he was ſoon reconciled again, Hubert profeſſing that he did not know the King had deſigned another Match for him; and alſo promiſed to pay a round Sum of Money; and that it ſeems was the powerful Argument which appeaſed the King's Anger.

[1] Id. p. 441. Otto the Pope's Legate comes into England and is received with great Pomp.

[1] As for Eccleſiaſtical Affairs we find little, only that about the Feaſt of St. Peter and St. Paul (i. e. the Eighteenth of June) Cardinal Otto the Pope's Legate came into England, at the requeſt of the King, but without the Knowledge of his Great Men; for which (it was ſaid) the Archbiſhop of Canterbury very much blamed the King, as being a thing exceeding prejudicial to his own Dignity, as well as a great Damage to the Kingdom: However, he would not hearken to his Council, but received him (as did alſo the the Clergy) with great Pomp and Ceremony, large Presents being made him, some of which he refused (contrary to the Usage of those who had formerly come from Rome) which very much abated the Hatred conceived against him; and by his Mediation, Peter Bishop of Winchester, Hubert Earl of Kent, Gilbert Basset, Stephen Segrave, and Richard Sward, were reconciled to each other. Anno Dom. MCCXXXVIII

Matt. Westminster relates, That the Reason why the King sent for this Legate into England, was, because he repented that he had bestowed such great Honours and Estates upon Earl Richard his Brother, and Gilbert the Earl-Mareschal, and others, whom he thought were ungrateful to him; and therefore by private Messengers to the Pope, he desired him that he would please forthwith to send his Legate over hither to reform the State, as if it had been then in apparent danger. This shews the Meanness of this King's Temper, who that he might domineer over his Subjects by the Pope's means, cared not how much he subjected himself and his Kingdom to his Exactions. The private Reason of this Legate's coming over.

[2] About this time, although according to the Act made in the Council or Parliament at London, the Thirtieth Part granted to the King was to be collected, and secured in certain Monasteries, or Castles, to be disposed of towards the defraying the necessary Expences of the Kingdom; yet notwithstanding all this Caution, the King bestowed most of this Treasure upon Strangers, who carried it out of the Realm, and he now again wholly relied upon their Councils, which much exasperated the Great Men, and more especially his Brother Richard Earl of Cornwal, who thereupon went to the King, and represented to him the miserable State of his Realm; how that he had scraped from, and deprived his Natural Subjects of their Money and Goods, and had lavishly bestowed it upon Foreigners; adding withal, that the Archbishopricks, and all the Bishopricks of England had been void in his time, except those of York, Bath, and Winchester, besides what arose from vacant Abbeys, Earldoms, Baronies, Wardships, and other Escheats, and yet his Treasure was never the fuller: Moreover, that he had lately called in the Pope's Legate, whereby he had so inslaved himself, that he could do nothing in his Realm, without his Consent; so that he was no longer King, but a Feudatary to the Pope. [2] Id. p. 445. Notwithstanding all the Caution of the last Parliament, the Money there given is squandred away upon Strangers. And he being wholly governed by them, it highly exasperates the Earl of Cornwal and other Great Men, who represent to the K. the miserable estate of the Nation.

[3] His Principal Councellors and Advisers in these things were John Earl of Lincoln, and Fryer Geoffery a Templar, Natives born within the Kingdom. [3] Id. p. 446. Who were the K.'s principal Advisers in these Proceedings.

But as for Simon Monfort, who is also here named by our Authors, as one of the King's New Advisers, he was Younger Son to Simon Earl of Montfort in France, and was lately come over to make his Fortunes in England, having quitted the French Court by reason of some Dispute he had with Queen Blanche the King's Mother; yet did not this render him less odious to the English Nobility, as you will find hereafter.

[4] On the Fourteenth of September, the King summoned the Great Men to meet him and the Legate at York, to treat upon some great Affairs that concerned the Kingdom: The King of Scots met him there, to conclude the Difference depending between them. After much Consultation and Debate, it was agreed, That the [4] The K. summons a Parliament at York, where an Agreement is made between K. Henry and the King of Scots.

the King of Scots ſhould have Three hundred Pounds in Land by the Year in England, for which he ſhould do Homage to King Henry; but he ſhould not build any Caſtles upon it, and was to quit all Pretences to any farther Claim. But in the Record it appears to have been but Two hundred Pounds per Annum, and was to be out in Cumberland and Northumberland.

The Legate ſignifies to that King his deſign of viſiting Scotland, but is civilly put off by him.

Then the Legate ſignified to the King of Scots, that he would go into Scotland to treat upon Eccleſiaſtical Affairs there, as he had done in England: But that King anſwered him, 'That he never 'remembred any Legate ſent into his Kingdom, and he thanked 'God) there was no need of any now; for neither his Father nor 'any of his Anceſtors had ſuffered any to enter there; and ſo 'long as he was Maſter of himſelf, he would not allow it neither; 'and withal adviſed him to take heed how and when he entred 'into his Land; for he had an Ungovernable People, whoſe Vio'lence and Fury would not be reſtrained. Whereupon the Legate, after he had heard what the King ſaid, altered his Thoughts of ſeeing Scotland, and kept cloſe to the King of England, whom he found very obſequious in all things: So great a difference there was between the Temper of theſe Two Princes, the one doing all he could to enſlave his Kingdom to the Pope, the other to keep it free.

[5] Id. ib.

The Legate holds a Synod at London, where ſeveral Decrees are made.

[5] So ſoon as the Legate returned out of the North, he held a a General Council or Synod of all the Archbiſhops, Biſhops, Abbots, and Priors inſtalled of all England, in the Weſt-end of St. Paul's Church, where a lofty Throne or Seat was erected for him. When all the Biſhops and Clergy were aſſembled, and the Archbiſhops of York had taken their Places, the former on his Right Hand, the Latter on his Left, after a ſhort Sermon in Latin, he read aloud, and cauſed to be ratified by the Synod, certain Canons or Decrees, which are ſtiled the Conſtitutions of Otto to this day; and, for which, ſince they relate wholly to Eccleſiaſtical Diſcipline, I refer the inquiſitive Reader to our Lyndwood for further Satisfaction.

The death of John the Scot Earl of Cheſter without Iſſue.

I muſt here likewiſe take notice, that John, Sirnamed the Scot, Earl of Cheſter, dying this Year without Iſſue, (and being poiſoned, as was ſuppoſed) the King annexed that Earldom to the Crown, allowing his Siſter's Fortunes out of other Lands, leſt ſo Noble an Earldom ſhould be divided among Women.

[1] I ſhall conclude this Year with that ſad Account which our Author gives us concerning the General Corruption of the Church of Rome, 'about this time, and for which (ſays he) it muſt needs 'have incurred God's juſt Indignation, ſince its Chief Miniſters 'and Governours ſeek how to ſcrape Money together, and fill their 'Purſes rather than to gain Souls: They ſtudy how to oppreſs 'Religious Perſons, and to gain other Men's Goods by Penalties, 'as Uſury, Simony, and other unlawful Means; but never took care 'of Juſtice and Honeſty, or the Inſtruction of the Simple; that 'whoſoever any way obtained an Eccleſiaſtical Benefice, was very 'ſollicitous how much it would yield him; but as for the Name 'of the Saint, to whom his Church was Dedicated, it was the laſt 'thing he enquired into, (if ever he did it at all;) and from Anno Dom. MCCXXXV.

* This was Peter Count of Auxerre, a Frenchman.

[2] This Year King Henry at Chriſtmas kept his Court at Weſtminſter, and Simon Montfort, on the Day after Epiphany, married Eleanor the King's Siſter (he himſelf giving her) in his own private Chapel: She was the Relict of William Mareſchal late Earl of Pembroke, and had a very great Jointure. About which time the Pope having heard what great Diſturbances were like to ariſe in England upon the calling in, and continuance of his Legate there, ſent his Revocatory Letters to him; but he being very unwilling to depart from a Place where he reaped ſo great a Harveſt, prevailed with the King, Earl Richard, and all the Biſhops, to certifie to the Pope under their Hands and Seals, That his Continuance in England would be of very great Advantage to the King, the Church, and whole Realm, whereby he obtained Leave to ſtay ſome time longer.

Anno Dom. MCCXXXVIII

[2] Id. p. 465. S. Montfort marries Elianor the K.'s Siſter.

[3] But when Earl Richard and the Great Men heard that Simon Montfort was privately Married to the King's Siſter, they were grievouſly enraged at it, becauſe it was done without their Privity and Conſent; and Earl Richard went to the King, and gave him very hard Words about it, becauſe contrary to his late Promiſes and Oaths, he ſtill adhered to, and was guided by the Counſels of Strangers. Then Gilbert Earl-Mareſchal, and all the Earls and Barons of England ſeconded Earl Richard, whom they looked upon to be the Man that ſhould free the Land from Italians and Strangers; ſo that none now ſtuck cloſe to the King but Hubert Earl of Kent, whom for his Years, as well as divers other Reaſons, they were not much afraid of. When the Legate ſaw the Danger the Kingdom was in, he applied himſelf to Earl Richard, and adviſed him to deſiſt from oppoſing the King his Brother, promiſing him large Poſſeſſions from him, and the Pope's Confirmation of them. To whom the Earl anſwered, That he had nothing to do with the Eſtates of Laymen, but ſhould only concern himſelf with Eccleſiaſtical Matters. But it was not ſtrange that the Earl ſhould be ſo much concerned for the preſent State of the Kingdom, ſeeing he was the only Heir Apparent to the Crown: And although ſo many Profits accrued every way to the King, yet by reaſon of the great Gifts he beſtowed upon the Queen's Relations, the Treaſury was empty, when the Kingdom was on every ſide encompaſſed with Enemies and Strangers, who were enriched with great Church-Revenues, and Benefices given and founded by his Pious Anceſtors.

[4] When the Legate heard this, he endeavoured by Admonitions, Entreaties and Threats, to allure or affright the Barons of his Party into a Compliance, but all in vain, for the King saw their Inclinations were wholly bent towards his Brother; and therefore when he found he could do no good upon them, he desired time till the day after the first Sunday in Lent to give his positive Answer. On the Day appointed the Great Men met at London, guarded with Horse and Arms, to compell the King (if he refused) to the performance of the Promises; and at last, after many long Debates, the King promised to submit himself to the Determination or Direction of some of the most Grave and Discreet Men; which Agreement was reduced into Writing, and Sealed both by the Legate and the other Nobles.

[5] At this time also Simon Montfort and the Earl of Lincoln, (by their humble Submission and the Intercession of Friends, together with some Presents,) so wrought upon Earl Richard, that he was outwardly reconciled to them, they having first given caution to make satisfaction for the Injuries they had committed: But this was a great Blemish to his Reputation; and his Integrity was afterwards much suspected.

[5] Id. ib.

[1] Simon Montfort finding himself neglected by the King, as also by Earl Richard and the Great Men; and his late Marriage with the King's Sister like to be made null and void, having borrowed and got together what Money he could, took a Journey to Rome, hoping there to procure a Confirmation of his Unlawful Marriage, for the Countess his Wife, had some time before the said Solemnization, vowed perpetual Celibacy to the Archbishop of Canterbury, though she had not taken upon her the Habit of a Nun; but during her Husband's absence she remain'd privately at Kenelworth (it seems big with Child) expecting the Event of the Journey; but Simon by his Money so far prevailed with his Holiness, that notwithstanding it displeased Edmund Archbishop of Canterbury, (who was then at Rome) the Pope wrote to his Legate Otto to give Sentence for Simon Montfort's Marriage, and on the Fourteenth of October he returned into England, and was received by the King and all the Court, with all outward Satisfaction and Joy.

Simon Montfort goes to Rome, to procure a Confirmation of his Marriage.

And obtains orders for it.

[2] Some time after Easter, the Legate went to Oxford, and was honourably received there by the Scholars, and Lodged in the Abbey of Osney; yet his coming thither occasioned a great deal of trouble to the University; for one day after Dinner, the Scholars coming to pay their Respects to him, they were uncivilly repulsed by the Porter, and ill treated by the other Servants, which caused a great many reproachful Words on either side; in the mean time a poor Irish Scholar begging for some Relief at the Kitchin-Hatch, the Legate's Chief Cook instead of an Alms, cast a Ladle-full of Boiling Water in his Face; but when a Welsh Clerk who stood nigh him saw this Outrage, he cryed out, How long shall we endure this? And having a Bow in his hand, forthwith shot the Cook (who it seems was the Legate's Kinsman) through the Body with an Arrow, upon which he immediately fell down dead; the Legate hearing of this Fray, secured himself in the Tower of the Church till Night, and by this means made his Escape and hastened to the King (lying ing then at Abbingdon, and with many grievous Complaints related what had befallen him at Oxford: At which the King being moved, sent Earl Warren with some armed Men to relieve the Legate's Servants, who were still shut up there, and to repress the Insolence of the Scholars. The Earl when he came thither, took about thirty of them, and imprisoned them in Wallingford-Castle: Then the Legate (after he was recovered of his Fright) calling to him some Bishops, Interdicted the University of Oxford, and Excommunicated all that were Abetters or consenting to the late Riot. Anno Dom. MCCXXXVIII

The Legate Interdicts the City.

[4] Soon after this, he summoned all the Bishops of England to meet him at London on the Seventh of May, to treat with him about Ecclesiastical Affairs; and there the Bishops offered something in behalf of the Scholars, whereof a great Number were at his Pleasure imprisoned, and the rest ready to make their Submissions to him; Then after many Intreaties, the Legate was at length prevail'd upon to restore them; but upon these Conditions, That all the Scholars should meet at St. Paul's Church (which was above a Mile from the Legate's Lodging) and go on foot until they came to the Bishop of Carlisle's House, and there should put off their Caps, Cloaks, and Shoes, and so go to the Legate's House, and humbly beg his Mercy and Pardon; which they submitting to, and performing, the University was restored, and the Legate promised it should be no Infamy or Reproach to them.

[4] Id. ib. The Legate calls a Council of the Bishops at London, who intercede for the Scholars. Which he grants, but upon very hard Conditions.

This Difference being thus composed, the King sent Assistance to the Emperour against his Rebellious Subjects in Italy, under the Conduct of Henry de Turbeville, an Experienced Souldier, who was very successful in his Enterprizes, and reduced many Cities to the Emperor's Obedience. The King likewise sent a Letter to the Pope on his Brother-in-Law's behalf, which was taken very ill at the Court of Rome, and put a stop to all the English Affairs there for some time.

[5] Id. ib. The K. sends Assistance to the Emperor, which is ill taken at Rome.

I cannot omit here to mention the Decease of Two Persons of Eminent Quality, though of different Sexes; The first was Johanna Queen of Scots, the King's Eldest Sister, who came into England the last Year to visit her Brother, and died the Fourteenth of March; the other was Peter de Rupibus, or de la Roche, Bishop of Winchester, who deceased at Farnham, after he had Governed that Church about Two and thirty Years, who though he was a Man of Arbitrary Principles, and had been the cause of the King's Breach of Magna Charta, and of his advancing of Foreigners; yet to give him his due, he was certainly a Person very considerable for Policy, and long Experience in State-Affairs, and being very rich, and a great Benefactor to Religious Houses, no wonder our Author gives him large Commendations, though before he would allow him no very good Character.

[3] The King had endeavoured all he could to enclime the Monks of Wincester to chuse William his Half-Brother, Bishop Elect of Valence, to that Bishoprick; but he could not prevail with them, for they made choice of Will. Rale; however, the King refused him, and swore he would never accept of him: Then they proceeded to treat about another Choice, of which when the King heard, he endeavoured to influence or affright them to compliance with him by Promises and and Threats, though all to no purpose, for they Elected Ralph Neville Bishop of Chichester, the Chancellor to that See; which raised the King's Indignation to such a degree, that he bitterly reviled and reproached both the Monks and him; and then forcing from him the Great Seal, he delivered the Custody of it to Geoffrey a Knight-Templar, and John de Lexington; but the Profits of the Chancellorship still belonged to the Bishop. Then the King sent Two Lawyers, Simeon and Alexander, to the Court of Rome, who by Bribes and large Promises, procured this Election to be declared void.

The K. takes the Seal from the Bp. of Chichester, and appointed two Commissioners to keep it.

[4] After this, the King being at Woodstock in the Month of September there came One to the Court, who it seems had been of some Note (for our Author calls him a Literate Esquire) this Man feigning himself to be Mad, would needs have had the King to resign his Kingdom to him as his Right: The Officers about the King hearing this Insolence, would have forced him away with Bastinadoing him, but the King forbad them offering any Violence to him, saying he did nothing but what became a Mad-man: However, he was not so Mad as he feigned himself; for about midnight he got through a Window into the King's Bedchamber, with a long Knife drawn in his Hand, and not finding him there (for he slept that Night with the Queen) the Fellow search'd about in other Places: This was discovered by one of the Queens' Maids called Margaret Biseth, who (being then at her Devotions) cried out, and with her Noise alarm'd the Guard, who presently coming in upon him, secured him till next Morning: Upon Examination, he confessed that he was employed by William de Marie, the Son of Geoffrey de Marie, to Assassinate the King, and that many others were in the Conspiracy: Whereupon he was condemned to be drawn asunder by Horses at Coventry, which was executed accordingly, and his Body being Quartered, was sent to some of the Chief Cities of England, to be hanged upon a Gibbet.

[5] This Year King Henry kept his Christmas at Winchester, where whilst he was one Day at Dinner, Gilbert Earl-Mareschal came with several of his Friends to the Palace, but were denied Entrance by the Door-keeper: The Earl (suspecting something had been whispered in the King's Ear to his Disadvantage) sent to him next Day to know why such an Affront was offered to him the Day before? To which Message the King replied, That Richard his Elder Brother was a Traitor and a Rebel, and continued so till the time that Divine Vengeance took him; That through the importunate Intercession of the Archbishop of Canterbury (and not his own Merit) he had restored to him both his Brother's Office and Inheritance, yet could recall it whenever he pleased. The Earl having heard the King's Answer, and being now satisfied of his Displeasure, retired from Court, and went into the North of England. Then, about Candlemas, the King created Simon Montfort Earl of Leicester, and received Stephen de Segrave again into his Council: So unconstant was this poor Prince, that he never loved or hated any Man, but according to the Influence and Suggestions of those that were about him.

[5] Gilbert the Earl-Mareschal is refused entrance into the K.'s Palace; And sending to know the reason, the K. returns him a severe Message.

S. Montfort created Earl of Leicester.

[1] This Year the Pope by his Letters called home Otto his Legate; but the King fearing his Great Men would unanimously oppose him next Parliament, presently dispatch'd Messengers to his Holiness, with a Request to let him continue still in England, to appease the Troubles he expected there; which Licence the Legate some time after received by Simon Norman, who had been on purpose on that Errand; but when the Noblemen that were now come to London observed this, fearing the Legate's Wiles and the King's Subterfuges, they went home (slighting the King's fair Speech as meer Sophistry) without doing any Business.

[1] Id. Ib. Otto is again recalled, but at the K.'s Request continued Legate.

[2] Soon after Easter, the King being sensible of his own Indiscretion, in discharging the Bishop of Chichester from the Chancellorship, and removing him from Court, used all the Arts he could to prevail with him to return to his Office; but he refused it, still remembring how he had been treated by the King, in pronouncing his Election to the Bishoprick of Winchester void, when he had both Served him and his Father so long with great Fidelity and Integrity.

[2] Id. p. 485. The K. again offers the Bp. of Chichester the Seal; but he refuses it with good Reason.

[3] This Year in Lent Pope Gregory by his Bull Excommunicated and Anathematized Frederick the Emperour, because he justified himself in seizing and detaining certain Lands and Castles belonging to the Bishop of Sardinia, and would not hearken to his Holiness's Admonitions to the contrary. Upon which the Emperour was some time after, by the Pope's Mandate, denounced Excommunicate in St. Paul's Church, and afterwards all over England, without any Contradiction; tho the King (as being his Brother-in-Law) had more reason than any other Prince to have hindred it; but he was then so absolute a Vassal to the See of Rome, that he durst not refuse any thing that she was pleased to impose.

See the Pope's Bull in Matt. Paris, and the Emperour's Answer to it.

But to return to Domestick Affairs of greater Importance to England: [4] On the Sixteenth of June following, Queen Eleanor was safely brought to Bed of a Young Prince at Westminster, who on the Fourth Day after, was Baptized Edward by the Legate in the Abbey-Church (although he was no more than a Deacon) the Archbishop of Canterbury being present, who only Confirmed him in the presence of several Bishops and Great Men.

[4] Id. pe 488. Prince Edward born.

[5] This Year William, one of the King's Messengers, being convicted of many Crimes, was condemned to die; but to prolong his own Life, he accused several of the Court of Treason, and among the rest Ranulph Bretton, Chanon of St. Paul's, and Treasurer, who was by the King's Writ to the Mayor of London apprehended, imprisoned, and laid in Irons in the Tower: Whereupon the Dean of London, with the Chanons, in the absence of the Bishops proceeded to Excommunicate all that were actually concerned in this Violation of the Church's Privilege; the King being admonished by the Bishop to correct his Error, and neglecting it, the whole City of London was threatned to be Interdicted, by the Legate, Archbishop, and Bishop of London. Thereupon the King (though against his Will) released him; but upon this Condition, That he should appear whenever he should be called upon to his Trial: But the Church would not consent to it; so at length he was set at liberty, but discharged the Court.

[1] Id. p. 497. The K. ſhews his ſudden Diſpleaſure againſt S. Montfort and his Lady for no cauſe.

[1] On the Ninth of Auguſt, many Great Ladies being met at London to accompany the Queen to her Churching; ſo ſoon as the King ſaw Simon Montfort Earl of Leiceſter, and his Lady there, he told him he was an Excommunicated Perſon, and prohibited both him and her (though his own Siſter) to be preſent at that Solemnity; adding withal, that he had firſt Debauched, and then (to avoid Scandal) Married her, and had gone to Rome to procure by Bribes the Pope's Confirmation of this unlawful Marriage: But when the Earl heard theſe ſharp Words from the King, he was quite out of Countenance, and not being permitted by him to Lodge in the Palace of the Biſhop of Wincheſter (which he had lent him) nor able by any means to appeaſe the King's Diſpleaſure, he that Evening hiring a Boat on the Thames, with his Lady and ſome few Attendants, took Shipping, and went beyond Sea: But what ſhould be the occaſion of this ſudden Alteration of the King's Favour, beſides the Fickleneſs of his own Humour, I cannot find.

[2] Id. p. 498. The Biſhops conſult how to relieve the Church from the Exactions of the Legate, but in vain.

[2] On the laſt of July, the Biſhops met at London, to conſider upon a very great, but difficult Undertaking, which was how they might relieve the Church of England from thoſe many Oppreſſions it lay under, by the perpetual Exactions of the Pope's Legate; but inſtead of eaſing them, he demanded freſh Procurations from em; to whom they briefly anſwered, That the Church had been ſo often ſqueezed by him and others from Rome, that they could endure it no longer: So the Synod was diſſolved, not without great Murmurs and Complaints; yet he extorted a great Sum of Money from the Religious Orders.

[3] Id. ib. The Legate is refuſed entrance into Scotland by that King.

[3] Soon after this the Legate went towards Scotland with a Guard of Engliſh, to ſecure himſelf from any treacherous Attempts; but before he entred that Kingdom, he was met by the King of Scotland, who told him plainly, 'That never any Legate had entred there before, and there was no occaſion for any at this time; for Chriſtianity (he thanked God) flouriſhed there, and the Church was in a proſperous Condition: But when Words began to multiply and grow high on both ſides, and the King was about to prohibit his Entrance, then through the Interceſſion of the Great Men of England, it was agreed under the Hand and Seal of the Legate, that this ſhould not be drawn into a Precedent; whereupon (as the Chronicle of Melroſs informs us) the Legate entred Scotland, and held a Council or Synod at Edinburgh, and having ſcraped together what Money he could there, returned into England.

his Hands; To all which he answered by Laurence a Clerk of St. Albans (his sure Friend in all his Adversities) with such Modesty and Submission and yet so fully to the purpose, that all that heard him were satisfied with the Earl's Innocence; although the King and all his Lawyers or Pleaders did what they could to prove him Guilty: However, the King's Wrath was no whit abated, until he had resign'd into his hands Four of his best Castles, namely, Blanch-Castle, Grosmund in Wales, Screwsbrith, and Hatfield. The Articles against the Earl and his Plea to them, are very long, together with their Answers, and are found at large in the [1] Additaments of Matthew Paris, to which I refer the curious Reader.

[2] But to say something of Foreign Affairs; This Year the Pope wrote to the King of France, to let him know, that he had by the Advice of his Brethren the Cardinals, Excommunicated and Deposed Frederick the Emperor, and had made choice of Count Robert the King's Brother to succeed him in the Empire; and then promised not only his own, but also the Assistance of the Universal Church to establish him in the Possession of the Imperial Crown: To which the King of France (by the prudent Advice of his Council) answered, That he knew not by what Authority so great a Prince was Deposed, nor was satisfied that the Crimes laid to his Charge were ever proved; and if they were, it ought to be done by the Act of a General Council, and not by the Pope, who was his Capital Enemy: Nor had he found so much Religion in his Holiness as in him; and therefore would not be engaged in so dangerous an Affair. Which when the Pope's Envoys heard, they went away confounded: Then there was sent solemn Ambassadors from the King of France to the Emperor, and they gave him a full Account of the late Message from the Pope; to which the Emperor made a Noble and Generous Reply, highly reflecting upon the Pope's Piety; which since it is not within our Province, I refer the Reader to our Author.

[3] This Year K. Henry kept his Christmas at Winchester, where he Knighted Baldwin de Rivers, and then made him Earl of the Isle of Wight, and Married him to the Daughter-in-Law of his Brother Richard Earl of Cornwal: Then on the Octaves of Epiphany (or Thirteenth of January) the Archbishops and Bishops, with many Great Men, met at London, the Legate being present, where before the King in his own Court, the Bishops made grievous Complaints of his Injuries, Oppressions, and Desolations, that were brought upon the Church by his means, contrary to his Charters and Oaths, by keeping many Churches void for a long time, and taking the Profits of them to his own Use; as also for hindring Canonical Elections: And about Thirty Chapters of Cathedrals seconded the Bishops in their Complaints against the King; and at length they proceeded to Excommunicate all those his Councellors who had enclined his Mind to such Enormities.

[4] Id. p. 524. The Emperor's complaint against the K. and on what ground.

[4] At which time also the King received an Express from the Emperor, wherein he complain'd, that sure the King had forgotten he had married his Sister, when he had suffer'd the Pope's Sentence of Excommunication against him to be published in his Realm, and had inconsiderately called in, and still continued in his Kingdom the Pope's Legate, as Coadjutor in these Practices against him; wherefore he desired that the Legate might be thrust out of England as an Enemy and Pillager of his Subjects; to whom the King most shamefully answered, That he ought to obey the Pope, and his Ecclesiastical Commands because he was his Tributary and Feudatory: However, after some Consultation with himself, he advised the Legate to leave his Kingdom, lest by his stay here he should incense the Emperor; the Legate reply'd, That he had called him into his Kingdom, and therefore required safe Conduct for his Return. Thus the King, instead of Excusing, rather shewed himself guilty of greater Weakness; yet he being willing somewhat to appease the Emperor, wrote to the Pope on his behalf, beseeching him, that for Affinity's sake, he would deal more mildly with him: But in the mean while, the Legate was not Idle in Collecting and Forcing the Clergy to pay their Procurations. Moreover, hearing (as he said) that some that had undertaken the Crusado, and were unable to fight, had gone to Rome for Absolution from their Vow, he by his Letters invited all such as were desirous of Absolution, and willing to spare their Labour and Expences, to come to him, and upon the Payment of a Sum of Money, they should be Absolved from their Oath, since he had received the Pope's Command, that he ought not barely to Absolve them, but also to compel them to redeem their Vow, that is, to compound for their Absolution by Money.

The K's mean Answer, yet at last he advises the Legate to withdraw.

A great difference between the Scholars and Townsmen of Oxford.

About this time also there arose such a Difference between the Citizens and Scholars of Oxford, that many of them removed from thence, and settled at Cambridge, where the Scholars had before obtained certain Liberties from the King against the Townsmen; and that by his Grant or Charter: About the same time also the King

[3] About that time the Archbiſhops, Biſhops, Abbots, and ſome of the Great Men of England met at Reading, to hear from the Legate what the Pope's demands were. When they were aſſembled together, and Silence was made, the Legate declared the Pope's Love and Charge in ſecuring the Peace of the Church againſt the Aſſaults of the Emperor Frederick; wherefore, for that and his Holineſs's Support, he required on Fifth Part of all their Goods: The King had before given his conſent to it, affirming, He neither would nor could oppoſe the Pope; but the Biſhops looked upon this as an inſupportable Burthen, and that it highly concerned the Engliſh Church; wherefore they deſired time to deliberate upon an Affair of ſo great Importance.

[3] Id. p. 526. An Aſſembly of the Biſhops and Great Men of Reading, where the Legates demands a Fifth Part of all Goods.

[4] After ſome conſideration, the Archbiſhop of Canterbury conſented to pay the Fifth Part of his Rents, which amounted to Eight Hundred Marks, and the reſt of the Prelates of England followed his Example.

[4] Id. p. 527. At laſt the Bps conſent to pay it.

[5] But ſome time after, when the Archbiſhop ſaw the Church of England was every day more and more oppreſſed, ſpoiled, and deprived of its Liberties, without any hopes of Remedy; and that the Eight hundred Marks he had given the Pope availed nothing; he not long after left England, and retired to the Abby of Pontigny in France.

[1] Some time after, the King ſent Juſtices-Itinerant, through all the Counties of England, who under the pretence of correcting Enormities, and doing Juſtice, only gathered a great Sum of Money for the King and the Pope's Legate's Uſe, who now remitted over to him a vaſt Sum of Money, by one of his Clerks; and thus the King and the Pope ſhared all the Riches of the Kingdom between them.

[1] Id. p. 533. The K. ſends Juſtices-Itinerant all over England, to fleece the People.

[2] But to add ſomewhat more concerning the Papal Oppreſſions; this Year the Pope ſent his Precepts or Breves, directed to the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and to the Biſhops of Lincoln and Salisbury, commanding them to prefer no leſs than Three hundred Romans or others to the firſt vacant Benefices in England, and not to collate any Others, till they were all ſufficiently provided: [3] And the Pope had alſo lately ſent into England one Peter Rubeus to be his Collector, who went about to the Chapters of Religious Houſes, and of ſome he gained a Promiſe to pay ſo much Money for uſes not mentioned, but only as ſuch a Biſhop, or ſuch an Abbot, had engaged engaged to do before, and then urged their Examples to Others, whereby many were seduced and cheated of their Money: But when the Abbots were sensible of this detestable Practice, two of them, namely the Abbots of St. Edmunds, and Battle-Abbey went to the King, and made known their Grievance to him, urging, That if such Exactions were suffer'd, the Baronies they held of him would not answer the Services that were due to his Crown; and therefore they humbly besought him for Remedy and Redress; But the King received them with Frowns, and told the Legate, (who was then present) that he might do what he pleased with them, adding, That he would lend him one of his Castles to imprison them; upon this some yielded to the fore-mentioned Exactions; but others refused to bring themselves under such a detestable Servitude.

Two Abbots represent this Grievance to the King, who receives them with Frowns, and leaves them to the Legate to do what he pleased with them

[4] Id. p. 334. The Bps are also tried, but they cunningly put it off.

[4] Thereupon the Legate with Peter Ruben, met the Bishops at Northampton; but they being warned by the late Example of the Abbots, they could get no positive Answer from them, but only several Exceptions against these Contributions, too long here to insert. Then he summoned the Rectors of the Churches in Berkshire to attend him and his Accomplices, and endeavoured both by Promises and Threats, either to allure or affright them into a Compliance; [5] But they resolutely stood it out, affirming, They ought not to contribute any thing against the Emperour, because he neither was Convicted nor Condemned by the Judgment of the Church, nor yet had possessed himself of the Patrimony of St. Peter: They also farther urged, That as the Roman Church had its own Patrimony, so other Churches had theirs also, by the Grants and Beneficence of Kings, Princes, and other Great Men, no ways Tributary to the Church of Rome. And likewise, That although the Care of the Church belonged to the Pope, yet the Dominion and Property did not. Again, That their Revenues were so small, that they could scarce supply them with Necessaries; therefore they ought not to be compelled to any such Contribution.

Anno Dom. MCCXL.

This Year likewise Edmund A.B. of Canterbury died of Grief in France; a Pious and Constant Prelate, [4] who did whatever he could by his Letters to make the Pope sensible of the Oppression the English Church then lay under, by reason of the King's keeping the Bishop's Sees so long vacant, purely for his own Advantage; as also his interposing by Letters and Menaces, to hinder the due Elections of Bishops and Abbots: but Pope Gregory was so far from contributing to have these Abuses redress'd, that he rather join'd with the King in promoting them; saying, That it was contrary to the King's Prerogative to restrain him; so that all the Archbishop's pious Intentions came to nothing; and this made the King hereafter more bold to impose the Election of Boniface, his Wife's Uncle, upon the Monks of Canterbury, contrary to the Liberties of that Church: But as for this Archbishop, he was not long after Canonized a Saint by the Council of Lyons.

[5] But before I conclude this Year, I cannot omit some other Passages, which though of less Moment, yet deserve our notice: Among which, is the Arrival of Thomas Earl of Flanders in England, with a great Retinue, being received by the King himself, attended by the Citizens of London in great State; whither as soon as he came, he was presented with Five hundred Marks in New-Coined Sterling Money, and had a Pension of as much more granted him, to be Yearly paid out of the Exchequer, in lieu of the Homage which he then paid the King for it; so having received divers rich Presents from him, he, after some time, took his Leave, and return'd into his own Country. From whence we may observe, how easie King Henry was to part with so much ready Money for a mere Ceremony; and besides, this shews us, that Homage was paid in those Days by one Prince to another, not only for Lands and Territories, but for Pensions in Money too.

[5] Id. p. 532. Thomas Earl of Flanders arrives in England, and is Nobly presented by the K.

[1] This Year also, the Jews of Norwich privately stole away, and Circumcised a Christian Child, intending to Crucifie him before Easter; but the Boy being indued by his Parents, and upon search found in a certain Jew's House, all the Men of that Religion in the City were presently seized, and Four of them being convicted of this Crime, were drawn at Horse-Tails, and then hanged upon Gibbets. This is the second Offence of this Kind which we find recorded by our [2] Author, to have been committed by the Jews of this Place in five Years time; and if so, it declares their horrid Enmity to, as well as Hatred for the Christian Religion.

[3] This Year King Henry kept his Christmas at Westminster, being attended by many of the Great Men, where he Knighted the Legate's Nephew and another, a Provincial, and gave them Considerable Estates in Land; and four days after, the Legate received Letters from the Pope, commanding him without any more delay to come to Rome. Then having taken his solemn Leave of the King, with many Signs and Embraces, they parted, and he taking Shipping at Dover the Day after Epiphany, left England: [6] No Man but the King lamenting his Departure; for he had so pillaged the Clergy, (letting alone the Holy Vessels and Ornaments of their Churches)

[5] Alſo about this time, Peter Earl of Savoy, the Queen's Uncle (on whom the King had before conferr'd the Earldom of Richmond) arrived here in England, and had very great Donatives beſtowed upon him. Some time after, the Jews were Fined, and forced to pay the King Twenty thouſand Marks, upon pain of being Baniſhed, or perpetually Impriſoned.

[1] Id. p. 554. The Author's Account of the inſatiable Avarice of the Roman Church.

[1] At this time (ſays Matt. Paris) by the procurement or permiſſion of Pope Gregory, the inſatiable Avarice of the Roman Church, ſo much increaſed, that confounding Right and Wrong, and laying aſide all ſhame, like a common Strumpet that receives all Comers, ſhe counted Uſury but a ſmall Fault, and Simony as none at all: So that ſhe infected other Countries with her Contagion, and England amongſt the reſt, of which though he ſays he could ſhew many Examples, yet thought fit only to afford us this ſingle Relation. That the Pope had wrote to the Abbot and Convent of Peterburgh, commanding them to grant him one of their beſt Parſonages of the Yearly Rent of a Hundred Marks, (yet if it were double that value it would pleaſe him ſo much the better) and he would Rent it out to them again at a Hundred Marks by the Year, and the reſidue ſhould be their own; he likewiſe wrote to ſeveral Italians that were Beneficed in England, to ſollicite and further it by their Admonitions, if not, to compell them to a Compliance with his Deſires; But the Monks anſwered, They could do nothing without the King's Conſent, who was their Patron and Founder, and that alſo their Abbot was now abſent; thereupon the Italian Clerks who came over into England, going to Peterburgh, were very inſtant with them to do it, though without either the Privity of the King or their Abbot; but this the Monks utterly refuſed, yet deſired they might not be preſſed for an Anſwer till their Abbot came home, whom, in the mean time, they acquainted with the whole Buſineſs:

[2] Whereupon he preſently ſent William de Burgh his Chaplain, to the King, to let him know how dangerous the Conſequence of ſuch a Matter might prove. When the King was made ſenſible of the Detriment the Church would hereby ſuſtain, and deteſting the Covetouſneſs of the Court of Rome, he ſtrictly prohibited them from proceeding any further in ſuch enormous Attempts: But this is the firſt Example of the King's Courage, in refuſing the Pope's Unreaſonable Demands.

[3] In April following, the Monks of Canterbury, through the Contrivance and great Induſtry uſed by the King in that Affair, Elected Boniface of Savoy, (a Graceful Perſon, yet whoſe Learning and Parts were wholly unknown to them) Archbiſhop of that Place, who was approved of and confirmed both by the King and the Pope.

[4] Id. p. 565. Gilbert Earl-Mareſchal killed near Tornaming by his Horſe.

[4] This Year, on the Seven and Twentieth of June, Gilbert Earl-Mareſchal was kill'd by the Unruſineſs of his Horſe, whoſe Reins breaking in a Tourneament at Hertford, he was flung down, and his Foot being engaged in the Stirrup, cauſed him to be almoſt kick'd to Death: and at the ſame time Robert Say one of his Knights was was likewise slain, and divers Esquires wounded and hurt: yet could not these unfortunate Accidents make the Noblemen quit this rough and dangerous Recreation, notwithstanding they had the Pope's Inhibitions, and the King's Commands to the contrary. Anno Dom. MCCXLI.

[5] Otto, the Pope's Legate, had, at his departure, left behind him, Peter Rubeus, and Peter de Supine, armed with the Pope's Bull, by which they had Power to collect Procurations, to Excommunicate, Interdict, and by several ways to extort Money from the English Church; by which Authority this Peter carried himself as if he had been a Legate, and wrote to divers Abbots in a Commanding manner to make them contribute under the name of Procurations; and in the mean time Peter de Supine went by the King's permission into Ireland, carrying the Pope's Bull, where with great severity he exacted the like unreasonable Payments, and then return'd back into England in Autumn, bringing over no less than Fifteen hundred Marks from that Poor Kingdom.

[5] Id. p. 556. Petir Rubens, and Peter de Supine, are left by the Pope's Legate to extort Money from the Clergy.

[1] As for Civil Affairs, this year affords little, only that Griffin, the Base Son of Llewellin Prince of Wales, was treacherously imprison'd, by his half Brother David, who would not be perswaded to release him: Upon this Richard Bishop of Bangor first Excommunicated him, and then applied himself to King Henry for farther Remedy; whereupon he sent to David, and severely blamed him for his Treachery and Unkindness to his Brother, and commanded him to give him his Liberty; To whom David return'd a Malepart Answer, affirming, That Wales would never enjoy Peace, if he were set free: [2] But when Griffin understood this, he sent privately to King Henry to let him know, That if he would procure him his Liberty, he would become his Vassal, and pay him Two hundred Marks a year for his Land, and Swear Fealty to him, and would also assist him in subduing the Rebellious Welsh: At the same time also Griffin the Son of Madoc, a most Potent Man among the Welsh, promised the King his utmost Assistance, if he would but enter Wales with a good Force.

[1] Id. p. 569. Griffin is treacherously dealt with by his Brother Prince David, who is therefore Excommunicated by the Bishop of Bangor.

[2] Id. p. 570. Griffin, to obtain his Liberty, promises to become the K's Vassal.

[3] The King having such an Advantageous Offer made him, joyfully accepted it, and summoned all who owed him Military Service to meet him at Gloucester with Horse and Arms at the beginning of Autumn, and from thence with a great Army, he marched towards Chester, which so affrighted Prince David, that he presently capitulated, and instead of seting his Brother free, delivered him up to the King; But the Poor Man's Condition was not at all the better for it, because he was immediately sent Prisoner to London, with several Noblemen of Wales, that were Hostages for Prince David, under the Conduct of John de Lexington, to be secured in the Tower: Then about Eight days after Michaelmas Prince David came to London, and having done his Homage, taken an Oath of Fealty, and given Security to the King to observe the Peace, he was dismissed, and so returned home in safety: These things were done between the Eighth of September, and Michaelmas following.

[3] Id. ib. The King accepts the offer, and prepares to march into Wales. David frighted with this News, makes an Agreement with the King, and delivers up his Brother to him. He is imprison'd in the Tower. David does his Homage to the King, and returns home.

But since we may receive a great deal of light, as to the History of these Welsh Transactions, from the Tower Records, I shall give you an Abstract of them from Dr. Brady's History and Appendix, where where it appears by a Charter of this year, * That ſome time before Prince David had thus delivered into the King's hands his Brother Griffin, Senana his Wife complain'd to him, that Prince David had Impriſon'd her Husband, with his Son Owen, for whoſe Releaſe ſhe, in the Name of her ſaid Husband, offer'd the King Six hundred Marks, provided that he by the Judgment of his Court, and according to the Law of Wales, would put him in Poſſeſſion of that part of his Father's Inheritance, which he ought to enjoy, and which David by Force then with-held from him; At the ſame time alſo ſhe undertook, that her Husband his Heirs ſhould pay to the King and his Heirs Three hundred Marks per Annum, viz. one Third part in Money, another Third part in Oxen and Cows, and the laſt Third part in Horſes, at Shrewsbury, to be deliver'd to the Sheriff of Shropſhire: She alſo Engaged for her Husband, That if at any time any Welſhman rebell'd againſt the King or his Heirs, he ſhould at his own Coſt compel him to give Satisfaction; and for the Performance of all this, in the Name of her Husband Griffin, ſhe offer'd the King as Pledges, or Sureties, Ralph Mortimer, Walter de Clifford, Roger de Montealt, Steward of Cheſter, with ſeveral other Noblemen, her Friends.

* Then follow the ſeveral Inſtruments or Charts of thoſe Noblemen to the King, That what Senana had propos'd ſhould be truly perform'd; † After theſe, are ſet down the ſeveral Charts of Mereduc ap Howel, Owen ap Howel, and thoſe Noblemen of Wales that favour'd Griffin's Cauſe, which alſo Teſtifie, That they had Sworn Fealty to King Henry, and would faithfully ſerve him with all their might during their Lives whenever he wanted their Aſſiſtance; with ſome other Articles needleſs to be here recited: And for the Obſervation of theſe things, they put themſelves under the Juriſdiction of the Biſhops of Hereford and Coventry, whom the King had appointed to Excommunicate their Perſons and Interdict their Lands, if they did any thing contrary to this Agreement; which bears Date Auguſt the Sixteenth.

* Ib. N. 169.

Yet notwithſtanding, all theſe fair Propoſals and Articles came to nothing, for Prince David out-bid his Brother Griffin, and inſtead of ſetting him free, (as he ought to have done) deliver'd him up to the King (as you have heard) who kept him Priſoner, till he broke his Neck by a fall, in endeavouring to make his Eſcape out of the Tower, as you will find hereafter.

* Cart. 25 H. 3. M. 3. Dr. B.'s Ap. N. 164.

The King had ſummon'd Pr. David to appear before him at Worceſter.

The ſame * Roll alſo gives us a more exact Account of ſome other former Proceedings with this Prince David, than what we find in our Hiſtorians; for it there likewiſe appears, that the King had the February before ſummon'd David Prince of North-Wales to appear before him at Worceſter, to appoint Arbitrators in the room of ſuch as were named in the Inſtrument of Peace made between them the year before, (and who were then beyond Sea) that they might do Juſtice according to that Form. It thereby farther appears, that David came not, but ſent Three Meſſengers to the King, but indeed without ſufficient Power to do what was required; and therefore the King by a Letter, dated the Nineteenth of February, commanded him by virtue of his Allegiance (all Excuſes laid aſide) Perſonally to appear at Shrewsbury a week before Palm-Sunday, before fore such Commissioners as he should send thither to Transact that Affair; and a day in the last week in April was assigned for him and the Lords Marchers to appoint Arbitrators in the Place of those beyond Sea, who were to do and receive Justice according to the Form of Peace agreed on between the King and him. Anno Dom. MCCXLI.

And we farther find by another * Record of this very year, that Prince David in obedience to the King's Letters, sent Thudy his Steward, and David his Chancellour, and Philip ap Ivor, as his Procurators or Commissioners, with full Power to do what was so desired; and that Ralph Mortimer, Roger Steward of Chester, and others for themselves, and the rest of the Lords Marchers, appear'd, and desired that Justice might presently be done according to the Proofs and Allegations of Witnesses at Shrewsbury, before Stephen de Segrave, and his Fellow Judges, who were sent thither for the King; where, after Two days Debate, instead of Otto the Legate, (who was at first appointed, but was gone away) the Bishops of Worcester, Norwich and Coventry, John Fitz-Geoffrey, Hubert Fitz-Matthew, and Walter de Clifford, were chosen (in his stead) Arbitrators, and another day was then set, a month after Whitsunday, at Maneford-bridge beyond Shrewsbury, to hear what Proof could be made out concerning the Injuries done on either side; on which day the Matter being fully heard, another day was appointed for Judgment to be given by the Arbitrators, according to the Proofs before them.

* Rot. Cl. 25 H. 3. M. 8. Dors. Dr. B.'s App. N 165. New Arbitrators chosen between the King and Pr. David.

And it also appears by another * Letter of the King's to Prince David, bearing Date from Merlbridge the Fifteenth of July; and which is also upon † Record, that not long after this the King was inform'd, That David, contrary to his Oath lately taken, had confederated with, and drawn off the Sons of Madoc, and certain of the King's Subjects in Kerry, and had received them into his Country; and that he had begun to commit Burnings and Slaughters in the Lands of Ralph Mortimer, and others the King's Feudataries; and also had by Force seized the Lands of Owen Vaughan, and his Nephews, against all Right and Justice, and which had been adjudged to them in the King's Court; That he had caused a Ship belonging to Chester to be stayed in his Country laden with Wheat and other Victuals, making no Satisfaction to those that own'd the Goods; That when the King sent his Commissioners to Shrewsbury, David, in Contempt, neither came, nor sent any Procurators to meet them; wherefore he admonish'd him, that he should not fail to acquaint him before the First of August, what Satisfaction he would make for these Outrages committed by his Orders.

* Rot. Cl. 25 H. 3. M. 7. Dors. † Dr. B.'s App. N. 166. The King had notice of a Confederacy by Pr. David against him.

[4] Whereupon on the Nineteenth of the same month, Prince David despairing to succeed by Force, sealed his Charter of Submission to the King, which is found at large in Matt. Paris, and is also upon * Record in the Tower, to this effect:

[4] Id. p. 570. Prince David Seals a Charter of Submission to the King, with the Articles therein contained.

First, That he would deliver his Brother Griffin, or Gruffith, and his Son, to the King.

Secondly, That he would stand to the Judgment of the King's Court, whether Griffin ought to be kept Prisoner, or not; and also for the Portion of his Father's Inheritance, which he claimed according Thirdly, That he would restore to Roger de Monte-Alt, Steward of Chester, his Lands of Montalt, (or, as it is now commonly called Mould,) with its Appurtenances.

Fourthly, That he would restore to the other Barons Marchers all such Lands, Lordships, and Castles, as had been taken from them, since the beginning of the Wars between King John and his Father Llewellyn, Prince of Wales.

Fifthly, That he would defray all the Charges of King Henry in the last Expedition against him.

Sixthly, That he would make Satisfaction for all the Injuries done by him, or his, unto the King or his People; and also that he would restore unto him all the Homages which King John had, or which he ought to have, especially of the Noblemen of Wales.

Seventhly, The Land of Ellesmer, with the Appurtenances, was to remain to the King for ever.

Eighthly, That David would not receive any of the King's Subjects within his Country of Wales, that were Outlaw'd or Banished.

Ninthly, And that for the Performances of this, he would give Pledges and Security according to the King's Will and Pleasure, and obey all his Commands, and stand to the Law in his Court.

* 5 H. 3. M. 2. Dors. vid. Dr. B.'s App. N. 171. He seals another Charter, wherein he engaged, that he and his Heirs would faithfully serve the King, &c.

After this, on the Thirty first of August, he Seal'd another Charter to the King, (extant on *Record) freely and willingly; whereby he engaged, that he and his Heirs should faithfully serve the King and his Heirs, and assist him all the days of their Lives; and if at any time they should act contrary to that Engagement, then all his Lands and Territories should be forfeited to the King, for him and his Heirs to enjoy them for ever; and for the farther Confirmation of this Agreement, he caused the Bishops of Bangor, and St. Asaph, to put their Seals, as Witnesses, to this Charter.

I have been the more particular in these Transactions, not only because I find them mention'd by none besides Dr. Brady, but also to shew the infidelity of these Welshmen, who having begun a fresh and needless War against King Henry, Three years after fled to the Pope for Protection, as the Reader will find anon. But to return to our English Affairs.

[5] M. P. p. 572. Walter, Brother to the late Mareschal, is at first refused by the King to be invested in his Earldom, and Office, but is afterwards prevailed upon to grant him them.

[5] About this time Walter the Mareschal, next Brother to Gilbert late deceased, applied himself to the King, to be invested in his Office and Inheritance; but the King in a great Heat and Passion denied him both, urging against him the Treasons and Disobedience of his Brother, as also his own Undutifulness in being at the Torneament at Hartford, contrary to his Commands; but at length through the Intercession of the Queen, the Bishop of Durham and other Noblemen, he was prevailed with, the Sunday before All-Saints, to restore him to the Honour, Office and Estate of his Brother, and to invest him with his Earldom and Mareschalsie, reserving only to the Crown Two Castles in Wales, Kaermarden and Cardigan, which the King Garrisoned to secure his new Acquisitions there.

[1] I

[1] I shall conclude this year with an Account of Forreign Affairs; Richard Earl of Cornwal, and Titular Earl of Poictou, being now in the Holy Land, Lewis King of France on Midsummer-day, knighted his Brother Alphonso, and interested him with the Title, and Earldom of Poictou; most part of which that King now enjoyed by the Conquest of King Philip his Grandfather: at this Affront, offer'd to himself as well as his Brother Richard, King Henry was highly incensed, but it seems to no purpose.

[2] This year also Tin Mines were first discovered in Germany, both finer and more plentiful than those in England, which Mettal before was no where to be found but in Cornwal; by which Discovery the Price of Tin was very much lessened abroad.

[3] The same year deceased Two Ladies of the Blood Royal of England; First, Isabella, Empress of Germany, the King's Eldest Sister, who died in Child-bed, to the great Grief of the Emperor her Husband; [3] The other was Eleanor, Daughter of Geofrey Earl of Bretagne, and Sister to Duke Arthur; who having been kept Prisoner many years, now deceased in the Castle of Bristol without ever being Married; She is said to have been a Lady of a high Spirit, and who insisted upon her Right to the last; but tho King Henry might obtain by her death a more indisputable Title to the Crown than he had before, yet I do not find that the King of France, or any other Forreign Prince, ever espoused her Interest, or made any scruple to acknowledge Henry as Lawful King all her Life-time.

[4] As for Ecclesiastical Affairs, Pope Gregory dying about the end of August this year, for Grief (as was supposed) that he could not subdue the Emperor Frederic; Immediately upon this Pope's decease, there happened a great Division among the Cardinals at Rome about the Election of a new Pope, Five of them chusing Geofrey Archbishop of Milan, (whose Election the Emperor congratulated) and the other Three Cardinals chusing Romanus, (late Legate in Greece) which produced a great Schism in the Roman Church, no Pope being Lawfully chosen till the year following.

[5] Not long after the death of the Pope, the Emperor dispatched a Messenger to give King Henry the first notice of it, that he might seize the Money the Pope's Collectors had gathered in England for his Holiness's Use; but they were too quick for him, and escaped into France with all their Prey; yet afterwards being met with by the Emperor's Servants somewhere in his Dominions, they were taken and imprisoned, and all their Treasure paid into the Imperial Exchequer.

[1] This year King Henry kept his Christmas at Westminster, where Peter of Savoy, Earl of Richmond, being now resolved to return home, resigned up into the King's Hands all those Castles which were committed to his custody, lest his sudden Advancement should displease the Great Men of England; but before he had taken Shipping, he was remanded by the King, and perswaded, (tho seemingly against his will) to accept the Government of Dover Castle.

He applies himself to the King for Protection, offering to help him to recover his lost Dominions.

The King thereupon calls a Parliament at London.

Id. ib. The Earl of Cornwall returns home from the Holy Land.

[3] Id. p. 580, 581. The Parliament being met, dissuade the King from engaging in a War against France, and their Reasons for it.

The King not being able to prevail with the whole Body of the Nobility, discourses with them apart, but to little purpose.

They giving him very resolute Answers.

[2] But the chief Affair of this year was, That Hugh Earl of Marche (a Principal Nobleman of Poictou, and who had Married King Henry's Mother) having through the Pride of that Princess refused to do Homage to Alphonso, Brother to the French King, now Earl of that Province; Hugh thereupon applied himself to the King of England, his Son in Law, for Protection, perswading him, That by the help of the Poictovins and Gascoigne, with the Assistance of the King of Arragon and Earl of Thoulouse, he might easily recover those Dominions he had lost; Whereupon the King giving credit to these Pretences, wrote to all the Great Men of England, viz. Archbishops, Bishops, Abbots, Priors, Earls, and Barons, streightly Commanding, That they should all come to London on Tuesday before Candlemas-day, to Treat of such Publick Matters, as would not bear any delay.

In the mean time, viz. the day after Epiphany, Richard Earl of Cornwall, the King's Brother, landed at Dover from his Pilgrimage to the Holy Land, where he had made an Honourable Truce with the Sultan of Babylon, and was received by the King, Queen, and Nobility, with all the Demonstrations of Joy and Affection imaginable. Upon his return to Court, the Poictovins endeavoured all they could to perswade him to a War with France, for the Recovery of Poictou, which was to be his when regained, who therupon confirmed the King in his Resolution to attempt it.

[3] At the day appointed all the Nobility of England, as well Prelates as Earls and Barons, met at London, according to the Summons; but when they were assembled, and understood that the Earl of Marche had engaged the King in a War against France, they resolved to oppose both him and the Poictovins who advised it, adding, That the Kingdom stood [illegible] and the Treasure [illegible] had been already exhausted from them, and unprofitably spent; and therefore they would not consent that they more should be granted to be so unduly misspent and abused. When the King saw he could not prevail with the whole Body, he would needs try what he could do with them severally, and therefore sent for them one by one, telling them that such an one had promised so much, and another so much, but this Stratagem only rendered him the less considerable to them as to the Majority. Then he attempted those Great Men who were his Favourites and Domesticks, urging, That they were Honourable Men, and ought to be very desirous to have the antient Rights of the Kingdom recovered, and the Injuries done to it vindicated by force of Arms, therefore he wondered with what confidence they could oppose and desert him, when he had Promised and Sworn to prosecute what he had undertaken; but they also answered, The great Sums of Money had been already [illegible] and the People of the Realm had been [illegible] already, yet all the Treasure was wasted and gone; and the [illegible] gold by it; Moreover they very much wondered, he would undertake to hazard a War, without ever consulting his Natural Subjects; and that the Truce between Him and France, was not as yet expired, which good Kings had Sworn inviolably to observe; Besides, those Noblemen that advised him to this War, were the King of France's Subjects, and the King might expect but little Faith from such who had proved Traitors to their Natural Prince, adding withal the unsuccessful Attempts that his Predecessors had made in this nature; when the King heard all their Answers, he was much displeased, and in a great Passion swore, That their Words should neither affright nor hinder him from prosecuting what he had designed; but that after Easter he would pass over Sea, and try the Fortune of a Battel: And so the Parliament was dissolved.

Anno Dom. MCCXLII.

At which the K. is highly displeased, and falls into a Passion.

[4] This is our Author's Account of this Colloquium, or Parliament, wherein he mentions much hard Language given unto the King by the Great Men, even unto his face: Upon which Passage [5] Dr. Brady observes, That in the Relation which immediately follows this, and which (this Author says) was written as a perpetual Memorial of the Barons Answer to the King, it appears they never spoke, nor had any personal Conference with him, but only heard his Pleasure, and the Business he had with them, from his Commissioners or Messengers, viz. Walter Archbishop of York, Richard Earl of Cornwal, and Walter Provost of Beverley, by whom, upon mature Deliberation, They advised the King rather to send to his Cousin of France for Satisfaction, if he had done any thing contrary to the Articles of the Truce between them, and not to declare War until the time thereof were expired; but if he had done any Injury that could be proved, and that then he denied Restitution, they would assist him according to their Abilities: Then they reckoned up the many Aids they had given him, and remembred especially the last of a Thirtieth Part of their Moveables, which was by stipulation to have been expended by the Advice and Oversight of four Barons, for the Benefit of the King and Kingdom: And seeing they had never heard that any of it was expended by their Advice, they believed the King had all that Money by him, which he might now make use of; And further minded him, That by keeping so many Bishopricks vacant in his hands, as also by the Escheats of the Lands of Earls, Barons, and Knights, by Fines and Amercements which his Itinerant Justices had set upon Counties, Hundreds, Cities, Burghs, and Towns, he had of late raised great Sums of Money; insomuch, that by such Exactions and other Aids already given, the People of the Kingdom were so impoverished, that they had scarce any thing left them to subsist upon? And since the King, after their giving the last Thirtieth Part, had never observed the Great Charter, yet had engaged by another Additional Charter, That such Exactions should never be brought into Consequence; they answered positively, That at present they would grant him no further Aid. But when the King's Commissioners asked them, What if the King of France should break the Truce before it expired? to pacifie them they then farther engaged, on the behalf of the King, That if he had injured any of the Great Men, he would make them Satisfaction according to the Judgment of Peter of Savoy and others of his Council. To the First the Barons answer'd, as they had done before; and to the Second, they said, That they heard the same things formerly, when they granted the Thirtieth Part of their Moveables; but whether they had been performed or not, they left that to the King himself to consider: And so remained resolute in not granting him any Aid at all.

Dr. Brady would make the Author inconsistent with himself, without just cause.

Here the Doctor farther remarks, That there is not one Word of any Billingsgate Language or Reviling of the King, which he says this Monk's Relations do very much abound. Thus the Doctor would fain make his Author (to whom he gives much Credit in other Matters) to contradict himself in this Relation. Yet I can see no Reason for such a Conclusion; for this Author was then living, and might very well write an Account of what passed between the King and Barons at their first Meeting, and before they were retired to consult in a Body, and to whom being so assembled he sent his Deputies above-mentioned, by whom they returned him this last solemn Answer, the former passing only by way of Discourse.

But if Matt. Westminster may be credited in this Affair, the King discoursing with divers of the Prelates apart (using the Subtilty of the Roman Legates) brought them at last to his Will, and got a good round Sum of Money from them, which was in great part distributed to such Knights as wanted it to go over with him. This Author also further relates, That the King being still pressed by Messages from the Earl of March, and other Great Men of France, he scraped together all the Money he could raise, bestowing the whole Lent in this Employment, looking upon those who refused to assist him, as his declared Enemies, and vexing them by his Officers with many Oppressions; for the Earl of March had sent him word, That he need only take care to provide Money, for as to Men he would procure them.

[1] Id. p. 582. The K. summons all his Military Tenants according to the usual Tenor; but instead of their Service to bring Money.

[1] Against Easter the King sent out his Summons to all those that owed him Military Service, to meet him at Portsmouth, not with Horse and Arms, according to the usual Tenure, but (in lieu of their Service) to bring each a good Sum of Money with them (which our Author says was more like a Banker than a General:) So the King having committed the Custody of the Kingdom to the Archbishop of York, and received into his Favour the Bishop of Chichester, formerly his Chancellor, and recalled Ralph Fitz-Nicholas, and Godfrey Crancumb to Court, took Shipping at Portsmouth with Queen Eleanor, Earl Richard, and Seven other Earls, and landed at Gascoigny at the Mouth of the River Garonne, where they were received by Reginald de Pons, and the Great Men of Xantoigne. And in the mean while, for the better Security of his Affairs at home, a Marriage was agreed upon between his Daughter Margaret, and Alexander Eldest Son to the King of Scots; and that part of the Kingdom which bordered upon Scotland, was thereupon committed to the care of that King, during the time King Henry should remain beyond Sea.

He commits his Kingdom to the Abp. of York, and passes beyond Sea.

A Marriage agreed on between the K.'s Daughter and the K of Scots.

The French King sets out a small Fleet.

But let us see what was doing in the mean while in France: When King Henry's Designs were known to King Lewis, he presently equipped Twenty four Galleys to hinder the English from landing at Rochel; and Peter Earl of Richmond and the Bishop of Hereford, being sent into Poictou to secure what Friends and Assistance they could among the People of that Province, they hardly escaped being taken by the French; therefore they returned into England, without effecting any thing considerable.

[2] The King of France was not idle all this while, but prepared a mighty Force, which consisted of Four thousand Knights compleatly Armed, and Two thousand Esquires, besides Cross-bow-men and Common Soldiers to many more. This War was commenced by his seizing of the Goods and Persons of the Merchants both in Kingsland and France, that King first beginning it, to his great Dishonour, since it had not been practised in France till that time. Then King Lewis marched with his Army, and sate down before Fontenay, a strong Castle of the Earl of March's. During this Siege, the King of England sent Ralph Fitz-Nicholas and Nicholas de Molis, to the King of France, to denounce War unless he would agree to his Demands; The King received them civilly, letting them know, That he much wondred he could so openly break the Truce, that had been confirmed by their mutual Oaths to last for Three Years; Adding further, That he was so far from breaking the Truce, that he was willing it should be continued for Three Years longer, and would consent to deliver to their King the greatest part of Normandy and Poitou, provided he would not hinder him from revenging himself upon those Enemies and Traitors, who only trusted to their King's Assistance, and admired that his Cousin of England should think he infringed the Truce in the least, when he endeavoured only to correct and repress the Insolence of his own Rebellious Subjects; and yet admired that he should be so much wheedled by the Earls of March and Tholouse, and therefore thought that he had violated the Truce, in thus receiving and encouraging his Rebels and Enemies.

[3] With this Answer the Messengers returned to the King of England, who being over-perswaded by the crafty Poictovins against his own Interest, would by no means embrace those Honourable Proposals, but utterly refused to renew the Truce, and sent some Knights Hospitallers in his Name to defie the King of France, because he made War upon his Father-in-Law the Earl of March.

[4] When King Lewis found those so fair Overtures of Peace thus slighted, though he expressed his Sorrow that the King of England should be so drawn in by the Earls of March and Tholouse, yet shewed himself most concerned for the Oaths his Father had made to King Henry, when he left England, of delivering up his Dominions in France. But one of his Great Men replied, That the Oath was Mutual, and the King of England had violated it on his part, when he broke his Promises to Lewis's Accomplices, and caused Constantine a Citizen of London to be hanged for defending your Father's Honour. This poor Pretence satisfied the King's Scruples for the present, and then he proceeded to make a vigorous Attack upon the Castle of Fontenay, which after Fifteen Days Siege, was gained by Assault, contrary to the Confidence of all the Poictovins, and the Earl of March's Son who kept it, who with all his Accomplices, being above Four hundred, were made Prisoners. But when some about the French King advised, that they might be executed for a Terror to other Rebels, he replied, The Son has obeyed his Father, and the rest the Command of their Lord, and upon that account

This put the rest of the Defendants of the Earl of Marche his Castles into such terrour, that some of their own accord came in, and delivered up their Keys to the King of France; and others Capitulated upon his appearing before them: After which, That King took divers other Castles of the Earls, some by Force, and others by Surrender.

[5] Id. p. 589. The Earl of Marche, and the Poictovins repent their having begun this War.

[5] These uninterrupted Successes made the Earl of Marche and his Poictovins almost desperate, but they now began to repent they had ever engaged themselves against their Lord the King; in the mean time the King of England came before the City of Taillebourg, and Encamped in a Meadow over against it; but when the King of France heard of it, he marched with his Army towards that Place, and so soon as the Citizens had notice of his approach, they went out to meet him, and opened their Gates to him and his Army: The King of England seeing himself thus disappointed, and that he must now Fight the French with the few Men he had with him, he called to the Earl of Marche and asked him, How he had performed his Promise of procuring Men enough to baffle the French, if he supplied him with Money? The Earl replied, He never made any such Promise: Then Earl Richard produced the Charter of Agreement between them; which the other denied it was ever made or sealed by him, or that he had ever encouraged the Undertaking of this Expedition, but that it was the sole Contrivance of his Wife, the King's Mother. When he heard the Earl's reply, he was very much concern'd at it; but Earl Richard seeing the danger the King was in of being made a Prisoner, presently disarmed himself, and with a Truncheon in his Hand went to the French Camp, where he was kindly and honourably received; and being introduced to the King's Presence, he desired a short Truce, which the King granted for one Day and the Night following.

K. Henry being fail'd by them is much distressed.

Earl Richard goes to the French Camp, and obtains a short Truce.

So soon as the Earl had obtained this, he return'd to King Henry, and advised him to make his Escape with as much speed as he could, otherwise he would be taken Prisoner; Thereupon the King following his Counsel, took Horse that Night, and never stopped till he came to Xaintes; and the whole Army followed him, though not without great hazard, and some loss. The next day the King of France decamped, and marched with his Army towards Xaintes in pursuit of King Henry; then after several Skirmishes, and some few days intervals, both Armies met not far from Xaintes, where they had a sharp Engagement; and had the English equalled the French in number, they had gained the Victory, which the French Historians relate to have fallen to them: But the Number of those that were slain on either side is not mentioned; the Prisoners that were taken were exchanged; and those that behaved themselves with most Courage and Resolution in this Battle, were Simon Montfort Earl of Leicester, the Earl of Salisbury, Roger Bigod Earl of Norfolk, John de Burgh, Warin de Mauchensy, with divers others.

Anno Dom. MCCXLII.

[2] Whenthe Earl of Marche saw how successful the King of France was in every thing he attempted, and that his Strength daily increased, he began to consider how he should regain his Favour, and be reconciled unto him, and therefore privily sent to the Earl of Provence to desire him, That he, with the Bishop of Xaintes, would use their Endeavours with the King of France to procure his Pardon; Upon this they both went to the King, and assured him, That the Earl of Marche was sensible how much he had offended against his Majesty, and implored his Mercy and Favour, desiring to know upon what Conditions he pleased to impart it.

[2] Id. p. 591. The Earl of Marche endeavours to be reconciled to the King of France.

[3] The King of France accepted the offer, and was reconciled unto him upon these Terms: First, That whatsoever Places belonging to the Earl the King had possessed himself of during this War, should be for ever annexed to the Crown. Secondly, That all those Castles that were then in his possession, whether of his own, or his Vassals, which were judged any ways prejudicial to the King of France, should be delivered into his hands for three Years, and then not to be restored, unless the King was satisfied with his Fidelity. Thirdly, That he should with Two hundred armed Men enter into his Service, and faithfully serve him for Three Years at his own Charges, against all Enemies of the Church and Crown of France. Fourthly, That he should surrender up his Charter, whereby the King of France was obliged to pay him Ten thousand Pounds a Year for defence of the Marches, and should quit any such claim for the future. And further the French Historians relate, That the Queen his Wife, and her Sons, were all Sworn to observe the Covenants now made. To these hard Conditions this proud Earl was now reduced to obtain his Pardon, and then was presently sent against the Earl of Tholouse, his old Friend, and the King of England's Confederate.

[3] Id. ib. He deserts K. Henry, and enters into the French Service, and on what Terms.

[4] All this was concluded privately, without the knowledge of K. Henry, who had by Charter given the City of Xaintes to Hugh le Brun, the Earl of Marche's Son, the King's Half-Brother, without the Consent of the Citizens whereby he lost their Affections; for that they hated Hugh, as being an insolent Young Man. However, the King thought himself safe and secure there, till he was informed by one from the French Camp, That King Lewis designed to come and besiege that City very suddenly, and was resolved not to stir from thence till he had made him his Prisoner; which was likewise confirm'd by another, who assured him, That the Earl of Marche was revolted to the French, and if the King continued there one Night longer, he would be besieged. King Henry being by this Second Messenger pretty well persuaded, that the News was true, fled presently to Blaye a Town in Gascoigny, about Forty or Fifty English miles from Xaintes, and his Army followed him as fast as it could, but was so harrassed with the length and suddenness of the March, that they were unfit a good while for any Service. Upon this the Cities of Xaintes, Pons, and all the rest of Poictou forthwith submitted to the King of France; only Harould Governor of Mirabel-Castle went to the King of England, and implored his Protection; To whom the King replied, He was betrayed by the Earl of Marche, and was scarce able able to secure his own Person, and therefore gave him Leave to act according to his Direction. Thereupon he went to the King of France, and submitted himself to his Mercy and Protection; to whom the King replied, That he truly had behaved himself faithfully to his King, and therefore received the Castle and himself very kindly, and having first taken an Oath of Fealty, restored it to him again.

[5] William de Nangis in his Life of King Lewis under this Year, and in the relation of this Story, is in some things more particular, and in others less than Mat. Paris, though in the main they agree. The French Historian saith, That the Earl of Marche sent his Eldest Son, Hugh, who made Peace with the King of France upon these Terms, viz. That such Territories and Places as the King of France had taken from his Father, should remain to the Earl of Poictou, the King of France's Brother, and his Heirs; but as to the rest of the Lands the Earl of Marche and his Wife, with their Children, were to stand to the Pleasure and Courtesie of the King of France, for whose greater Security the Earl was to deliver up three strong Castles, viz. That of Merbin, his Castle upon the River Creuse, and Castle Archand; all which accordingly received Garisons, and that thereupon the Viscount of Thouars, and most of the Barons and Great Men of Poictou, did Homage to the King of France.

P 411, 412 Dein. William de Nangis gives a more particular Account of this Transaction.

[1] In the mean time, the King of France resolved to pursue the King of England to Blaye, and from thence to Bourdeaux, if he fled thither; but secret Factions among the Nobility, as also the want of Victuals and Forage hindered all; the Pestilence which raged in his Army, being deprived of near Fourscore Noblemen who were either Dead, or carried home Sick; together with his own Indisposition, (being naturally of a tender Constitution) made him alter those measures he had before resolved upon; so that instead of pursuing the War, he made a Truce with the King of England for Five Years, and then returned into France by Xaintes, and in a short time recovered his Health. This unfortunate Expedition is an Instance, that the Kings of England have scarce ever succeeded in any Enterprize, which they have undertaken without the Advice and Consent of the Great Council of the Kingdom. But whilst King Henry was engaged in this unlucky War, the Queen his Wife lay in at Bourdeaux, of a Daughter called Beatrix.

[3] During the King's being in France, a Scutage was exacted throughout all England of every Knight's Fee Three Marks, or (as Matth. Westminster relates) but Twenty Shillings; In the mean while, King Henry having retired to Bourdeaux, spent his time with his Queen in Idle Jollity, as if no Disturbance had befallen him; and during his stay there, (about Michaelmas) Earl Roger Bigod, with the Earl of Winchester, and many other Great Men, came to the King, desiring leave to return into England, which he granted them. After about the same time William de Marisco, a Knight of Ireland, having been long Outlawed with divers of his Accomplices, exercised Piracy in the Welsh and Irish Seas, making the Isle of Lundy (of which they had then possessed themselves) their Receptacle; but being there surprized by some that were sent for that Purpose, and brought to London, he and Sixteen more of his Company were

[1] About this time likewiſe, the King treated William de Roſs Baron of the North, very unkindly, who after he had ſpent all his money in his Service, and ſo could not ſtay any longer in France, becauſe he had not wherewithall to maintain himſelf, had notwithſtanding his Lands ſeized without the Judgment of his Peers; But when Earl Richard perceived how hardly he had been dealt with, he went to the King and blamed him for it; but he was received by him with great Paſſion and ſome Threats, to which Earl Richard made no return; but when he ſaw the King continued obſtinate, and would not be guided by his Advice, [5] He, with William the Mareſchal, the Earl of Hereford, and many other Great Men, left him at Bourdeaux, and came over into England, though not without great danger of Shipwreck, being driven upon a certain Iſle on the Coaſt of Cornwall.

[1] In October following, King Henry ſent to the Archbiſhop of York, (to whom he had committed the Government of the Kingdom in his abſence) commanding him to ſeize the Grain belonging to the Archbiſhoprick of Canterbury, and all other Biſhopricks that were vacant, with the Bacon, Salt, and other Winter Proviſions, alſo to provide a great quantity of Cloath for his Soldiers, and without delay to ſend them to him at Bourdeaux, which was done accordingly: Moreover, he commanded the Archbiſhop, that he ſhould confiſcate the Eſtates of thoſe that withdrew themſelves from his ſervice; but the Archbiſhop prudently declined to execute thoſe ſevere commands, becauſe he knew that Neceſſity had forced them to retire; and alſo they that continued with the King at Bourdeaux, (namely Simon Earl of Leiceſter, William Earl of Salisbury, and ſome other Noblemen) had contracted ſuch vaſt Debts, that they were reduced to Great Want.

The K. writes to the A. B. of York, to ſend him over Proviſions and Cloaths for Army. As alſo to ſeize the Eſtates of thoſe that had deſerted his Service.

[2] Id. ib. The K's Extravagance at Bourd. aux reduces him to great Neceſſity, notwithſtanding the Supplies that had been ſent him.

[2] The King at this time gave himſelf wholly up to ſoftneſs, and unprofitable Expence of Money, and was now abſolutely Govern'd by the Council of the King of Arragon and Earl of Tholouſe, who yet never ſtood by him in any Exigency; however he was ſtill deluded and led away by them, as alſo by the Poictovins and Gaſcoigns; ſo that notwithſtanding the Scutage he had Extorted, and the many other ſupplies of Money and Proviſions, beſides the Cloaths for his Soldiers; yet [3] he was reduced to ſuch great ſtreights, that in October he again wrote to the Archbiſhop of York, his Juſtitiary or Lieutenant, to deſire of the Ciſtercian Order, one Year's Profit of all their Wooll, from which they endeavoured by divers plauſible pretences to excuſe themſelves; but when they were preſſed by the Archbiſhop to comply with the King's deſires, who always was ready to ſuccour their Neceſſities, One of the Abbots of that Order anſwered, That the King was ſworn to do Juſtice, and they never deſired any thing of him in particular, which he was not obliged to do for them in general; Let him therefore (ſaid the Abbot) Govern as by Law, and commit no Oppreſſion contrary to Juſtice; [4] and then if he would give them any thing for the Health of his Soul, and the good State of the Kingdom, they were ready to receive it: An honeſt blunt Anſwer, and worthy an old Engliſh Abbot.

[5] This Year King Henry kept his Chriſtmas, and ſpent the reſt of the Winter at Bourdeaux, without doing any thing conſiderable, except the ſubduing ſome Gaſcoign Rebels, who had fortified certain Caſtles belonging to the King's Feudataries within the Diſtrict of that City; the Particulars of which our Author does not think worth mentioning, only that at the taking of a Church belonging to a Monaſtery called Verines, which was held by theſe Rebels, a certain Clerk and ſpecial Councellor of the King's, called John Manſel, a Stout and Brave Man, having had his Leg broken by a Stone let fall from the top of the Church, had been there killed by a ſhower of Stones caſt upon him, had he not been ſaved by the broad Targets of ſome of his Friends, and being carry'd off and recovered, was by the King not long after admitted as one of his Chiefeſt Directors, for his great Courage and Fidelity: This I take notice of (though otherwiſe of no great Moment) to inform the Reader upon what ſcore this Man became one of the King's Chief Miniſters of State, and of whom you will hear a great deal hereafter.

From Bourdeaux in the beginning of March following he again wrote to the Archbiſhop of York to ſend him more Proviſions and Money, complaining he had received neither, ſince the Abbot of Eueſham came to him. This amazed the Archbiſhop, who had ſo lately ſent ſuch large Supplies; but he thought that the Sea had devoured it; wherefore he made further Proviſions both of Victuals and Money, and deſigned to ſend them unto him: But the Wardens of the Cinque-Ports refuſed to undertake it, unleſs he would provide a Convoy of Ships ſufficient to protect them againſt the Piracies of the Earl of Bretaigne and thoſe of Calais, who had already thrice ſet upon them, and ſpoiled them of their Men, Ships, and Goods, to their irreparable Loſs and Damage: But when the Archbiſhop heard their Anſwer, he ſignified the ſame to the King, and deſired him to haſten his return into England.

[1] On St. Gregory's Day (being March the Twelfth) the Five Years Truce between the King of England and France was ſolemnly confirmed by both Parties; and by this Agreement the King of France was to retain whatever he had got by the Sword, nay even thoſe Caſtles which the King of England had acquired by the help of the Gaſcoigns, were to be reſtored to him; and he was alſo to pay to the King of France Five thouſand Pounds Sterling every Year: to ſo mean Terms was this poor Prince by his own Raſhneſs and Obſtinacy now reduced.

[2] I cannot here paſs by one very remarkable Paſſage in our Author, tho' it is omitted by Dr. Brady in his Compl. Hiſt. viz. That about this time the City of London was compelled to a moſt grievous Ranſom, (which is there called a Taillage) made after this manner: The King's Officer came to this and that Citizen in particular, telling him, That the King being now engaged in a Foreign War, and in great want of Money, he muſt lend him ſuch and ſuch a Sum: And thus they extorted from the poor Citizens what they pleaſed to rate them at; but all this and more our Author ſays says the Citizens would have willingly lent, if they had been satisfied it was bestowed for the good of the King and Kingdom. I have noted this, to let the Reader see, that forced Loans to the Crown, though they were no new things, yet were always looked upon as against the Rights and Liberties of the City and Nation; but this Dr. B. endeavours to conceal. Anno Dom. MCCXLIII.

[3] About the same time the King wrote to the Archbishop to provide such a Fleet as might secure his Passage into England; and further commanded all the Great Men to be in a readiness at Portsmouth to receive him at his Landing: But by many cross Accidents his Passage was still delayed; for either the Queen was not as yet well recovered from her lying in, or else had some other Infirmity; and besides, the Citizens of Bourdeaux, and all the Gascoigns, were unwilling to part with so profitable a Guest, being liberal in his Bounties to them; so that his departure raised a Tumult among them, which he hearing of, after he was embarked, was forced to land again, and return to Bourdeaux to appease it: And on the other hand, the Archbishop and Great Men of England were tired out with their long attendance: But at length, after he had settled Gascoigny, and committed the Government of that County to Nicholas de Molis, he again took Shipping, and landed at Portsmouth on the Twenty fifth of September, and was received at Winchester by almost the whole Nobility, with all the Demonstrations of Joy and Respect they could shew; by the Citizens of London with variety of inestimable Presents; and by the Clergy with a pompous Procession on the Thirteenth of October following.

[4] The King, soon after his return, forced the Jews to pay him a great Sum of Money, and took from one Aaron a rich Jew of York no less than Four Marks of Gold, and Forty thousand Marks of Silver: As for the Gold which every Jew, both Man and Woman paid, he did them the Favour to receive it with his own Hands, but left the receipt of the Silver to his Officers: The Abbots also and Priors presented him with many rich Gifts; and if he did not answer his Expectation, he rejected them, and required others of greater value.

[5] After which, on the First of November, Beatrix Countess of Provence, the Queen's Mother, arrived in England, being received at London with great State and Magnificence; she brought with her her Daughter Cinetia, who was married to Earl Richard at Westminster, on the Twenty third of that Month; and the Marriage was celebrated with great Pomp and Feasting, there being no less than Thirty thousand Dishes provided for the Wedding Dinner.

[2] This Year King Henry kept his Chriſtmas at Wallingford-Caſtle, being nobly entertained by his Brother Earl Richard, as likewiſe were moſt of the Nobility; his Lady Cincia appearing there alſo, with the Counteſs Beatrix her Mother: ſhe ſoon after, upon the news of the Earl of Provence her Husband's being very ſick, took her ſolemn Leave of the King and Court, and embarking at Dover, had a good Paſſage to her own Country.

[3] Id. p. 368. The K. ſummons a great Council, and deſires an Aid.

[3] I ſhall now return to Secular Affairs of greater moment: Immediately after Chriſtmas, the King ſummoned the Great Men of the whole Kingdom, the Archbiſhops, Biſhops, Abbots, Priors, Earls, and Barons, to meet at Weſtminſter; and being there aſſembled, he with his own Mouth demanded a Pecuniary Aid of them, with which he indeed deſigned to bring the King of Scots to Reaſon (who now began to oppoſe him;) Yet the King only pretended, that he had the Year before by their Advice paſſed into Gaſcoigny, where he had contracted great Debts, of which he deſired them to eaſe him. To this the Barons anſwered, They would conſult together about it. Then the Archbiſhops, Abbots, with the Priors treated of it apart by themſelves; and after that, they asked the Earls and Barons, if they would pleaſe to conſent to what they had reſolved, in relation to their Anſwer to the King's Demands? Who replied, That without the whole * Body or Community of the Kingdom, they would act nothing; and then by common Aſſent, there were choſen on behalf of the Clergy Boniface Archbiſhop of Canterbury, the Biſhops of Wincheſter, Lincoln, and Worceſter; and on behalf of the Laiety, Earl Richard the King's Brother, Earl Roger Bigot, Simon Montfort Earl of Leiceſter, and the Earl Mareſchal: On behalf of the Barons, Richard de Montfichet, John de Baliol, with the Abbots of Ramſey and Bury: And what theſe Twelve ſhould agree, ſhould be communicated to the whole Body, that ſo nothing ſhould be offered to the King without the Common Aſſent.

The Clergy treat of it by themſelves.

* Univerſitas Regni.

They agree.

[4] Id. ib.

The Reſult of their Reſolutions ſeems to be thus: [4] That becauſe the Charter of Liberties, which the King had regranted ſome time before (and for the Obſervation whereof Edmund Archbiſhop of Canterbury had ſworn and undertaken) was not kept; nor the Aids ſo often given, diſpoſed of to the Benefit of the King and Kingdom, and that through the Fault of the Chancellor, Writs were granted contrary to Juſtice, they therefore deſired, that ſuch a Juſtitiary, and ſuch a Chancellor might be made, that the State of the Kingdom might be eſtabliſhed upon its former Baſis. But all theſe reaſonable Requeſts proved ineffectual; for the King (leſt he ſhould be thought to do any thing by Compulſion of this Council) would not grant the Petition of the Great Men, only promiſed in general to amend what he was by them informed to be amiſs. Whereupon their Meeting was adjourned until Three Weeks after Candlemas: But they firſt reſolved, That if in the mean time the King would of his own accord chuſe ſuch Councellors, and take ſuch care of the Rights or Laws of the Kingdom, as to ſatisfie the Great Men, then they would give him an Aid; yet on that condition, That it ſhould be expended for the Benefit of the Kingdom, by Advice of the Twelve Repreſentatives above mentioned. the the King saw he could not prevail upon them in a joint Body, then tried the Clergy a-part, what they would do upon the Pope's late Letters, in which he exhorted them to give the King a liberal Assistance in Money. Anno Dom. MCCXLIV.

[5] But the King finding he could do no good with the whole Clergy, desired the Prelates (that is, all Bishops, Abbots, and Deans) that they would meet in the Infirmary of the Abbey of Westminster; and when they were thus assembled, the King sent the Earl of Leicester and other Noblemen to perswade them to contribute some Money towards the War of Gascoigny, and to repress the Insolency of the Welsh. But whilst they were debating about it, the King came to them himself, and repeating his former Requests, further told them, That his Honour and theirs should be inseparable: But when they deferred their Answer, and desired longer time to advise about it, the King withdrew: The last Result of the Bishops and Prelates was, That they could not divide themselves from the Common Assent or Agreement of the Great Men of the Kingdom; and so all Affairs were put off till their next Meeting, and then this Synod broke up. [5] Id. p. 640. The K. tries the Clergy a-part, to obtain an Aid of 'em, but without effect.

It also appears by our Author, [1] That this great Council or Parliament had contrived a new Method of Government, which they intended to have offer'd to, and put upon the King, if they could; to wit, That Four of the most Potent and Discreet Men of the Kingdom should be chosen by Common Assent, and then sworn of the King's Council; and these should transact all Affairs relating to both King and Kingdom, and should do Justice to all, without respect of Persons; and that these should still follow the King, and Two of them at least were always to be present with him, that so they might hear and relieve the Complaints of Persons oppressed: The King's Treasury was likewise to be managed by them, and all Aids were to be expended as they thought most for the Advantage of the Nation: In shore, they were to be the Conservators of the Publick Liberties; and as they were chosen by Common Assent, so they were not to be removed out of their Office but by the same Assent; when one died, another was to be chosen by the Three Survivors: And without the Consent of these Four, the Great Council was not to meet. So that if this Design had taken effect, the King had been a meer Cypher, and had had little or no share in the Government. [1] Id. p. 641. A new method of Government design'd in this Parliament.

But it seems this Project came to nothing, by reason that the Clergy, who had a great hand in these designed Alterations, were now taken up with other Affairs that more nearly concerned them; [2] for about this time Pope Innocent had sent a Clerk or Chaplain of his called Martin, as his Nuncio into England, with Power to Excommunicate and Suspend whomsoever he should find refractory to his Commands; which Authority he soon exercised on several Prelates, until they would make such a Provision for the Pope's Clerks and Kinsmen as he demanded, who thought no Revenue under Thirty Marks per Annum worth their acceptance. Moreover, he directed his Letters to several Abbots and Priors, strictly enjoining them to lend him such Horses as were fit for the Pope's own Chaplain; and if they refused, and made any excuse, though never But the Design is defeated, and why [2] Id. p. 643. The Pope's Nuncio's unreasonable Demands.

Anno Dom. MCCXLIV. never so reasonable, they were forthwith suspended, as particularly the Abbot of Malmesbury, and the Prior of Merton, until they would make full Satisfaction: And when any Prebendaries of Churches became void, he presently seized them, and by virtue of the Pope's Authority, disposed of them as he pleased; and gave one of the Richest Prebendaries of Salisbury to a little Boy, who was the Pope's Nephew, against the Will of the Bishop and the whole Chapter.

[3] Id. p. 642. The Pope demands Money of the Clergy.

And what yet further perplexed them, was, [3] that this Mr. Martin produced other Letters from the Pope, in which he required a great Sum of Money of them to pay off the Debt, that his Predecessor Gregory had contracted in a War (as he pretended) for the Catholick Faith, Ecclesiastical Liberty, and the Patrimony of the Church.

These Transactions, and several others of this Year, are not put together in due Order of Time, as they ought to have been by our Author, and therefore I have endeavoured to correct that Defect as well as I could: I shall now give an account of what was done at the next Session of this Parliament; [4] When the Great Men and Prelates met again at London according to their late Adjournment, Three Weeks after Candlemas, to treat about the King's Demands of an Aid, he there again renewed and promised entirely to keep the Charter of Liberties, which he had sworn to at his Coronation, and gave the Bishops leave, in their respective Dioceses, to Excommunicate himself and all others, that should act contrary to it in any Article: Yet for all this, he could only obtain Twenty Shillings of every Knight's Fee to marry his Eldest Daughter, of all those who held of the King in Capite, the one half to be paid at Easter, and the other half at Michaelmas.

[4] Id. p. 643. The Parliament meet again.

The K. promises better to observe the Charter of Liberties, under pain of Excommunication.

Id. p. 643. When Mr. Martin the Pope's Nuncio saw that the Great Men had given the King this Aid, he pressed his Business to the Clergy as earnestly as he could, making them a very cunning Speech, That since they had assisted the King their Temporal Lord, could they now do less for their Spiritual Father the Pope? But the Prelates were as cunning as the Legate, and laying their Heads together, answered by the Mouth of the Dean of St. Paul's, That what he demanded, particularly concerned the King, the Archbishops, and all the Bishops and Prelates of England; and that since the King by reason of Sickness, and the Archbishops and several Bishops were likewise absent by reason of Business, they could not for the present give him any other positive Answer: Upon which Words came in John the Mareschal, and forbid all the Prelates, who held Baronies of the King in Capite, to oblige their Lay-Fees to the See of Rome, whereby the King would be deprived of the Service due to him. Nor did the Legate meet with any better Success upon other fresh Letters, which he produced from the Pope in a lesser Assembly of the Prelates, who met during the absence of the rest, and then gave Mr. Martin their positive Answer, That the present Poverty of the Kingdom, and their Fears of new Wars which were like to break out upon them, would not permit them to consent to this Exaction; besides, many other good Reasons were added, which the Reader may find in our Author, and more at large in the

Annals

Annals of Burton, if he will give himself the leisure to peruse them: And then upon the Nuncio's threatning of them, they only sub-join'd, That they were also afraid of the Emperor's Threats, if they gave any Money; for he had by his Letters lately forbid both the King and them to contribute any thing to the Pope; so that it seems all the Nuncio could do, was to lay his hands on the Revenues of vacant Benefices, and to scrape Money together by all the exactive means he could think of. But to return to Temporal Matters: Anno Dom. MCCXLIV.

[5] In the same Month of February, the King made some Alterations in his Court and Council, which whether they were for the better or the worse, I will not determine, only that he put in Sir Paulinus Piper Steward of his Household, and took John Mansell Chancellor of St. Paul's, into his Council; and Mr. Lawrence of St. Martin's was made President of his Council, and his Procurator in all Ecclesiastical Affairs; This John Mansell was one in Orders, and being a very Politick Person, was afterwards made one of the King's Chief Ministers and Favourites. [5] Id. p. 616. He makes Alterations in Court and Council.

Not long after, [1] on the first day of March, hapned an Accident, which though it was of no great moment, yet seems to have encouraged David Prince of Wales to rebell; for Griffyn his Half-brother, being weary of his long Imprisonment in the Tower, having made a long Line of the Furniture of his Chamber tied together, thought to slide down by it from the top of a Tower; but the Rope breaking with his weight, he being a very large and heavy Man, he fell down, and dash'd out his Brains: He was a Person of great Courage, and as long as he liv'd, his Brother the Prince could never have dared to attempt any thing against the King, for he should thus have been let loose against him; but being thus taken off, it was no wonder if the Peace did not long continue. [1] Id. ib. Griffyn Brother to Prince David, falls from the Tower, and dashes out his Brains.

[2] For in the beginning of this Summer, the Welsh Prince, notwithstanding the solemn Oaths and Charters which he and his Great Men had made to King Henry, in token of their Homage and Subjection to him, they revolted from his Obedience, and made War upon him and his Lord Marchers, viz. the Earl of Clare, the Earl of Hereford, John de Monmouth, Roger de Mortimer, and other Noble Barons, who gathering their Forces by the King's Command, came to an Engagement with the Welsh, in which there fell about a hundred on both sides. [2] Id. p. 638. The Welsh rebell against K. Henry.

[3] Then on the Eleventh of June, the King being at St. Albans Abbey, received the ill News of the Welsh Insurrection; at which time also he heard, that the King of Scots had publickly declared, That he would not hold the least Piece of Earth of the King of England; for ever since the last Marriage of the Scottish King with the Daughter of Engelram de Cusey, a Potent Nobleman of France, and an utter Enemy to King Henry, the good Intelligence between the Two Crowns was so much abated, that at last it ended in an open War. [3] Id. ib. The King of Scots renounces his Homage to the King.

For not long after, the Quarrel between these Two Princes rose to that heighth, [4] that King Henry summoned all the Great Men of England, as well Bishops and Abbots, as Lay-Barons, who held [4] Rot. Cl. 28. H. 3. M. 8. Dors.

held of him in Capite, to provide their Services ready at Newcastle upon Tyne, to force the King of Scots to make Satisfaction, unless he would hear their Advice, where they appeared accordingly at the appointed time, being the Fifteenth of August, and they had a serious Treaty about this Weighty Affair; and then by the Mediation of Earl Richard, and other Great Men of both Nations, there was a Peace made upon these Terms, That the King of Scots and his Heirs, should keep Perpetual Faith and Friendship towards his Liege-Lord King Henry and his Heirs; That he should not make any Leagues with the King's Enemies; That the Peace should stand Good, that was made in the Presence of Otto the Pope's Legate at York; as also the Agreement concerning a Contract of Marriage to be made between the King of Scot's Son, and the King of England's Daughter, all which appears by [5] King Alexander's Charter, which you may find at large in our Author, as also the Pope's Bull to confirm it.

K. Henry summons all Tenents in Capite to march against the K. of Scots.

[5] Id. p. 646.

No sooner had the King dispatched these great Affairs in the North, but he was called back by a fresh Insurrection of the Welsh, [1] who having now invaded the English Borders, burnt and plundered all before them, when the King too much despising the Forces of his Enemies, dispanded most part of his Army, and going himself for London, only sent Herbert Fitz-Matthew with Three hundred Horse to subdue them; whereupon the Welshmen taking Courage fell upon and defeated the Forces of the Earl of Hereford and Ralph de Mortimer before Herbert could get up to them, and when he attack'd them the Day after, they put him to flight, and so they continued Victors for the rest of this Year.

[1] Id. p. 647. The Welsh make fresh Invasions on the English Marches, and rout the Forces of the Lords Marchers.

[2] In the beginning of November, the King again Assembled the Great Men of the Kingdom, of whom he required an Aid against the Welsh, which was denied him; but whether it was out of anger, because of the King's late ill Conduct, in not sending greater Forces against them, or that the Nobility thought they might be reduced without an Aid in Money, I can not determine.

[2] Id. p. 650. The K. requires an Aid against the Welsh, but is denied.

But not long after, the King received news, which highly incensed Him and the Great Men against David Prince of Wales, [3] who desiring to cast off the Yoke of Subjection to King Henry his Uncle, and notwithstanding the Charters of Homage and Subjection which he had made to the King about Three Years since, [4] sent privately to the Pope, some time last Summer, offering to hold his Countrey of him at the Yearly Tribute of Five hundred Marks, provided he would protect him against King Henry, and for a round Sum of Money obtained the Pope's [5] Bull, directed to the Abbots of Aberconway and Kemmer, by which he constituted them his Inquisitors; whether Prince David by Force and Fear was compelled to stand to the Arbitration of the Bishop of St. Asaph, and others; and if they found it to be so, then to dispense with, Release, and make void his Oath and Engagements; and by vertue of which Bull, the said Abbots summoned the King to appear before them on the Vigil, or Eve of St. Agnes, (that is, January the Twenty First) at Keyrus in Wales, to answer Prince David concerning the Contents of the said Bull: But when the King had received this Insolent Summons from these Abbots, it so enraged Him and the Great Men of the Kingdom, that they resolved to march against the Welsh as soon as the Season would permit.

Anno Dom. MCCXLIV.

But since the Welsh Historians give a far different and larger Account of the Grounds and Progress of this War, I shall from Dr. Powel's Chronicle under this Year, shew you what they assign as Reasons to Justifie Prince David in thus breaking the Peace, which he had so solemnly sworn to observe; as First, That King Henry had the Year before began very much to oppress the Welsh, by turning them out of their Estates without any just Title, or sufficient Cause, and that after the Death of Griffyn above-mentioned, King Henry had Entituled his Eldest Son Edward to the Principality of Wales.

The Account the Welsh Historians give to justifie their Prince's breaking the Peace.

And to give you all the Welsh Transactions of this Year together, though confusedly set down by our Authors; Upon this News, Prince David understanding the King's design to disinherit him, used all the means he could for the Defence of his just Right; but finding himself unable to withstand the English, resolved to effect that by Policy, which he could not obtain by Force; wherefore the Year before he privately sent Messengers to the Pope, complaining against the King of England, as you have already heard above.

Then Prince David finding that the Pope only minded his own Interest, and delayed to do Justice upon his Complaints against the King of England, thought it was to no purpose to wait any longer for his Decision, but judged it more adviseable to vindicate himself by the Power of his Arms: Having therefore mustered up his Forces together, (being now reconciled to, and followed by most of the Nobility of Wales) he drew his Army towards the Marches, to be revenged upon the Lords of those Parts already mentioned, who (as he pretended) had injured and oppressed his People, and with these Noblemen he fought divers times this Summer, with various Successes.

Dr. Powel's Chron.

Prince David finding no Remedy from the Pope, takes up Arms and Invades the English Borders.

But as for this Relation, though it may be in great part true, especially as to what concerns Prince David's addressing himself to the Pope for Protection against King Henry, yet I do not find from any good Authority, that the Welsh Prince had received any Provocation from King Henry, sufficient to Justifie him in the breach of the last Articles of Peace between him and the King; for there is no mention in our English Histories concerning any such violent taking away of the Welshmens Estates, as is given us in the above-mentioned Relation; and if there had been any such thing, yet could it no ways have vindicated this War, since he ought by the said Articles to have first complained to the King for redress, before he had taken up Arms; and if he had not been then satisfied in his Lawful Demands, he might have had some colour of righting himself by War: But as for King Henry's Entitling his Son Edward to the Principality of Wales, (for which Dr. Powell quotes no less an Authority, than the Records of the Tower, yet without giving us the Year, or Number of the Roll,) I find no such thing mentioned in any of our Historians; though when any such Record can be found, I shall agree with this Author's Relation, but till then I think I may boldly affirm, that there is no such thing. And as for Prince David's Allegation to the Pope, that his late Charters of Homage and Fealty to King Henry were gain'd by Force and Fear, it is certain, the Matter of Fact was otherwise, and that Prince David being then in perfect Liberty, might have defended himself if he had pleased, against the King's demands, supposing he had thought them too Unjust and Unreasonable to be comply'd with.

But it is now time to look abroad, and see what was done in Foreign Parts, during this busie Year in England; about the beginning of which [1] the King of France assembled at Paris all such of his Subjects that had Possessions in England, and declar'd to them, That he thought they could not serve faithfully two different Lords at the same time; and then gave them their Choice to whom they would adhere; and after that they were to relinquish their Lands and Possessions in the other Prince's Dominions; upon this some kept their Estates in England, and left those in France and came over hither, whilst others did the contrary, according to their different Interests and Inclinations. When this was made known to the King of England, He commanded all the Estates that the Normans then enjoy'd in his Realm, to be forthwith seized to his own use, and would not give them their Liberty of choice, (as the King of France had done,) which Prince they would adhere to, which was by the French looked upon to be a Breach of the Truce: But their King was not so well recovered of his late Sickness, or at leisure to prosecute this pretended Violation by a new War, but wisely endeavoured to appease and repress the querulous Invectives his Norman Subjects made against the King of England.

[1] Id. p. 614. The K. of Fr. his offer to his Subjects that had Estates in England and France; But K. Henry wou'd not leave the Normans to their Choice.

As for the Affairs of Germany, I find little considerable to have happened this Year, only that the Emperor Frederick, the King's Brother in Law, about the beginning thereof, sent Mr. William D'ocra, and others his Ambassadors with Letters to the King, offering to justifie himself from the Imputation of Contumacy and Disobedience to the Pope, and that he would submit his Cause to the Judgment of the Kings of England and France, and the Baronage of their Kingdoms; and then complaining of the Pope's Severity and Injustice, desired the King not to permit any Contributions in Money to be made to him by his Subjects, threatning besides, if the King did not comply with his desires, to revenge it upon such of the English, whom he should find within his Dominions.

As to such Ecclesiastical Affairs, as had no dependance upon the Civil, I find none considerable, only that William de Raule Bishop of Winchester, having been long kept out of England, and from his Bishoprick, by the King's Unjust Severity, was about Midsummer, by the Pope's Mediation call'd home, and restored to the King's Favour, at which all true Englishmen were much rejoiced, except some Court-Chaplains, who being Fomenters of Discord, were afraid, lest his Prudence should render them wholly useless, by promoting the Welfare of both King and Kingdom.

The

[2] The King now kept his Christmas at London, with many of his Noblemen, where he Knighted John Gatesden a Clerk in Deacon's Orders, who having by his Prudence and Industry in Publick Affairs acquir'd a good Estate, he resign'd his Benefices, and soon after married the Daughter of Rose de Bruis, and leaving off the dangerous Care of Souls, aspired to the Dignity of a Nobleman.

[3] On the Sixteenth of January following, the Queen was brought to Bed of a Son, who was Christ'ned Edmond, and afterwards created by his Father, Earl of Leicester and Derby.

[4] So soon as the Season would permit, the War was afresh renewed against the Welsh; for in the beginning of Lent the Constable of the Castle of Montgomery, with such Forces as he had with him, by a Stratagem overcame the Welsh, and killed above Three hundred of them; but the same Week Prince David, to revenge this Defeat, wasted the English Borders with Nocturnal Incursions, against whom when the Militia of the Country began to March, they were assaulted by the Welshmen in the narrow Passes and Streights of the Mountains, with Darts, Arrows, and Stones, one of which knock'd down, and kill'd on the Place Herbert Fitz-Matthew (already mentioned) Chief Commander; The English were so dismay'd at this, that they presently retreated, carrying off the Dead Body along with them. The Welsh being animated with this Success, Prince David mustered up his Forces, and laying Siege to the Castle of Montalt, took it by Assault, and killed most of those he found in it, but miss'd of Roger de Montalt the Owner of it, whom he thought to have found there. I read of nothing further done against the Welsh, till towards the End of this Summer, notwithstanding the King and his Nobilities late resolutions of undertaking a speedy Expedition against them; but it seems they were so taken up with contriving how to put some stop to the Papal Exactions, that they could not mind Military Affairs.

[5] For Martin the Pope's Nuntio still continued his wonted Oppressions of the English Church and Clergy, by his unjust Exacting of Procurations, and by conferring great Benefices upon the Pope's Creatures and Relations; and our Author tells us, that his Greediness and Extortions were so Notorious, that he conceals the Particulars out of meer Reverence to the Roman Church: Yet notwithstanding, the King still supported the Nuntio against the Clergy, because his hold the Pope might do him the like good turn, whenever there was occasion for it.

[1] But at last Matters were reduced to that Extremity, that they required some speedy Redress, and therefore some Great Men deploring the lamentable State of the Church and Kingdom, took the Courage to give Orders, That if any more Bulls from the Pope came into England to exhaust the People of their Money, they should be stopt. Now it happened about this time, that a Messenger from the Pope arrived at Dover, whom the Warden of that Port presently seized, with all his Bulls and Letters, containing divers new Inventions to get Money; but when Mr. Martin heard of his being taken up, he went presently to the King, and made his Complaint of it: But he not daring to own the Action, immediately gave or-

[2] M. p. 658. The K. begins to be sensible of the Avarice of the Roman Church. The vast Revenues of the Italians in England.

Yet some time after, his Eyes began to be opened, for about Whitsuntide following, he ordered a strict Enquiry to be made in each County of the true Value of the Livings and other Benefices which the Italian Clergymen then enjoyed in England by the Gift of the Pope; and they were found to amount to Sixty thousand Marks per Annum, which then exceeded the whole Revenue of the Crown; upon this Report the King came to himself, and being moved with Anger, began to detest the insatiable Avarice of the Roman Church, yet durst he not in Person declare against it, only he permitted a bold but elegant Epistle to be written in the Name of the General Body or Representative of the whole Kingdom, in which they set forth the Execrable Extortions and Exactions of the Pope's Legates and Nuntioes, and sent it to the Council then sitting at Lyons, by Earl Roger Bigod, John Fitz-Geoffrey, William de Cantelupe, Philip Basset, Ralph Fitz-Nicholas, and Master William Pomeric their Clerk or Secretary, in the Name of the whole Body of the Nation, who were to declare the insupportable Burthens thereof, as also by reason of the Pope's Exacting the Tribute, granted by King John, to which they had never consented, and ordered them to seek for Redress against it.

[3] Id. p. 659. The Representative Body of the Kingdom write a bold Letter to the Council at Lyons.

But the high and active Spirits of the English Nobility and Gentry could not endure so much delay, therefore they resolved to take a more speedy Course; but the King fearing before-hand their violent Proceedings forbad them to meet, upon the Account of a Tournament: yet for all this, on the Thirtieth of June (not long after) they assembled in a great Body both at Luton and Dunstable in Bedfordshire, and there resolved to bear no longer with the Pope's Nuntio: from thence they sent Falk Fitz-Warin (one of their Number) to the New-Temple at London, to Mr. Martin the Pope's Nuntio, and chief Instrument of his Exactions. When Falk came thither, he looked upon him very sternly, and bad him begon out of England immediately: Who commands me to do this, said Mr. Martin? Is it your self? To whom Falk answered, No, not I, but the whole Body of armed Knights, that lately appeared at Luton and Dunstable, do by me command you to be gone, and bad him be gone again, or else he and his Followers should in Three days be cut in Pieces. Mr. Martin much affrighted at this rough Salutation, went immediately to the King, and told him what he had heard, and desired to know if it were done by his Authority? The King told him he was not the Author of any such thing, but (saith he) you have contriv'd matters so, as to set the Barons against me, for that I have so long suffered your Depredations and Injustice in my Kingdom. Upon this Discourse with the King, he requested his Pass-port to be gone, which was readily granted, and for his greater Security the King sent with him Robert Norris, one of the Messengers of his Court to conduct him to the Sea-side, and so embarking he went away, to the great Satisfaction of the Kingdom.

[4] The Military-Men resolving to hold a Tournament send a severe Message to Martin the Nuntio, commanding him to be gone.

Whereupon the K. not being willing to protect him he is forced to go away.

[5] But

Anno Dom. MCCXLV.

[5] But I must not here omit a remarkable Passage in our Author, since it shews the Insolence and Haughty Temper of this Pope; for when this Martin return'd to him and complained of his harsh Usage here, the Pope remembring that not only King Henry, but the Kings of France and Arragon had lately refused him admittance into their Kingdoms, he presently bending his Brows, said to him, (yet so loud that he might be heard) Well, we must make Peace with the Head; (meaning the Emperor) That so we may humble these Rebellious Petty Princes; for the great Dragon being once pacified, the smaller Serpents will be easily trampled under Foot.

[1] Id. p. 660.

But to return again to England: We may observe that this English roughness did more good, than all their Remonstrances to the Council of Lyons: [1] For when the Procurators of the Body of the Nobility of England before-named had arrived there, Mr. William Poweric their Clerk or Secretary propounded the Grievances of the Kingdom of England, and on behalf of the said Body lamentably complained of the Tribute* injuriously imposed on the Kingdom by the Court of Rome, to which neither the Ancestors of the said Nobility, nor they themselves had ever consented, nor ever could consent; whereupon they desired Justice, and speedy Remedy; to which Complaint the Pope made no immediate Answer. Then William Poweric after a little Silence presented the Epistle it self, which declared at large the many Extortions made in England by the Legates and Nuntio's of the Roman Church.

[1] Id. p. 666, 667. The Procurators of the English Nobility at the Council of Lyons, represent their Grievances;

* i.e. The Tribute granted by K. John

[2] These Letters being publickly read, the Pope would return no positive Answer to them, for he said, That so weighty an Affair required great Deliberation; so the Answer was for that time deferr'd, though the Ambassadors pressed for a speedy One: Yet however, they then added one more Great and Important Grievance to all the rest; to wit, the Violent Oppression and Impudent Exaction, occasioned by that wicked Clause of Non-obstante, which was frequently inserted into the Pope's Bulls and Letters; which deserves our Notice, since the like Clause (though copied from the Roman Court) within some Years then following, crept into the King's Charters, as you will find hereafter.

Vid. The Epistle it self in Matt. Paris.

[2] Id. p. 668.

Especially that wicked Clause of Non-obstante in the Pope's Bulls.

But as for these Ambassadors above-mentioned, [3] when they had waited a great while at the Council to no purpose, they were at last fain to depart thence without any Satisfactory Answer; yet at length after their departure, I find in this [4] Author, (though under the next Year) that the Pope during this Council granted a Bull directed to all Patrons of Churches both Ecclesiastical and Secular, that they might freely present whom they pleased to the Benefices in their Gift, without any Lett or Hinderance of himself or his Legates. [5] And also another, that upon the death of the Incumbent, being an Italian one of the same Nation should not immediately succeed: But these, as all other Privileges signified nothing, by reason of the Bar of a Non-obstante, wherever he pleased to make use of it.

[3] Id. p. 670. The Ambassadors not obtaining a Satisfactory Answer, leave the Council.

[4] Id. p. 696.

[5] Id. p. 697.

[1] However, these Ambassadors did not fail, before their departure, to make a solemn Oath of Protestation, that they would never pay, nor permit to be paid to the Roman See, that detestable Tribute granted by King John: But the Politick Pope passed by

[1] Id. p. 681.

and dissembled all these Things; yet was so far from giving up any thing, that he only waited for an Opportunity of acting more severely; and therefore to let the King see he would keep what he had got, he not long after sent to all the Bishops of England, streightly commanding them, that each of them should set his Seal to that Charter of Tribute which King John of unhappy Memory had long since granted, that being thus strengthned it might be the better perpetuated for Time to come; which these Timorous Bishops performed, to the Unspeakable Prejudice of the King and Kingdom, as well as Reproach of themselves. But when he had heard what they had done, he fell into a great Passion, and swore, That although the Bishops had thus basely Complied, yet he would stand firm for the Liberties of the Kingdom, and would never whilst he lived pay this Pension or Tribute any more. And without doubt he then meant to do as he said; But alas! This Poor Prince had neither the Courage nor Constancy to set himself free; for not long after he return'd to his wonted Tameness and Submission: This (as also the Passage concerning Non-obstante's, when they first began) I thought fit to take notice of, being omitted by Doctor Brady in his Compleat History. But to return to Civil Affairs.

The Pope makes the English Bishops attest K. John's Charter by their Seals.

But the King swears never to pay that Tribute.

[2] About the end of June, the King by his Letters summoned all the Earls, Barons, Knights, and others, who owed him Military Service, that they should prepare to attend him into Wales; since he, being no longer able to endure the Ravages and Incursions of that Nation, was resolved forthwith to make an Expedition thither: In order to which the King not long after came to St. Paul's Church, and there civilly took leave of the Citizens, according to the Custom of that time.

[2] Id. p. 660. The K. summons all Military Tenents to attend him into Wales.

[3] Yet notwithstanding all these great Preparations, the King did not reach Wales with his Army, till the beginning of August, upon whose arrival near Snowdon, the Welshmen retreated to their Mountains, Woods, and Fastnesses, and took their opportunity now and then to destroy some Parties of the English; so that all that the King did in near Two Months time, was, to build the Castle of Ganoc, which when he had finished, with great difficulty, and put a strong Garrison into it, the Winter now too fast approaching, he, first having destroyed all the Victuals and Forage upon the Borders, and in the most Inner parts of Wales, returned into England with his Army, presently after the Feast of St. Simon and Jude.

[3] Id. p. 681, 684. The K. does not arrive there till August, but then the Welsh retreat to their Fastnesses.

The K. having only built a Castle on the Borders, returns home.

[4] This Summer also, the Irish by the King's Command landed in the Isle of Anglesey, (which was the Place of Refuge for the Welsh) and burnt and destroyed the whole Country. I have nothing farther to note concerning this Expedition, but that the King then sent to Maurice Fitz-Gerald his Justitiary of Ireland, to pass over into Wales with some Forces to assist them; But he coming too late, though he had a fair Wind to transport his Men, was for this Neglect put out of his Office of Justitiary, and John Fitz-Geoffrey sent thither in his stead.

[4] ib. The Irish destroy the Isle of Anglesey.

[5] No-

[5] Nothing else remarkable happened this Year in England, except the Death of Walter Earl of Pembroke, Mareschal of England, about the End of November or Beginning of December; and although his Brother Anselme (then Dean of Salisbury) succeeded him in his Honours, yet he dying without Issue three days before Christmas, the Noble Earldom of Pembroke, with a vast Estate in England, Ireland, and Wales, fell to be divided between his Five Sisters, who were married to divers great Noblemen of England.

Anno Dom. MCCXLV. [5] Id. p. 686. The Death of Walter the Earl-Mareschal, who is succeeded by Anselm his Brother, but he dies not long after.

Thus fail'd this Noble Family of Striguil, in the Third Generation, after it was raised to that Heighth by Earl Richard their Grandfather, the First Englishman who obtained the Kingdom of Leinster in Ireland, partly by Marriage, and partly by Sword, as you have already heard: but whoever is curious to enquire into the Cause of the sudden Failure of the Heir-Males of this House, may find it in our Author, who ascribes it to the Curse of an Irish Bishop upon Earl William their Father, for taking away some Lands belonging to his See, and upon his Son's refusing to restore them, he prayed that God would shew some remarkable Judgment upon his Family; but for this I do not give you my own, but the Author's Opinion.

Id. p. 687.

I shall here conclude with some Ecclesiastical Affairs, which have no dependance upon the Civil. [1] This Year the King began to pull down the old Abbey-Church at Westminster, and new build it in that Magnificent manner in which it remains to this Day, it being one of the most lofty Fabricks in Europe of the Gothick Model.

[1] Id. p. 661.

The Pope having left Italy for fear of the Emperour, came the last Year to Lyons, where some time after, he Confirmed and then Consecrated Boniface of Savoy Archbishop of Canterbury, with his own hands, being a Prelate better skill'd in Matters of War, than those of Learning, having been promoted to this Dignity in respect to his High Birth, and near Relation to the Queen.

Id. ib.

Whilst the Pope continued at Lyons, he there held a pretended General Council, to which divers Bishops of England were summoned, some of whom went thither, but others excused themselves from this troublesome Journey, by reason of their publick Employments, or Old Age.

In this Council the Emperour Frederick was again Excommunicated, and Deposed, as far as the Pope and Council were able to do it; but the Emperour valued it not, for He kept the Crown Imperial on his Head as long as he lived, in spight of his Holiness and all his Adherents: Here likewise many Decrees were made, which being only either for the Reformation of the Clergy, or Advancement of the Papal Power, I omit.

[2] This being the Thirtieth Year of King Henry's Reign, he kept his Christmas at London, in the Company of his Queen and her Sister, the Queen of the Romans, with her Husband King Richard, many other of the Noblemen of the Kingdom being likewise present with him; where they enjoy'd and refresh'd themselves Cheerfully and Pleasantly, after the Hardships of the late Welsh Expedition; but before Twelfth-tide the King received the ill News, that his Mother-in-Law, Beatrice, Countess of Provence, had contrary to her Promise

K. Henry received news that his Mother-in-Law the Countess of Provence had delivered all that Country to the K. of France.

Promise and Agreement, delivered up all that Country to the King of France, together with Sixteen Castles and their Territories, which King Henry was to have enjoyed as part of his Wife's Portion, and as his share of that Earldom; and for the fortifying and maintaining of which Castles, the King had expended for divers Years before no less than Four thousand Marks; This she did in consideration that Beatrice her Youngest Daughter should marry Charles Brother to King Lewis, as was some time after performed.

But the French Historians more truly relate, That Raymond the last Earl of Provence left his Fourth Daughter Beatrice by his Testament sole Inheretrix of that Earldom, and that in her Right Charles Duke of Anjou became Earl of Provence, in which Family it continued for divers Generations.

[1] Id. p. 691. Severe Laws made against Robbers of Parks and Warrens. * Pag. 156.

[1] This Year also in a Parliament at London, divers severe Laws were made against such as Robbed Parks and Warrens, for which I refer you to the Laws of this King, set down at the end of his Reign, and also to the Author's * Additaments at the end of his History.

[2] Id. p. 698. The Parliament again assembled, and the Pope's Oppressions again represented.

[2] On Mid-Lent Sunday the same Parliament of the whole Kingdom met at London according to Summons, where the King conferr'd with the Bishops a-part, the Earls and Barons a-part, as also the Abbots and Priors a-part, concerning the means how to redress the Grievances of the Nation, proceeding from the Exorbitancies of the Roman Court; which were these that follow:

[3] Id. p. 699. A Catalogue of those Grievances.

[3] First, That the Pope, not content with the Payment of Peter-Pence, oppressed the Kingdom, by extorting from the Clergy great Contributions without the King's Consent, against the ancient Customs, Liberties, and Rights of the Kingdom, and against the Appeal of the Procurators of the King and Kingdom in the General Council of Lyons.

Secondly, That Church and Kingdom were oppressed, in that the Patrons of Churches could not present fit Persons to them, because they were letten by the Pope's Letters to Romans (i. e. Italians) who understood not the English Language, and carried the Money out of the Kingdom, to the great Impoverishing of it.

Thirdly,

Thirdly, The Nation was oppressed by the Pope's Exactions of Pensions from Churches.

Fourthly, The Church and Nation suffered, for that Italians succeeded Italians, and the English were forced to prosecute their Right out of the Kingdom against both Customs and written Laws, and therefore against the Indulgences of the Pope's Predecessors granted to the King and Kingdom of England.

Fifthly, The Church and Nation infinitely suffered, by reason of the above-mentioned Clause of Non-obstante, which weakned and enervated all other Customs, written ancient Laws, Grants, Statutes, and Privileges whatsoever.

Sixthly, The Church and Kingdom suffered, for that in the Parishes where the Italians were Beneficed, there were no Alms, no Hospitality, no Preaching, no Divine Service, no Care of Souls, nor Reparations done to Parsonage Houses.

[4] The Result of the Conferences upon these Grievances, was, That they should all again supplicate the Pope by Letters to remove this intolerable and insupportable Yoke: In pursuance of which, [5] the King wrote by himself, the Bishops by themselves, the Abbots by themselves, and the Earls and Barons with the Nobles and other Great Men, and the Inhabitants of the Sea-Ports, all by themselves, and that in the Name of the whole Clergy and Laity of England, as appears by each of their particular Letters extant in [1] Mat. Paris; all filled with loud Complaints against these Oppressions, with their earnest Desires that he would remove them, or else that they should be forced to make use of other Methods to ease themselves.

[2] But notwithstanding these just Complaints, the Pope, a little before the Dissolution of the Council of Lyons, caused the English Bishops to put their Seals to the Charter of King John, above-mentioned; And though Fulk Bishop of London was very unwilling to do it, yet at last he suffered himself to be overcome by Fear: The Bishops at the same time also signed an Instrument approving the late Deposition of Frederick the Emperor by the Pope; [3] And not yet content with this (to the great Prejudice of the King and Kingdom) he sent his Apostolick Commands to the Bishops, that some of them should find Fifteen, others Ten, and others Five Stout and Brave Men, well Horsed and Armed for one Year, as the Pope should direct; and lest the King should make any Provision against this Exaction, the Bishops were commanded not to discover it under pain of Excommunication.

And not satisfied with this, [4] the Pope now also claimed the Administration of the Goods of all Clergy-men dying Intestate, and committed the execution of this Decree to the Minors and Preachers; which nevertheless the King prohibited, because he found it would tend to the Damage and Impoverishment of his Kingdom: But this Decree being very unreasonable, the Pope himself, by the Mediation of the Cardinals was forced to revoke it.

[5] To redress these great Grievances and Exactions of the Pope, William Powerick and Henry de la Mare were sent to Rome by Common Consent of the King, Bishops, Earls, and Barons; but in the mean time the Pope exacted a fresh Talliage by the Bishops of Winchester, London, Yet freſh Talliages are impoſed on the Biſhops by the Pope; Which the King forbids to be paid.

[1] Id. p. 708.

[2] On the Seventh of July, there was a great Council holden at Wincheſter of the King and Noblemen of the Kingdom, about the Deſolation of the Church; for William de Poweric and Henry de la Mare, that had been lately ſent to the Court of Rome, were by this time returned, bringing back no hopes of any Moderation from the Pope, concerning the Oppreſſions of the Kingdom and Church of England, of which they had complained; for he continued reſolute in his Demands; which ſo incenſed the King, that he commanded Proclamation to be made in all Towns, Markets, and Publick Places, that no Man of the Kingdom ſhould conſent to any Contribution to the Pope, or ſend him any Aid: But when his Holineſs heard of it, he wrote ſharply to the Prelates, charging them under pain of Excommunication and Suſpenſion to pay in the Money he had impoſed, to his Nuncio at the New Temple at London; and whereas the King was firmly reſolved to defend the Freedom of the Church and Kingdom, he at laſt, by the Threats and Perſwaſions of his Brother Earl Richard (who then ſided with the Pope) and ſome of the Biſhops, but eſpecially of the Biſhop of Worceſter, who (as it was ſaid) had Power to Interdict the Nation, ſubmitted, and gave up the Cauſe; ſo that this Contribution was paid: And thus all the Endeavours and Hopes of maintaining the Freedom of the Engliſh Church and Kingdom came to nothing.

[2] Id. p. 709. A Council at Wincheſter, where the K. again conſults with the Great Men about the Deſolation of the Church and Kingdom.

The King inceenſed by the Pope's Exactions, Iſſues a Proclamation, that no Man ſhould pay any Money to the Pope.

Yet at laſt, by the Threats of his Brother, and ſome of the Biſhops, the K. is forced to yield to thoſe Exactions.

[3] Upon this the Pope, taking great Confidence from what he had already done, Commanded more imperiouſly than he was wont to do, That all Beneficed Clerks that reſided upon their Livings, ſhould pay him a Third Part of their Goods; and ſuch as did not reſide on them, to pay one Half; and he appointed the Biſhop of London to execute this Project: He with ſome others met at St. Paul's to conſider of this Matter, to whom the King ſent John de Lexington a Knight, and Laurence of St. Martin a Clerk, on the Eighth of December, prohibiting them to conſent to that Contribution; whereupon they broke up their Meeting, to the great Satisfaction of all ſuch as were called before them: If any Man think it worth his Labour to peruſe the Anſwer of the Clergy to this unreaſonable Exaction, he may ſee it in Matt. Paris.

[3] Id. p. 716. Whereupon the Pope exacts great Talliages from all the Beneficed Clergy.

[4] About this time the Biſhop of Lincoln, at the Inſtigation of the Friers Preachers, and Friers Minors, made very ſevere Inquiſitions by his Archdeacons and Rural Deans, concerning the Continency and Manners both of Noble and Ignoble Perſons, to their great great Scandal, and the blasting of their Reputations. The King hearing the grievous Complaints of his People concerning these Proceedings, by the Advice of his Court, sent his Writ to the Sheriff of Hertfordshire, commanding him, That as he loved himself and all he had, he should not permit any Lay-man of his Bialiwick for the future to meet in any place, to make Inquisitions or Attestations upon Oath at the pleasure of the Bishop of Lincoln's, Archdeacons, or Rural Deans, unless in Matrimonial and Testamentary Causes. This deserves our notice, since it shews the Antiquity of the King's Prerogative to grant Prohibitions to hinder the Proceedings of Bishops when they medled with what did not belong to them. Anno Dom. MCCXLVI.

The K.'s ancient Prerogative to grant Prohibitions.

This Year being chiefly taken up in setting forth the Grievances and Oppressions of the Pope, affords us little of Civil Affairs; [5] only that Queen Isabel the King's Mother, and Wife to the Earl of March (her first Lover) died in France, being a Lady of no very good Humour or Reputation, by what our Historians mention concerning her: Also many other Persons of great Note deceased this Year, for whose Names I refer the Reader to my Author.

[5] Id. p. 710. The Death of Q. Isabel the K.'s Mother.

Also some time this Year * Hugh Bigot Earl of Norfolk, after frequent Sollicitation, was, in right of his Lady Maud, Eldest Daughter of William the Mareschal Earl of Pembroke, made Mareschal of England; but this Great Office remained not long in that Family, as you will see hereafter in the next Volume.

* Ib. 705.

[1] This Year King Henry, with many of his Great Men, kept his Christmas at Winchester, where he was the Day after splendidly entertained by the Bishop of that Place; by which the King signified that he had forgotten all former Offences, and in the presence of the whole Court received the Bishop into Favour. Anno Dom. MCCXLVII.

[1] Id. p. 719. The K. reconciled to the Bp. of Winchester.

About the same time the King summoned his Great Men with the Prelates and Archdeacons of England to him at London, to consider how the Contributions exacted by the Pope should be raised; but at the Day appointed, all the Bishops absented themselves on purpose, that so they might not appear openly to oppose the Pope's Desires.

A Council again summoned to prevent the Pope's Exactions.

The Bishops absent themselves on purpose.

[2] Yet these continual Exactions of the Pope's Legates and Collectors, opened every one's mouth against him, but especially in France, where they did not spare his Holiness, but loaded him with bitter Reproaches for the Extortion and Rapine that was practised by his Ministers; [3] insomuch that the Great Men of that Kingdom decreed, and by Oath established, That no Clerk or Laick for the future should compel any one to appear before the Ordinary, or his Ecclesiastical Judge or Delegate, unless upon the account of Heresie, Matrimony, or Usury, upon Forfeiture of all his Goods, and loss of one of his Members. This Resolution of the French very much chagrin'd the Pope, so that he endeavoured by all means to soften them into a Compliance; wherefore he bestowed many Ecclesiastical Benefices among their Relations, giving them licence to obtain more, with other Indulgences; and besides, he was bountiful in his Gifts among the Noblemen of that Kingdom, which brought many over to him from their former Reſolution.

[4] Id. ib. The Parliament meet again at London.

[4] The Day after Candlemas the Parliament met again at London, where the King was informed that the King of France had a Deſign upon Gaſcoigny; and he was ſenſible that it would not only be a Diſhonour, but a great Prejudice to him to ſuffer it to be loſt, ſeeing he received yearly from Bourdeaux alone a Thouſand Marks. When the Archdeacons and a great part of the Inferior Clergy of the whole Kingdom met the Great Men there, they complained of the Pope's frequent and intolerable Exactions, affirming to the King, That if theſe Men were ſuffered, his Kingdom would be endangered, and both Laiety and Clergy would be ruined by a Deſolation unknown to former Times. Upon this it was reſolved, That ſome other diſcreet Meſſengers ſhould be ſent to the Court of Rome, with Letters both to the Pope and Cardinals, on behalf of the Community of the whole Clergy and Laiety of the Realm, ſetting forth their Grievances and Oppreſſions.

Where the Archdeacons and Inferior Clergy make great Complaints againſt the Pope's Exactions. They again agree to write Letters to the Pope, ſetting forth their Grievances.

[5] Id. p. 721. The Contents of their Letter to the Pope.

[5] The Contents of their Letters to the Pope were, 'A Profeſſion of 'their readineſs to obey his Holineſs; but to deſire his Pardon, if 'they could not then comply with his Demands; for although 'their Country yielded plenty of Fruits for the Nouriſhment of 'its Inhabitants, yet it afforded no Money, neither was it ſufficient 'to ſupply what was demanded; for their King's Neceſſity required 'what they could ſpare towards the Defence of his own Domini'ons againſt the Aſſaults of his Enemies; and concluded, that any 'further Burthens would prove inſupportable to them.

[1] Id. Ib. The Contents of thoſe to the Cardinals.

[1] Their Letter to the Cardinals was to this effect; They firſt gave them an Abſtract of their Grievances, and what they had contributed ſince the laſt Lateran Council; firſt, a Twentieth part for Three Years for an Aid to the Holy Land; then a Tenth to the Pope; afterward ſeveral other Payments for different Uſes, at the Command of the Apoſtolick See: And then they urged the great Neceſſity and Wants their own King lay under, whom they were bound to aſſiſt as their Temporal Lord; and that they themſelves were now reduced to ſuch Penury and Want, that if all they had were expoſed to Sale, it would not be ſufficient to anſwer what was demanded of them: Wherefore they humbly beſeeched them fairly to preſent their Condition to the Pope, and endeavour to divert not only his Thoughts but his Councels and Inſtruments from ſuch grievous Oppreſſions.

[2] Id. p. 722. The Pope grants the K. a plauſible but inſignificant Privilege.

[2] About the ſame time the Pope granted to King Henry a plauſible but yet a deceitful Privilege, That no Italian or Nephew of his own or the Cardinals, ſhould henceforward be ſent into England to be Beneficed, unleſs he or his Cardinals ſhould firſt ask and obtain Leave of the King to have him provided for, which the Pope knew could be eaſily got whenever they pleaſed. Before the Council was ended, Peter of Savoy Earl of Richmond came to the Court at London, and brought with him ſeveral Young Ladies from his own Country, to be Married to the Young Noblemen that were the King's Wards, which thing much diſguſted his own Native Subjects.

Many Foreign Ladies are brought over to be Married to the King's Wards.

[3] This

[3] This Year alſo John and Alexander, Two Friers Minors, Engliſhmen by Birth, were ſent from the Pope with his Authority, to be Collectors (or rather Exactors) of his Money in England, pretending to ask Charity only, and to uſe no Force; and by this means they obtained the King's Licence to come over; but they were no ſooner here, but they went to the Chief Prelates, and very ſaucily required of them Money for the Pope's uſe; and ſometimes demanded Twenty Shillings for a Procuration, which was to be paid without delay; if not, they produced the Pope's Thundering Letters to affright and conſtrain them to it. When they came to the Biſhop of Lincoln, who was a great Admirer of that Order, he ſtood amazed at their Habit (which was more Soldier-like than Religious) but yet when they had ſhewed him the Pope's Letters, and demanded of him Six thouſand Marks to be forthwith paid out of his Biſhoprick, he anſwered with great Grief of Heart, That ſuch Exactions were never heard of before, and were very unjuſt, becauſe it was impoſſible to anſwer them; And ſeeing it concerned the whole Body of the Clergy and Laiety of the Kingdom, he could give them no anſwer in ſuch a difficult Affair, until he had firſt conſulted the Community of the ſaid Kingdom. Upon this they parted from him, and went to St. Albans, and demanded of the Abbot there Four hundred Marks, to be paid to them for the Pope's uſe; but they received much the ſame anſwer from him as they had before from the Biſhop of Lincoln.

Anno Dom. MCCXLVII.

[3] Id. ib. Two Friers Minors coming into England, under pretence to ask Charity, prove very ſawcy in their Demands for the Pope. The Bp. of Lincoln amaz'd at their Confidence, denies to contribute any thing.

[4] About the ſame time the Pope, by the like Meſſengers, the Friers Preachers and Minors, ſent to all the Chief Prelates in France, and deſired them to lend him Money according to every one's Ability, and whatſoever they lent ſhould be repaid them without fail, when he was able; but as ſoon as this was known to the King of France, he prohibited them under pain of forfeiting all their Goods from lending ſuch Sums, leſt thereby his own Kingdom ſhould be impoveriſhed.

[4] Id. p. 723. The Pope tries the ſame Trick in France, but that K. commands his Clergy not to lend any Money.

[5] This Year one Godefrid, Son to the Præfect of Rome, was ſent Legate into England, although there was no occaſion for any ſuch, and Maſter John Rufus into Ireland inſtead of a Legate, that he might thereby elude the Privilege lately granted to King Henry, who ſo well managed his Maſter the Pope's Buſineſs there, that he extorted from them Six thouſand Marks, which Sum was conveyed to London by certain Religious Perſons (or Friers) and paid into the Pope's Treaſury.

[5] Id. ib. A new Legate ſent into England, without any juſt occaſion.

[1] The ſame Year King Henry followed the Example of the Great Men of France, who by their King's Conſent and Approbation had lately entred into a Confederacy, and made a ſtrict Decree againſt the inſatiable Avarice and Oppreſſion of the Court of Rome; and that the like Exactions and Extortions might for the future be prevented here, the King now ordained that theſe following Orders ſhould be inviolably obſerved throughout England. Firſt, That no Laick ſhould bring any Cauſe before an Eccleſiaſtical Judge, unleſs it concerned a Marriage or Teſtament. Secondly, The King likewiſe preſcribed the Biſhops a certain Form, whereby to proceed in Caſes of Baſtardy, viz. to enquire whether they were born before or after Matrimony. Thirdly, That Clerks were prohibited

With other good Regulations of the Spiritual Courts.

[2] Id. p. 728. The Pope's Exactions renewed upon the Abbey of St. Albans.

[2] In the beginning of Lent, the fore-mentioned John the Minorite again demanded of the Abbey of St. Albans Four hundred Marks by virtue of his Authority, and cited the Abbot to appear at London Three days after, either in Person, or by his Proxy, to satisfie the Pope's late Demands: The Abbot hereupon sent his Archdeacon to appear for him at the Day appointed; who after he had demanded, and with difficulty obtained a Copy of the Brief, answered, That the Abbot designed to send special Messengers to Rome to acquaint the Pope with these Grievances, and for Remedy appealed to him, because both the Abbot and Convent thought they should meet with more Favour from his Holiness than they could expect from him: But John, to be revenged on the Abbot, wrote Letters to the Pope, containing great Complaints against him; wherefore when his Messengers came to Lyons (where the Pope then resided) they were very coldly received, and met with great Difficulties and some Checks; as namely, that they did not give that Respect, and pay that Reverence which was due to the Pope's Nuncio; and that their Abbot was the only Person amongst all the Abbots of England, who refused to yield Obedience to his Commands: But when they saw how they were treated, and that there was no Remedy to be expected, they compounded for Two hundred Marks, and their Expences amounted to One hundred more. But when Frier John saw the Clergy (especially the Abbots) so unwilling to yield to his Demands, he wrote to the Pope to have his Power enlarged: The Pope's Answer, together with the Letters of his additional Powers, see in Additament. to Matt. Paris, p. 155, 160.

The Abbot threatens to appeal, but finds the Remedy worse than the Disease.

[3] Id. p. 730. Another Council summon'd at Oxford to consult about the Pope's Exactions.

[3] About the same time the King finding the State of his Realm still more endangered and impoverished by these Papal Exactions, and the Money carried out of his Kingdom without any Advantage either to Church or State, summoned the whole Nobility of the Kingdom to meet at Oxford to consult about it; but the Prelates in a more especial manner, that they might consider how the Church should be relieved from those Oppressions it now lay under; and although some of the Prelates had resolved to refuse the aforesaid Contributions, yet their Hearts failing them when they met, they, contrary to all Expectation, consented to a Contribution to the Pope of Eleven thousand Marks; and the Clergy were constrained to pay it into the hands of the Bishops of Worchester and Norwich; and such as refused were wearied into a Compliance, by the Troubles and Damages they sustained from Frier John the Minorite: Nor did the Abbot of St. Albans fare one jot the better, for all he had sent the Pope Fourscore Marks the Year before;

The Bishops being faint-hearted, agree to another Contribution.

before; and they had now great reaſon to fear, leſt by a private and mutual Agreement between the Pope and the King, both the Church and State ſhould be expoſed to the like Exactions, ſince the Pope had wrote not long ſince to the Great Men of England to promote their giving Money to the King. Anno Dom. MCCXLVII.

[4] This Year (being almoſt wholly taken up with theſe Contentions between the Pope and Temporal Princes) affords very little of Civil concerns at Home, only that Baldwin, the Titular Emperour of Conſtantinople, being driven from thence by the Greeks, came into England to ſollicite for Relief, yet he found here no very great effects of it. [4] Id. p. 731. The Titular Emperour of Conſtantinople arrives in England.

[5] Not long after this, Guy de Luſignan, William de Valence and Athelmar a Clerk, all Three Sons to Hugh le Brun, Earl of Marche, (and the King's Half-Brethren by his Mother Queen Iſabel) came into England to make their Fortunes; where William, the Second Brother, being not long after Knighted, married Joane Daughter of Guarin de Montgenſil, and was ſome Years after, in her Right, made Earl of Pembroke; and the King did all he could to Enrich them, though to his own great Diſadvantage and Detriment. [5] Id. p. 732. The K's Half-Brothers by the Mother, come over hither to make their Fortunes.

[1] Alſo the Sterling-Money of England was now ſo very much defaced by Clippers, that not only all the Letters thereof were cut away, but they ſcarce ſpared the Inner-Ring; whereupon the King's Council began diligently to examine and conſider of a Remedy to prevent it for the future; and it then ſeem'd convenient in divers Prudent Mens Judgments, rather to change the Matter, than the Form of it, ſince by reaſon of that, rather than this, the Money had ſuffered ſo great a Diminution: But what was done in this Affair, you will find under the following Year. [1] Id. p. 733. The Coin much defaced in England by Clippers.

As for the Foreign Affairs of this Year, [2] the Day after Michaelmas ſome of the Princes of Germany, to whom the Right of Election belonged, met, and Choſe William Earl of Holland, a Young Nobleman of about Twenty Years of Age, King of the Romans; [3] but it was by the Procurement and Recommendation of the Pope, who had privately ſent him a great deal of Money to make War againſt the Emperour Frederick, that had been before depoſed in the Council of Lyons; yet for all this he could not be deprived, but made War againſt the Pope though with various Succeſſes. [2] Id. p. 735. William Earl of Holland, Elected K. of the Romans. [3] Id. p. 730.

[4] Richard Earl of Cornwall went this Autumn into France, to demand his Right of that King, before he undertook his Voyage to the Holy-Land, but return'd from thence towards the End of October, without obtaining any thing from him, though he was willing in himſelf to do Juſtice; but yet he was kept from it by the powerful Perſuaſions of his Great Men and Counſellors, who were the Earl's Enemies. [4] Id. p. 739. The Earl of Cornwall goes into France to demand his Right, but returns as he went.

[5] King Henry's Ambaſſadors alſo at the ſame time made a freſh Demand of Normandy, but all the Anſwer they could get, was, That the King of France had been now in the quiet Poſſeſſion of it for Forty Years: But this being no Satisfactory Anſwer, the King referred it to the Biſhops of Normandy; who thereupon gave their Opinions, That the French King had moſt Right to it, becauſe King John had undergone the Judgment of his Peers; But to this our [5] Id. ib. As did alſo the K's Ambaſſadors, who went to demand Normandy.

Author

Anno Dom. MCCXLVII. Author answers very well, That that King ought not to be Judged by his declared Enemies, neither should the Son suffer for the Iniquity of his Father.

Anno Dom. MCCXLVIII. This Year King Henry kept his Christmas at Wincheſter, with many of his Great Men; [1] Soon after which he ſummoned the Nobility of the whole Kingdom of England to meet him at London eight days after Candlemas, where (beſides a great number of Barons, Knights, and Noblemen, as alſo Abbots, Priors, and Clerks,) there appeared nine Biſhops, and as many Earls; of the former were theſe, the Archbiſhop of York, and Biſhops of Wincheſter, Lincoln, Norwich, Worceſter, Chicheſter, Ely, Rocheſter, and Carliſle; of the latter, Earl Richard, the Earls of Gloceſter, Leiceſter, Wincheſter, Hereford, Oxford, and Roger Bigot, (now Earl-Mareſchal) with the Earls of Lincoln, Ferrars, Warren, and Richmond; but the Archbiſhop of Canterbury was then beyond Sea, the Biſhop of Durham infirm, and the Biſhop of Bath lately dead. When they were aſſembled, the King required of them a pecuniary Aid; but they reproved him for aſking it without Bluſhing, (as our Monk bluntly expreſſes it) ſeeing when they granted the laſt, he promiſed by his Charter, That he would not any more burthen his Great Men; Moreover they blamed him for his repeated Kindneſs and Liberality to Foreigners, and Contempt of his Native Subjects, for not Encouraging the Trade of his own Kingdom, and in taking and enacting unreaſonable Gifts from Merchants; And laſtly, For keeping Biſhopricks and Abbeys void in his own Hand: To theſe they added, That neither the Juſticiary, Chancellor, nor Treaſurer, were made by the Common-Council of the Kingdom, as they were in his Predeceſſor's Reign.

[1] Id. p. 743. A general Parliament ſummon'd at London.

The King requires a Pecuniary Aid, but is refuſed it; and why.

They then ſum up their Grievances.

[2] Id. p. 744. [2] Now when the King heard theſe things, he ſeemed ſomewhat out of Countenance, and promiſed, That what was amiſs ſhould be ſpeedily amended; to which the Whole Body of them replied, That as they had often, ſo they would now patiently wait a while, and ſee whether he intended as he ſpake, and according as he performed his Promiſe, ſo would they their Obedience to him in all things: Upon which, the farther Conſideration of this Affair was put off till Fifteen days after Midſummer; but in the mean time the King's Heart became hard'ned, and ſo exaſperated againſt his Subjects, that he took no care to correct thoſe Exceſſes, according to the Promiſe he had ſo newly made them.

[3] Id. p. 749. The Parliament meet again; and the K. makes them a notable Speech.

[3] At the Day appointed the Nobility of all England met again at London, and the King made them a Speech to this Effect, That they had not treated him very Civilly, but would impoſe mean and ſervile Conditions on him; and that which every one of them in private thought to be his Right, was yet denied Him, even that Authority which every Maſter exerciſed in his own Family, who might uſe whoſe and what Counſel he pleaſed, and put out and put in what Servants he thought fit in his own Houſe, but this, ſays He, You deny your King; and as Servants ought not to Judge, or impoſe any Difficulty upon their Lord, ſo neither might Vaſſals on their Prince; and therefore he was reſolved, neither to remove the the Chancellor, Juſtitiary, nor Treaſurer at their Pleaſure: But as to the other Propoſals, though Beneficial to the Kingdom, he gave dilatory Anſwers, and then added, That he expected from them a Pecuniary Aid for the Defence and Recovery of his Rights beyond the Seas, (which alſo was their own concern;) but they all Unanimouſly replied, That they would no longer impoveriſh themſelves to enrich Strangers, as they had formerly done, when they gave Money towards his laſt Expedition to Gaſcoigny and Poictou.

Anno Dom. MCCXLVIII

And tells them he would remove none of his Officers at their Pleaſure. Yet obtains nothing from them thereby.

Whereupon the Parliament was Diſſolved in great diſorder, without any Benefit or Satisfaction either to the King or themſelves: inſomuch that the King was thereby reduced to very great neceſſities, [4] which forced him to expoſe to ſale his Jewels, Plate, and other Houſhold Utenſils; and ſuch Veſſels as were curiouſly wrought and guilded, were ſold, not according to their Value, but Weight. But as the King was enquiring where he ſhould find Buyers, upon ſome Body's anſwering in London, He replied, If the Treaſury of Octavian (meaning, I ſuppoſe, Auguſtus) were to be ſold, on my Conſcience the City of London were able to purchaſe it; and then added to this Effect, Theſe ill-bred Citizens, who call themſelves Barons, abound in all things, and are indeed an inexhauſtible Magazine of Treaſure; from which time the King reſolved to take the firſt Opportunity to ſpoil them of their Goods.

The Parliament is Diſſolved in great diſorder.

[4] Id. p. 794. The K. ſells his Plate and Jewels for ready Money to the Citizens, but owes them a Grudge for it.

[5] This Year alſo (though our Author has not given us the Day) all Clipt and Light Money was called in, and forbad to be paid or received, by Proclamation; and diligent Inquiſition was made to find out theſe Falſifiers and Corrupters of the Coin, and upon ſtrict ſearch the Jews, the Courſini, or Italian Uſurers, as alſo the Wooll-Merchants of Flanders, were all found guilty of this Crime.

[5] Id. p. 747. All Clipt Money is called in, and the Clippers enquired after, and found.

[1] But this ſudden calling in the Money did very much impoveriſh the People, for Exchange of Money was uſed but in very few Cities; and when they came thither, beſides the Loſs in Weight, they were fain to allow Thirteen Pence in the Pound for the bare Coinage; ſo that beſides the Labour and loſs of Time, the People received ſcarce Twenty Shillings of New Money for the Old they paſſed with: But as for the New Coin, it differ'd nothing from the Old in Figure, only that the Croſs now paſſed through the very Letters in the outward Rim. I have taken notice of this, to let the Reader obſerve, That no Alteration of Coin was ever made without great Loſs to the Nation.

[1] Id. p. 748. The People ſuffer great Loſs by the Alteration of the Coin.

[2] This Year on the Thirteenth of October, the King with many Prelates and Great Men met at London, to celebrate the Feaſt of the Tranſlation of St. Edward, and cauſed a new Fair to be proclaimed at Weſtminſter, to continue for Fifteen Days, and prohibited all other Fairs that uſed to be kept at that time of the Year, throughout England; and alſo all Trading in the City of London within doors and without, during that time, that ſo this Fair at Weſtminſter might be the more plentifully ſtored and frequented with all ſorts of People and Commodities; which Oppreſſion highly incenſed the City at that time.

Anno Dom. MCCXLVIII

But as for Eccleſiaſtical Affairs, [3] the Pope continued his wonted Extortions from, and Oppreſſions of the Engliſh Nation, and again ſent his Italians to be without delay beneficed in England, one of whom going to the Abbot of Abbindon to be provided for, made choice of the Church of St. Hellens in the ſame Town, worth one hundred Marks per Annum; but the ſame day it became void the King ſent his Mandate to the Abbot, to confer it upon Ethelmar his Half-Brother, and that the King would protect and indemnifie him in ſo doing, whereupon the Abbot yielded to the King's Command; after which, on the Complaint of this Italian, the Pope cited the Old Abbot to appear before him at Rome, and then he being deſerted by the King, was conſtrained to take that wearifom and tedious Journey, where, after many Difficulties and Expences, he was at laſt forced to compound for Fifty Marks.

[3] Id. p. 754. Several freſh Inſtances of the Pope's Oppreſſions.

In Foreign Parts, that which happened worth taking notice of this Year, was, [4] That Lewis King of France, having long before undertaken the Cruſado, in Autumn began his Voyage for the Holy-Land; and paſſing by Lyons, he there took his Leave of the Pope, and ſo going on to Marſeilles, he Embarked there as many of his Army as he could carry along with him; the reſt being left behind for another Opportunity.

[4] Id. p. 749. The K. of Fr. begins his Voyage for the Holy-Land.

[5] Alſo in Germany, Conrade, Son to the Emperor Frederick, marching with his Forces to the Relief of Aix la Chapelle, then beſieged by the Pope's Legate, and the Great Men of Germany, that Prince's Army was routed, and the City thereupon ſurrender'd to Mercy; in which not long after William Earl of Holland was crown'd Emperor (according to Cuſtom) by Conrade, Archbiſhop of Cologne, few of the Temporal Electors being preſent.

[1] This Year the King kept his Chriſtmas at London, and required of the Citizens large New-Years Gifts; and not being content with this, he ſome time after ſent to the ſame Perſons to ſupply him with Money: This Meſſage they received with heavy Hearts, and complained, That the Liberties of the City which were ſo often Bought, Granted and Sworn to, could not protect them from being treated as Slaves: So at length (though not without great reluctancy) they were conſtrained to pay Two thouſand Pounds; but this would not ſatisfie the King's wants, therefore he was forced to apply himſelf to his Great Men one by one, and requeſted them to lend him Money, both to ſupply his Neceſſities, and pay his Debts, and alſo to Enable him to recover thoſe Rights which the King of France had invaded; and then in a moſt ſubmiſſive manner made his urgent Neceſſities known to the Prelates and Abbots, begging of them either to give, or lend him ſuch a Sum of Money, yet could obtain nothing but Excuſes and Denials, unleſs from the Abbot of St. Albans, from whom he received Sixty Marks. [2] This encouraged the King to hope for the like Succeſs from other Abbots and Priors, and accordingly he wrote to thoſe of Eſſex and Hertfordſhire, to lend him Money for his preſent Neceſſities; and at the end added his Promiſe faithfully to repay the ſame.

[3] The Pretence for borrowing this Money, was, That the Truce between himself and the King of France being now almost expired, he should be at great Charges to recover his lost Rights beyond the Seas; whereas indeed he durst not undertake any such Enterprize, the Pope having by his Nuncio lately forbid him, (though privately) under pain of Excommunication to disturb any of the King of France's Territories, during his absence in the Holy War; but the true Reason was, That the King, during his last Expedition in Poictou, had so deeply run in Debt to the People of those Parts, that all the Money he could by any means take up, or extort in England, would not serve to discharge those Obligations.

[3] Id. ib. The K's Pretences for borrowing of Money were, to recover his Rights in Fr. But indeed were for another end.

This Year [4] Nicholas Bishop of Durham, being sensible of his great Age and Infirmities, resigned his Bishoprick, and withdrew himself from all Publick Affairs to a Private Life; whereupon the King recommended Ethelmar his Half-Brother to the Convent, and by Messengers and repeated Intreaties would fain have perswaded them to chuse him for their Bishop: But they replied, That at his Coronation he had sworn to Preserve the Church's Liberties, and that the Person recommended was neither of sufficient Age, nor Learning for so great a Charge: [5] The King answered, Then he would keep the Bishoprick eight or nine Years in his own Hands, and by that time he would be capable of it.

[1] This Year in June, Simon Montfort Earl of Leicester (although he had a little before undertaken the Crusado) went over into Gascony, and subdued all that were in Rebellion against King Henry, and in every thing behaved himself with such Fidelity and Courage, that he gained the Applause of all the King's Friends, and the Name of a Worthy Patriot: Also a little after, on the Third of July, died Alexander II. King of Scotland, a Prince of great Virtue and Wisdom, leaving his Son Alexander, a Child of about eight Years old, to succeed him.

[1] Id. p. 667. Simon Montfort goes over into Gascony, and subdues the Rebels there.

Alexander K. of Scots dies.

There happened nothing else this Year worth the noting, [2] but that two Merchants of Brabant were robbed near Winchester of Two hundred Marks, and not being able to obtain Justice from the Countrey against some that were foully suspected of it, but instead of being found Guilty were acquitted by the Oath of their Compurgators; wherefore these Merchants came to the King who was then at that City, grievously complaining of the Injury and Injustice that had been done them; at which he being much incensed, called before him the Bailiffs and Freemen of Hampshire, charging them to find out and discover these Malefactors; and this was also enforced by the Bishops denouncing all those Excommunicated, who were any ways concerned in this Robbery. Now for the discovery of this, there were chosen a Jury of Twelve Men out of Winchester, and the County adjacent, to enquire in Particular concerning these Offenders: But this Inquest refusing to discover them, and pretending Ignorance who they were, this their Dishonesty and Remissness so provoked the King, that he commanded them to be clapt up in Prison, and another Inquest to be summoned out of the same Places; and these being afraid of the like Usage as the former had met with, if they offered to conceal any of those they knew to be Offenders, revealed and impeached a great many Men of

The Concluſion was, That about Thirty of the Ring-leaders of theſe Malefactors being executed, the Knot was pretty well broke, and the Countrey reſtored to its former Security: I have taken notice of this to let the Reader ſee, that this Age is not more Wicked and Corrupt than that which was Four hundred years ago, when even the Beſt Men in a County, nay the King's own Servants and Guards, made no Conſcience of turning Highway-men.

Some of the K's own Servants being alſo Convicted.

Anno Dom. MCCL. This [3] Year King Henry kept his Chriſtmas at Wincheſter, and after the Celebration of that Feſtival came to London, about which time, Cincia, Earl Richard's Lady, was brought to Bed of a Son, who was Chriſtned Edmund; ſoon after many of the Nobility of England, the Chief of whom were the Earl laſt mentioned, and the Earl of Gloceſter, Henry de Haſtings a Baron, Roger de Thurkelby, and divers other Nobles, beſides the Biſhops of Lincoln, London, and Worceſter, and with them the Archdeacons of Oxford and Bedford, and ſeveral other Clerks) went all beyond Sea. The Errand they went on ſeem'd only to accompany Earl Richard through France, who travelled with great Magnificence to treat with the Pope being then at Lyons; but the Biſhops took this Opportunity to go thither about their own private Affairs.

[4] On the Seventeenth of March the King himſelf, and many of the Nobility and Clergy undertook the Cruſade; there were in all about Five hundred Knights, beſides an innumerable Number of Eſquires and Common Soldiers. In May Earl Richard returned into England from the Pope's Court, where he had been received and treated both by the Pope and Cardinals in a moſt ſplendid and magnificent Manner, to the Admiration of all that were preſent at his Entrance, and ſaw his Reception. This occaſioned various Conjectures, but moſt People thought that the Pope, knowing him to be both Rich and Ambitious, then deſign'd to promote him to the Empire, and that this was the main Cauſe of his Journey; [5] with him the Earls of Gloceſter and Leiceſter, and ſeveral other Great Men and Biſhops, likewiſe returned into England.

[1] About Midſummer there was a great Diſturbance in the City of London, concerning ſome Liberties belonging to the Citizens, and which the King had granted to the Abbey of Weſtminſter; whereupon the Mayor, with the whole Community of the City, made their Complaint to the King, but without obtaining any Remedy; Then they applied themſelves to Earl Richard, and the Earl of Leiceſter, and ſome other Great Men, who went to the King, and ſeverely blamed him for infringing thoſe Charters which his Predeceſſors had granted to the City, and alſo ſharply reproved the Abbot, bot, as one that had occasioned and moved the King to this Violation; by which means the King was restrained from proceeding any further in his Grant to that Abbot. Anno Dom. MCCL.

Soon after this, [2] the King complained to the Pope, That his Great Men who had undertaken the Crusado, designed to begin their Journey to the Holy Land before he himself was prepared for it; and that they were more ready to follow the King of France, his Capital Enemy, than himself. Upon this, the Pope by his Letters, under pain of Excommunication, prohibited any from going without the King's Leave; who, to make the Prohibition more effectual, sent to the Wardens of his Sea-Ports to hinder any of his * Great Men, that had thus taken the Crusado upon them, from passing over Sea. Also [3] this Year a rich Jew of the City of York named Aaron, being convicted of counterfeiting or falsifying a certain Charter, was severely fined, and paid to the King Fourteen thousand Marks, and to the Queen a proportionable Sum in Gold; so that it was computed that this Jew had paid to the King Thirty thousand Marks of Silver since his coming from beyond Sea, and to the Queen two hundred Marks of Gold, as the same Jew informed our Author Matth. Paris, * who says they were not to be pitied, because they were proved to be Corrupters of the King's Seals and Charters. [3] Id. ib. A rich Jew of York severely fined for falsifying a Charter. * Ib. n 50.

But here to intermix somewhat of Ecclesiastical Affairs: [4] The King having about this time granted to a certain Knight of mean Birth (because he had Married the Sister of John Mansel his Clerk or Secretary) Free Warren within the Lands belonging to St. Albans Abbey, and that contrary to the ancient Charters of his Predecessors; and being reproved for this by our Author himself (who was not afraid to do it) all his Excuse for it, was, Why, does not the Pope do the same thing, adding in his Briefs or Letters, * Notwithstanding any Privilege or Indulgence? Yet presently upon better Thoughts he said, Well, well, we will consider further of it: But for all this, the Remembrance both of his Words and Promises vanish'd with the speaking. This I take notice of, to shew the Reader after whose Imitation the Clause of Non-obstante then crept into the Grants of this King. [4] Id. p. 783. This K. excuses his using the Clause of Non-obstante from the P.'s Example. * Non obstante.

[5] About the same time the King, to get more Money, sent Geoffrey de Langly as his Officer or Inquisitor, to search into the Transgressions upon Forests, which Charge he executed with that Violence and Extortion (especially in the Northern Parts) as exceeded belief, clapping up Gentlemen in Prison for but muttering against his unjust Proceedings, and ruining divers of the best Quality for killing but a Deer, or a Hare, albeit it were in the very Highway; by which means, though he gain'd the King a great Sum of Money, yet it lost him the Affections of his People, when he came to stand most in need of them, as you will find hereafter. [5] Id. p. 785. The K. sends Langly to enquire into the Transgressors upon Forests, who executes his Charge with great severity.

But to add some other Ecclesiastical Matters: [1] About the end of September, William Rale Bishop of Winchester died at Tours; upon which News, the King sent very kind and obliging Letters to the Monks of that Convent, to perswade them to choose Ethelmar his Half-Brother for their Bishop: [2] Whereupon they were under great [1] Id. p. 800. The Bp. of Winchester deceasing, the K. recommends his Br. Ethelmar to the Monks to be Elected. [2] Id. p. 801.

great Difficulties how to manage themſelves; for in the firſt place, they durſt not reject the King's Requeſt, for fear leſt further Inconveniences might enſue, becauſe they thought the Pope was the King's cloſe Friend; neither were they willing to elect one, whom they knew to be altogether inſufficient for ſo great a Truſt; yet at laſt, after many Diſputes, the King's powerful Requeſt, or rather Sermon, which he made them in their Chapter-Houſe upon this Text, Righteouſneſs and Truth have kiſſed each other, ſo far prevailed with them, that Ethelmar was choſen Biſhop; and forthwith Envoys were ſent to give the Pope notice of it, with Letters full of Intreaties and Promiſes, to induce him to approve of what was ſo very acceptable to the King.

Who upon the K.'s making a Speech to them, is Elected Biſhop.

[3] Id. p. 803. The Pope by a Meſſage deſires the K.'s Leave to ſtay for ſome time at Bourdeaux.

But [3] ſoon after this, the King received ſolemn Meſſages from the Pope, to deſire his Leave to let him reſide for ſome time at Bourdeaux, becauſe the Earls of Poitou and Provence, Brothers to the King of France (who was lately taken Priſoner by the Saracens) looked upon the Pope as the principal Author of his Misfortune, in that he had hindred thoſe who had undertaken the Cruſado from proceeding according to their Deſign, and for Money had abſolved many from their Vows: And there had paſſed hard Words between the Pope and thoſe Princes, inſomuch that they parted in great Anger; and therefore they made all the haſt they could into England, to ſollicite the King to afford them what Aſſiſtance he was able in this Juncture, for the Relief of the King their Brother; urging to him the Vow he at preſent lay under. This Requeſt of the Pope's reduced the King to great Streights; for if he conſented to it, he made the Emperor his Enemy, and beſides, the Pope might from Bourdeaux eaſily paſs into England (which he had often talk'd of) where his Company was not at all deſired; but again, if the King refuſed it, he incurred his Diſpleaſure; whereupon the King took longer time to conſider what Anſwer he ſhould return.

Whereupon the K. takes time to conſider of it.

[4] Id. p. 804. The death of Frederick the Emperor, with his Character.

In foreign Parts what had happened moſt conſiderable [4] was, the Death of the Emperor Frederick II. who notwithſtanding he had been Excommunicated, and Depoſed by the Pope and Council of Lyons divers Years, was a Prince of great Valour and Prudence; and for all that the Pope and his Confederates in Germany were able to do againſt him, maintained his Dignity till his Death.

[5] Id. p. 793. The K. of Fr. and his two Brothers taken Priſoners in Egypt by the Saracens.

But to ſay ſomething more of Foreign Affairs: [5] Lewis King of France, having the Year before taken the City of Damiata in Egypt, had great hopes likewiſe of getting all that part of the Country next Paleſtine; and therefore marching out this Year from Damiata, paſſed that Branch of the River Nile which runs by Roſetta, and tho' the King defeated the Saracens in ſeveral Skirmiſhes there, yet encamping at laſt near a place called Pharamia, Sultan Melec came upon him with a great Force, and the King's being much weakned with Sickneſs, he would fain have retreated with them to Damiata; but it was then too late, for his whole Army was cut in pieces in their return, and the King with his two Brothers Alphonſo and Charles, taken Priſoners; for whoſe Ranſom and his own, as alſo for all the other Chriſtian Captives that were taken Priſoners with them, the King was forced to ſurrender the City of Damiata to the Saracen Sultan, beſides the payment of Four hundred thouſand Livres; and ſo making a Truce with this Prince for Ten Years, and the King and the reſt of the Princes being ſet free, they ſailed to Acon; but not daring to ſtay there neither, for fear the Saracens (who threatned to break the Truce) ſhould beſiege it, he ſent home his Brothers, and then quitting that Place, did nothing more worth taking notice of; but having viſited the Holy Places as a Pilgrim, returned home about Four Years after. Anno Dom. MCCL.

[1] This Year King Henry kept his Chriſtmas at Wincheſter, but by reaſon of his great want of Money, the uſual Plenty and Hoſpitality of his Court was laid aſide, and the accuſtomed Diſtribution of New-year's Gifts and Liveries were omitted; yet none were acceptable Gueſts at Court, who did not bring ſome Gift or Preſent to the King, Queen, or Prince Edward, and the Principal Courtiers. Anno Dom. MCCLI.

[1] Id. p. 807. The K. for want of Money, retrenches the Hoſpitality of his Court.

Then [2] on Twelfth-day Simon Montfort Earl of Leiceſter, after he had in ſome meaſure reduced Gaſcoigny to the King's Obedience, came into England, accompanied only with Three Eſquires, and going to the King, acquainted him with the great Charge and Expence he had been at to repreſs thoſe Rebels, but could no longer maintain it out of his own Revenues; therefore he deſired a ſpeedy Supply both of Men and Money; which was granted him: And having received out of the King's Treaſury Three hundred Marks, and gathered together what Money he could amongſt his own Tenants, and thoſe of his Wards, he prepared to return into Gaſcoigny, as he did with a new Reinforcement the next Spring following.

[2] Id. p. 810.

[3] About this time alſo there was a Suit commenced between Sylveſter Biſhop of Carliſle, and a certain Baron, about a Mannor which the Biſhop's Predeceſſor had ſold away, and which he would fain recover again: Now the Biſhop having occaſion to ſtay beyond Sea, obtained the King's Letters of Protection, that the Suit ſhould be ſtopt till his return; but in the mean while the Baron his Adverſary obtained other Letters from him, with this Clauſe, That notwithſtanding the former Letter, the Baron's Cauſe ſhould not be delayed. So that now thoſe Writs, or Letters, with that deteſtable Addition of Non-obſtante, became very frequent, which being obſerved by Roger de Thurkeby a prudent Man, and one of the King's Juſtices, he ſaid with a deep Sigh, Alas, alas! what Times are we fallen into! Behold the Civil Court is corrupted in imitation of the Eccleſiaſtical, and the River is poiſoned from that Fountain. This I have alſo added (though omitted by Dr. Brady) to give you a perfect hiſtory of the Original and Progreſs of Non-obſtante's in the King's Writs and Charters.

[4] On Candlemas-day Henry de Bathe the King's Juſtitiary, and very Learned in the Laws, was accuſed to the King for Bribery and Extortion, and that thereby he had raiſed a very great Eſtate upon the Ruin of others; upon this he was attached, and when John Manſel Clerk, one of the King's Principal Councellors, offered to be his Bail, the King refuſed him, adding, that his Fault was little leſs than Treaſon; but upon the importunate Intercеſſions of the Biſhop of London and ſeveral others, he was ſet at Liberty, Liberty, and Twenty four Knights bound for his appearance at a time appointed.

[5] On the Seventeenth of February (according to appointment) the Parliament met at London, where appeared the above-mentioned Henry de Bathe, accompanied with a great Train of his own and his Wife's Relations; and then (besides other Crimes) he was accused for incensing the whole Baronage against the King, upon which a general Sedition was like to have ensued; and the King was so highly provoked against him, that he caused it to be openly proclaimed, both in his own Court and in London, That if any Person had any Action or Complaint against him, he should come in, and be fully heard. Then one of his Fellow-Justices laid to his Charge, That for a great Bribe he had acquitted and discharged one convicted of notorious Crimes; which further so enraged the King, that he again publickly declared, That if any one should kill Henry de Bathe, he would pardon him; and he had been soon dispatched, had not the Prudence of John Mansel, and the Threats of the Bishop of London secured him from Violence. [1] But at length having made Earl Richard his Friend by great Presents, through his Powerful Mediation, and the Promise of a round Sum of Money, he gained his Liberty; and so about the end of July following, he returned to Court, and was reconciled to the King, upon the payment of Two thousand Marks. From whence we may observe, That in those Times it was all one to be Innocent or Guilty, provided the Party accused were Powerful, and would part with his Money freely.

[5] Id. p. 814. H. de Bathe accused in Parliament for incensing the K. against the Baronage of England.

He is also accused of Bribery, at which the K. is much enraged.

[1] Id. p. 815. Yet by the Mediation of Earl Rich. and the Promise of a round Sum of Money, he is reconciled to the K.

[2] About this time Ethelmar the King's Half-Brother was by the Pope approved of, and confirmed in the Bishoprick of Winchester; and at the same time his Holiness sent to the King to make a Provision of Five hundred Marks (in Ecclesiastical Revenues) for the Duke of Burgundy's Son, a Child. [3] Likewise the same Year part of Wales was wholly subdued, and received the English Laws; and that side of it which borders upon Cheshire, was committed to the Government of Alan de la Zouch, who answered to the King Eleven hundred Marks per Annum; which deserves to be taken notice of, as being not mentioned in the Welsh Chronicles.

[2] Id. p. 815. Ethelmar is confirmed by the Pope in the Bishoprick of Winchester.

[3] Id. p. 816.

As for Domestick Matters (according to the ancient Manuscript Chronicle of the City of London) this Year in Whitson-week, the * Community of the City swore Allegiance to Prince Edward at St. Paul's Cross, saving the Fidelity they owed to the King his Father, who then also granted them a Confirmation of all Liberties they enjoyed in the Time of King Henry the First; and also that for the future the Mayor should be sworn before the Barons of the Exchequer at Westminster, and not before the King in Person; for which Charter the City paid him Five hundred Marks.

* Communia Civitatis.

But to intermix somewhat of Ecclesiastical Affairs: [4] Some time after, the Pope sent John de Cumecurio his Nephew and Chaplain into England, * with Letters to the Abbot and Convent of St. Albans, commanding them to confer upon him the Parsonage of Wendgrave, or any other good Benefice belonging to their Patronage (if desired by the above-named John) when it became void, Notwithstanding that Indulgence or Privilege lately granted to [5] Simon Montfort, Earl of Leicester, having this Summer, by divers great Successes against the Rebels in Gascoigny, broken their strength, and had taken Chastellion, a Castle of great Importance, and their common Refuge; he, together with his Wife and Earl Guido de Lusignan, the Third Half-Brother of the King, landed at Dover, in November, of which when he had notice, he commanded his Great Men and the Citizens of London to receive his Brother with all solemnity and signs of Joy; and after he had supplied his Wants by his Royal Bounty, he return'd home plentifully furnished.

[5] Id. p. 825. Simon Montfort having subdued the Rebels in Gascogny, returns into England, with the K's Half-Brother.

How he is received by the Great Men and Citizens of London.

I have nothing more to add to the Civil Affairs of this Year, but to observe from the same [1] Author, That the King now began to imitate his Father, and slighting his own Natural Subjects, to settle his Affections upon Strangers, such as were (besides his Half-Brother above-mentioned) the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Bishop of Hertford, and Peter of Savoy; whence arose so many Princes in England, who made nothing to seize upon Men's Horses, Carts, Victuals, and other Necessaries, without paying for them: And besides, the Poictovins did not spare the very Noblemen, but did all they could to Oppress and Impoverish them, especially the Abbots and Priors; these things lost the King the Love of his Subjects, and were one main cause of those great Disturbances, which afterward ensued.

[1] Id. p. 816. The K. settles his Affections upon Strangers.

[2] As for other Foreign Affairs, this Year affords not many worth the Noting, only that in France, during the Imprisonment of King Lewis, a great Multitude of Shepherds and other Peasants got together under their Leader, (an Apostate Monk, an Hungarian) who upon pretence of delivering the King from Captivity, made a dangerous insurrection; with these joined a great Number of Rogues, Thieves, and all sorts of Malefactors, so that they soon made up a considerable Army; and then railing against the Bishops, and all the Religious Orders, marched to Orleans, where they fell upon the Scholars, plunder'd them, and killed several; till being Excommunicated by the Bishop of that City, and going into Berry, the People of that Province rose upon them and put them to the rout, and killed a great many; and those that were taken being Hang'd, the rest laid down their Arms, and vanished as it were in a Moment.

Being Excommunicated, they march into Berry, and are taken and put to Death.

Anno Dom. MCCLII.

[3] This Year King Henry kept his Christmas at York, because his Daughter Margaret (being now of Age) was to be solemnly married to Alexander the Young King of Scots; and for the more famous Celebration of these Nuptials, (besides that King and his Mother the Queen) there was a very great Confluence of the Clergy and Nobility, not only out of England and Scotland, but several from France. Then on Christmas-day King Henry Knighted Alexander King of Scots, and the next Day early in the Morning the Lady Margaret was married to him, upon which he did Homage to the King of England for Lothian and the other Lands he held of him; and after that it was demanded, that he should do the same Homage and Fealty to his Lord the King of England for the Kingdom of Scotland, as his Predecessors had formerly done; To which the King of of Scots (though very Young) wisely replied, That he came thither voluntarily at the King's Invitation, and by the Marriage of his Daughter to unite himself more closely to him; but was not prepared to give an Answer to such hard Questions, for he had not consulted his Nobility about so difficult an Affair. When the King heard this modest Reply, he would not press him any farther, (lest the designed Mirth and Jollity of the Nuptial Solemnity, should be thereby disturbed,) but passed it by in Silence, till a fitter Opportunity. The Marriage-Ceremonies being now over, that King (having obtain'd whatever he could in reason expect from King Henry his Father-in-Law) returned with his Wife, the Young Queen, into Scotland.

And returns Home.

[4] Id. p. 831. The P. sends to K. Henry to hasten his Preparations for the Holy-Land.

[4] Soon after this, the Pope wrote to King Henry to hasten his Preparations for the Holy-Land, to prosecute the Vow he lay under, and give what Aid and Relief he could to the King of France; and if he would not go himself in Person, not to hinder others who stood obliged by the same Vow. The King, to shew his readiness to answer the Pope's request, took great quantities of Money from the Jews, nor were his Christian Subjects much less spared.

[5] Id. p. 832. The Nobility of Gascoigny accuse Simon Montfort of Unfaithfulness and Avarice.

But the Earl upon pleading his Innocency is furnished with Money.

[5] In the Spring following, the Noblemen of Gascoigny sent over their Complaints to the King against Simon Earl of Leicester, accusing him of Unfaithfulness and Treachery, heaping together great Sums of Money from all sorts of People, under pretence of taking it for the King's Use, but indeed turning it wholly to his own; but so soon as the Earl heard what was laid to his Charge, he went to the King and pleaded his Innocence, saying, He wonder'd he should give more credit to his Rebellious Gascoigns, than to him, who had given such evident Proofs of his Fidelity; To whom the King replied, That if he were Innocent, a strict Enquiry would render him the more Remarkable; so the Earl (though somewhat humbled with this Answer) was again furnished with Money: But before his return into Gascoigny, they would have revolted from their Allegiance to the King of England, and sought out a new Lord, could they have found any other Countrey to have sold their Wines in with as good advantage.

[1] Id. p. 836, 837. The Earl upon his return is accused by the Gascoigns.

[1] Soon after the Earl's return, the Great Men of Gascoigny agreed to send publick Messengers to the King of England, to acquaint him how inhumanely his Faithful Subjects of that Countrey were treated by the Earl of Leicester, and drew up a fresh Charge or Accusation against him, which was testified by the Common Seals of their Cities, Great Men, Castellans, and Bailiffs; and this was carried to the King by the Archbishop of Bourdeaux and several Noblemen, who landed in England about Whitsuntide, and found the King at London; before whom they again made [2] a lamentable Complaint of the Treachery and Tyranny of the Earl of Leicester. But the King would not give too hasty a Belief to their Complaints, because he himself had found them Traytors, when he was in Gascoigny; but waited till the return of Nicholas de Molis and Drogo Valentine, whom he had sent thither to Enquire into the Truth of their Accusation.

[2] Id. p. 838. But the King would not give too hasty a Belief to their Complaints.

[3] These

[3] These at their return reported to the King, that they found some who had been very severely treated by the Earl, yet (as they believed) but according to their deserts. The Archbishop of Bourdeaux, and such as came with him, hearing this, required they might prove their Accusation, and then have Judgment, and protested upon Oath, they would never obey the Earl, and begged of the King to provide them a new Governour, but his Charge was then no farther enquired into, because he was absent; However, a Day was appointed throughly to Examine this Affair. In the mean time Leicester had procured Earl Richard, and the Earls of Glocester and Hereford, and several other Noblemen and Men of Quality, who were his entire Friends, to be present at the hearing of his Cause: And when the Earl appeared, he so well made out his Innocence, and vindicated himself, that he silenced most of his Adversaries; tho' when the King perceived that his Brother Richard and the other Noblemen there present sided with the Earl, he had much ado to restrain the Resentments he had conceived against him; And after several Debates as well as Reflections upon each other, no sooner did the Earl repeat the Services he had done the Crown, and mention the Promises and Grants the King had made him, to repay the Expences he had been at in his Service, and make bold to demand of him the Performance of his Royal Word and Engagement, by a Recompence for his Charges; but the King replied, He would not stand to any Promise he had made to one that was a Traytor; whereupon, the Earl told the King He Lied; and were he not a King, he would make him eat his Words; asking, (in a reproachful manner) Whether any Man could believe he was a Christian, or whether he had been at Confession? The King replied, Yes: The Earl answered, What availeth Confession without Penance and Satisfaction? To which the King return'd, That he never had more reason to repent of any thing, than that he had suffered him to come into England, and that he had shew'd such Honours and Preferments upon One that had so little Gratitude and Manners; and the King had immediately caused him to be Apprehended and Imprisoned for this Insolence and Sawcinesse, but that he had notice, that some of the Great Men would abet and support him: At length, by the Interposition of Friends, they parted from each other, outwardly reconciled. Which Relation, as it shews the Insolent and haughty Temper of this Earl, which few Princes besides King Henry could have born with, and patiently put up so great an Affront as the Lie; so likewise it is no wonder, if the King, as he before was afraid of him, ever after hated him mortally, and only waited an Opportunity to Ruine him.

Anno Dom. MCCLII.

[3] Id. p. 836. But sends over Commissioners, who on their return make a Report in his favour.

The Earl having made E. Richard, &c. his Friends, justifies himself.

The K. not being able to hide his Resentments, calls the Earl Traytor, who thereupon gives him the Lie, with other grosse Language.

Yet the King is fain to be reconciled to him.

[4] Soon after, the King ordered the Earl of Leicester to return into Gascoigny, telling him, That if he was such a Lover of War, he might there find Employment enough, and also a Reward answerable to his Merits, as his Father had done before him; To which the Earl boldly replied, That he would go over and never return, till he had wholly subdued the Enemies, and reduced the Rebellious Subjects of an Ungrateful Prince; and presently made all Preparations possible for his Expedition.

[4] Id. p. 844. The Earl is again sent into Gascoigny.

Anno Dom. MCCLII.

[5] Id. p. 845. As soon as the Earl is gone back, the K. declares the Prince his Son L. of Gascoigny.

[5] But not long after the Earl's departure, the King called to him the Archbishop of Bourdeaux, and all the Gascoignes that came over with him, and were still about London, and declared to them, (though untruly) That his Brother Earl Richard, whom he had formerly made Governour of their Country, neither valued it, nor cared to see it; whereupon he gave them notice, that he had conferred it upon Prince Edward, his Eldest Son.

Which highly rejoices the Gascoignes.

This much rejoiced the Gascoignes, and forthwith all that were present did their Homage, and swore Fealty to him; the King reserving to himself the Supreme Dominion thereof: Then after they had received many Gifts and Presents from Prince Edward, they prepared for their return into Gascoigny, where they found all People very well pleased with their new Governour, and very busie in making Preparations both to receive him, and countermine the Earl of Leicester's Designs, between whom and the Gascoignes there was shortly after a smart Skirmish; wherein the Earl with much difficulty escaped being taken or kill'd, but he was happily relieved by a Knight, who had been a little before taken Prisoner himself; so the Ambush being discovered which they had laid for him, the Earl, by his Assistance, soon gained the Advantage, and having made five of their Principal Men Prisoners, put the rest to flight.

The E. hardly escapes being slain by the Gascoignes.

[1] Id. p. 846. A great Complaint against the Oppression of Foreigners.

[1] This Year there were abundance of Complaints among all sorts of People, both Clerks and Laicks, of the cruel Oppressions and Exactions they suffer'd from Foreigners, but more especially the Poictovins; and when any Man complained he was Injured, and sought remedy by Law, these Poictovins would reply, *What did their Law, Assizes, or Customs of the Kingdom concern them, they valued them not? Which very much vexed the King's Natural Subjects; but above all, when they saw some of the English tread in the same Steps with those Strangers.

[2] Id. p. 849. Almost all the Prelates of England meet the K. at London, where the Pope's Demand of the Tenths of all Ecclesiastical Revenues for Three Years is propos'd to them.

[2] On the Thirteenth of October (being the Feast of St. Edward) all the Prelates of England (except the Bishop of Chester who was infirm, and the Archbishop of Canterbury and Bishop of Hereford, that were beyond Sea, and the Archbishop of York, who was absent for some reason as then unknown) met the King at London, where was propounded to them the Pope's Demand, That the Tenths of the Revenues of the whole Church for Three Years, should be set a-part, and paid towards the defraying the King's Expences in his Journey to the Holy-Land; and this not to be levied according to the old Value of Church-Livings, but according to a new Valuation, and the strictest Inquisition of the King's Collectors or Officers; and the King's Agents then offer'd, That if they would pay down Two Years value according to the Pope's Precept, then that of the Third Year, or at least Half of it (although not granted in the Bull) should by the King's Bounty be remitted; To all which the Bishop of Lincoln answered, That they proceeded upon a supposition which was not granted, namely, That they had consented to this Cursed Contribution; when the Elect of Winchester replied, How can we contradict both the Pope and the King? Especially since the French have consented to the like, since an Act often repeated begets a Custom; with him agreed the Bishops of London, Chichester, and Worcester, as did almost all the rest, only Salisbury fluctuated, and the Bishop of Lincoln still moved,

Which is refused by the Bp. of Lincoln, but agreed to by the Bishop-Elect of Winchester, and some others.

that they ſhould intreat his Majeſty, that for the Health of his Soul he would remit this Severity; which at laſt was agreed to by the major part of them: But when the King heard their Anſwer, he fell into ſuch a Paſſion, that it frighted all about him; yet at length being ſomewhat appeaſed by thoſe that were there preſent, he ſent the Biſhops word, That they did not only oppoſe the Pope and himſelf, but alſo Jeſus Chriſt and the Univerſal Church: To which the Biſhops anſwered, That if the Pope did but truly underſtand how they and all the Kingdom had been impoveriſhed and oppreſſed on every ſide, by the Enlargement of his Foreſts, his Juſtices Itinerant, and divers new-invented Projects, he would not think it ſtrange that they ſhould oppoſe this Contribution; adding thereto many other Aggravations of the King's Injuſtice and Breach of his Coronation-Oath, too long to be here particularly mentioned, for which I refer the curious Reader to the Author himſelf: So when the King with great importunity ſtill urged the payment of it, they anſwered him, That both the Archbiſhops of Canterbury and York were abſent, and they could not do any thing without the Conſent of their Primates.

[3] After which, the King perſiſting in his wonted exorbitant Courſes, ceaſed not to beſtow the vacant Benefices on Strangers, being both ignorant and ſcurrilous Perſons; ſuch as was a certain Poitovin, Chaplain to Geoffry de Luſignan the King's Half-Brother, on whom he beſtowed the rich Benefice of Preſton, though he were but an illiterate Buffoon, and whom our Author has ſeen pelting the King and his Brother Geoffry with Turfs and green Apples, as they walked in the Orchard belonging to St. Albans Abbey; upon which he makes (and that juſtly) a very ſevere Reflection.

[3] Id. p. 850. The K. beſtows his Benefices upon Strangers, being ignoble and ſcurrilous Perſons, of which our Author gives us an Inſtance.

[4] Not long after this, the King being reſolved to try whether he could not have better Succeſs with the Biſhops being aſunder, than when they were together, preſently after the riſing of the late Council, he ſent for the Biſhop of Ely to come to him, and making him a very obliging Speech, he acknowledged the Biſhops great Preſents and Contributions to him on ſeveral Occaſions, yet that now having great need of Money for his Voyage to the Holy Land, he humbly entreated him again to contribute to his Aſſiſtance on ſo preſſing an Occaſion: But all theſe fine Words had no effect on the Biſhop; for he would not by any means be drawn from the General Reſolution of all the reſt of his Brethren; and this rather deterr'd than encouraged the King from undertaking this Expedition, from the late Misfortune of the King of France; but when the King had heard the Biſhop's Anſwer, he was ſo angry, that he bid his Officers turn him out of doors for an Ill-bred Fellow as he was: The King alſo tried ſome of the other Prelates, but he met with no better Succeſs.

[4] Id. p. 858. The K. tries the Biſhops ſingly, and begins with the Bp. of Ely, and moves him for Money towards his intended Voyage for the Holy Land. But when the K. could not prevail upon him, he ordered him to be turned out of doors.

[5] Nor did he come off to much greater Advantage from another Encounter he had not long after with the Widow Counteſs of Arundel, who waited upon the King about her Right to a certain Wardſhip, which he challenged by reaſon of a ſmall Parcel of Land which was held in Capite: But when the Counteſs found by all her Applications ſhe could by no means prevail upon him, ſhe thus boldly accoſted him: My Lord the King, why do you turn your Face from Juſtice? for no body now can obtain any Right in your Courts; You are placed between God and us, but you neither Govern your ſelf nor us, as you ought: Are you not aſhamed, both to oppreſs the Church, and diſquiet the Nobles of your Kingdom? Which when the King heard, he, bending his Brows, ſaid thus to her; What do you mean, Lady Counteſs? Have the Great Men of England given you a Commiſſion to be their Advocate? But ſhe (though a Young Woman) did not anſwer like one; Not ſo, Sir, (ſaid ſhe) the Nobility have not made me any ſuch Charter, though you have broke that which you and your Father have granted, and ſworn inviolably to obſerve, and for which you have ſo often extorted Money from your Subjects: Where are the Liberties of England ſo often reduced into Writing? ſo often granted, and ſo often redeemed? Therefore I (though a Woman) with all your Natural Subjects, do appeal from You to the Tribunal of God, the Great and Terrible Judge, and let him revenge us. At which Anſwer the King being confounded, he held his peace, becauſe his own Conſcience told him ſhe had ſpoke but too much Truth; ſo he only replied, Did not you ask a Favour, becauſe you were my Couſin? To whom ſhe only returned, Since you have denied me my Right, how can I expect any Favour? The King thus reproved, ſaid no more; and the Counteſs went away without taking Leave, as well as without any other Satisfaction than that of having freely ſpoken her Mind.

But though Dr. Brady has (for ſome Reaſons beſt known to himſelf) paſſed by theſe laſt Relations (albeit they are alſo in M. Paris) yet I have not thought fit to do ſo, ſince it not only lays open the Weakneſs of this King's Temper, but the Injuſtice of his Government, whilſt he was managed by ſuch wicked and unjuſt Councellors, which bred all thoſe ill Humours that ſome few Years after broke out againſt them to their Ruin.

[1] Id. p. 852. The K. extorts Money from the Citizens of London, contrary to their ancient Charters. And alſo makes them ſhut up their Shops during St. Edward's Fair.

[1] About the ſame time likewiſe the King extorted from the Citizens of London, by his imperious Commands, Twenty Marks of Gold (which makes Two hundred Marks of Silver) a great Sum in thoſe Days, though according to the Tenour of thoſe Charters and their ancient Liberties, they ought to be free; ſo that they were reduced to almoſt as ſervile a Condition as the very Jews themſelves; nor was he contented with this, but made them ſhut up their Shops Fifteen Days together, and carry their Commodities to St. Edward's Fair, which he had lately ſet up at Weſtminſter (as I have mentioned before) and there to remain all Day in Tents and Booths; and to expoſe themſelves and their Wares to the Rain and Cold (it being preſently after Chriſtmas) though they had few Chapmen for them: Theſe things cauſed great Heart-burnings and Diſcontents among the Citizens, and produced that Averſion which they afterward expreſſed againſt the King and all thoſe that adhered to him.

[2] Id. p. 853. The K. ſummons his Great Men about the Affairs of Gaſcoigny, who all take S. Mentfort's part, which diſpleaſes the King, who had reſolved to have proceeded againſt him as a Traitor.

[2] Soon after, he ſummoned his Great Men to conſult with them about the Affairs of Gaſcoigny; who when they were met, urged on behalf of the Earl of Leiceſter, That the Gaſcoignes were a Treacherous and Rebellious People, as appeared by their baſe treating of the King when he was among them, and by whoſe means he had returned home poor and inglorious; and that they had practiſed Robbery and Depredations on Travellers and Merchants; chants; and that the Earl of Leiceſter had Ten Years, and an half yet to come in his Charter, by which the Government of that Country was committed to him. The King was extreamly diſpleaſed to find his Great Men ſo ready to excuſe the Earl, for he had reſolved to have proceed againſt him as a Traitor: But when the Earl had notice of the King's Deſign, [3] he replied, I am very well ſatisfied that the King would deſtroy me to enrich ſome Provençal or Poictovin with my Earldom. Upon this the Counſel was diſſolved; ſo that the King was alike diſſatisfied with the Secular Great Men, as well as with the Prelates, and therefore thought beſt to ſend for a Legate from Rome, who might force the Clergy by the Pope's Authority to comply with his Demands.

Anno Dom. MCCLII.

[3] Id. p. 854. The K. hereupon reſolves to ſend for the Pope's Legate.

[4] On the Eleventh of November, Albert the Pope's Nuncio came into England to perſwade Earl Richard (who was known to be by far more Wealthy than all the Noblemen of theſe Parts) to accept the Pope's Offer of the Kingdoms of Apulia, Naples, and Sicily, and to expoſe his Perſon, and ſpend his Treaſure in his Service; but the Earl was too wiſe and experienced to hearken to thoſe ſubdolous Propoſals; [5] neither (to be ſure) was the Nuncio unmindful of his own Intereſt, in letting the Prelates know, that he himſelf was the Pope's Favourite, and that Preſents and Benefices would be very grateful and acceptable to him.

[4] Id. p. 856. The Pope ſends a Nuncio to perſwade E. Richard to accept of the Kingdom of Sicily and Naples, which the Earl is too wiſe to accept of.

[1] This Year alſo the Biſhop of Lincoln employed one of his Clerks to take an exact account of the yearly Revenue that Italian and Foreign Clergy-men poſſeſſed in England, and it was found to amount to above Seventy thouſand Marks per Annum, when the King's bare Revenue at the ſame time ſcarce reached one Third part of that Sum: From whence we may obſerve, how poor a thing the ordinary Revenues of the Crown were in thoſe times, being not ſo great as ſome Noblemens Eſtates in England are at this day.

[1] Id. ib. The Bp. of Lincoln takes an exact account of the yearly Revenues of the Italians in England, and finds they amount to 70000 Marks.

[2] To this Relation I may likewiſe add what is mentioned in the ſame place, and which will ſufficiently ſhew the great Riches and Luxury of Clergy-men in that Age; for John Manſel Clerk, who was at that time the King's Principal Councellor, enjoyed no leſs than Seven hundred Eccleſiaſtical Preferments at once; ſo that his Revenues amounted to Four thouſand Marks per Annum, an Income then ſufficient for the greateſt Prelates; wherefore our Author juſtly wonders, how any wiſe or good Man would ever burthen his Conſcience with the Care of ſo many Souls; and therefore much ſuſpects his deſerving either of thoſe Characters: And he alſo well obſerves, That divers Men know a great many things, but in the mean time are ignorant of themſelves and their own Duty.

[2] Id. ib. The Prodigious number of Benefices enjoyed by John Manſel.

[3] This being the Seven and thirtieth of King Henry's Reign, he kept his Chriſtmas at Wincheſter, where though the Citizens preſented him with a large Preſent of Proviſions even to Admiration, yet in requital of their Kindneſs, he obliged them in a ſhort time after to pay him Two hundred Marks, which made them paſs their Chriſtmas as heavily as the King did his merrily, he being not at all concerned at their Complaints.

[3] Id. p. 860. The K. keeps his Chriſtmas at Wincheſter, where tho' the Citizens make him large Preſents of Proviſions, yet for all that he extorts Money from them.

Yet

Anno Dom. MCCLIII.

Yet he did a greater Act of Violence and Injuſtice a little while after: [4] For having agreed to marry his Niece, the Daughter of the Earl of Engoleſme, to the Son and Heir of Richard Earl of Gloceſter, in conſideration of a Portion of Five thouſand Marks which the King obliged himſelf to pay; but not having the Money ready, he commanded the Abbots of St. Albans, Reading, and Waltham, to give Security on his behalf to the Earl of Gloceſter, for the ſaid Sum, which they utterly refuſed; for who could force the King to repay them, if he had no mind to it? Wherefore he then importun'd the Knights-Templars and Hoſpitallers to be bound for the Payment of that Money; but they refuſing likewiſe, He threaten'd them moſt terribly, and to be revenged of them, turned out Friar Roger, one of their Brethren, from his Office of Almoner, and alſo watched for an Opportunity how to be farther revenged upon them. This is one of the many Abuſes that Dr. Brady ſlyly paſſes over; as he does alſo what is mentioned in the very next [5] Page, concerning the King's forcing the Citizens of London to pay a Contribution of One thouſand Marks the Lent following.

[4] Id. p. 862. A greater Inſtance of the K's Injuſtice, in his dealing with certain Abbots.

[1] Simon Montfort, Earl of Leiceſter, having this Year reſigned his Charter or Patent of the Government or Stewardſhip of Gaſcoigny, which he had obtained of the King for Five Years, upon his buying him out of the Remainder of his Term, (which was Three Years) and giving him Security for the Money; the King thereupon conferr'd that Government upon his Son Prince Edward, as you have already heard; but ſo ſoon as Alphonſo, King of Caſtile, found the Earl of Leiceſter had quitted his Charge of that Province, and that it was left to the Government of a Youth, he pretended a Grant of that Country from King Henry the Second, confirm'd by Richard the Firſt, and King John; whereupon Gaſton de Bearn, and ſeveral others of the Nobility of Gaſcoigny, revolted from King Henry, and joined themſelves to Alphonſo's Party; but the Citizens of Bourdeaux, who continued Faithful to the King of England, gave him notice of it, and that unleſs he ſent them a quick and powerful Aſſiſtance, he would loſe the whole Country: Whereupon, the King was troubled that he had removed Montfort, who was now gone into France, where he had the offer made to him of being High-Steward of that Kingdom; but he generouſly refuſed it.

[1] Id. ib. The K having beſtow'd the Government of Gaſcigny upon Pr. Edward, the K. of Caſtile challenges it as his own.

Whereupon, many of the Nobility of that Countrey revolt from K. Henry.

[2] In Lent many freſh reports came from Gaſcoigny, as that Reole-Caſtle, and ſeveral other Places, were taken from the Engliſh; the King was ſtartled at this News, and cauſed Proclamation to be made, and ſent his Writs into every County, that all Men ſhould be Armed and Muſtered, according to antient Cuſtom, and that Watch ſhould be kept in Cities and Towns. But about the middle of April, the Gaſcoign Nobility finding themſelves freed from the Government of Simon Montfort, fell foul upon one another, invaded each others Caſtles, took Priſoners on both ſides, and burnt and waſted each others Houſes and Lands.

[2] Id. p. 864 The Gaſcoigners fall together by the Ears.

[3] The King having incurr'd the ill Will, and indeed Curſes of his People, by taking extraordinary ways to raiſe Money contrary to Law, (in ſuch a violent and illegal manner as is mentioned by our Author) yet ſtill wanted a very large Sum for his intended Expedition to the Holy-Land; whereupon he called a Parliament to [3] Id. p. 865. The K. being ſtill in want of Money, is at laſt forced to call a Parliament, where he demands a great Sum.

to conſult about the difficult Affairs of the Kingdom; and Fifteen days after Eaſter the whole Nobility meeting accordingly, he demanded a very great Sum of Money from them; but after many Arguments and Debates about it, [4] the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, the Biſhops of Carliſle, Salisbury, and Ethelmar the Elect of Wincheſter, were ſent to the King by the Biſhops and all the Prelates, to perſuade and induce him (as he had often promiſed upon Oath) to permit Holy Church to enjoy all her Liberties, eſpecially thoſe concerning Elections, in which (as they ſaid) Eccleſiaſtick Liberty chiefly conſiſts; and if he would correct this Error, and thoſe concerning the other Liberties contained in Magna Charta, they would do their utmoſt to ſatisfie his deſires. Whereupon, the King freely confeſs'd his Failings, and how he was ſorry he had ever done ſo, and that they ſhould be corrected for the future; then making a ſmart Speech to theſe Biſhops, ſetting forth how he had advanced them (though unworthy) to thoſe high Dignities they enjoy'd, before many other Grave and Learned Divines, he therefore adviſed them, (as they valued their Salvation) to lay down thoſe Spiritual Charges which they had by his Prerogative unjuſtly acquir'd; and then he himſelf, being reformed by their Example, would for the future take care to prefer none but ſuch as ſhould be worthy; they being thus ſharply, yet civilly reproved, had nothing to reply, but that they came not to rip up what was paſt, but to mind him what he ought to do for the future.

Anno Dom. MCCLIII.

[4] Id. p. 866. Whereupon, the Prelates require a Reſtoration of the Privileges of the Church in Elections.

The K. confeſſes his Failings, and makes a ſharp Reflection upon them.

[5] Then, after Fifteen days debate about this and other Things, they came to this Unanimous Reſolution, That the King's Intentions of taking upon him the Cruſade, were very Pious, and they ſhould not want their due Effect; yet that the State of the Church or Kingdom might not receive any Detriment thereby, the Clergy therefore granted him the Tenth of all Church-Revenues for Three Years, for the Relief of the Holy-Land againſt the Enemies of God, to be diſburſed by the overſight of the Great Men; and the Knights or Military-Men alſo gave him for that Year Three Marks of every Knight's Fee, in Conſideration of which, the King promiſed bona fide, and without fraud, to obſerve the Great Charter, and every Article therein contain'd, which is the ſame that his Father King John had ſworn to keep many Years before; and which he in like manner had ſworn to at his Coronation.

[5] Id. ib. At laſt the Clergy agree to grant the K. a Tenth of their Revenues for Three Years.

And the Military Men Three Marks upon each Knight's Fee; for which the K. promiſes ſtrictly to obſerve the great Charter.

[1] After this, on the Third day of May, in the Great Hall of the Palace of Weſtminſter, all thoſe that Oppoſed, Violated, Diminiſhed, or Changed the Liberties and Cuſtoms of the Kingdom, (eſpecially thoſe contained in the Great Charter of Liberties and Foreſts) were ſolemnly Excommunicated and Anathematized with Bell, Book, and Candle, by Boniface Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and the reſt of the Biſhops, being in their Pontificalibus; and this was done in the Preſence, and by the Aſſent of the King, Richard Earl of Cornwall, his Brother, the Earl of Norfolk, Mareſchal of England, the Earl of Hereford, the Earl of Oxford, the Earl of Warwick, and other Chief Men of the Kingdom; the Archbiſhops and Biſhops holding Lighted Candles in their Hands: The King in the mean while laying his Hand on his Breaſt, ſaid, after all this was perform'd, So may GOD help me, as I inviolably obſerve all theſe things; But

But he refuſed to hold a Taper, becauſe he was no Prieſt, ſaying, His Heart was a greater Teſtimony. [2] Then alſo the Original Charter which King John had granted was produced, and read before them all, which the King having Regranted and Confirmed, they put out their Candles, and threw them down ſmoaking upon the Ground, and every One wiſhed, That ſuch as deſerved that Sentence, might ſo Stink and Smoke in Hell.

[2] Id. ib.

[3] Id. ib. As ſoon as the Council is diſſolved, the K. deviſes how to break them.

[3] The Council was no ſooner Diſſolved, but the King (who commonly followed the worſt Advice) contrived, how he might break through all thoſe Things he had ſo lately granted; it being told him by ſome about him, That if he obſerved thoſe Charters, he would not be King, nor abſolute Lord of England; and his Father King John had ſhewed him this, who choſe rather to die than to be trampled upon by his Subjects; and theſe wicked Councellors farther whiſper'd in his Ear, That he need not fear the Cenſure of Excommunication, ſince for Two or Three hundred Marks, the Pope would abſolve him of his Oath, by the Plenitude of his Power; and he might farther obtain another Tenth of the Clergy by the Pope's Authority, if the King would but allow him a ſhare out of it, or perhaps enlarge the Payment of it for a Year or two; all which pernicious Councils were put in Practice, as the following Hiſtory will ſhew. But this (tho' omitted by Dr. Brady) deſerves to be taken notice of, ſince it was the Cauſe of all thoſe dreadful Wars and Combuſtions, that ſome Years after enſued.

[4] Id. ib. The Citizens of Bourdeaux ſend to the K. to come and ſave Gaſcoigny, then in Rebellion.

[4] About the ſame time, the Citizens of Bourdeaux acquainted the King, That if he came not over preſently into Gaſcoigny, he would loſe the whole Country, which, upon the Departure of Simon Montfort, was now fallen into Rebellion; wherefore the King ſent them word, That he would ſpeedily come over to them in Perſon with a conſiderable Force: Upon which, about the Firſt of June, he ſummoned all his Military-Tenants to be ready with their Horſes and Arms at Portſmouth, Eight days after Trinity-Sunday, to paſs the Seas with him, when he took up a Thouſand of Engliſh and Foreign Merchant Ships; but he lay there Wind-bound above a Month, to his great Expence, as well as Prejudice of his Affairs beyond Sea; at laſt, having before appointed his Queen and Brother Richard to Govern the Nation in his Abſence, and left his Son Edward under their Care, he ſet ſail with a fair Wind, and on the Fifteenth of Auguſt arrived at Bourdeaux, and preſently commanded Reole-Caſtle to be Beſieged; ſo that by the end of Summer the King had recovered all his Caſtles in Gaſcoigny, either by Force or Compoſition; the Beſieged often ſending to the King of Spain for Relief, but never receiving any: Yet the King, not daring to rely upon the Fidelity of the Gaſcoignes, and ſuſpecting that they might Revolt to the King of Spain, ſent the Biſhop of Bath, and John Manſel, his ſpecial Chaplains, Ambaſſadors, to deſire his Friendſhip, and that he would conſent to Marry his Siſter to his Son and Heir Prince Edward, on whom he had lately beſtowed Gaſcoigny: Theſe Ambaſſadors ſo well diſpatch'd this Affair, that they not only concluded that Match, but alſo made a League with the King of Caſtile, and brought back a *Charter ſealed with a Golden Seal; by which he released to King Henry whatever Right he had, or could have in that Countrey, by the Grant of Henry the Second, Richard the First, or King John; then upon John Mansel's assuring his Master of the King of Castiles Sincerity, he some time after sent for his Son, Prince Edward, to come over to him, in order to send him thither to consummate the Marriage; yet this Match and League were kept conceal'd from the Great Men of England, as you will find by and by. Anno Dom. MCCLIII.

[5] In the mean while, the Earl of Leicester came with some Troops of his own, and offer'd his Service to the King; which when the Rebellious Gascoignes understood, they dreading the Earl's great Courage, and also hearing that the King of Castile had made Peace with King Henry, by degrees return'd to their Allegiance; yet the King continued all this Winter in France. [5] Id. p. 879. Upon which the Gascoignes return to their Allegiance.

As for Ecclesiastical Affairs, this Year affords little, [1] only Robert Grosstead, Bishop of Lincoln, having received a Letter of Brief from Pope Innocent, commanding him (as he had often done several other Prelates of England) to do somewhat that he thought Unjust and against Reason, He wrote to him a long Epistle, (which you will find in our Author at large) wherein, though he professes all due Obedience to the Apostolical Commands, yet he is utterly against such as wholly contradict all those Precepts, since they can be no other, than what are consonant and agreeable to the Doctrine of our Lord Jesus Christ, and his Apostles; Then he taxes the Clause of Non-obstante in the Pope's Bull, as a Cause of many great Evils in the Church, (which he there reckons up) and afterwards proceeds to reprove his bestowing of Benefices on such as (contrary to Christ's Institution) take no care of the Flock committed to their Charge; all which Abuses, though contain'd in the Pope's Letter, yet out of that Fidelity and Obedience, which he ow'd to the Apostolical See, and that Union which it holds with Christ's Mystical Body, he cannot obey, but must contradict and oppose, as being directly contrary to the Catholick Faith, and the Sanctity of the Church of Rome; and for which refusal his Holiness ought not to punish him, because, such a Contradiction is no Rebellion, but part of that honour which is due to the Divine Commands, and the truest Respect that could be shewed to himself; and therefore briefly minds him, That the Apostolical See can act only for the Edification and not the Destruction of the Church; whereas those Provisions (that were then sent him) tended to the quite contrary ends: In all which, the Bishop very well distinguishes between the right Use and Abuse of Ecclesiastical Authority, making only the former to be Obligatory, and thereby wholly destroying the Modern Doctrine of a blind Obedience, without Reserve, to all the Pope's Commands, as Infallible. [1] Id. p. 880. The Bp. of Lincoln having received an unreasonable Letter from the Pope, returns him another, full of sharp Reflections. Non-obstante.

When the Pope had received these Letters, he fell into a great Passion, calling the Bishop an old, rash, doting Fellow, threatning to ruine him, and to command the King of England, his Vassal, to clap him up in Prison: But it seems one Giles, a Spanish Cardinal, and others, mitigated his Holiness's Wrath, telling him, That he ought not to decree any thing against the Bishop, since they could not deny what he had said to be true, nor could they condemn him, being Anno Dom. MCCLIII. being much more Learned and Holy than themſelves; and that if he ſtirred farther in it, this Letter, when it came to be generally known, would excite many more againſt him: Therefore the Pope thought it better to connive at and diſſemble his Reſentments againſt the Biſhop, leſt he might raiſe a Tumult which he could not eaſily appeaſe.

This I have thought fit to mention, that ſo the Reader may obſerve there were even in that Age ſome Biſhops (though but few) who were not only ſenſible of, but declared againſt the Abuſes then practiſed in the Roman Church, and that to the Pope himſelf, who was indeed the Author of them; but this good Biſhop died not long after.

Anno Dom. MCCLIV. [2] This Year, the King keeping his Chriſtmas in Gaſcoigny, on the Seven and Twentieth of January almoſt all the Great Men of England were ſummoned to Parliament, where appeared on behalf of the King, his Commiſſioners who were newly return'd from Gaſcoigny, viz. Roger Bigot, Earl-Mareſchal, and Gilbert de Segrave, and declared his deſires to the whole Body of England; there were alſo preſent Richard Earl of Cornwall, and the Queen, with all the Biſhops, except thoſe that were then with the King: The Meſſage delivered in this Meeting from him, was, That he had been deceived in the King of Spain, whom inſtead of a Friend, he had found a cruel Enemy, and therefore now required a powerful Aſſiſtance from them. What was done upon this Meſſage, beſt appears by the Queen's and Earl Richard's Letters to the King, to be found in the [3] Additaments of Matt. Paris, to this Effect;

The Sum of the Queen's and Earl Richard's long Letter to the King.

'That they had received his Majeſty's Letters at Chriſtmas, and 'had according to his Commands ſummoned the Archbiſhops, Biſhops, Earls and Barons of the Kingdom, on the Morrow after the 'Feaſt of St. Hilary, acquainting them with the State of his Affairs, 'That the King of Caſtile was coming againſt him into Gaſcoigny; but 'ſince the ſhortneſs of the time would not permit the ſaid Great 'Men to meet at that Day, they had ſummoned them to Weſtminſter Fifteen days after that Feaſt, (i.e. the Seven and Twentieth of 'January) and that the Earls and Barons, after they had heard the 'Cauſe of their Meeting, offered to be ready at London three Weeks 'after Eaſter, to march from thence to Portſmouth, and there Embark 'themſelves to relieve Gaſcoigny, in caſe the King of Caſtile ſhould 'invade that Countrey; That the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, the Biſhop Elect of Wincheſter, with the Biſhops of London and Worceſter, 'all promiſed they would come over to him with a good Strength; 'That the other Biſhops and Abbots had likewiſe promiſed a large 'ſupply in Money: And Earl Richard further ſignified to him in 'the ſame Letter, That he would not fail him of a Supply anſwerable to his Neceſſities and his own Honour, if the King of Caſtile 'ſhould arm againſt him; and that he would leave the Kingdom 'in good hands, by advice of the Queen, and bring her and the 'Prince over with him. [4] Yet for all this they did not believe the King of Caſtile had any ſuch deſign; and ſo the Council was diſſolved without any great effect.

[4] Id. p. 882.

Then

[5] Then Fifteen Days after Easter, the Great Men were ſummoned again to London, where the King upon the ſame Reaſons made the ſame Demands, and received the ſame Anſwer; for then their ſuſpicions, that the King of Caſtile had no ſuch Deſign againſt King Henry, but on the contrary, that a Peace was concluded between them, were confirmed by Simon Earl of Leiceſter, who was newly returned from beyond Sea: Thus this politick Deſign of the Court to get Money being diſcovered, the Great Men of the Kingdom eaſily avoided the Traps that were laid for them; and ſo departed in great Indignation, without giving the King any Aſſiſtance. Anno Dom. MCCLIV.

[5] Id. p. 857. The Great Men are again ſummoned to London, but refuſe to give the K. any Aid, with the Reaſon thereof.

[1] About the ſame time the King being reſolved to have Money by one means or other, fell upon the poor Jews ſo violently, that they grew weary of their Lives; for Earl Richard now required from them ſo great a Sum, under pain of Death or Impriſonment, that Elias, their Chief Rabbi or Elder, plainly told him and the Lords then preſent, That ſince they found the King was reſolved entirely to ruine them, and had favoured the Pope's Uſurers againſt them, and ſuffered them to get what they pleaſed to their great Impoveriſhment, and ſince the King required more than they had, they therefore deſired leave to depart the Kingdom; but though the Governours ſqueezed them almoſt to the utmoſt Farthing, yet would they not let them go.

[1] Id. ib. The K. to get Money unmercifully ſqueezes the Jews.

[2] About the end of May, the Queen (notwithſtanding ſhe had lately received the King's Commands to the contrary) with her Two Sons, Prince Edward and Edmund, and her Unkle the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, took ſhipping at Portſmouth and arrived at Bourdeaux the laſt of the ſame Month; [3] and not long after their landing, Prince Edward was ſent in great State to Alphonſe King of Caſtile, where having married his Siſter Eleanor at the City of Burgos, he was by that King Honourably ſent back to his Father, together with his Bride: Upon his arrival, King Henry ſettled upon him and the Princeſs his Wife all Guſcoigny, Ireland, Wales, with the City and Towns of Briſtol, Stamford, and Grantham; and from that time the King began to prepare for his Return into England, when upon ſtating the Accounts it appeared that his Expences in thoſe Expeditions amounted to Twenty thouſand and ſeven hundred Pounds and more, beſides the Lands, Wardſhips, and Rents he had given to Strangers, and moreover Thirty thouſand Marks he had beſtowed, and expended upon his Poictovin Half-Brothers; but which was ſtill worſt of all, our Author here relates, that it was all to little or no purpoſe, for that when the King was told of this great Expence by one about him, he replied, Oh, for the Head of God ſay no more of it, leſt the very Relation make Men wonder and ſtand amazed!

this News the Pope ſent private Nuncio's to King Henry, and offered him that Kingdom for his Son Edmund: Upon this the King was very forward to embrace the ſeeming Favour, and received it with much Satisfaction; and to make way for him, Pope Innocent the Fourth had lately accuſed Conrade Son of the Emperor Frederick the Rightful King, of Hereſie, Murther, and other great Crimes; to all which Accuſations [5] he gave a very clear Anſwer, yet died not long after to the great Joy of the Pope, who preſently ſubdued almoſt all Apulia: but both the Sicilian and Apulian Nobility, rather than be under his Government, ſet up Manfred an Illegitimate Son of the late King Frederick, and did Homage and ſwore Allegiance to him.

[1] Yet could not all this obtain his Favour; for a certain Clerk being accused of murthering an outlandish Prior (who pretended to be related to the Queen) was clapt into Newgate, from whence a little after he made his escape; whereupon the City was prosecuted for its neglect; and though the Citizens pleaded that the Prisoner was not properly theirs, but the Bishop of London's, who had seized him as a Clerk, and kept him there in Prison, because he had no Gaol of his own, and they were the Bishop's Servants that suffered him to escape; yet all this signified nothing, for the City was amerced in no less than Three thousand Marks; and though they alledged their Charters and their Loyalty to the King, yet they were forced to pay dearly for this supposed Offence; nay, the King being incensed that they did not presently pay it down, commanded some of the Chief Citizens to be seized, and clapt into Prison; and in Lent following he demanded from the Jews no less than Eighteen thousand Marks upon pain of Death, which when they heard, they pleaded their Poverty, and desired Leave to depart the Kingdom; but the King pleaded his own Poverty and great Debts, which amounted to more than One hundred and fifty thousand Marks: After this, he sold or assigned over the Jews to his Brother Earl Richard; but notwithstanding he made great Advantage of them, yet he used them mercifully in comparison of the King.

The Jews desire leave to depart the Kingdom; but the K. assigned 'em over to his Brother Earl Richard.

[2] About the same time, viz. Fifteen days after Easter, all the Nobility of England, as well Ecclesiasticks as Seculars, met at London, so that there had not been seen for a long time before such a numerous Assembly; then the King acquainted them with his great Debts, and let them know that without their Assistance he could not discharge them, and therefore earnestly requested an Aid sufficient for that purpose: Whereupon they grew querulous, ripping up the old Grievances of how much Money they had paid for the Confirmation of their Charters, which had been so often sworn to by the King. Wherefore to pacifie them, he immediately caused these Charters to be proclaimed a-new in all Counties; but yet for all that, he did not himself strictly observe them. Then they demanded that the Justitiary, Chancellor, and Treasurer might be chosen by the Common Council of the Kingdom, as it had been anciently used and accustomed; and likewise that they might not, unless upon some notorious Fault, be removed, without the said Common Consent; which the King not granting, they [3] unanimously declared that the Business should be deferred till Michaelmas following; and thus the Council broke up.

As to Foreign Affairs, [4] this Summer the new Pope, Alexander the Fourth, followed the Steps of his Predecessor Innocent lately deceased, in prosecuting the War in Sicily and Apulia; and therefore sent Cardinal Octavian his General with an Army of 60000 Men to destroy the City of Nocera, and King Manfred that was then in it; who upon their approach, marched with a great Body of Men out against them, and utterly defeated Octavian and the remainder of the Pope's Army, Army, moſt of which were ſent away before, through the Treachery of the General.

The News of this Defeat put the Pope into great Confuſion, becauſe he had promiſed Sicily and Apulia to the King of England, who (as the Writers of this time report) had paid this Army for the uſe of his Son Edmund, to whom the Pope had ſent a Ring of Inveſtiture by the Biſhop of Bononia, then upon his Journey towards England: And here our Author (and that juſtly enough) falls into a great Exclamation againſt the Ambition and Covetouſneſs of the Roman See.

The Pope had ſent Edmund the K.'s Son a Ring in token of his Inveſtiture of Sicily.

Upon their arrival Robert de Roſs withdrew himſelf, but afterwards appeared, and with John Baliol ſubmitted to a Fine for their Miſcarriages: Then the King and Queen came together again, and being put into ſuch a Condition as they liked, King Henry took his Leave of them, and returned into England.

[1] About this time Peter Equeblanch Biſhop of Hereford (a Foreigner) obſerving the King uneaſie, by reaſon of his great want of Money, found out a new, but knaviſh Invention for a Supply, with which he acquainted him; and then by his Order went to Rome toward the end of Summer (having Robert Walleran a Knight joined in Commiſſion with him) to perfect this Project, where he found the Pope very Melancholy for the great Debts he had contracted, which yet he ſaid the King of England was obliged to diſcharge under the pain of being Diſinherited and turned out of his Kingdom: The Biſhop obſerving the ill Poſture of the Pope's Affairs, comforted him with a Way he had found out to help him; and by the Aſſiſtance of ſome Cardinals (whoſe Advice he followed to bring about the Deſigns of his Predeceſſor) the Biſhop obtained from him what he pleaſed. Now his Project was, to produce certain forged Obligations under the Seals of as many Biſhops, Abbots, and Priors, as he pleaſed, in the Sum of Five, Six, or Seven hundred Marks a-piece, or more [2] to this or that Sienna or Florentine Merchant (or Uſurer) as if it were for Money really borrowed of them, and expended at Rome about the Affairs of their particular Churches; which Cheat was alſo confirmed by the Pope's Breve to the ſaid Biſhop (who took upon him as Agent for the Biſhops and Abbots) as is to be ſeen in our Author at large. This Grievance, Matth. Paris tells us, exceeded all that ever went before it, and afterwards involved many Prelates in great Loſſes and Troubles, as in due time ſhall be declared.

[5] About this time alſo Pope Alexander ſent Mr. Ruſtand, a Gaſcoign and Canon-Lawyer, and one of his Sub-Deacons, into England, giving him, the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and the Biſhop of Hereford, Power to gather a Tenth in England and Ireland, to the uſe of the Pope or King, indifferently, Notwithſtanding any former Bulls or Indulgences, in any Town, or for what cauſe ſoever granted to the contrary: He alſo gave them Power to abſolve the King from his Vow of undertaking the Expedition into the Holy Land; provided that he would make another into Apulia, againſt Manfred, a profeſſed Enemy to the Church of Rome. To this the King ſhould be ſworn by the Biſhop of Bononia; and the better to draw him on, the Pope gave him all the Moneys in England, which were to be collected toward the Maintenance of the intended Expedition to the Holy Land. Thus did not the Pope at that time ſtick at any thing (right or wrong) that might advance his own Intereſt and Grandeur.

[1] Upon the Feaſt of St. Luke (or Eighteenth of October) almoſt all the Great Men of England met at Weſtminſter in Parliament, where the King earneſtly preſſed his Brother, Earl Richard, for ſome Supply of Money, to whom the Pope alſo wrote, deſiring him to lend his Brother Forty thouſand (whether Marks or Pounds is uncertain) that he might ſhew a good Example to others; but this Politick Earl was not to be prevailed upon, either by the Intreaties of the Pope, or the Importunities of the King, becauſe he had undertaken this Apulian Expedition without his Advice, being wheedled into it by the ſly Inſinuations of the crafty Italians, and againſt the Aſſent of the Baronage of the Kingdom, divers of whom being moved about the ſame matter, replied, That they had not been all ſummoned according to the Tenour of the Great Charter; and there they would then make no Anſwer, nor grant any Aid without their other Peers, who were abſent; ſo this Parliament, after many needleſs Delays, was continued a Month longer, while the Great Men emptied their Purſes at London; and then returned home without doing any thing conſiderable.

[2] Dr. P's Chron. A great Quarrel among the Princes of Wales, and on what occasion.

[2] This Year affords little of Foreign Affairs, only there arose a great Quarrel between the Princes of Wales; for Owen, the Elder Brother, could not be content with half the Principality, but got his Younger Brother David to join with him, and they two levied a great Army, with a design to disinherit Llewellyn; but he with his Men met them in the Field, and after a long and sharp Fight gave them an entire Defeat, took both of them Prisoners, and then seized all their Lands, enjoying alone the whole Principality of Wales.

[3] M. P. p. 912. A barbarous Action of the Jews at Lincoln, who Crucify'd a Boy.

Before I conclude this Year, I cannot omit a barbarous piece of Cruelty related by our [3] Author, concerning the Jews, which does in great part justifie the Government's severe treatment of them, provided it were true, as perhaps there may be too much grounds to believe it: He relates that about the end of June, the Jews at Lincoln stole a little Boy, named Hugh, of about Eight Years of Age, and after they had kept him up for some time, they in reproach to our Saviour Crucified him in a great Assembly of theirs from all Parts of England, having first tormented, and done all those opprobrious things to him, that we read were done to Jesus Christ himself, and that when he was dead, they flung the Body into a Well, where the Mother of the Child (going into a Jew's House to search for him) discovered him by chance; whereupon the Jew that own'd the House being taken, confessed the whole Matter, and further, That almost every Year they did Sacrifice a Child in like manner; This being discovered to John de Lexington, a Discreet and Learned Man in the Laws, he promised the Jew his Life to make it out; but when the King heard of it, he was very much displeased at it, and would not give him his Pardon; so that not only the Discoverer, but also near an Hundred other Jews were condemned, (as they well deserved) for having a Hand in so barbarous a Murther, though most of them were afterward pardoned by the Intercession of the Friers Minors.

And Sewal succeeds him.

As [4] for Ecclesiastical Affairs, there happened none this Year, but what have been already mentioned, except the Death of Walter de Gray, Archbishop of York, a Person of great Prudence and Integrity; he held the See near Forty Years, and was succeeded by one Sewal, Dean of that Church, a modest and pious Person, tho' he sate in it but a short time.

[5] Id. p. 918. The Author's Representation of the sad Condition of the Church in those Times.

[5] Our Author concludes this Year with an Account of the sad State of the Church of England during these Times, when the Pope and the King combining together, and dividing the Spoil, peel'd the poor Clergy at their Pleasure, none daring upon pain of Excommunication to oppose them: In the mean time, the King stood obliged to the Pope in near Two hundred thousand Marks, and the Bishops and other Prelates in Fifty thousand, though without their own Knowledge or Consent. Matt. Paris here also sets forth the horrid Abuses and Grievances, that then abounded both in Church and State, in these Words: 'The Sacred Privileges of Churches 'now signifie nothing, and though the Pope hath a Power only for 'Edification, and not for Destruction, (as Robert Bishop of Lincoln 'has observed) yet the Tax upon the Clergy, which was granted at first but for Three is now changed into Five Years, and formerly Laymen paid Tythes to the Clergy; but now even the Prelates were compell'd to pay Tenths to the Layety; an Aid was granted in succour of the Holy-Land, and (we the Clergy) are compell'd to pay it, to fight against the Christians in Apulia; a Tenth was also granted by us to the King for the observation of the Great Charter, which notwithstanding is not kept; besides many other Grievances then done to the Clergy and Church of England, by the Pope's means, though with the Privity and Connivance of the King himself, too long to be here repeated: Which though omitted by Dr. Brady, yet we may from hence observe the sad Condition of the People, where the Prince, instead of defending them, gives them up for a Prey to a Foreign Power.

This being the Fortieth Year of the King's Reign, [1] he kept his Christmas at Winchester, where his Half-Brother, the Bishop Elect of that City, entertained him at his own Charges; but when the King would have interceded with him for the Monks of that Church, whom he then cruelly oppressed, all the Answer he could get of him, was, That so long as he had any Money, he would not stick to bestow it at Rome, till he had got his Will of these Obstinate and Stubborn Monks.

Anno Dom. MCCLVI

[1] Id. p. 919. The K. keeps his Christmas with his Brother the Bp. Elect of Winchester, but yet can obtain no favour for the Monks of that Church.

[2] There were at this time likewise, great Complaints made by the Merchants of Gascoigny, against the King's Officers for taking away their Wines without paying for it; and Prince Edward (on whom that Countrey was now settled) declaring he would no longer suffer such Abuses, the King was very angry at it, and said, The Days of King Henry the Second were returned, when the Sons Rebelled against their Fathers; yet at last, taking better Advice, he passed it over, and promised to make Satisfaction for those Injuries; however, the Prince looked to himself, and encreasing his Retinue, rid abroad with Two hundred Horse, as his Garde du Corps in his Train.

[2] Id. ib. Great complaints of the Merchants of Gascoigny, and Pr. Edward himself declares against it. Upon which the King is highly incensed.

[4] On the Feast of St. Hilary, the Bishops and Archdeacons met again at London, where they were much pressed to give an Answer to Master Rustand the Pope's Nuncio, (or rather the King's Agent) to whom, upon his urging that all Churches belonged to the Pope, Master Leonard, (already mentioned) as Deputy or Prolocutor for the whole Clergy, return'd this Wise and Modest Reply, 'That 'they did so indeed, but it was on this Account only, that he 'should defend them, and not appropriate them to his own Use, 'and that this was the Intention of their Founders, according as 'we say also, when we affirm, That all things are the King's; yet 'we still mean it is to Protect, and not to waste and destroy them;' which Answer the Nuncio being very much nettled, he bid every one ſpeak for himſelf, that the Pope might thereby know, as well as the King, who were for, and who againſt them in this Affair; at which they were all of them ſo aſtoniſhed, that they knew not what to anſwer, for it now appeared very plainly, that the Pope and the King had combin'd together to undo the Clergy, and therefore they appeal'd againſt theſe Demands.

[5] Id. ib. Yet the Nuncio would take no notice of it but falſly writ to the P. That the Prelates had own'd the Receipt of great Sums from Italian Merchants.

[5] Notwithſtanding all which, Maſter Ruſtand would not alter one tittle of what he had written in his Letter to the Pope, wherein was inſerted, That the Prelates had owned, they had received no ſmall Quantity of the aforeſaid Money from the Italian Merchants, which was known to all there to be falſe; and they affirmed, (not without reaſon) that it was better for them to ſuffer with St. Thomas the Martyr, (viz. Thomas Becket) than to endure his Oppreſſion any longer; but when the Nuncio ſaw how heinouſly all there took this Uſage, he became more moderate in his Temper, and diſſembling what he had done, only ſaid, That he would ſpeak further with the Pope about this Affair: However, they would not truſt him, but immediately diſpatched away the Dean of St. Pauls, and ſome others, to Rome, on the behalf of the Clergy, for they fear'd to be born-down by two ſuch Potent Adverſaries as the Pope and the King; and they were likewiſe afraid, that this being drawn into Example, might tend very much to the Prejudice of the Church of England.

[1] Id. ib. The Clergy agree that the Clauſe in Mag. Chart. which contained the freedom of Eccleſiaſtical Elections, ſhould be laid before the P.

[1] It was alſo about the ſame time agreed by the Clergy, That that Clauſe of King John's Magna Charta, which concern'd the Freedom of Election of Churches, and had been then confirm'd by Pope Innocent, ſhould be now carried to Rome, but to what end ſerves all this [2] ſays our Author, when Whiſperers and Flatterers of Great Men pervert all things, and put a wrong Interpretation upon them? And all the Anſwer they can receive from the Pope and his Cardinals, is, That we muſt not in theſe times offend Princes; adding withall, That they muſt now diſſemble and paſs by many things; and ſo, by reaſon of this pretended Fear, Juſtice is ſeen very much to fail in that Court.

[2] Id. p. 921.

I have been the more Particular in relating all theſe Proceedings with the Clergy, as alſo our Author's Reflections upon them, that ſo the Reader may obſerve the great Corruption of the Court of Rome in thoſe Times; as alſo the ſlaviſh Subjection which the Clergy and People of England were then forced to undergo; and I hope they will not ſeem tedious, though Dr. Brady has thought fit to omit them.

Item, The Incurſions of the Welſh.

Item, The Diminution of the Power of England, in Council, Money, and Men, which was like to happen by Richard Earl of Cornwall's ſudden leaving of it.

Item, The King of France, and the Great Men of the Neighbouring Nations, eſpecially ſuch as heretofore had Lands in England, would be encouraged to make attempts upon it, when, to carry on this Deſign upon Sicily, England was emptied of Men, Arms, Counſel, and Money.

Anno Dom. MCCLVI.

Item, We cannot, nor ought to agree, That the King take upon him the Burthen of this Expedition, leſt he may ſeem to have delivered himſelf into the hands of his Enemies by our conſent; neither can nor will we undertake the Burthen of the ſaid Affair with the King, for the Reaſons aforeſaid, and for the great Hazard and vaſt Expences, which we can never bear or overcome.

Laſtly, For the difficult and grievous Conditions impoſed upon the King, by his acceptance and firſt undertaking of this Buſineſs, by reaſon whereof, after infinite Charge and Labour he may eaſily be laid aſide, or loſe the Right of that Kingdom.

The King's Demands were as follow.

[5] Id. p. 374.

'WHereas [5] the King, by the Common Advice of the whole Engliſh Church, upon the Grant of the Kingdom of Sicily to his Son Edmund, had obliged himſelf to the Pope to pay all paſt and future Charges of acquiring that Kingdom; he now deſired that the whole Clergy and Laiety would become obliged for the entire Debt, or at leaſt for the Intereſt or Penalties thereof, to which he had bound himſelf. Alſo he demanded of the Clergy, that the Tenths of all their Benefices might be continued to him for Five Years, according to the new Taxations of the true extended Value, only neceſſary Expences deducted.

'Alſo he demanded the Firſt Year's Profits of all Benefices that ſhould become void, for Five Years: Alſo he required half the Benefices of Non-Reſidents: He likewiſe was asked the Profits of all Benefices of Priviledged Perſons (viz. ſuch as had Sine-cures, or had Diſpenſations for Church-Livings without performing any Service) except one Benefice, which the Priviledged Perſon might chooſe: Moreover, he deſired all uncertain Legacies, ſuch as were indiſtinctly given, without naming any particular Charity, and left to be diſpoſed of according to the Diſcretion of the Prieſt, Confeſſor, or Ordinary.

Anno Dom. MCCLVI.

[1] The Reaſons of the Biſhops and Clergy againſt the King's Demands, were theſe that follow. [1] Id. ib.

'Firſt, The King's Demands ſeem not ſatisfactory, becauſe a great Sum of Money had been already unprofitably ſpent and utterly loſt: Alſo, we were not required to contribute to the Payment of that Money from the beginning, nor are we any ways bound for it; nor did the King contract or make this Bargain with the Pope, by our Conſent, either tacit or expreſs; nay, we knew nothing of it, and therefore we neither can, nor ought to be urged any further to carry on this Buſineſs.

'Alſo, when we have nothing but the Patrimony of Chriſt, (whoſe Stewards we are) that which by the Divine Law we are bound to give to the Poor, we cannot give to Kings, unleſs we mock God, and convert Eccleſiaſtical Goods to prohibited Uſes, which for no Reaſon we neither will, nor ought to do.

'Beſides, the whole Kingdom is not ſufficient to bear ſuch a Burthen, although Gold were as Dirt, eſpecially ſince the Kingdom of Sicily is Inexpugnable, and Inacceſſible to our Armies; and although we might have ſtipendiary and hired Soldiers of that Nation, yet their Faith may juſtly be ſuſpected: Alſo, if the Engliſh Militia ſhould be conducted to thoſe Parts, with as much Money as was neceſſary for them, we might yet fear the Neighbour-Kingdom would invade ours, and ſo both Kingdoms might be loſt, as well this in poſſeſſion, as that which is coveted; eſpecially when the King of the Romans that is to be, will carry a good part of our Militia with him.

'Alſo, we are ſenſible of the Inroads of the Welſh, and 'tis moſt neceſſary to defend our own Kingdom, rather than to expect to Conquer another: 'Tis ſaid likewiſe, That there is a Compoſition between the Church and Manfred concerning the Kingdom of Sicily, and all that belongs to it, as Publick Fame relates.

[2] Yet notwithſtanding all theſe ſubſtantial Reaſons, the Clergy being Canonically admoniſhed by Ruſtand the Nuncio, they at laſt tamely ſubmitted, and firmly promiſed to obey the Pope's Commands, which was to do what the King deſired, that ſo he might be furniſhed with Money to pay him his Demands, for what was expended towards the Reduction of Sicily and Apulia. For the Debt the Pope claimed of the King, beſides what Money he had already received of him, was One hundred and thirty five thouſand Marks Principal, and Five hundred and forty more for Intereſt; and this was

[2] Rot. Cl. 40 H. 3. M. 13. Yet notwithſtanding all theſe Reaſons, the Clergy ſubmit to the Pope's Demands.

Anno Dom. MCCLVI. was to be paid by Michaelmas then next coming; before which time alſo the King was either to come in Perſon, or elſe to ſend a General with competent Forces, otherwiſe the whole Contract, Bargain, and Grant, were void, if he deferred either his coming or ſending thither after that time: And not only ſo, but the King was to be, and remain Excommunicated, and his whole Kingdom put under Eccleſiaſtical Interdict. The fear of the Execution of which Sentence had ſuch an effect upon the King, that he prayed further time of the Pope for performance of the Contract. But yet notwithſtanding theſe Diſcouragements, and the hard Conditions impoſed upon him, he reſolved to proſecute this Enterpriſe, againſt the Senſe of his Great Counſil: All which Matters of Fact, is very evident from his Letters to divers of the Cardinals, which Dr. Brady has given us at large in his Appendix (Nº 185, 186.) from the Records in the Tower above cited.

[3] Id. p. 922. K. Henry ſends Ambaſſadors to the Eſtates of France, to demand his Rights in that Kingdom, but receives a flat denial.

But to give you ſome Account of Foreign Affairs: [3] About Candlemas this Year, the King of France held a General Aſſembly of the Eſtates, or Parliament (as our Author terms it) to which the King of England ſent his Ambaſſador, requiring his Rights beyond the Seas; for he was now reſolved to ſeem formidable to the French; but however he could receive nothing from them but a flat Denial: Yet Mr. Manſel, the King's Envoy, having lately had an account of the total Rout of the Papal Forces, thought it beſt to omit one part of his Errand, viz. to demand free Paſſage for the King of England, or his General, to march with an Army through France into Italy.

[4] Id. p. 923. King Henry Knights Magnus King of the Iſle of Man. A Proclamation that all Men worth 15 l. per Ann. ſhould be Knighted.

[4] At Eaſter King Henry Knighted Magnus King of the Iſle of Man, and beſtowed on him great Preſents at his Inauguration; and about the ſame time came out a Royal Edict, or Proclamation, whereby every one who held Fifteen Pounds per Annum in Land, ſhould take upon him the Order of Knighthood; and that thoſe who did not deſire it, or could not ſuſtain the Dignity as they ought, ſhould buy it off with Money.

[5] Id. p. 929. The Citizens of London are made to pay another Talliage of 500 Marks.

[5] Alſo this Year the Citizens of London were made to pay another Talliage of Five hundred Marks; theſe Talliages were under various Pretences, as ſometimes they were for the uſe of the King, ſometimes of the Queen, &c. Thus were they treated like Slaves, notwithſtanding all Liberties or Exemptions they had to the contrary.

[1] Id. p. 914. The Abbot and Convent of St. Albans receive Letters from the Pope, commanding them to pay 500 Marks to certain Italian Merchants, to whom he ſaid they were bound.

In purſuance of [1] the Biſhop of Hereford's Contrivance of binding Abbeys, Monaſteries, Prelates, and Churches to foreign Merchants before mentioned, the Abbey and Convent of St. Alban's, on Palm-Sunday, received Letters from the Pope, letting them underſtand, That they were to pay Five hundred Marks to certain Italian Merchants, to whom, he ſaid they were bound in that Sum within a Month, otherwiſe, after that time, they were to ſtand ſuſpended. This was the Tenour of thoſe Letters, whereas they did not know they were bound to any Man living. In like manner was it with other other Monasteries that were also thrust under the Yoke of these Merchant-Usurers; and that the Exactors might more effectually extort the Money from them, they said it was for the King's Use, who was now preparing for his Voyage or Pilgrimage for the Holy Land, though it was not at all intended. Anno Dom. MCCLVI.

Then [2] Fifteen Days after Easter, the Bishops in great Perplexity met at London, to answer Mr. Rustand's and the King's Demands: At first, by reason of their Disagreement, they were about to break up, and depart; but being encouraged by the Barons, they denied Rustand, and peremptorily told him, they would not contribute any thing to the King from their Baronies.

[2] Id. ib. The Bishops meet again at London, to return an Answer to the Pope's Nuncio; and being encouraged by the Barons, deny to contribute any thing to the King.

[3] In August the King and Queen of Scots came into England, and gave their Parents a Visit at Woodstock; from thence they went to London with a mighty Train, so that the Courts were constrained to take two different Roads, the Country being crowded with the great Numbers of the Nobility, Gentry, and their Retinues. On the Fifteenth of the same Month they came to London, where their Reception was Noble, and agreeable to their Expectations, it being expressed by all Demonstrations of Welcome in that City, and also at Westminster.

[3] Id. p. 930. The King and Queen of Scots arrive in England, and are nobly entertained.

To return to Ecclesiastical Affairs: [4] About this time also was sent over the Pope's Bull to Rustand his Nuncio (which our Author has given us at large) commanding him to collect and receive from some of the Monasteries of England the Sum of Two thousand Marks, which (he said) they had obliged themselves to pay to the Merchants of Sienna at the Pope's Command; and that in case of any delay or contradiction, he was to proceed against them by Ecclesiastical Censures, without any Appeal, and that notwithstanding any Apostolical Priviledges or Indulgences to the contrary.

[4] Id. p. 924. The Pope sends over his Bull to his Nuncio, commanding him to raise the Sum of 2000 Marks from divers Monasteries.

This Money was to be paid to certain Florentine Merchants there named, for maintaining the Garisons in the Kingdom of Sicily; but when the Prelates had heard how the Pope and the King had combined to oppress them, being ground as it were between two Mill-stones, they knew not which way to turn themselves, and so were forced quietly to submit to those Oppressions.

[5] But the Priors and Convents of Durham and of Gisburn, being thus forced to be bound in great Sums, were the only Abbeys that stood out against these cheating Obligations and unjust Suspensions, and would not bow their Knees to Baal; yet at last, having none to assist them, they also were compell'd to submit to the arbitrary Will of the Roman Court and its Merchant-Usurers, as well as the rest of the richer Monasteries.

[5] Id. p. 934. But the Priors of Durham and Gisburn, who had stood out against these cheating Obligations, are at last forced to submit to them.

[1] Id. p. 935. The K. comes into the Exchequer, and declares that all Sheriffs, that did not appear and bring in their Money presently after Michaelmas, should be grievously amerced.

[1] This Year, on the Ninth of October, the King came to the Exchequer while the Barons were sitting, and with his own Mouth declared, That every Sheriff that did not appear within eight Days after Michaelmas, and bring in his Money, as well Fee-Farm Rents as Amercements and other Debts, should be amerced the First day Five Marks, the Second day Ten, the Third day Fifteen Marks, and the Fourth day to be more grievously fined, if they continued refractory, and would not appear: And he also declared the same thing against all Cities that had Liberties, and were to answer at the Exchequer by their own Bailiffs; so that the Fourth day they were to lose their Liberties, if they appeared not as well as the Sheriffs. Thus all the Sheriffs of England were Amerced each Five Marks, because they did not distrain every one that had Fifteen Pounds a Year in their several Counties, to come up and be knighted; but they obtained some longer time, and so the King sent his Writs to them accordingly.

[2] Id. p. 936. The Bp. of Ely deceasing, the K. recommends the Keeper of his Seal; but he being refused by the Convent, and another chosen, it highly provokes the K.

[2] The Bishop of Ely being dead, the King by his Letters recommended Henry de Wengham, Keeper of his Seal, to the Election of that Convent, and sent special Messengers to that purpose; but the Convent would not comply with his Request, but chose Hugh de Balsham, their Prior, Bishop. This so exasperated the King that he would not accept of him, but ordered John Walleran (to whom he had committed the Custody of that Bishoprick) to cut down the Woods, and sell the Stock upon their Lands.

[3] Id. Ib. The Pope's Usurers cause the Abbey of St. Albans to be put under an Interdict.

[3] But the Pope's Exactors or Usurers fell most severely upon the Monastery of St. Alban's; for about the Feast of Simon and Jude (i. e. the Eight and twentieth of October) it was put under an Interdict for Fifteen days, not that it wanted great Privileges, but that the detestable Addition of a Non-obstante, annulled all those Pious Concessions of former Popes; therefore the Convent rather chose to comply with an unjust and violent Sentence, than to be guilty of a Contempt.

[4] Id. p. 937. The Welsh being extremely oppressed, take Arms in their own Defence.

[4] The Welsh, having been extreamly oppressed, and the Government of their Country sold to such as would give most for it, and being at length harrassed beyond measure by Sir Geoffrey de Langley, the King's Receiver and Assessor of his Taxes, about the Feast of All-Saints, took up Arms for the Defence of their Country and Laws, and Invading the English Borders, destroyed the Tenants of Prince Edward, whom as yet they had not acknowledged for their Lord; whereupon, the Prince having no ready Money, borrowed four thousand Marks of his Uncle Earl Richard, to raise sufficient Forces to suppress their Incursions, and enter their Country in order to make Reprisals; but the whole Winter was so Wet and Stormy, and the Places whither the Welsh had retired, were so Boggy and Impassable, that the English durst not attempt them, so that this Expedition proved ineffectual, and the Prince's Expences in vain: Our Author also here gives us but a bad Account of the Carriage of this his young Prince and thoſe of his Retinue, that even Prince Lewis, the Invader of England, never brought over greater Plunderers: And the Monk tells us one Prank of this Prince, which made the People have no great hopes of him, which was, That as he was riding along the Road, he cauſed his Men to cut off one Ear, and put out one Eye of a certain young Gentleman he met with, but upon what Provocation or Affront the Prince uſed him ſo barbarouſly, our Author does not acquaint us. Anno Dom. MCCLVI. A bad Account of this Prince his Youthful Pranks.

Pr. Edward raises an Army to hinder their Incursions, but to no purpose.

[5] About this time the King forbad the Chancellor to iſſue out any Writs that might prove prejudicial to his Brother Earl Richard, as to Richard Earl of Gloceſter, Peter of Savoy, or any of the King's Half-Brothers, which (ſays our Monk) was contrary to the Law and Peace of the Kingdom: Alſo the King about the ſame time, (being neceſſitated for Money) forced ſuch whom he thought fit, to be made Knights, or elſe to Fine off, and ſo be excuſed; He likewiſe cauſed all ſuch as neglected their Suits to his Courts to be ſeverely amerced, and taxed all Lands that held in Serjeanty; And ordered Inquiry to be made into Liquid Meaſures of Wine, Ale, and Dry Meaſures of Grain, as Gallons and Buſhels, as alſo into Weights, and grievouſly puniſhed (even above their deſerts) all thoſe whoſe Meaſures and Weights did not anſwer the Standard; by which means he raiſed a great Sum of Money, but leſſen'd the Affections both of the Clergy and Laiety towards him; and yet for all theſe Courſes he could not retrieve himſelf from extream Poverty, for he had borrowed ſo much Money of the Pope's Merchant-Uſurers, for the Promotion of his Son Edmund to the Kingdom of Sicily, that the Intereſt and Forbearance of it, amounted to a Hundred Pounds a Day; into ſo deplorable a Condition had this poor Prince now plung'd himſelf, through his too much credulity on the Pope's ſpecious Promiſes.

[5] Id. ib. The K forbids his Chancellor to iſſue out any Writs againſt his Brothers, and ſeveral other Great Men, contrary to Law. And cauſes all that were qualified to take their Knighthood, or to Fine off. And enquires into the faults of Meaſures, &c. And thereby raiſes much Money; yet all could not reſcue him from extreme Poverty.

As for the reſt of the Eccleſiaſtical Affairs of this Year, Matt. Weſtminſter takes notice of what Matt. Paris has omitted, viz. That at the end of this laſt Parliament the Sentence of Excommunication was afreſh renewed againſt all Tranſgreſſors of Magna Charta, and that of Foreſts, the form of which he has there given us at large, but needs not to be here repeated; only the Reader may obſerve, it was pronounced by Archbiſhop Boniface in the Great Hall at Weſtminſter, in the Preſence of the King, his Brother the Earl of Cornwall, and divers other Earls and Biſhops of the Kingdom, all holding Tapers in their Hands: But tho' the exact time of this Action is not mentioned in our Author, yet I thought fit to take notice of it, becauſe this as well as the precedent Tranſactions (though very conſiderable) are omitted by Dr. Brady in his Hiſtory. Sentence of Excommunication was again paſſed upon all Infringers of the Great Charters.

Anno Dom. MCCLVII.

[1] This Year the King kept his Chriſtmas at London, where came to him ſeveral of the Princes of Germany, who declared, that Richard Earl of Cornwall, was rightfully choſen by unanimous conſent King of Almain, or the Romans, in the room of William Earl of Holland, who [1] M. P. p. 919. Several German Princes declare E. Richard Elected King of the Romans.

Anno Dom. MCCLVII. who had been killed not long before in a Skirmish with the Frisons. The Earl at first was unwilling to accept of this Dignity, being dis-heartned by the ill Success of the two former Princes, who bore that Title; but being prevail'd upon by the King and his Half-Brother, the Bishop Elect of Winchester, he at last consented to take that high Honour, not, (as he himself at that time declared) 'out of any Ambition or Covetousness, but purely to Reform that 'Kingdom, and bring it into a better State and Condition: With which the German Ambassadors being very well satisfied, they return'd home to give an Account of their Message to those that sent them.

The E. is with some difficulty persuaded to accept of that Honour.

[2] In Mid-lent there was held a great Parliament at Westminster, to which by the King's command came the Masters of the University of Oxford, that so there might be a Reconciliation made between them and the Bishop of Lincoln, who then troubled that University, and went about to invade their Privileges, of which the said Masters had already complain'd to the King, as he went lately on Pilgrimage to St. Alban's Shrine: There appeared also at this Parliament Earl Richard, King Elect of the Romans, who then came to take his leave of the Representative* Body of England, for almost the whole Nobility of the Realm were there present; yet did not they at that time know the Claim the King of Castile made to that Kingdom, tho' he asserted, That he himself was Prior Elected thereunto. There was at this time so great a Multitude in London, that the City could scarce contain them.

[1] Id. p. 946. A great Parliament at Westminster, where the Masters of the University of Oxford attend, and for what purpose.

Universitas.*

[3] To this Parliament the King brought his Son Edmund, dressed in an Apulian Habit; and having shewed him to them all, he said thus, 'See, ye Faithful Subjects, my Son Edmund, whom 'the Lord of his Grace has freely called to the Royal Dignity; 'wherefore it is manifest, how worthy he is of all Men's Favours, 'and how Inhumane it would be in any one to deny him a powerful Assistance in this Juncture of Time; and then farther affirm'd, 'That by the Favour and Consent of the Church of England, he 'had obliged himself to the Pope, under pain of losing his Kingdom, for the Payment of One hundred and forty thousand Marks, 'Principal Money, besides Interest, which daily increased; And 'for the Discharge of this, he demanded the Tenths of the whole 'Beneficed Clergy for Five Years, according to the New Valuation, 'without any Deduction or Allowance, even for necessary Expences. At the hearing of this high Demand, all Men's Ears began to tingle, and they stood amazed, especially when they found that this Tyranny had taken its rise from the Pope himself: But at length, when neither Excuses nor Intreaties would prevail, they granted the King an Aid of Fifty thousand Marks towards his urgent Necessities; but upon this Condition, that he should for the future inviolably observe that Capital Charter, which had been so often promised, and so often paid for; but the King, not thinking this Sum sufficient for his Design, refused to accept it.

[3] Id. ib. The K. presents his Son Edmund to the Parliament, and makes a Speech to them to Assist him.

And demands the Tenths of all the Beneficed Clergy, for five Years.

The Parliament with much ado grant the K. an Aid of Fifty thousand Marks.

Then

Then (according to the Annals of [4] Burton) Fifteen days after Easter, the King held another Parliament at Westminster, to treat again of the Business of Apulia or Sicily, in which the Archbishop of Messina, the Pope's new Legate, was present; and then and there the King received the same Answer from the Clergy and Laiety, as he had done before, which here seems to be a flat denial, and is contrary to what Matt. Paris has already related; But I think he deserves more credit.

Anno Dom. MCCLVII.

[4] P. 376.

[5] So soon as this Parliament was dissolved, there arrived the Archbishop of Cologne, with some other Bishops, besides a certain German Duke, not named, who all came over to encourage Earl Richard to accept the Kingdom of Almain, as an Earnest of the Roman Empire, and that he might be received without any Contradiction; yet they cunningly conceal'd the Election of Alphonso King of Castile, by some of the Electors; though indeed it is a wonder how a thing so notorious as that was, could be hid from any Body, and especially that the Earl of Gloceſter and Mr. Mansel, who were lately return'd out of Germany, should hear nothing of it; However, Earl Richard was so well satisfied with the good Words that were given him, that he presented the Archbishop with a very rich Mitre; which was so acceptably received by him, that he thereupon promised to Crown him King of Germany; which our Author says he mentions, to shew Posterity how Strangers then imposed upon the English Simplicity.

[5] Id. p. 947. The A. B. of Cologne and several other Bishops, come over to encourage E. Richard to accept of the Kingdom of Almain.

And it was chiefly for this Prince's great Wealth that these German Princes then Elected him King; He being able, as [1] Mat. Paris relates, to spend a Hundred Marks a day for Ten years together, not accounting the Revenues he received from England and Germany.

[1] Id. p. 941.

[2] Not long after Easter the new King Elect, having received the Homages of the Archbishop of Cologne, and the other Noblemen that came with him, went towards the Sea-side, and having stayed a good while there for a Wind, at last he took Shipping with all his Retinue, on the Sunday after St. Mark's Day, and upon Tuesday following, (being the First of May) he Landed at Dort, from whence on Ascension-Day he came to Aken, (or Aix-la-Chapelle, as we now commonly call it) and on the same Day was Crown'd King, and his Countess Queen of the Romans, with great Splendour and Magnificence, in the Presence of the Archbishops of Cologne and Mentz, and many Earls, Barons, and Noblemen; and he was placed in the Throne of Charles the Great, with the usual Solemnity; yet the Archbishop of Treves, with several other Princes were not there, having before opposed Earl Richard's Election.

[3] Id. p. 984.

The K. Elect goes for Germany.

He, together with his Qu. is Crown'd at Aken, with great Splendour.

But to return to Domestick Affairs: This Year, (according to the MS Chronicle of the City of London) the King Coined a Penny of Pure Gold of the Weight of * Two Sterlings, and commanded that it should go for Twenty Shillings. This I take notice of, as being the first Piece of Gold I can find, that had been Coined in England.

[3] Id. p. 949. The Welsh having invaded the English Borders, force Pr. Edward to a Retreat.

[3] The Welsh having this Year plundered and burnt the English Borders, and killed the Inhabitants, and forced Prince Edward and his Army (who had invaded them) to retreat, they remained Victorious in those Parts; nor would Prince Llewellyn desist from this Enterprise, though he was entreated by a Letter from the new King Richard, to cease making any further hostile Incursions to disturb the Peace of the Kingdom: But about the Two and Twentieth of July, the King being highly provoked by these Invasions, marched himself into Wales, with his whole Military Tenants, whom he had now Summoned by Writ, to suppress their Incursions; but they having notice of his coming, fled into the farthest Recesses of their Countrey, to wit, Snowdun, and other Mountainous and inaccessible Places, carrying with them their Wives and Children, and driving all their Cattel thither: yet before their departure they ploughed up their Meadows, destroyed their Mills, brake down their Bridges, and digged Pits in their Fords to make them unpassable; [4] and at length they Confederating with those of South-Wales, by the Treachery of Griffin de Brun, (a Welsh Nobleman, who then Served the King) made an Assault upon one Part of the Royal Army, and routed it; then the King with the residue of his Forces marched back towards Chester, and burnt all the Corn in the Borders thereabouts; [5] whereupon the Welsh offer'd to submit, so that they might enjoy their antient Laws and Liberties, and not be subject to Prince Edward, nor any but the King himself, but he then refused the Terms; yet towards Winter he was forced to make a shameful Retreat into England, having spent much Treasure, and done nothing that was considerable.

Whereupon the King himself with all his Military Force marches into Wales.

[4] Id. p. 953. They Confederate with the South-Welsh-Men, rout part of the King's Army.

[5] Id. p. 954. The Welsh offer to submit, but are refused.

Whereupon, the K. is forc'd to return into England.

[1] Id. p. 957. The bad success of several small Expeditions against them.

[1] Nor had the English any better success in some private Expeditions against the Welsh, that were made after the King's departure. When a Nobleman, called James de Audeley, (who had Castles and Lands in the Borders of Wales, which during his absence in Germany the Welsh had burnt and destroyed) resolved to be revenged of them, and to that end made an Incursion into their Territories, though very Unfortunately, for they sallying out of their private Recesses, fell upon the English, and routing them, drove them out of their Countrey: thus they and the English mutually wasting each other's Territories, it not only broke off all Commerce between the two Nations, but also reduced all the Borders of Wales to a perfect Desart.

[2] Id. p. 956. The Bp. Elect of Ely, and Abbot of St. Edmunds-Bury, return from Rome, having spent a great deal of Money.

[2] As for Ecclesiastical Affairs, about the same time this Year, the Bishop-Elect of Ely, and the Abbot of St. Edmunds-Bury had their Elections confirm'd at Rome, where they had spent, given, and promised vast Sums of Money for obtaining their Rights, by which our Author (I ſuppoſe) means their Confirmations, for there had been lately a new Law made by the Pope, that every Elect (whether Biſhop, Abbot, or Prior) ſhould come thither and compound for this Confirmation, which (as our Author ſhews) proved highly burthenſome and inconvenient to the Church. Anno Dom. MCCLVII.

[3] And as for Foreign Affairs, not long after this, the Biſhop of Worceſter, the Biſhop Elect of Wincheſter, the Abbot of Weſtminſter, the Earl of Leiceſter, Hugh Bigot, the Earl-Mareſchal, Peter of Savoy, and Robert Waleran, were ſent to the King of France, to demand the Reſtitution of K. Henry's Rights in Normandy, and the other Parts of France; but returned re infecta, as you will find by and by; for the King of France had already ſo well fortified and ſecured all the ſtrong Places there, that he needed not to be afraid of any thing King Henry, or his Brother Richard could do againſt him. [3] Id. p. 958. Ambaſſadors are again ſent into France, to demand the King's Rights there, but to no purpoſe.

[4] This Year alſo the good Underſtanding and Affection between Alphonſo King of Caſtile, and King Henry, began to abate, by reaſon of his Brother Earl Richard's Competition with him for the Kingdom of Almain; yet he now ſent Letters to King Henry, deſiring his Aſſiſtance againſt his Brother, according to the Tenour of the late Charter of Peace made between them, That one ſhould aſſiſt the other againſt all his Adverſaries whatſoever: But the King would by no means hear of it, but ſaid, That his Brother had been lawfully Elected and Crowned, and that he would ſtand by him againſt all his Oppoſers. [4] M. P. p. 555. 957. The good Correſpondence between K Henry and the K. of Caſtile, begins to abate, and for what Reaſon?

[5] To conclude this Year with ſome remarkable Paſſages, tho' not immediately relating to Civil Hiſtory: The ſcarcity of Corn, and all other Proviſions, was ſo great, as well through the extream Wetneſs of the Seaſon as other Cauſes, that a Horſe-load of Corn was ſold for Ten Shillings; ſo that vaſt Numbers of poor People died of Famine, which the Author of the Chronicle, called (though falſly) * Walter of Coventry's Julius, obſerves to have been ſo great, that himſelf ſaw them fighting for the Carcaſſes of dead Dogs and other Carrion, and to eat the Waſh that was ſet for the Swine. But Matth. Paris further obſerves, That this Famine did happen not ſo much from the ſcarcity of Corn, as from want of Money, ſince the like Quantity of Corn had been formerly ſold for a Mark, or Twenty Shillings; yet none of them had died for Hunger. And the reaſon why it was otherwiſe now, proceeded from Richard King of the Romans his late carrying over into Germany no leſs than Seven hundred thouſand Pounds in ready Money; an incredible Sum in thoſe Days, beſides what King Henry had lately ſent to the Pope to proſecute the Deſign upon Sicily; and therefore it was no wonder if England was near exhauſted of its Money. [5] Id. p. 958. A great Scarcity of Corn, ſo that many People died of Hunger. * MS. in Bib. Cotton. The true Reaſon of this Famine.

[1] Id. p. 959. The K. does every day loſe ſomewhat of Royal Dignity.

[1] This Year the King kept his Chriſtmas at London, and about that time, notwithſtanding all the Intereſt that he and the Archbiſhop could make at Rome to the contrary, the Biſhop of Ely and Abbot of St. Edmundsbury, returned from thence confirmed by the Pope; ſo that the King, taking ill Advice, every day loſt ſomewhat of his Royal Dignity, and for that reaſon ſtudied how to damnifie the Church.

[2] Id. ib. The K.'s Ambaſſadors return out of France, without obtaining any thing, and the reaſon of it.

[2] As for the Noblemen lately ſent by King Henry to the King of France, to demand Normandy and his other Rights in that Kingdom, they were civilly received by himſelf; but his Brothers, and the other Great Men of France, much oppoſed them, ſo that they returned on the Sixth of January, or Twelfth-day, without obtaining any thing for which they were ſent.

[3] Id. ib. The Welſh ſeize ſome Towns in England.

[3] About this time the Welſh deſpairing of Peace, and diſtruſting the King's Mercy, ſeized ſome Towns and Places belonging to Prince Edward, and other Noble Men, in the Borders of Wales; and and having firſt plundered them, they afterwards burnt them, and killed all the People.

[4] Id. p. 960. The Pope falls out with the King, and for what cauſe.

And threatens to Excommunicate him, and Interdict his Kingdom. Whereupon the K. ſends him 5000 Marks.

[4] It was alſo about this time that the Pope began to fall out with the King, becauſe he obſerved not his often-repeated Promiſes, wherein he had bound himſelf, under pain of loſing his Kingdom, to correct his wonted Exceſſes; and at the inſtance of Laurence Biſhop of Rocheſter, and many others of the Clergy, threatned (after many fruitleſs Admonitions) to Excommunicate him, and Interdict his Kingdom, and to proceed further, as he ſhould ſee cauſe: Whereupon the King being in great Confuſion, ſent him Five thouſand Marks, to pacifie and bring him into a better Temper, and to put off the Sentence for a time; with which Money and the King's earneſt Petitions, he ſeemed pretty well ſatisfied, though it was now evident, that notwithſtanding all that vaſt Charge the Nation had been at, for acquiring the Kingdoms of Sicily and Naples, yet all hopes of it were now quite vaniſhed.

[5] Id. p. 962. [1] Id. p. 954. Mr. Ruſtand returns into England much troubled;

And by cunning Inſinuations and Lyes obtains great Benefices.

[5] In Mid-Lent Mr. Ruſtand, the late Nuncio, returned from Rome, where he was deprived of his former Authority, [1] having been there ſome time before accuſed by ſome of his Rivals, that he had been too Rapacious, and (laying aſide all true Fear of God) had gained great Revenues in England: But now that he might obtain the King's Favour in retaining of them, he affirmed he was born at Bourdeaux, and promiſed, as he was the King's Liege and Natural Subject, effectually to procure the Dominion of the Kingdom of Sicily, and tranſact his other Buſineſs at the Court of Rome and elſewhere: With which flattering Promiſes, he ſo circumvented this eaſie King, that he was endowed with other great Benefices. However, he was removed from the Power and Dignity he he had before enjoyed, and was again recalled to Rome, and not long after, viz. the Week before Easter, Mr. Herlot, or Arlot, the Pope's Notary and Special Secretary, came with mighty Pomp into England, invested with great Authority; and though he was not stiled a Legate, yet he wanted not the Power of one. Anno Dom. MCCLVI. Mr. Herlot the Pope's Notary, comes as his Nuncio into England.

[2] The late Truce between the English and Welsh now expiring, they again miserable straitned the King's Subjects in those Parts, insomuch that they could get neither Salt nor Corn, nor other Necessaries; and they had also invaded Pembrokshire, and fallen upon many of the Inhabitants there: Wherefore the King being highly incensed at it, [3] on the Fourteenth of March issued out his Writs to all that owed him Service, both Clergy and Laiety, enjoining them to meet him at Chester eight Days before Midsummer, to march into Wales against Llewellyn the Son of Griffin and his Accomplices, who had seized on, and wasted divers of his own Lands, as well as those of his Son Edward, and other his Liege Subjects, against the Homage and Fealty they had sworn to him. [1] Id. P. 963. The English are miserably straitned by the Welsh. The K. issues out his Writs of Summons to all Tenants by Knights Service to meet him at Chester. [3] Claus. 42. Hen. 3. M. 11. Dors.

It seems that [4] the Welsh made these Incursions at this time, in confidence that the King would be diverted by the Scots; for whereas that King, upon Marriage with King Henry's Daughter, had put himself and Kingdom under his Protection and Government, until he should be of lawful Age, some of his Rebels had lately taken him out of the hands of those Councellors and Curators whom King Henry had set over him, and detained him against his Will: For repressing of which Insolence and Rebellion, the King had issued out [5] Summons, dated on the 17th of January before, to all his Military Tenants of the North, especially those of Yorkshire, Cumberland, and Northumberland, to march with Horse and Arms and all their Forces into Scotland, together with such as he should send to them. These Writs are still upon the Roll; but yet I do not find any thing done in pursuance thereof. [4] M. P. ib. 63. The Welsh made these Incursions, in hopes of being diverted by the Scots, and on what account. [5] Claus. 42. Hen. 3. M. 11. Dors. M. P. ib.

[1] Then presently after Hock-Tuesday (that is, the Tuesday after Easter-Tuesday) a Parliament was convened at London, wherein the King being pressed with the Affairs of the Kingdom of Sicily (concerning which, Mr. Herlot was sent to urge him to a positive Answer) now demanded a very great Sum, which the Pope upon his Request obliged himself to pay the Merchants: But the Great Men obstinately denied to assist him with Money, for they would not impoverish themselves to pay his Debts, which he had contracted through his own Weakness; and if he had bought the Kingdom of Sicily of the Pope for his Son Edmund, it was done without the Consent of his Nobility, since there were so many insufferable Difficulties lying in the way to the gaining of that Kingdom. [1] M. P. ib. A Parliament held at London, where the K.'s Demands for Money are rejected by the Great Men.

3. [2] When

Anno Dom. MCCLVIII.

[2] When the King had received this Repulſe in Parliament, he tried ſome other ways to get Money; for he applied himſelf to the Abbot of Weſtminſter, who was ſo wheedled by his falacious Promiſes, that he put the Seal of the Convent to a Charter, where it became bound for the King in Two thouſand five hundred Marks, and ſo gave a pernicious Example to other Abbeys; for immediately thereupon the King ſent Simon Paſſeleve to the Abbey of Waltham, who ſhewed them the King's Letters, and ſaid, that the Abbot of Weſtminſter deſired them to do the like; but the Abbot of Waltham would by no means conſent to charge his Houſe with any Money, notwithſtanding all Simon's Entreaties; ſo he not ſpeeding here, went immediately to the Abbey of St. Albans with the ſame Meſſage; but the Abbot and Convent there plainly told him, That it was againſt their own Privileges, and alſo the Pope's Prohibition, thus to oblige their Houſe for the King: Whereunto Simon anſwered, That the King had ſent along with him a Frier Minor, who had Power to abſolve them from that Oath: But the Abbot would not hear of this, but honeſtly replied, That it was not ſafe to undergo Excommunication in hopes of being abſolved; as no Man would hearken to one that ſhould perſwade him to break his Leg to have it well ſet again; and beſides, in doing this, they ſhould tell a great Lye, and the Convent-Seal would be Witneſs againſt them of their Breach of Truſt, And when Simon urged them farther, That they ought to aſſiſt the King, becauſe all they enjoyed came from him and his Progenitors; their Anſwer was, That it was true, all they had was the King's, but for the Preſervation and not Subverſion of the Kingdom; and that the King had at his Coronation, as well as many times ſince, ſworn to this: So that notwithſtanding all Simon could ſay, he could not prevail with them to put their Common Seal to the Obligation. Yet for all this Repulſe, Simon went from thence to the Abbey of Reading, but neither did he there find any better Entertainment: Upon which he wos forced to return without getting any Obligations Sealed by them for the Two thouſand five hundred Marks, which the King hoped, by the Aſſignment of this Security, to have taken up of the Italian Merchants. I have inſerted this Paſſage (which Dr. Brady has omitted) to let the Reader ſee the honeſt Stoutneſs of the Engliſh Abbots at that time.

[2] Id. p. 965. The K. obtains a Bond from the Abbot of Weſtminſter for 2500 Marks, which is urged as an Example for other Abbeys.

But the Abbot of Waltham denies the like Requeſt, and gives very ſhrewd Reaſons for it.

An honeſt Anſwer of an Engliſh Abbot.

[3] But to return to Civil Matters, from whence we have a little digreſſed: [3] In this Parliament there aroſe great Heats and Contentions, which laſted till after the Feaſt of Aſcenſion, between the King and Barons, who made great Complaints againſt him, That he ſlighted the Authority of the Church, and did not obſerve the Great Charter; That he had raiſed to Dignities and Riches his Half-Brothers againſt all Law, as if they had been the Natural People of the Land, and would not ſuffer any Writ to iſſue out of Chancery againſt them; and that although the Inſolence of his other Brothers and the Poictovins were intolerable, yet that of William de Valence exceeded them all.

[3] Id. p. 968. The Barons make Complaints againſt the K. for not obſerving the Great Charters, and for other Grievances.

Anno Dom. MCCLVIII.

[4] Also Simon Montfort, Earl of Leiceſter, taking his Advantage of thoſe Differences, highly complain'd to the Univerſitas Regni, i. e. General Body, or Repreſentative of the Realm, concerning his own private Grievances, and told the King, that he only promoted and enriched Strangers, and deſpiſed and waſted his own People, to the ſubverſion of the whole Kingdom; by which means he became unable to repel the Injuries of the weak and inconſiderable Welſh. And indeed this had been a reaſonable Complaint, in one who had not been a Foreigner himſelf.

[4] Id. ib. S. Montfort complains to the General Repreſentative of the Kingdom, concerning his own Grievances.

[5] To conclude, the King's various ſorts of Exceſſes, and unwillingneſs to receive any good Advice, required many particular Conferences before they could be ended; but at laſt He came ſo far to himſelf, that being convinced of the Juſtneſs of their Reproofs, he grew more moderate, and confeſſed he had often been miſled by evil Counſel, but he then Promiſed and Swore upon the Altar and Shrine of St. Edward, That correcting all his former Miſcarriages and Abuſes, he would for the future follow the Advice of his own natural Subjects.

[5] Id. ib. The King being ſenſible of his former Miſcarriages, ſwears to correct them for the future.

[1] But becauſe his former frequent breaches of his Oath and Promiſes, had now rendred him wholly ſuſpected by his People, and that the Great Men knew not how to bind this Proteus of a King, (as this Author calls him;) and alſo becauſe the Affair was very difficult, the Parliament was therefore Adjourned unto St. Barnaby's Day; and to be holden then at Oxford; but before this Adjournment, upon Aſcenſion-Day (or ſecond of May) the Barons promiſed, that if he would reform the State of the Kingdom, according to their Advice, and the Pope would make the Conditions about the Affair of Sicily more eaſie, ſo as it might be proſecuted with effect, they would do their endeavour, with the *Commonalty of the Kingdom, to procure him a common Aid or Tax for that purpoſe; and thereupon the King agreed, that before Chriſtmaſs next the State of the Kingdom ſhould be redreſſed and ſettled by them, and the Pope's Legate, if in England; and for the performance of what ſhou'd be ordain'd, he would put himſelf under the Pope's Pleaſure, ſo that it ſhould be in his Holineſs's Power to compel him to it by Eccleſiaſtical Cenſures. He alſo cauſed his Son Edward, the Prince, to ſwear, that he would obſerve and keep what his Father had granted: This appears by a [2] Charter recorded on the *Roll, and is recited at large in Dr. Brady's Appendix. Moreover, he granted at the ſame time to the Barons, another [3] Charter confirm'd by his Oath, that the State of the Kingdom ſhould be rectified and reformed by Twelve faithful Perſons of his Council then choſen, and by Twelve others to be choſen by the Barons, who ſhould meet at Oxford a Month after Whitſunday next coming, as they ſhould think moſt to the Honour of God, and Profit of the Kingdom; and promiſed inviolably to obſerve whatever ſhould be ordained by thoſe Four and Twenty, or the major part of them, under ſuch Security as they ſhould direct; and he likewiſe cauſed his Son Edward to ſwear, that he would inviolably obſerve the ſame things; whereupon the Earls and Barons promiſed to endeavour, that the Community or general Body of the Kingdom ſhould grant him an Aid.

Anno Dom. MCCLVIII.

It farther appears by a Third [4] Charter in French, that the King, at the requeſt of his Great and Wiſe Men of the Community of the Kingdom, granted that theſe Four and Twenty, who were thus to be choſen, ſhou'd have full Power to chooſe Four more, and theſe to chooſe the King's Council, who were to redreſs and amend all Matters appertaining to him and his Kingdom; and this Council, or the major part of them, were to chooſe one or more in the place of ſuch as ſhould make default. [5] Barnaby-day approaching, the Great Men and Nobles of the Land haſten'd to the Parliament, then to be holden at Oxford, and commanded all ſuch as owed them Military Service to accompany them; ſo that they made Preparations, as if they were to defend their Borders from the Attempts of their Enemies the Welſh; thô that was but a pretence to palliate their coming thus Armed; yet really it was from their fears of a Civil War, leſt the King and his Brothers, together with the Poictovins, ſhould bring in Foreign Troops againſt them: and therefore they cauſed all the Ports to be ſtrictly guarded.

Thoſe choſen by the King, were the Biſhop of London, the Biſhop Elect of Winchester, Henry Son to the King of Almain; John, Earl of Warren; Guido de Luſignan, and William de Valence, the King's Half-Brothers; John, Earl of Warwick; John Manſel, Frier; J. de Derlington, the Abbot of Weſtminſter; Henry de Wengham, Dean of St. Martins in London; the Twelfth is omitted, but it may be worth enquiring, whither the Lord Peter of Savoy, or James Audley, were not the Perſon.

[2] The Twelve choſen by the Earls and Barons were, the Biſhop of Worceſter; Simon, Earl of Leiceſter; Richard, Earl of Glouceſter; Humfry, Earl of Hereford; Roger, Earl of Norfolk, and Earl Mareſchal; the Lords, Roger Mortimer, John Fitz-Geoffrey, Hugh Bigod, Brother to the Mareſchal, Richard de Gray, William Bardolf, Peter de Montfort, and Hugh de Eſpenſer. Theſe Twenty Four choſe Four of their own number, viz. the Earl of Warwick; John Manſel; Earl Roger, the Mareſchal; and Hugh Bigod, his Brother; and theſe were to name the King's Council, who were in number Sixteen, being theſe that follow; the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, the Biſhop of Worceſter, the Earl of Leiceſter, the Earl of Glouceſter, the Earl Mareſchal, Peter of Savoy, the Earl of Richmond, the Earl of Albemarle, the Earl of Warwick, the Earl of Hereford, John Manſel, John Fitz Geoffrey, Peter Montfort, Richard de Gray, Roger Mortimer, James de Aldithlege, or Audley.

[3] Id. 414. The firſt thing the 24 demand, is a Confirmation of the great Charter. With ſeveral other Alterations of no leſs Moment.

[3] Theſe Twenty Four Great Men, in the firſt place, required the King's Confirmation of the Charter, which had been granted by King John his Father, and ſo often confirmed by the King himſelf, and which he had alſo ſworn to obſerve, and had cauſed all Tranſgreſſors thereof to be ſolemnly Excommunicated in his own Preſence, as well as in that of the whole Baronage.

Secondly, They required ſuch a Juſtitiary as would do Juſtice to thoſe that had ſuffer'd Wrong, as well to the Poor as Rich.

Thirdly,

Thirdly, That they ſhould chooſe the Juſtices, Chancellors, Treaſurers, and other Officers and Miniſters from Year to Year. Anno Dom. MCCLVIII.

Fourthly, That they themſelves, or their Adherents, ſhould have the Cuſtody of the King's Caſtles.

Fifthly, By an Edict or Statute to be aſſented to by the King, they made it Capital for any Perſon, of what Degree or Order ſoever, to refuſe their conſent to theſe things; and againſt ſuch the Archbiſhops and Biſhops alſo pronounced Excommunication.

They alſo required ſome other things of publick Concern, which tended to the good of the King, as well as benefit of the Kingdom; tho' it muſt be confeſſed, that moſt of theſe Demands were unreaſonable, and inconſiſtent with Kingly Government.

[4] The Twenty Four alſo ordained, that there ſhould be Three Parliaments held every Year; as likewiſe when and how they ſhould be holden; which Order I find drawn up in this Form in the Annals of Burton, and is here faithfully tranſcribed out of the French Original.

[4] Id. ib. Three Parliaments are appointed to be holden in every Year.

[5] 'Be it remembred, That the Twenty Four have ordain'd, there 'may or ſhall be Three Parliaments in the Year, the firſt on the 'Octaves, or eight Days after St. Michael; the ſecond on the Mor-'row after Candlemaſs-Day; and the third on the firſt of June, that 'is (to wit) Three Weeks before the Feaſt of St. John; to theſe 'Three Parliaments ſhall come all the choſen Counſellors of the 'King, tho' they be not ſent to, (i. e. tho' not ſummoned by par-'ticular Writs) to provide for the State of the Realm, and to treat 'of the common buſineſs thereof, when need ſhall be, by the Com-'mand of the King, or by his Summons.

[5] Id. p. 415. The Form of this Ordinance.

[1] Then the Commons or Community alſo choſe Twelve Perſons to repreſent them in theſe Parliaments to ſave the Charges of the Community; the Act for this Election was drawn up in this Form, the Original of which is in French.

[1] Id. ib. The Commons chuſe Twelve Perſons to repreſent them, to ſave Charges.

[2] 'Be it remembred, that the Commons or Community have cho-'ſen Twelve Wiſe Men, who ſhall come to Parliaments, as alſo at 'other times, when there ſhall be need, and the King or his Coun-'cil ſhall command or ſend to them to treat of the buſineſs of the 'King and Realm; and the Commons or Community will hold for e-'ſtabliſhed what theſe Twelve ſhall do; and this ſhall be done to 'ſpare the Coſt or Charges of the Commons or Community.

[2] Id. ib. The Form of this Ordinance.

The Names of the which Twelve are entred in the ſaid Annals in this Form.

Theſe are the Twelve who are choſen by the Barons to treat in the Three Parliaments every Year with the King's Council, for all the Commons, or whole Community of the Land, upon the common buſineſs, viz. the Biſhop of London, the Earl of Wincheſter, the Earl of Hereford, Philip Baſſet, John de Baliol, John de Verdun, John de Gray, Roger de Sumerie, Roger de Montalt, Hugh de Eſpenſer, Thomas de Greſley, and Ægidius de Argentun. The Names of the Twelve who were to appear, and act for the whole Community of the Land.

It muſt alſo be owned, that theſe were all Barons, and great Tenents in Capite, not one Commoner (as now reputed) amongſt them; yet that theſe were choſen by the Commons, properly ſo called, ſhall be proved in another place.

Anno Dom. MDCCLIII.

What other Statutes and Ordinances were made in this Parliament.

Many other Statutes and Ordinances were made in this Parliament concerning Feudal Tenures, about Cuſtody of Wards, Mariages, and Eſcheats; as alſo about Suits to the King's Courts, before his Juſtices; and likewiſe Suits to Itinerant County-Courts, Hundred-Courts, Sheriffs-Turns, Writs of Right, waſte of Eſtates in Wardſhip, taking of Diſtreſſes, &c. moſt of which were made in abatement of the Rigour of the Feudal Law, and for the eaſe and benefit of the People, which are to be found in the Annals laſt cited, and are alſo on [3] Record in the Tower.

[4] M. P. p. 971. This Body of Laws were call'd the Proviſions of Oxford, which the King, the Prince, and all the Nobility ſwore to obſerve.

[4] Theſe Laws were then called the Proviſions of Oxford, which the whole Baronage of England were bound by Oath to obſerve, and that they would never deſiſt from proſecuting theſe their juſt Reſolves, either for loſs of their Lives or Eſtates; ſo that they often beſeeched the King to agree to obſerve them; which ſeeing he was no longer able to avoid, He, together with the Prince, his eldeſt Son, took the ſame Oath.

Thus through the eaſineſs of a weak and inconſtant Prince, and the over great Power of an Inſolent and too much provoked Nobility, the Head of the State became a Cypher, and this whole Government was put into the hands of a few Men, who notwithſtanding all their fair Pretences minded their own Intereſt and Grandeur more than the common good of the Nation, as you will find hereafter.

Other Charters of the King, whereby he authorizes the 24 Noblemen abovementiond, to proceed in the Reformation of the Kingdom.

Alſo before the Diſſolution of this Parliament, the King granted his Charters to the Earl of Glouceſter, and unto thoſe Twenty Four Biſhops, Earls, Barons, and others, who had either by himſelf, or the Baronage, been choſen Governours or Reformers of the Kingdom; wherein after a recital of his ſaid Promiſe and Oath, to hold for firm and ſtable, whatſoever they ſhould Ordain for the Reformation of the Kingdom; he thereby alſo Commands them to proceed to the ſaid Reformation, under pain of his Diſpleaſure, as alſo of his Heirs, if they omitted it: And he farther Promiſes for himſelf and his Heirs, that if they proceed in the ſaid Reformation, neither he, nor his Heirs will be * moved or diſpleaſed with them, or theirs, any time hereafter for ſo doing, but will always preſerve them undemnify'd on that account. [5] This Charter bears date at Oxford the twenty ſecond of June, and is upon Record. And is alſo Printed in Dr. * B's Appendix tho' he has omitted to give us the Contents of it in his Hiſtory; as alſo of another Charter of the like nature, which is found upon the ſame Roll, and is likewiſe Printed in the ſaid Appendix *, whereby the King commands John Manſel, and Roger Bigod Earl of Norfolk; Hugh Bigod, Juſtitiary; and John Pleſſy, Earl of Warwick, (who were elected by the Twenty Four Great Men, to nominate thoſe who were to be of the King's Council) to proceed to the ſaid nomination, by the Faith whereby they were bound to him, and as they would avoid the diſpleaſure of himſelf and his Heirs, if they omitted to do it, with an Indemnity to them and theirs, if they performed it. This bears date at the ſame Time and Place with the former, and ſhews how cautious theſe Lords and Great Men then were, not to act any thing in theſe Affairs without the King's expreſs Commiſſion, as well as the authority of the Parliament it ſelf.

There is alſo the Form of the Oath that the Governours were to take, to this effect, viz. faithfully to keep the ſaid Caſtles for the King and his Heirs, and not to deliver them up to any, without the conſent of the King's Council, that is, by the Wiſe Men choſen thereunto, or by the major part of them; which is worth your noting.

[2] There were alſo appointed at this Meeting, by the ſaid Community, Twenty Four Perſons to treat and conſult of an Aid for the King, whoſe Names (as they ſtand in the ſame Annals) are theſe, viz. the Biſhop of Worceſter, the Biſhop of London, the Biſhop of Salisbury, the Earl of Leiceſter, the Earl of Glouceſter, the Earl Mareſchal, Peter of Savoy, the Earl of Hereford, the Earl of Albemarle, the Earl of Wincheſter, the Earl of Oxford, John Fitz-Geofrey, John de Gray, John de Baliol, Roger Mortimer, Roger de Montalt, Roger de Sumerie, Peter Montfort, Thomas de Greſley, Fulco de Kerdiſton, Giles de Argenton, John Kyriel, Philip Baſſet, and Giles de Erdington, all Earls and Barons, or Knights, and Tenants in Capite.

[2] Annal. de Burt. p. 414. Twenty Four Perſons are appointed to conſult about an Aid for the King.

But whither theſe Noblemen ever came to any Reſolutions about giving the King this Aid, we do not find; perhaps they were diverted by [3] his Half-Brothers, viz. Adomar or Athelmar, Biſhop Elect of Wincheſter, Guy de Luſignan, Geofrey de Luſignan, and William de Valence, their refuſing at that time to ſwear to obſerve or give their conſents to the Acts called the Proviſions of Oxford; whereupon the Barons fell into great Heats and Differences, not only againſt thoſe Strangers, but among themſelves; for altho' Prince Edward had ſworn to the late Proviſions, yet he did all he could to go from them; but John, Earl of Warren, had directly refuſed to conſent to them, and Henry, Eldeſt Son to the King of the Romans, ſeemed unreſolved, ſaying, He could by no means take this Oath without his Father's conſent; to whom it was preſently anſwered, That if his Father would not agree with the Baronage, he ſhould not enjoy one Foot of Land in England.

But being diverted by the King's Half-Brothers, who refuſed to ſwear to the Proviſions at Oxford, we do not find any thing farther done in that Affair.

[3] M. P. p. 970, 971. Prince Edward endeavours all he can to go from the ſaid Proviſions, and ſome other great Lords refuſe alſo to conſent to them.

[4] And further, the King's Half-Brothers utterly refuſed to deliver up the Caſtles and Wardſhips which the King had beſtowed upon them: This produced very hard Words between them and the Earl of Leiceſter, inſomuch that he plainly told William de Valence, (who took upon him more than the reſt) that he ſhould either part with the Caſtles he detained from the King, or with his Head; which was alſo made good by all the Earls and Barons there preſent; this ſtruck ſuch a Terror into theſe Noblemen, that they, with the Poictovins, fearing the whole Body of the People would riſe againſt them, and then no Caſtles they had would be ſtrong enough to defend them, reſolved to ſteal away privately, whilſt the reſt of the Lords were at Dinner, which they did, taking Refuge at firſt with their Brother, the Biſhop Elect at Wincheſter; but being perſued thither by the Barons, with Horſe and Arms, and (who had now choſen Hugh Bigod Juſtitiary) they quickly found that place too hot for them; ſo going from thence to London, under the ſafe Conduct of the Anno Dom. MCCLVIII. the Barons, they ſtayed ſome time at the Biſhop of Winchester's Houſe in Southwark to refreſh themſelves, and there inviting ſeveral of the Great Men to an Entertainment, divers of them were thought to be there poyſoned by the Poictovins their Servants, as appear'd pretty plainly by the ſtrange and ſudden Deaths of thoſe Noblemen not long after.

They obtain the King's ſafe Conduct, and are guarded to the Sea-ſide by ſeveral Noblemen.

[5] But the King's Brothers having obtain'd his ſafe Conduct, which bore date the Fifth of July, whereby Humfrey de Bohun, Earl of Hereford and Eſſex; John, Earl of Warren; William de Fordz, Earl of Albemarle, and other Nobles were aſſigned to guard and conduct them to the Sea-ſide; from thence they paſſed over to Bologne, where they were fain to ſtay ſome time, expecting the King of France's Safe-Conduct to carry them thither, but that was for a while refuſed; he being then exaſperated againſt them, by his Queen, becauſe they had defam'd her Siſter the Queen of England; but in the mean time the Barons blocked them up there both by Sea and Land, to hinder their return into England.

[5] Rot. Pat. 42. Hen. 3. M. 5. Vid. Dr. B's Appen. N. 194. where it is printed at large.

But we will now look back on what the Barons and Community of the Kingdom had farther done at Oxford, before they roſe; where they enter'd [1] into an Oath of Confederacy or Aſſociation, to obſerve the Proviſions there lately made; the Form of which was as follows.

[1] Annal. Burt. p. 413.

The Form of the Confederacy or Aſſociation entered into by the Barons.

'We (ſuch and ſuch there named) do make known to all People, 'that we have ſworn upon the Holy Goſpels, and ſo being obliged 'together by that Oath, we promiſe in good Faith, that each of 'us, and all together, will aid and aſſiſt one another, and that we 'will do Right to our ſelves and others againſt all Men, without 'taking any thing for the ſame, which we cannot do without miſdo-'ing; ſaving the Faith we owe to the King and the Crown: and we 'farther Promiſe, upon the ſame Oath, that we will not take any 'thing from each other, either in Land or Moveables (i. e. Goods) 'whereby this Oath may be diſturbed, or any ways impaired; and 'if any ſhall do contrary hereunto, we will hold him for our mor-'tal Enemy.

They alſo appointed a new Oath for the Twenty Four Chief Governours; which was to this effect:

The Form of the Oath to be taken by the Twenty Four Chief Governours.

'Every one of them was to ſwear upon the Holy Goſpels, that to 'the Honour of God, and for keeping Faith to the King, and for the 'Profit of the Realm, he would ordain and treat with thoſe that 'had ſworn before, about the Reformation and Amendment of the 'State of the Kingdom; and that he would not deſiſt from that 'Work, for any Gift, Promiſe, Love, or Hatred, nor for the Power 'of any Man; nor for Gain, or Loſs; but that he would Loyally '(that is legally and faithfully) do according to the Tenor of the 'King's Letter or Charter, which he had lately Granted and Made.

Id. ib. There is alſo to be found the Oath, which was at that time adminiſtred to the Chief Juſtice of England, in this Form.

The

Anno Dom. MCCLVIII.

The High or Chief-Justice of England shall swear,

'That he shall well and faithfully to his Power do whatever appertaineth to his Office of Justitiary, and do right to all Men, to the Advantage and Benefit of the King and Kingdom, according to the Provisions lately made, and others to be made by the Twenty four, and by the Council of the King and Great Men of the Land; who had sworn to aid and maintain him in these things.

The Form of the Oath to be taken by the Chief Justitiary of England.

Then follows the Oath of the Chancellour of England to this effect, 'That he shall seal no Writs without the Command of the King and his Council, some of whom shall be then present; nor seal the Grant of any Great Ward, or Great * ——— nor of Escheats, without the Assent of the Council, or the major part of them; nor shall seal any thing contrary to the Ordinances, &c. made or to be made by the Twenty four, or the greater part of them; nor shall take any Reward, but such as had been given formerly to other Chancellours: And that if he shall take to him an Assistant or Deputy, it shall be according to a Form to be provided by the said Council.

The Oath of the Chancellour.

* Perhaps the Word here wanting may be Marriage.

When these Twenty four Governours had by these their Ordinances procured their Friends and Confidents to be made Constables of all the King's Castles and Places of Strength in the Nation, and had also provided themselves of a Justitiary and Chancellour for their purpose, and bound them by Oath to act according to their Dictates, they then (if any credit may be given to [3] Matt. Westminster) held continual Parliaments without the King's Consent, took to themselves the King's Escheats and Wards, and gave to their Sons and Relations all Churches in the Patronage of the King.

The Barons Practices to advance themselves and their Relations.

[3] Sub Anno 1265.

But to return to the History; though it is certain from [4] Matt. Paris, That upon the sudden Flight of the King's Half-Brothers to Winchester and the Barons pursuing them thither, That the Parliament at Oxford then broke up in Confusion; yet it appears from the MS. † Annals of Winchester in the Cottonian Library, as also from another nameless ‖ Chronicle in the same Place; that this Parliament met again presently after at Winchester, and there made an Ordinance for the Banishment of the King's Half-Brothers above-mentioned; but Adomar, Bishop Elect of that City, though by reason of his Character, he was excus'd from that Sentence, yet voluntarily underwent the same Fortune, and passed over beyond Sea along with them; and then the King and his Son Prince Edward were throughly reconciled in the Chapter-House of that Cathedral, after which, about the Fifteenth of July the Parliament broke up.

And I suppose it was from hence that (as [5] Matt. Paris relates) certain Commissioners were sent on the Behalf of the general Body of England to the City of London; and the MS. Annals of that City, tell us, they were the Earl-Mareschal Simon Mountfort, and John Fitz-Geoffrey, and some others, who, producing the Charter lately sealed by the King and his Son Prince Edward, in confirmation of the late Oxford-Provisions, in a great Assembly or Common-Council of the Citizens at Guild-hall, then asked of them, whither they would adhere to, and faithfully observe the same Statutes, and bravely Anno Dom. MCCLVIII. bravely reſiſt all ſuch as would oppoſe them, and to that end afford the Barons an effectual Aſſiſtance when ever there was Occaſion? To all which the Citizens then freely aſſented; and in token thereof oblig'd themſelves by a Charter under the Common-Seal of the City: It is not therefore to be thought criminal in them, if they afterwards proved very zealous for theſe Proviſions, ſince the King and Prince had then agreed to them; and that they were deſign'd highly beneficial for the whole Kingdom, tho' upon Tryal they did not prove ſo.

[1] M. P. p. 978. V. Ad p. 215. The Community of England write Letters to the Pope to excuſe their late Reformation of the Kingdom without his Conſent.

[1] About the ſame time the Community of Earls, Barons, Great Men and others of the Kingdom of England, wrote Letters to the Pope to excuſe themſelves as to what they had done, which were to this Effect, 'That altho' his Holineſs had lately ſent Mr. Herlot '(or Arlot) his Sub-Deacon and Notary, who had admoniſh'd and 'induc'd them to aſſiſt the King in the Proſecution of the Affair of 'Sicily, which he had undertaken without their Advice and Conſent, 'nay, and againſt their Wills: Yet out of Reverence to him and the Holy See, they thought fit to return this Anſwer; 'That if by their 'Advice the King would reform the Kingdom, and his Holineſs 'would mitigate the Conditions contain'd in his Bull of the Grant of 'Sicily, ſince they were beyond the King's Power to perform; That 'then according to the Terms of the ſaid Reformation and Mitigation, 'they would effectually aſſiſt the King: But ſeeing that He had conſented to chuſe twelve, and the Barons to chuſe twelve others, 'by whom the Reformation of the Nation was to be made; and 'that he had named Adomar, the Biſhop Elect of Wincheſter, and his 'Brothers, in the Number of theſe Twelve; and that they (but more 'eſpecially the ſaid Elect) had ſollicited the King to break his Oath, 'and go from the Promiſes he had already made; and that he had a-'nimated Prince Edward, and ſome others of the Nobility againſt 'them, to the Deſtruction of the Kingdom, and the Hindrance of 'the intended Reformation, and this by falſe Cavils and cunning 'Inſinuations; ſo that of this Biſhop Elect it might be ſaid, That 'this is the man who had troubled the Land, and ſhaken the King-'doms.

Adomar Biſhop Elect of Wincheſter accuſed for tempting the King to break his Oath.

They farther complain of the Exorbitancies of the reſt of the King's Half-Brethren and their Officers.

'They therefore ſignified unto the Pope, that the Offences of theſe 'Brethren were grown ſo great, as that the Cry of the Poor aſcen-'ded to Heaven againſt them; that their Miniſters and Officers were 'rather to be called Thieves and Ruffians who prey'd upon the Poor, 'enſnar'd the Simple, encourag'd the Wicked, oppreſs'd the Innocent, 'triumph'd in the worſt Actions, and rejoic'd when they had done ill, 'than any thing leſs: Therefore the Community aforeſaid conſidering 'that a Common-weal was a certain Body which grew up by Divine Bene-'ficence, and that it was not expedient, there ſhould be any claſhing 'amongſt the Members of the ſame Body, they had cauſed the King 'to ſummon the ſaid Elect, and his Brothers as Diſturbers of the publick 'Peace, to anſwer their Accuſers according to the Laws and Cuſtoms 'of the Kingdom; yet ſo, that if they deſired it, they might have leave 'to depart, who, rather than they would ſtand to, or undergo the 'Rigour of Juſtice, went out of the Nation; and therefore now they 'declared their Intentions to hinder the ſaid Elect from returning 'again; who (they urg'd) was the chief Cauſe of all this Diſtur-

And therefore declare their Intentions to hinder the ſaid Biſhop Elect from returning hither again.

'bance, and would certainly undo, if ever he return'd, what they had taken so much Pains happily to effect, since he and his Brothers 'had already so far infatuated the King and his Son Prince Edward, 'that not only their Insolencies remain'd unpunish'd, but (which was 'worse, and was indeed terrible to hear) if any Man being wrong'd 'by them, complain'd against them, the King, instead of punishing 'the Offenders (as he ought to have done) rather took their parts, 'and defended them against the Complainants; and instead of an 'equal Judge, shew'd himself an Adversary; so that they concluded 'with heaping more Crimes upon the Elect; as that he had terribly 'violated the Liberties of the Church, imprison'd and wounded 'Clerks, to the Prejudice of the Crown, which had the sole Power 'of imprisoning; and therefore they beseech his Holiness by the 'Fulness of his Power, wholly to remove him from the Administra-'tion of the Church of Winchester (he having receiv'd it by the mu-'nificence of the Apostolick See) lest worse things might happen, 'and they his most devoted Supplicants should be forc'd to do it 'by other means; and further let him know for certain, That tho' 'the King and the greater men of the Kingdom should consent to his 'Return, yet the Community thereof would in no wise permit his En-'trance into it; therefore pray'd, that he might be remov'd without 'any Scandal, seeing he was not a Consecrated Bishop.

Anno Dom. MCCLVIII.

The many Offences of him and his Brethren.

To these Letters Eleven great Persons put their Seals, and witnessed them on behalf, and instead of the whole Community.

Of these Eleven, Eight were of the Number of the Twenty four, viz.

Richard Clare, Earl of Glocester and Hereford.	John de Plasey, Earl of Warwick.
Simon Montfort, Earl of Leicester.	Hugh Bigod, Justitiary of England,
Roger Bigod, Mareschal of England.	John Fitz-Geoffrey, and
Humphrey Bohun, Earl of Hereford and Essex.	Peter Montfort.

The other Three were of the Fifteen of the King's Council chosen by four of the said Twenty four, viz.

William de Forz, Earl of Albemarle, Peter of Savoy, Earl of Richmond, and James Aldithley or Audley.

And further, in Pursuance of this Complaint, [2] the said Great Men of England fearing lest the Elect of Winchester should make haste to Rome, and by the Promise of a great Sum of Money to the Pope and Cardinals, obtain his Consecration, that so he might more effectually prejudice them, they sent four skilful and eloquent Knights, Men of Worth and Credit, to present the above-mention'd Epistle to the Pope and Roman Court; and, when they had fully declared the Cause of their Errand, they added greater Wickednesses which the Elect and his Brothers had committed in England, that is to say, Homicide or Murther, Rapines, Oppressions and other Injuries to the Subjects; and that the King would not restrain their Violence; Nor did they forget to tell the Pope of a great Injury they had done to Mr. Euſtace of Lex, the Archbiſhop of Canterbury's Official; for which all that abetted it were Excommunicated through all the Province of Canterbury, and at Oxford before the Univerſity: And they further told the Pope, that one of the Brothers, *viz. [4] It had been further ordain'd in the late Parliament held at Oxford, that all Exceſſes, Tranſgreſſions and Injuries done or committed, as well by Juſtices, Sheriffs, Bayliffs, and other Perſons in the Kingdom, ſhould be inquired into by four Knights in every County by Juries, to be ſummoned by the Sheriffs to come before them; and the Inquiſitions ſo made were to be ſealed with their own Seals, and the Seals of the Jurors to be deliver'd in their own proper Perſons at Weſtminſter to the King's Council Eight Days after Michaelmaſs, and [5] Writs were iſſued out to four Knights in every County to that purpoſe, dated the fourth of Auguſt, who made their Inquiſitions and Returns accordingly; but what was done upon the Return of theſe Writs and Inquiſitions, I find not.

But I cannot here omit another memorable old Engliſh Record in Saxon Characters of this Year, [2] which Dr. Brady hath either careleſly or elſe wilfully paſſed by, as perhaps not liking the Contents of it, being the King's Charter or Declaration to the Clergy and Laiety of Huntingtonſhire, in which he confirms all that his Counſellors, or the major part of them (that were choſen by himſelf and by the * People of the Land) had done, or ſhould do for the Honour of God, and for the Amendment of the Kingdom; and that it ſhall be inviolably obſerv'd and perform'd in every particular; and further commands all his Liege-People by the Fealty they owe to him, that they ſteadfaſtly hold, and ſwear to maintain the Ordinances which were made or ſhould be made by the ſaid Counſellors, or the major part of them, as is already mention'd; and that all Men aſſiſt each other to perform the ſame according to their late Oath againſt all Men that ſhould oppoſe or hinder the ſame: And that no Perſon whatſoever ſhould be damnified in any wiſe on this account; and if any Perſons ſhould oppoſe themſelves againſt the Premiſes, he wills and commands that all his Liege-People ſhould hold them for deadly Enemies; and becauſe he will have theſe Preſents the more firm and laſting, he ſends them this Writ patent, or open, ſealed with his Seal to be ‖ ſafely kept in † ſtore; Witneſs the King at London the Eighteenth of October in the Forty ſecond Year of his Coronation. Norwich, and Mareſchal of England; Peter of Savoy; William of Forz, Earl of Albemarle; John of Pleſſeiz, Earl of Warwick; and many other Earls and Barons, whoſe Names are too tedious here to be recited. Anno Dom. MCCLVIII.

There is alſo a Clauſe at the end of this Record, whereby it appears, that the ſame was ſent into every Shire of England, and alſo into Ireland; which is a plain proof, that that part of it which was then under the Engliſh Government, was obliged by the Laws made by the King and his Parliament of England, without the Conſent of the Parliament there. The Iriſh, obliged by the Laws of Parliament made in England.

This Writ or Charter, as appears by the Date, was made by the King and his new Counſellors, to confirm and reinforce the late Proviſions made at Oxford; and ſince it is therein expreſs'd, that theſe Counſellors were choſen by the Folk or People of the Land, it ſeems, that the Commons (as we now call them) had alſo a hand in the making of them.

I do not find any thing elſe conſiderable to have happen'd this Year, yet I will give you here ſome things of leſs Moment, ſince they may prove either Inſtructive, or at leaſt diverting to the Reader.

[3] About this time the Earl of Glouceſter was taken ſtrangely ill, ſo that many ſuppoſed him poyſon'd by ſome of the Poictovins, for he broke out all over in Boils, inſomuch that he loſt both his Hair and Nails: However, by the Care of a skilful Phyſician he eſcaped with his Life; but this much is certain, that many Noblemen died ſuddenly about that time, as I have ſaid before, who were alſo thought to have been poyſon'd. [3] Id. p. 974. M. W. The Earl of Glouceſter being ſuppoſed to be poyſon'd, hardly recovers.

[4] But about the ſame time his Brother William, a young Nobleman, of great hopes, died, under great ſuſpicions of Poyſon; the Symptoms being much the ſame as thoſe of the Earl his Brother, which highly exaſperated the Nobility againſt thoſe Strangers, whom they ſuppoſed to have done it. [4] M. W.

[5] About this time likewiſe there fell out an accident, which much diſturbed the Earl of Leiceſter and the Barons, ſince it ſhew'd them the King's private Reſentment. It ſeems one Day, as the King was going by Water from Weſtminſter, He was ſurpriſed by a great and ſudden Storm of Thunder and Lightning, of which He being naturally very fearful, commanded the Barge-men to ſet him on Shore at the next Stairs, which happen'd to be Durham-Houſe, where the Earl of Leiceſter then lay; he hearing the King was there, preſently ran down to receive him, and finding him ſomewhat frightned with the Thunder, ſaid unto him, Your Majeſty need not be afraid, the Storm is over. No, Montfort, (ſaid the King, with a ſevere look,) by God's Head, I fear not the Thunder, ſo much as I do thee: At which words the Earl being out of Countenance, ſaid, Sir, I am ſorry you ſhould fear your true Friend and humble Servant, more than the Enemies and Deſtroyers of your Kingdom. It was thought the King ſaid this, becauſe He looked upon the Earl of Leiceſter as the Head of the Party againſt the Poictovins, and the chief Promoter of their Baniſhment. And this may ſerve as a Caution to Great Men, not to become terrible to the Princes they ſerve, ſince whomſoever they Fear, they alſo Hate, and will be reveng'd of them at one time or other. [5] *M. [1] Nothing happen'd remarkable this Year in relation to Wales, but that the Welſh and Engliſh meeting upon a Parly, or Treaty of Peace, which was then held at Emlyn, between a Baron then called Patrick de Canton, for the King; and David, Brother to the Prince of Wales, with ſome others of his Council; Patrick finding the Engliſh to be ſuperiour in number to the Welſh, took the advantage, and ſlew a great many of them; but David, and ſome other of the Lords eſcaping, raiſed the Country, and perſuing Patrick, killed him with moſt of his Men. [2] Yet notwithſtanding Prince Llewelyn being deſirous of Peace, was willing to purchaſe it with his Money, and not long after offer'd the King Four Thouſand Marks for all Damages, and to his Queen Two Hundred Marks, and to Prince Edward Three Hundred Marks for their Good-will; but the King refuſed to accept of it, ſaying, What is this to all our Loſſes?

[3] As for Foreign Affairs this Year, the King receiv'd the ill News that Manfred, Son of the Emperor Frederick, was, by the Biſhops and Great Men of the Country, choſen King of Sicily; and that he had made Arch-Biſhops and Biſhops without the Pope's conſent, and that in contempt of his Prohibition to the contrary, they had given that King all due Obedience; and beſides that, the Nobility of that Kingdom took no notice of Earl Edmund, on whom the Pope had conferr'd it, but did their Homage and Fealty to Manfred, and gave him Poſſeſſion of all their Cities and Caſtles.

[3] M. P. p. 979. Manfred, Son to the Emperor Frederick, choſen King of Sicily, againſt the Pope's Will.

The Civil Affairs of this Year proving ſo various and turbulent, gave the leſs opportunity for Eccleſiaſtical; only [4] about the Feaſt of Aſcenſion, Sewal, Archbiſhop of York, departed this Life, being a Prelate of great Piety and Conſtancy of Mind; he died Excommunicated by the Pope, becauſe he refuſed to obey his unjuſt Commands, nor would beſtow the Revenues and Preferments of the Church upon unworthy and unknown Italians: at his Death he made a devout Prayer to God for Abſolution from all his Sins, and appeal'd to him from the Pope's unjuſt Sentence, calling Heaven and Earth to witneſs, how unjuſtly he was perſecuted; and then, after the Example of Robert, Biſhop of Lincoln, ſent the Pope a Letter, full of Complaints and wholſome Admonitions, but all to no purpoſe. [5] However, tho' he died thus Excommunicate, yet the Sentence being unjuſt, our Author reckons him a Saint, and relates a Miracle done by him before his Deceaſe. Some time after which, the Chapter of York choſe Godfrey de Kniveton for their Arch-biſhop, who going to Rome, tho' not without great Charges, yet obtain'd his Confirmation, and ſoon return'd home. [1] Alſo this Year the Dearneſs and Scarcity of Corn encreaſed more and more, by reaſon of the wetneſs of the Seaſon which ſpoiled the Grain that was then abroad at All-hollontide, whereby the Famine became ſo great, that a World of poor People died of Hunger.

But they ſuſpected, that his coming hither might be to pour out his Indignation and Revenge upon the Barons, Barons, for their behaviour towards his Father King John, and his Brother King Henry; and they were alſo afraid leſt he might divide them, and bring off many to be his Followers, and ſo fruſtrate all their Purpoſes. Anno Dom. MCCLIX.

[3] About the Feaſt of St. Hilary (that is January the thirteenth) they again entered into a common and ſolemn Conſultation and Debate, about his coming over into England; and thereupon ſent the Biſhop of Worceſter, the Abbot of St. Edmunds-bury, Peter of Savoy, and John Manſel, to him, to know the cauſe of his ſo ſudden and unexpected coming over, and how long he deſigned to ſtay here, and [4] to acquaint him, that before his coming hither, he muſt take an Oath to join with, and aſſiſt the Barons in compleating and eſtabliſhing their late Proviſions and Reformation. But King Richard being come toward the Sea-Coaſt with a well equipp'd Guard of good Horſe, carried himſelf very haughtily towards theſe Meſſengers, ſwearing by the Throat of God, that he would not take the Oath they required of him, nor would he tell them how long he intended to ſtay in England; and farther added, that thoſe Nobles ought not to reform the Kingdom without him, nor preſumptuouſly undertake ſuch a difficult buſineſs as that was, unleſs they had his Preſence and Aſſent.

[3] Id. ib. And reaſſume the Debate after the Holy-Days, and agree to ſend Meſſengers to treat with him about it.

[4] Ib. p. 983.

King Richard carries himſelf very haughtily towards theſe Commiſſioners.

[5] The Nobility, upon hearing of this, fitted out Ships and Galleys from the Cinque-Ports, and other Places, reſolving to fight him, and hinder his Landing if poſſible; and likewiſe rais'd an Army, both of Horſe and Foot to oppoſe him: But when he had certain Intelligence of theſe Preparations, he became more calm and eaſie; and through the perſwaſion of his Friends, engaged by his Charter to take ſuch an Oath as the Barons required of him; ſo on the Seven and twentieth of January, He with his Queen, and Son Edmund, Landed at Dover, with only Two German Earls, and Eight Knights, beſides their Retinue, but they were not permitted to go into the Caſtle; the next Day King Henry met him at Canterbury, and both Kings went into the Chapter-Houſe there, and then Richard Earl of Glouceſter called upon the King of Almain, by the Name of Richard, Earl of Cornwall, (without ever having any regard to his being Crowned King of the Romans) to take the ſaid Oath according to his Promiſe; which was in theſe words, viz.

[5] Id. ib. Whereupon the Nobility ſend out Ships and raiſe an Army to ſtop his Landing. Yet upon his engaging to take the ſame Oath as the Barons had done, he is permitted to come.

The Earl of Glouceſter calls him by no other Title than Richard Earl of Cornwall.

[1] Hear ye, all People, that I Richard, Earl of Cornwal, do here ſwear upon the Holy-Goſpels, that I will be faithful and diligent, together with You the Barons, to reform the Kingdom of England, hitherto too much out of Order by the Council of Evil Men; and I will be your effectual Helper to expel all Rebels and Diſturbers of the ſame Kingdom, and will obſerve this Oath inviolably, under pain of loſing all the Lands I have in England.

[1] Id. ib. Whereupon he takes an Oath to join with the Barons in the Reformation of the Kingdom.

[2] On Candlemaſs-Day following, the Two Kings, with their Queens, made their publick Entry into London, and were received with great Joy, becauſe King Richard had not brought his Half-Brothers over with him, as was expected.

[2] Id. ib. The 2 Kings with their Queens make their Entry into London.

[3] Eight

Anno Dom. MCCLIX.

[3] Eight Days after this, the Nobility, as they had agreed before at Oxford, met in Parliament at London; where the Earl of Leiceſter, having been for ſome time abſent beyond Sea, alſo appear'd, bringing over along with him the Dean of Bourges, one of the French King's Privy-Council, to treat of compoſing the Differences between his Prince, and the King of England; the occaſion of which was this.

[3] Id. ib. The Nobility meet at London in Parliament, and treat about compoſing the differences betw. K. H. and the K. of France.

[4] About the beginning of November laſt paſt, the Earl, with the Biſhops of Worceſter and Lincoln, and Roger, Earl Mareſchal, had been ſent, by Advice of the Baronage then Aſſembled at London, to meet the Kings of France and Almain at Cambray: But the Two Kings not coming thither, and nothing been done, all the reſt return'd home, but only the Earl of Leiceſter ſtayed behind, and went into France to treat further about theſe Affairs of the French Territories detain'd by that King; and he having been long expected by the Barons, now again return'd to their great Satisfaction: in this Parliament there was no ſmall debate about the Matter in difference between the Two Kings of England and France; and what had been before treated of beyond Sea, was now approv'd of, and thereupon a Peace was concluded on St. Valentine's Day, provided both the Princes would conſent to what their Agents had agreed on and determined.

[4] Id. p. 980. Ambaſſadors had been before ſent into France, to treat about it, but it came to nothing.

A great debate in this Parliam about the difference between the K.s of France and England.

[5] In the beginning of April, by the Command and Advice of the King, and whole Barbnage, the Earls of Glouceſter and Leiceſter, John Manſel, Peter of Savoy, and Robert Wallerand, were ſent over to the King of France, and his Great Parliament (or Aſſembly of Eſtates) holden at that time; and they carried along with them King Henry's Charter of Reſignation of Normandy, with Letters Credential to put an end to all Diſputes that were then, and had been for a long time depending between the ſaid Kings, on that Account; as alſo to confirm and eſtabliſh what had been lately agreed on by their Agents.

[5] Id. p. 986. Ambaſſadors appointed by the K and the Baronage, to go to the K. of France and his Parliam. who carry the K.'s Reſignation of Normandy upon certain Conditions.

[1] But becauſe theſe Envoys were (for ſome reaſon or other not mention'd) ſoon parted from each other, what was done in this Matter was not certainly known, or at leaſt not made publick; yet this much appears from the ſame Author, that when all things were in a manner agreed on between the Two Kings, the [2] Counteſs of Leiceſter (Wife to Simon Montfort) would not reſign her Right expectant in Normandy to the King of France; whereupon aroſe a mighty Quarrel between the Earls of Glouceſter and Leiceſter, to the great ſatisfaction of the French; but at laſt (tho' with much difficulty) it was taken up and compromiſed by the Mediation of Friends.

[1] Id. ib.

[2] Id. p. 987. But the Agreement of the Kings is broke off for the preſent, becauſe the Counteſs of Leiceſter would not reſign her expectant Right.

Matthew Paris ending his Hiſtory about the middle of this Year, hath left the Account of this great Tranſaction with France very imperfect, and therefore we muſt make it up as well as we can from William Riſhanger his Continuator, and Matt. of Weſtminſter; who both agree, that King Henry, his Queen, and Richard his Brother, with a vaſt Retinue, paſſed over from Dover into France preſently after Martinmaſs, leaving the Cuſtody of the Kingdom to the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and Hugh Biged the Juſtitiary. But I cannot, in this place, omit a remarkable Tranſaction, which was performed here, not long before the King's going beyond Sea, tho' I cannot find Matt. Paris here ends his Hiſtory.

The K. Q. and K. Rich. go to France to conclude the Treaty with that King.

find it in any other Author, but the MS. Chronicle of the City of London; that about the Feast of St. Simon, a great Parliament was held at Westminster, where the King being present, with many of his Earls and Barons, and an * innumerable multitude of other People, he there caused the late Agreement with the Barons, (by which I suppose this Author means the late Oxford-Provisions) to be openly and distinctly read; then the Archbishop of Canterbury, and divers other Bishops, being in their Pontificalibus, pronounced Sentence of Excommunication against all such as should presume to act any thing to the contrary. Anno Dom. MCCLIX.

* Cum innumerabili Populo.

And in the beginning of November the King came to St. Paul's Cross, and the Folkmote of the City being there Assembled, he took his leave of them, for he was then going beyond Sea; and at the same time he freely granted to the City divers new Privileges relating to that great Body. But to return to our History.

So soon as the King arrived, he sent Ambassadors to the King of France to demand Restitution of the Territories which had been wrongfully taken away from his Father King John and Himself, by Philip and Lewis his late Predecessors, as also by Himself, and which were by him still detain'd; the French alledg'd many things against it; and particularly, that the antient Donation of Normandy was never spontaneous, but had been forcibly extorted by Duke Rollo from the King of France.

The Argum. of the French against restoring any thing to K. Henry.

[3] Upon this King Henry having neither Courage enough to undertake, nor Money enough to maintain a War to recover his lost Rights, came in Person to the King of France's Parliament at Abbeville, and there made a Peace, and firm Agreement with that King, upon these following Conditions, viz. That the King of England should resign his Right to the Dukedom of Normandy, and Earldom of Anjou, upon payment of Three Hundred Thousand smaller Pounds of Turon Money; and in consideration of which King Lewis promised him the restitution of certain Territories in Gascony, of the yearly Value of Twenty Thousand Pounds Sterling Money; by which means having fully and absolutely resign'd his Right to all the rest of the Dominions in the King of France's Possession, King Henry from thenceforward shortned his Stile in his Patents and Letters, and no longer called himself Duke of Normandy and Earl of Anjou.

[3] Id. ib. Who comes to the K. of France, and makes a full Agreement with him for all that had been taken away, with the Conditions thereof.

[4] But Walter Heminsford in his Chronicle (tho' he allows the Agreement abovementioned, yet) says, that K. Henry soon repenting him of it, would never receive the Money, and that he still used the aforesaid Titles in all his Writings, as long as he lived; But I doubt in this he is mistaken, for it is certain, that this Year he alter'd his Effigies upon his Seal, which instead of a Sword, carried a Scepter in its Hand, as may be seen by the Draught thereof in Speed's Chronicle.

[4] T. 3. c. 28. Inter Scriptor. Oxon. Edit. Vol. II. Walt. Heminsford's mistake concerning this Affair.

[5] Yet T. Wikes with greater Probability relates, that the King, so soon as he came over into France, sent Robert of Gravesend, Bishop of London to Paris, to Treat about the abovementioned Territories; and that when the business was near finished, the King of France further insisted, that besides King Henry's own Release of his Right to those Territories, he should also procure the Charter of Prince Edward his Son, with that of King Richard, and of Simon Earl of Leicester, and their Heirs.

[5] Ibid. Sub hoc anno. A more exact Account from T. Wikes's Chronicle.

But

Anno Dom. MCCLIX.

But upon the Earl of Leiceſter's oppoſing this Agreement above-mention'd, by reaſon of what future claim might occur to him and his Heirs, in right of his Wife, the King's Siſter, as has been already ſaid, this Peace did not then take effect; through which obſtacle, the King and Queen ſtaying beyond Sea till Eaſter following, they there ſpent a great deal of Money to little purpoſe.

But tho' this Treaty was not at that time fully concluded, yet it is certain it was made an end of, and ratified by the beginning of the following Year, as you will find anon: And I have been the more particular in this great Tranſaction, becauſe Dr. Brady has given us ſuch an imperfect Account of it.

I ſhall conclude this Year with ſome Eccleſiaſtical Affairs not mention'd by our Hiſtorians, but is found on [1] Record. Adomar, the Biſhop Elect of Wincheſter, coming to Rome, had ſo far prevail'd with the Pope as to ſend one Velaſca his Penitentiary and Chaplain, with Letters directed to the King and Barons, to intercede with them for his re-admiſſion into England, and enjoyment of his Biſhoprick: But the anſwer both of the King and the Barons to this Letter and Mediation, was a flat denial, tho' modeſtly drawn up; and it is printed in Dr. B.'s Anſwer to Mr. Petyt's Rights of the Commons, &c. on which Letter I will alſo make ſome Obſervations hereafter.

[1] Cl. 43. Hen. 3. M. 4. Dorſ. Adomar deſires to be admitted into England, but is deny'd.

But I ſhall at preſent add ſomewhat more concerning this Adomar, from [2] Matt. Paris, in whoſe abſence the Monks choſe Henry de Wengham, then Dean of St. Martin's, and Lord Chancellor, for their Biſhop, and the King conſented to it, but ſtill ſaving the Right of Adomar, if he could obtain his Conſecration to that Biſhoprick from the Pope; but the Chancellor refuſed it, becauſe the Title was Litigious, and likewiſe excuſed himſelf as being unfit for ſuch a Dignity, as the cure of Souls, having read but little Divinity, nor ſtudied the Scriptures as he ought; yet this ſeems but a politick fetch, for Fulk, Biſhop of London, dying ſome time after, he accepted of that Biſhoprick, notwithſtanding his former pretended Inſufficiencies, and procured the King's Letters [3] Patents, by Advice of his Council, to hold and retain all his former Eccleſiaſtical Dignities and Benefices (whereof the King was Patron) together with the Biſhoprick, for ſo long time as the Pope ſhould pleaſe to give him a Diſpenſation for it.

[2] P. 982. The Monks choſe Henry de Wengham, Bp. of Wincheſter, who refuſes it.

[3] Vid D. B.'s Ap. N. 199. where it is at large.

[4] Whilſt Biſhop Adomar was beyond Sea, the King looking upon the Biſhoprick as good as void, ſeized the Temporalities and Stock belonging to the ſaid Elect, and granted Five Thouſand Sheep, Two Hundred Cows, and Ten Bulls to Fulk, Biſhop Elect of London, to Stock the Lands belonging to that See, warranting them againſt all the ſucceeding Biſhops of Wincheſter; yet with this Proviſo, that they ſhould be reſtored to his Brother Adomar, when ever he ſhould be confirmed by the Pope in that Biſhoprick. This appears upon Record; and though the Roll be not worth the inſerting here, yet you may find it in Dr. Brady, to whom I refer the Reader, who deſires farther ſatisfaction therein.

[4] Id. ib. N. 200. has the Patent at large. Bp Adomar's Stock granted to the Biſhop of London, and on what Conditions.

[5] The Continuator of Matt. Paris, concludes this Year with a ſhort account of the ſad condition under which England had lately groan'd, through the domineering Power of the Poictovins and Romans, but eſpecially of Adomar, Elect of Wincheſter above-mention'd, and William de Valence, the King's Half-Brothers, as alſo of Peter of

[5] P. 989. The ſad Condition under which Engl. lately groan'd.

Savoy

Savoy, the Queen's Uncle, who treated the King's Subjects, as well Eccleſiaſticks as Laicks, very ſeverely; for if any one who had ſuffer'd Wrong came to the Seneſchal or Steward of William de Valence, to complain of any Injury done them, they only receiv'd this Anſwer, If I do you Wrong, who ſhall Right you, whatſoever my Lord pleaſes, pleaſes the King; whereas it ſhould have been the quite contrary.

Anno Dom. MCCLIX.

Likewiſe in thoſe Days [1] the Pope's Legates, and the Italians, ſtrangely domineer'd over both Clergy and Laiety, exceedingly grieving them in Preſentations to Advowſons, providing ample Benefices for their Friends and Relations, according to their own Will; but croſſing the Biſhops and Abbots in all things, and perplexing them with frequent Excommunications, whence it happen'd that the Great Men of the Kingdom being provok'd by their Inſolence, were reſolv'd (tho' late) to give ſome redreſs to theſe intolerable Miſchiefs, and at laſt drove ſome of theſe Strangers out of the Kingdom, as will be related in due time, tho' they did not all at once, for at that time only the Poictovins were baniſhed.

[1] Id. ib. As alſo by the domineering Power of the Popes Legates.

Anno Dom. MCCLX.

[2] William of Riſhanger makes the King to have kept his Chriſtmaſs this Year at London, with a multitude of Strangers, but this is a great Miſtake; for as Matt. of Weſtminſter truly reports, (which is alſo confirmed by the Clauſe [3] Rolls of this Year) that he was then at Paris, making a final Concluſion of the late Treaty with the King of France: From hence it appears, that King Henry was from the Nineteenth to the Eight and Twentieth Day of December at Paris, and continued in France and Flanders a great part of this Year.

[2] Ib. W. of Riſhanger makes the K. keep Chriſtm. this Y. at Lond. but is miſtaken, for he kept it at Par.

[3] Cla. 44. H. 3. M. 5. Dorſ. Dr. B.'s compl. Hiſt. p. 636.

Matt. Weſtminſter deſcribes his magnificent Entertainment at Paris, and that King Henry kept his Chriſtmaſs there, with many Noblemen his Attendants, being ſplendidly regal'd by the King of France, they ſometimes feaſting together, and ſometimes treating of Affairs of higheſt Moment; and that then in a great Aſſembly of the Nobility, there was a final Peace and Agreement concluded and ratified by their mutual Charters, teſtified under the Seals of the Noblemen of both Kingdoms; by which the King of England ſurrend'red to his Brother of France, all his Right in Normandy, and his other Territories; in conſideration of which He was to receive a great Summ of Money from the King of France, with divers fertile and opulent Territories in Guienne and Gaſcoigny in exchange.

Mat. of Weſtm. Account of the King's Entertainment at Paris, and what he did there.

But the [4] French Hiſtorians are more exact, and tell us expreſly, that their King, by his Charter then made over to Ours all that part of Guienne on this ſide the Garonne, and on the other ſide Limoſin and Peregord.

[4] Paulus Æmilius in Ludovico San-to. Chezeray. Sub An. 1159. The French Hiſtorians relation of the Treaty betw. K. Lewis, and K. Henry about his Dominions in France.

But I do not find that this Agreement was ever confirm'd by the Prince, or his Uncle Earl Richard, as was at firſt inſiſted on; and then if not, according to the French Maxims, that Kings can only renounce for themſelves, and not for their Heirs, it could only oblige thoſe Princes that made it; and the Annals of St. Auguſtine of Canterbury farther tell us, that this Agreement being chiefly made by the Advice of Richard, Earl of Glouceſter, and without the conſent of the Prince (who then remain'd in England) he was very much incenſed againſt that Earl, and thoſe other Counſellors of the King his Father, who procured it.

Anno Dom. MCCLX.

[5] M. W. King Hen. having done his Homage for the Dutchy of Aquitain, takes his Journ. for Engl. but returns to Paris, on the ſudden Death of the French King's Son.

[5] So ſoon as this Treaty was finiſh'd, King Henry having done his Homage to the King of France for thoſe Countries which he was to enjoy under the Title of Duke of Aquitaine, took his leave of him in order to return into England; but before he could reach the Sea-ſide, he received the News of the ſudden Death of Lewis, eldeſt Son of France, a young Prince of a comely Preſence, and great hopes; at which being much concern'd, he return'd to Paris, and attended as a chief Mourner at his Funeral, and then went back again with a full deſign to go for England, tho' he ſtill met with ſomewhat to retard him, as you will hear preſently.

[1] W. R. p. 990. During the King's Abſence the Great Men ſequeſter the Revenues of the Italian Clergy.

[1] During the King's Abſence, the Great Men had commanded all the Religious Orders, who farmed the Revenues of the Churches poſſeſs'd by the Italians, not to anſwer the Rents to them, but to pay them in at a time and place appointed, to ſuch as ſhould be aſſigned by the Barons to receive them; which if they refuſed to do, they threatned to burn their Houſes and Goods, and to inflict the ſame Puniſhment upon their Perſons as was intended for the Romans; they likewiſe commanded the Biſhops not to interpoſe or concern themſelves for any of the Italians, or their Revenues, upon the like Penalties; and ſo by this ſevere Proviſion or Decree of the Barons, England for almoſt Three Years was freed from theſe Exactors, until Simon Montfort was ſlain, or (as it was believ'd by this Monk) Crowned with Martyrdom.

[2] T. W. M. W. p. 54. * Note, Thom. Wikes places this under the Year 1259. but it is a miſtake. King Henry at St. Omers believing a falſe Report of his Son Edw. Conſpiring againſt him, begins to raiſe an Army, but afterwards is ſatisfied to the contrary by his Son's and the Nobility's Letters. And comes over into Engl. where he is joyfully received.

[2] King Henry being arriv'd (as I ſaid but now) at the Sea-ſide, as far as St. Omers, in order to his return into England, * heard a report (tho' a falſe one) that his Son, Prince Edward, (being diſcontented at his late Agreement with France) had conſpired with ſome of the Chief Noblemen of the Kingdom, to Impriſon or Dethrone him at his Return: to which Rumours giving too much credit, the King began to raiſe an Army for his Defence; but when the Prince his Son, and Earl Richard his Brother had notice of it, having aſſembled moſt of the Nobility to a great Council at London, they preſently cauſed Letters to be written, and ſent to the King, under the Seals of the Prince, and his Brother, with all the reſt of the Great Men there preſent, aſſuring him of their entire Fidelity, and that he might return home with ſafety, whenever he pleaſed; wherewith being very well ſatisfied, he diſmiſſed all his Forces, except Three Hundred Foreign Knights or Horſemen, (beſides his own ordinary Retinue) and took Shipping, and landed at Dover, about the latter end of April, being met and joyfuly received by Prince Edward, and all the reſt of the Nobility; yet it ſeems the King's Suſpicions were not quite removed, for he did not ſo much as ſalute ſome of thoſe that had been formerly moſt in his favour.

[3] M. W. The K. continues in Lond. to ſee the iſſue of the Differences between the Prince and E. of Glouceſter.

[3] In the beginning of May the King came to London, yet went not to his own Palace at Weſtminſter, but ſtayed at the Biſhop of London's Houſe near St. Paul's for about Fifteen Days, till he ſaw what effects thoſe private Differences, that were now riſen among the Nobility might produce; for the Gates and Streets of the City were then guarded, as if it had been a time of actual War; inſomuch that none but Perſons very well known, could go in or out of them; but the reaſon of this Diſturbance was, that there had been ſome time before the K's arrival, a great miſunderſtanding between him and and his Son (who then it ſeems took part with the Earl of Leiceſter, and the Barons) and there was alſo a great Quarrel between Prince Edward and the Earl of Glouceſter, with thoſe of his Party; ſo that each Faction ſtrengthning themſelves, a Civil War had like to have broken out, had it not been for the Mediation of the King of the Romans, who did all he could to keep them in quiet till the King's Return. Not long after, He being come to his Palace at Weſtminſter, the Baronage or Nobility of England were again ſummoned to meet the King at London; when they were aſſembled, the Injuries pretended to be done by Prince Edward to the King his Father, being firſt diſcuſs'd, the Prince offer'd to prove his Innocence before his Father and Uncle, the King of the Romans, and that he was ready to make ſatisfaction for any thing he had done amiſs; affirming, that all the reſt of the Earls and Barons were not of Right his Peers, nor could exerciſe any Authority over him; whereupon the truth of thoſe Accuſations being now throughly canvaſs'd, and they appearing altogether falſe, the Prince was ſoon reconcil'd to the King and Queen, and all the Nobility, except the Earl of Glouceſter, and thoſe of his Faction.

Anno Dom. MCCLX.

Which had like to have cauſed a Civil War, but was prevented by the King of the Romans.

An Aſſembly of the Nobility at London, in which the Prince is clear'd, and throughly reconciled to the King his Father.

[4] The Earl finding he could do no good againſt the Prince, accuſed the Earl of Leiceſter of divers Offences committed againſt the King, as well on this, as on the other ſide the Sea, and a Day was prefix'd for the Earl's Anſwer, wherein he was to clear himſelf from theſe Accuſation; when it came, and that he appear'd ready to ſtand his Tryal, the Earl of Glouceſter, with his Accomplices withdrew their Accuſations, deſiring that the buſineſs might be further adjourn'd till the next Parliament; for he was afraid leaſt if the Earl were acquited, he ſhould recriminate; ſo this Diſturbance being pretty well quieted for the preſent, the Parliament broke up to the King's great ſatisfaction.

[4] Id. ib. The Earl of Glouceſter accuſes the Earl of Leiceſter of many great Offences but a Day being appointed to hear the Accuſation, the Earl of Glouceſter, withdraws it.

[5] About this time, as the City MS. Chronicle relates, the King cauſed a Folkmote of the Citizens to be aſſembled at St. Paul's Croſs, whither he himſelf came with his Brother, King Richard, and divers other Noblemen, and there told them, that all of the Male Sex, above Twelve Years of Age, ſhould take an Oath before the Alderman of their particular Ward, to be faithful to the King, and after his Deceaſe to his Heir, without naming any Perſon; which was done accordingly.

[5] In Libro de Antiquis Leg. The K. cauſes all the Males in the City, above 12 Yea. of Age to take a New Oath of Fealty.

Some time after, Richard, [1] King of the Romans, having now continued in England about a Year and a half, being put in mighty Expectations by the Pope of obtaining the Empire, went beyond Sea about the end of June, with his Queen, for Italy; but being fruſtrated of his main deſigns by the great Factions made againſt him, he ſtayed not long in Germany, but return'd again in October following.

[2] Id. ib. King Richard goes beyond Sea, in hopes to obtain the Empire, but is fruſtrated.

Some time after Michaelmaſs, [2] John, Son to the Earl of Bretaigne, came over hither, and married the Lady Beatrice, the King's ſecond Daughter, and at the Feaſt of St. Edward next following, (which was held with more than ordinary Solemnity,) received the Order of Knighthood, as did alſo the Two Sons of the Earl of Leiceſter. And theſe, together with Prince Edward, went over beyond Sea to a great Tourneament they had appointed there.

[2] T. W. The Earl of Bretaigne arrives in Engl. and marr. the King's ſecond Daughter.

Anno Dom. MCCLX.

About the ſame time alſo there was held a Parliament [3] where, after ſome Debates, a new Juſtitiary, Chancellor, and Treaſurer, were appointed by the Barons, in the places of thoſe that were either lately dead, or elſe prefer'd, or had reſign'd; as Nicholas, Arch-Deacon of Ely was made Keeper of the Great Seal; the Abbot of Peterburgh was appointed Treaſurer, and Hugh d' Eſpenſer chief Juſtitiary.

[3] Id. ib. A Parliament held, wherein ſeveral great Officers are choſen.

[4] This Year, in Autumn, the King of Scots came to London upon divers Accounts, partly to ſee the King and Queen, as alſo to appear and act as Earl of Huntington; but the chief Cauſes were to demand the Sum of Four Thouſand Marks, which he ſaid remain'd yet unpaid of his Wife's Portion; as likewiſe to renew his Demands for Cumberland and Weſtmorland; ſome Days after him, the Queen his Wife arrived, big with Child, having a great deſire to ſee her Relations and Country, and to Lye-in here; they were received with great Solemnity, and certainly the State and Expence muſt be very great, when no leſs than Three King's appear'd at once; and it was ſaid, that from the time of his coming into England, to his return into his own Country, he received Five Pounds a Day for his Expences (which was then more than Forty Pounds now:) this he claim'd as a Right, tho' many affirm'd, that it was no otherwiſe given, than by the King's Bounty; but how he ſucceeded in the Buſineſs he came about, our Author does not tell us.

[4] M. W. The King and Queen of Scots come to Lond. and on what Account.

And are nobly received, with his daily Allowance for his Journey.

[5] As for the Eccleſiaſtical Affairs of this Year, the moſt conſiderable are, that Adomar, Biſhop Elect of Wincheſter, having at laſt obtain'd the Pope's Favour, and receiv'd his Conſecration from his own Hands, took his leave of him in order to return into England, but died by the way at Paris: And his Departure was very grateful to all thoſe, who were for maintaining the late Proviſions at Oxford.

[5] T. W. Adomar Bp. of Wincheſter, receives the Pope's Conſecration, but dies in his return home.

This Year is alſo noted for the Death of divers other conſiderable Noblemen, Biſhops, and Judges, for whoſe Names I refer the Reader to my Author. [1] But it is much more remarkable for the Deceaſe of Pope Alexander IV. to whom ſucceeded Urban IV. who was Conſecrated the fourth of September after.

[1] R. W. The Death of P. Alexander, ſo whom Urban ſucceeds.

This Year, tho' England continued quiet from Civil Wars, yet [2] Prince Llewellyn early in the Spring appear'd in the Field, and paſs'd into South-Wales, and there fell upon Sir Roger Mortimer, the King's Governour in thoſe Parts; and having forcibly diſpoſſeſs'd him of all Buelht, and without any oppoſition taken the Caſtle of Melyenyth, and killed thoſe in the Gariſon, he marched through all South-Wales, making new Conqueſts about Brecknock, and afterwards return'd to his Palace at Aber, betwixt Bangor and Conwey.

[2] Dr. P.'s Chron. Pr. Llewellyn invades the Territories of Sir Roger Mortimer in South-Wales, and takes them.

[3] But when this News came to the King's Ear, he, fearing leſt theſe Diſturbances might end in an Invaſion upon England, iſſued out a Proclamation, that all Perſons that owed Knight-Service ſhould provide all things neceſſary for an Expedition into Wales, to revenge the Injuries the Welſh had done the King there. Then the Earl of Leiceſter was appointed General of the Army, as being the moſt Valiant and experienc'd Commander England then had; but divers Accidents happening which hinder'd this Expedition, ſo it ended in a Truce, tho' but for a ſhort time neither. But we ſhall now return to Matters of far greater Moment at Home.

[3] M. W. The King ſummons all that owed Military Service, to provide for an Expedition into Wales.

The Earl of Leiceſter made General of the Army.

[4] But

[4] But tho' the King, together with the Prince his Son, had ſolemnly ſworn to obſerve the Proviſions of Oxford (as you have already heard) yet He now began to grow grievous weary of them, and was reſolved not to be bound up by them any longer; yet fearing the imputation of Perjury, He had ſent privately the Year before to the Pope to be abſolved from his Oath to the ſaid Proviſions, which was obtain'd about this time, without any great difficulty, both for the King, and Prince Edward his Son: But Pope Alexander deceaſing this laſt Year, before the Diſpenſation could be ſeal'd, the King was forc'd to ſtay ſome time till it could be confirm'd by Pope Urban his Succeſſor.

Anno Dom. MCCLXI.

[4] M. W. The King being weary of the Oxford Proviſions, ſeeks to get a Diſpenſation from the Pope.

The Continuator of Matt. Paris falſely ſuppoſes the King to have kept his Chriſtmaſs this Year in the Tower of London, as being afraid of the Barons, becauſe he had broken his Oath with them, concerning the abovementiond Proviſions; but this Author is again miſtaken in the placing this Year, as well as the laſt; for I find in better [5] Authors, that he kept this Feaſt at Windſor, with his Queen, and his Daughter the Queen of Scots, being then ready to Lye-in; and it is not likely that the King would as yet pull off the Vizor, or declare himſelf Jealous of the Barons, before he had receiv'd his Abſolution from Rome.

Will. Riſhanger again miſtaken.

[5] M. W. T. W. The K. keeps his Chriſtmaſs at Windſor.

[1] But it is certain that in the beginning of February the King having held a ſecret Council, reſolved to declare himſelf, and ſhake off that Yoke which the Barons had laid upon him; wherefore having ſome time after ſummoned them to a Council or Parliament at London, he there plainly and briefly told them, that ſince by the 'late Proviſions of Oxford, which they had made both Himſelf and 'his Son Prince Edward to ſwear to obſerve, they had likewiſe obliged 'themſelves on their part, to encreaſe his Revenue, and pay his 'Debts, neither of which he had by experience found to be by them 'perform'd, according to their Engagements; but inſtead of that, 'ſeeking their own private Intereſts, they had rather diminiſh'd than 'increas'd his Revenues; and that by putting himſelf under their 'Government, he was become more their Slave than their King; there'fore they muſt not wonder, if truſting no longer to their Councils, 'he had now ſought for redreſs elſewhere.

[1] Id. ib. And having held a ſecret Council, reſolves to caſt off the Oxford Proviſions.

He ſummons a Parliament, wherein he plainly declares he will be no longer bound by them, and for what Reaſons.

For indeed beſides his ſending to Rome for Abſolution, he had now wrote to the King of France, and his Son Prince Edward, (who was then gone over thither to a Tourneament, as I have ſaid before) to provide him what Forces he could.

And [2] being now reſolved actually to vacate all theſe late Proviſions, about the beginning of March he put himſelf into the Tower of London, together with the Queen, and then commanding the lock of the Treaſure (which had for ſome time been kept there) to be forced open, he employed the Money to repair and ſtrengthen the Walls of the Tower, where it moſt needed: Moreover, he order'd the City of London to be fortify'd round about, and called all the Youth of the City, from Twelve Years old and upwards together, cauſing them to ſwear Fealty to him; and commanded it to be proclaim'd, that whoever would take up Arms under him, ſhould be maintain'd at the King's Charge. Upon this many Barons, from all parts, came with multitudes of Armed Men, who were lodged without the Walls, becauſe the Citizens refus'd to give them any Entertainment. Theſe

[2] Id. ib. And then in order to it, puts himſelf into the Tower, and ſeizes upon the Treaſure there, and with it fortifies the Tower and City, and makes all of above 12 Years old to take a new Oath of Fealty.

Anno Dom. MCCLXI.

These were the grounds and beginnings of that unhappy Civil-War, which for near Four Years tormented this Kingdom; but upon these Alterations, those who had no kindness for the King, raised a report, that he would impose upon, and exact from the Great Men and Community of the Kingdom, undue and unheard of Taxes and Talliages: Therefore the King being sensible of this, by his [3] Writ or Declaration, bearing date at the Tower of London, the fourteenth of March, directed to the Sheriffs of all the Counties of England, took notice of it, and after having recited the aboveſaid Calumnies, he Commands them to make Proclamation that he intended no such thing; and if they found any such Reporters of Lyes, to arrest and secure them, till they could produce the Authors of them, or that they should receive further directions from himself.

Upon a Report, that the K. intended to impose new and unheard of Taxes, he issues out a Declaration to the contrary.

[4] Then the King kept his Easter at Winchester, where taking Courage, he made the Lord Philip Basset his chief Justitiary, against the Will of the Barons; by reason of which there arose a great Dissention between the King and them; but He did not much regard that, for being now resolved to proceed in the Course He had already begun, He went a Circuit [5] to all the Cinque-Ports, and received the Oaths of Fidelity from the Barons of them; and coming to Dover, he took the Government of the Castle from Hugh Bigod, and gave it to Edward de Waleran, together with the Custody of the Cinque-Ports, and County of Kent. Then the King return'd to London, where He not long after receiv'd from the Pope the Bull of Absolution, both of Himself and his Son Prince Edward, from their Oaths to the Provisions of Oxford, but the Prince then refused to accept it, tho' afterwards he was perswaded to it: However, the King received it joyfully; but when the Barons had notice of it, they sent Messengers to him, Humbly beseeching him to observe the Oath he had so solemnly taken; and if any thing displeased him, and that He would be pleased to shew it, they would amend it. To which the King in great Passion replied, That they had fallen from their Agreement, and He would be obliged no longer by it; yet at length, through the powerful Mediation of the Bishops it was consented to, that Two discreet and indifferent Persons should be chosen, One by the King, and the Other by the Barons, who should make choice of a Third, and these Three were to hear the Complaints on both sides, and settle a lasting Peace betwixt them: But nothing could then be determined in this Affair, because Prince Edward was beyond Sea, and therefore it was adjourn'd till his return.

The K. makes Philip Basset, his Justitiary, against the Will of the Barons.

[5] W. R. M. R.

The K. goes to all the Cinque-Ports, and takes fresh Oaths of Fidelity from their Barons, and then gives the Governm. of Dover Castle, to Edw. de Waleran.

The King receives the Pope's Bull of Absolution for himself and the Prince

And by the Mediation of the Bps puts all Differences between himself and the Barons to 3 indifferent Persons.

And [1] he having notice, that the Agreement between the King and the Barons depended upon his coming over, (having got the better in the late Tourneament at Paris) forthwith return'd into England, and brought along with him his Uncle William de Valence, who had been for some time before banished the Kingdom; yet could he not obtain leave to return, until he had sworn to be obedient to the Provisions of the Barons, and to answer such Complaints as should be made against him.

[1] Idem.

The Prince returns into England, and brings Will. de Valence over with him.

But when the Prince understood by what Councils his Father had been govern'd, he was very angry, and retir'd from his Presence, and adhered to the Barons, according to his Oath, and enter'd into a Confederacy with them, to search out, and drive away from the King,

The Prince understanding by what Councils his Father was govern'd, adheres to the Barons.

King, all evil Counſellors, and their Favourers, becauſe that by their Inſtigation the King had been deceiv'd; and thoſe Proviſions, which the Prince then believ'd to be beneficial both to the King and Kingdom, were now vacated by the Pope's late Abſolution. Anno Dom. MCCLXI.

When this came to the King's Knowledge, He and his Counſellors were very much afraid, and ſecured themſelves forthwith in the Tower of London, whilſt Prince Edward remain'd with the Noblemen; to whom there was now a great and continual Reſort.

Whereupon the K. being afraid, ſhuts himſelf up in the Tower.

But that which made worſe for the King's Intereſt, was, that the Earls of Glouceſter and Leiceſter, who were before at variance, were now reconcil'd, and confederating themſelves with the Prince, and other Noblemen, threaten'd, that if the King did not remove from his Councils, thoſe Diſturbers of the Publick Peace, they would do it by force; but the King keeping himſelf, and thoſe Counſellors they diſliked, cloſe up in the Tower, a Peace, by the Queen's Mediation, was patch'd up on the ſudden, between the King and the Barons, ſo that for the preſent they ſeem'd reconcil'd, and all things remain'd for a time in the ſame ſtate they were at the making of the ſaid Proviſions.

The Earls of Leiceſter and Glouceſter are reconciled, and threaten the King, that if he did not remove his Evil Counſellors, they wou'd do it by force.

[2] But things did not long continue in this Poſture, for the King finding himſelf now ſomewhat more at liberty, reſolved to ſet himſelf wholly free from the Impoſition of the Barons, as well as from his former Oaths: Wherefore he went now boldly on Progreſs about the Cities and Caſtles of the Kingdom, reſolving to repoſſeſs himſelf of them, being much encourag'd to it by the Promiſe which the King of France and his Nobility had made him, of ſending a great Aſſiſtance; inſomuch that the Earl of St. Paul, and Gerard de Rhodes, were come over to the King with a great many Foreign Soldiers, who receiv'd Forty Days Pay before their Arrival, and the Earl himſelf had Ten Marks a Week out of the Exchequer. Then the King went to Winchester, and kept his Whitſontide in that Caſtle, where calling before him the Juſtitiary and Chancellor, who had been choſen by the Barons, he demanded from them the Seals, and the Rolls belonging to their Office; but they anſwered that they could not therein obey him without the conſent of the Barons: When the King heard this, he notwithſtanding made Walter de Merton, Chancellor, and Sir Philip Baſſet chief Juſtitiary, in the room of Richard de Lucy, whom he did not look upon as one firm to his Intereſt.

[2] M. W.

The King goes on Progreſs, and repoſſeſſes himſelf of the Cities and Caſtles, being incourrg'd by the Promiſes of the King of France.

The K. turns out the Juſtitiary, and Chancellor, who had been choſen by the Barons.

[3] But Thomas Wikes has given us a better reaſon of the King's Confidence at this time; for he now publickly produced and ſhewed to all the Noblemen there preſent, the Pope's Bull, whereby he was abſolved from the Oath which he had taken concerning the late Oxford-Proviſions, as in it ſelf unlawful, being made without his Holineſs's conſent, who was his ſupreme Lord, and whoſe Vaſſal the King now acknowledged himſelf to be; adding, that neither would he be obliged by his Oath, becauſe he made it againſt his Will: Thus could Princes, in thoſe Days be abſolved either for Money or Favour, from what Oaths they thought inconvenient for their Intereſt: And it ſhews us how impracticable a thing it is, to think to make Princes, (unleſs it be by force) to obſerve thoſe Oaths or Promiſes they make by compulſion, and only to ſerve a preſent turn.

[3] In hoc Anno.

The King ſhews the Pope's Bull of Abſolution from the Oxf. Proviſions, as being made without his conſent, whom the K. own'd as his ſupreme Lord.

When

Anno Dom. MCCLXI.

[4] Id. ib. M. W. Whereupon the Great Men take Arms.

[4] When the Great Men of the Kingdom underſtood this, and had conſider'd how contrary it was to the late Oxford-Proviſions, and fearing the King ſhould take upon him wholly to diſannul all that had been then agreed on, they preſently put themſelves into Arms, and made haſte to march to Wincheſter, where the King then was; but John Manſel hearing of it, and being much afraid for the King's as well as his own and his Accomplice's ſafety, he went privately thither, and warning the King of the imminent Danger, adviſed him ſpeedily to retire; whereupon He immediately left that Place, and made haſte to the Tower of London, with a ſmall Retinue.

The King retires into the Tower.

[5] Id. ib. The K. ſends Juſtices Itinerant all over England, but the Barons forbid all Men to appear before them.

[5] About this time the King, by his own Commiſſion, and without the conſent of the Barons, ſent Juſtices Itinerant all over England, who, though they ſate quietly at Glouceſter, yet coming to Hereford ſome Days after Midſummer, they could Act nothing there, becauſe ſome from the Barons forbad all Men, at their Peril, to appeal, or plead before them, becauſe they had gone their Circuits within leſs than Seven Years time, before the end of which, it was not lawful by the late Proviſions to begin new ones; as alſo becauſe the Juſtices had not iſſued out the Legal Summons of Forty Days, which was then requir'd by Law.

[1] Id. ib. A great diſturbance about the new Sheriffs raiſed by the King.

[1] This Year likewiſe there was a great diſturbance in the Nation, by reaſon of the new Sheriffs, whom the King had now named in the room of thoſe the Barons had formerly made: wherefore the People of ſeveral Counties, being excited by ſome of the Great Men of the Kingdom, ſtoutly reſiſted thoſe Sheriffs, and would neither obey their Precepts, nor appear before them; at which the King being very much concern'd, directed his Writs or Letters to his Sheriffs, in all the Counties in England, to force the People to their former Loyalty, and good Opinion of his Actions; which being upon Record, I ſhall give you the Subſtance of them from Dr. Brady's [2] Appendix.

Rot. Chart. H. 3. M. 46. Dorſ. [2] Append. N. 205.

The King iſſues out his Writs, ſetting forth the Juſtice of his Cauſe, and commanding all ſuch to be apprehended who adher'd to the Proviſions of Oxford or oppoſed the new Sheriffs.

The King recites his own late ſubmiſſion of himſelf, and the Affairs of his Realm to the Proviſions at Oxford, under certain Conditions which the Barons had not perform'd on their part; and further ſets forth the Injuſtice of thoſe Ordinances, which tended to the prejudice and depreſſion of his own Royal Power, as well as the damage of his People; and alſo acquaints them with his Abſolution from his Oath to obſerve thoſe Proviſions, which was granted him both by Pope Alexander and Urban, as likewiſe his own readineſs to do Juſtice to all Men, both Great and Small, in his Courts, to which they might freely, and with all ſecurity reſort. And moreover declares his willingneſs to obſerve the Articles contain'd in the Great Charter, and Charter of Foreſts, which they, the Sheriffs, were now commanded to proclaim in all places; and were ordered to apprehend and ſecure all ſuch as adhered to the former Ordinances of Oxford, or preſum'd to ſpeak or act any thing prejudicial to the Rights of the Crown, or his own Honour and Dignity, or to the Sheriff's execution of their Office.

Thus

Thus did this King, being in a great ſtreight, make no difficulty to give large Promiſes, and ſpecious Declarations, which when the Danger was over he obſerv'd as he thought fit. But to return to our Hiſtory. Anno Dom. MCCLXI.

The Quarrel being thus begun afreſh between the King and his Barons, and ſtill encreaſing, the Earls of Leiceſter and Gloucester, with many other Noblemen, went a Circuit round the Cinque-Ports, and obtain'd an Inſtrument from them, whereby they engaged, that they would ſtand by the Barons for their fidelity to the King; and that as for the Kingdom, they would guard it ſo well, that no Stranger ſhould enter it to its prejudice; at which News the King, and thoſe of his Party were highly concern'd: From whence we may obſerve the great Power of the Cinque-Ports in thoſe times, to which the chief Guard of the Kingdom, by Sea, was then committed, and which in that Age found the King no leſs than a Fleet of above Fifty Sail, each Town according to its proportion; and this they were to do for the Privileges they enjoy'd.

[3] N. W. Annal. Sti. Auguſti in Bib. Col. Sti. Ben. Cantab. The Earls of Leiceſter and Glouceſter go a Circuit about the Cinque-Ports, and engage them to ſtand by the Barons.

[4] After this the Barons again aſſembled at London, about the Feaſt of All-Saints, of whoſe Power the King being afraid, he ſtill kept himſelf, with thoſe of his Party, cloſe within the Tower of London, and from thence ſpeedily ſummon'd all thoſe that ow'd him Military Service, to come to his Aſſiſtance: But when the Adherents to both Parties were now Aſſembled, either of them fearing the doubtful Succeſs of a War, a Treaty of Peace was again ſet on foot, by the mediation of ſome cool and moderate Perſons amongſt them; and it was then agreed, that all differences between the King and them, ſhould be left to the Arbitrement of certain Noblemen to be choſen for that purpoſe; and ſo all this Labour and Diſturbance that the Barons gave themſelves came to nothing for the preſent; but you will hear more of it the next Year.

[4] M. W. The Barons aſſemble again at Lond. whilſt the K. keeps cloſe within the Tower.

Both Parties agree to refer all their Differences to certain Noblemen equally choſen between them.

In this nothing elſe happen'd remarkable, but the death of Sanchia, Siſter to the Queen, and ſecond Wife of Richard, King of the Romans, who was ſoon after buried in the Monaſtery of Hailes, which her ſecond Husband had Founded.

The Death of the Queen of the Romans.

Anno Dom. MCCLXII.

[5] King Henry kept his Chriſtmaſs there in the Tower, together with ſuch Counſellors, as our Author ſuppoſes were not for his own, or the Kingdom's benefit; ſo that [1] the difference between the King and the Barons grew ſtill wider and wider, for He now cauſed the new Pope Urban's Diſpenſation of his Oath to the late Oxford-Proviſions to be openly read at St. Paul's-Croſs, and not long after to be proclaim'd through all England; by which, not only the King, and the Prince his Son, but likewiſe all others who had ſworn to them, were abſolved from them, however very few of the Barons would accept of it.

[5] W. R. [1] M. W. The Breach between the King and the Barons grows wider, upon his cauſing the Pope's Diſpenſation, to be openly read at St. Paul's-Croſs.

[2] But tho' this Diſpenſation diſpleaſed a great many, yet none of the Biſhops durſt ſhew their diſlike of it, except Walter de Cantelupe, Biſhop of Worceſter, who, on the behalf of himſelf, and all the Great Men of England, publickly appeal'd from it to the Pope himſelf: But this Appeal ſignified nothing, ſo long as the Pope and the King had both agreed againſt the Obſervation of thoſe Proviſions.

[2] A. S. A. None of the Biſhops durſt ſhew their diſlike to it, but the Bp. of Worceſter, who appeals to the Pope himſelf.

Anno Dom. MCCLXII.

[3] Id. ib. The Barons finding the King and the Pope agreed, think beſt to make the beſt Terms they can.

It is at laſt agreed, that the Barons ſhall refer themſelves wholly to the King's Pleaſure, and that of the King of the Romans.

[3] And now the Barons finding that the King was reſolved wholly to lay aſide theſe uneaſie Bridles of his Prerogative, and that the Pope had thus declared for his Intereſt, they thought it high time to make the beſt Terms they could with him: Therefore after a long Debate between both Parties, (Richard King of the Romans being appointed to tranſact for the King his Brother, and the Earl of Glouceſter for the Barons) it was at laſt agreed, that the Barons ſhould renounce all their former Demands, and refer themſelves wholly to the King's good Will and Pleaſure, and the Judgment of the King of the Romans, in all things concerning the Government of the Kingdom; but the Earl of Leiceſter not conſenting to this, left the Court, and tho' many of the other greater and leſſer Barons were not at all pleaſed with this Agreement, yet it was in vain for them to ſtand out, the greater Part having already complied with what the two Kings would have done: So changeable were the Baron's Reſolutions, varying according to their ſeveral Humours, and the preſent Circumſtances of Affairs, of which we are not at this diſtance competent Judges.

[4] In hoc Anno. The Barons meet fifteen days after Eaſter, and yield to give up ſome of the Oxford Proviſions, provided he would confirm the reſt.

Four Perſons to be nam'd for Sheriffs, out of whom the K. of the Romans was to chuſe one.

But [4] Thomas Wikes gives ſomewhat a larger, and more different Account, and relates, that fifteen Days after Eaſter the Barons met again at London, to treat with the King; where, after many Debates, they at laſt yielded, that if he would confirm ſome of the Oxford Proviſions, they would give up all the reſt; and it was likewiſe then provided, that the Barons ſhould elect out of every County Four Knights, whom they ſhould judge moſt fit for Sheriffs, whoſe Names being given in to the King of the Romans, he out of them ſhould nominate one for each County, whom he thought beſt qualified for that Office; and theſe were to continue but till Michaelmaſs following, and then the King was again to name whom he pleaſed.

[5] Id. ib. The Great Men meet again to conclude the former Agreement.

The King of his own free Will commands the Oxford-Proviſions to be obſerved.

The ſame that ſome years after were inſerted into the Statutes of Marlebridge.

[5] Then preſently after Whitſuntide the Great Men met at the ſame Place, to conclude and ſettle the former Agreement: But the Earl of Leiceſter being diſcontented at what had been done, went over into France; and now (it ſeems) the King did in ſome Points anew confirm the late Oxford-Proviſions; for Matt. Weſtminſter ſays expreſly, that the King following more wholeſome Counſels, of his own free Will commanded the Conſtitutions of Oxford to be inviolably obſerved, and ſent them down into every County. But tho' none of our Hiſtorians have given us the Heads of the Articles that were now agreed to on both Sides, yet I find in two antient MSS. (the one in Bennet-Colledge Library in Cambridge, and the other in the Bodleian in Oxon) that thoſe Statutes chiefly related to thoſe Suits of Court, and Diſtreſſes made by Tenants in Capite, and other Lords of Mannors, upon their under-Tenants, which being very much for the Benefit both of the Lords and Tenants, were ſome Years after again confirmed by the King, and inſerted Word for Word in the Statutes of Marlebridge, as you will find at the End of this King's Reign.

[1] Id ib. M.W. All Quarrels between the King and Barons for a while reconciled.

[1] After the King's paſſing and confirming of theſe Laws, all Quarrels between him and the Barons ſeem'd for the preſent to be made up; So that about the end of June, the King of the Romans went over for Germany, and about the end of July or beginning of Auguſt,

King

King Henry with his Queen paſſed over to their Territories in France, where they continued till almoſt Chriſtmaſs, tho' our Authors are ſilent as to what was done there; only that the King, and ſeveral others near his Perſon, fell dangerouſly ill of Quartan Agues at Bourdeaux; which delay'd his Return longer than he deſigned. Anno Dom. MCCLXII. K. Henry and his Brother both go over beyond Sea.

[2] In the mean time Richard Earl of Glouceſter dying, his Son Gilbert was now obliged to go over into France to the King, to compound for his Father's Eſtate; but the King having had no Kindneſs for him, becauſe he had held him ſo ſtrictly to the Oxford-Proviſions, the Son was received very roughly at firſt; yet at length, by the means of William de Valence the King's Half-Brother, he treated him more favourably, and at laſt having made a full Agreement with him for his Lands, he was ſent home well ſatisfied for the preſent; yet all that had been done could not oblige this Young Lord to take part with the King in the War, which not long after broke out; for it ſeems his Father had upon his Death-bed charged him not to depart from thoſe Statutes or Proviſions above-mentioned. But to return to the Affairs of England. [2] A. S. A. The Earl of Glouceſter deceaſing, his Son goes over to the King, and is roughly received, till his Peace was made by William de Valence. Then is ſent home well ſatisfied for the preſent.

[3] During the King's Abſence in France, the Earl of Leiceſter arrived here privately from thence, about the beginning of October, without being reconciled to the King before he came over; but ſo ſoon as he came to London, he appeared at a Great Council, which the Lord Philip Baſſet, Juſtitiary of England, then held; where the Earl produced a Brief or Letter from the Pope, wherein he confirm'd the Proviſions of Oxford, and recalled the King's Abſolution, declaring, that he was deceived in the granting of it. This Brief was publickly read in the Council, contrary to the Will of the Juſtitiary, but as ſoon as ever the Earl had publiſhed it, he preſently went back into France, to proſecute the Deſign which he had now again ſet on foot. [3] Id. ib. The Earl of Leiceſter arrives in England. And at a great Council, produces a new Bull from the Pope, in Confirmation of the Oxford-Proviſions, Which was publickly read.

This Paſſage is found in no other Writer, except the Manuſcript Chronicle of St. Auguſtine; and, if true, not only ſhews us the variable Temper of the Pope and his Court, in firſt condemning, and now again confirming the Oxford-Proviſions; but alſo gives us the Reaſon of the ſo ſudden Change in the Baron's Humour, from what it was in the beginning of this Year; and ſhews us the Cauſe of what happen'd in the next, as you will find by and by: But if the Abſolution was now recall'd, it was ſhortly after re-confirm'd, as we ſhall hear anon.

I have nothing elſe worth taking notice of under this Year, [2] but that the Welſh ſtill continuing their Hoſtilities, a little before Chriſtmaſs a Party of Prince Llewellyn's Men ſeized by Surprize the ſtrong Caſtle of Melienyth, or Kenet, belonging to Sir Roger Mortimer; and having put moſt of the Gariſon to the Sword, they took Howel ap Meyric the Governour, with his Wife and Children, Priſoners; and after that, the Caſtle was demoliſhed by the Prince's Order: But when Sir Roger heard of it, he marched with a great Body of Lords and Knights to the Caſtle, where Prince Llewellyn met him; but Mortimer not daring to hazard a Battel, took Shelter within the Ruines of his Caſtle, and not finding himſelf ſecure there, deſired leave of the Prince to retire peaceably: Thereupon, by reaſon of the near Relation that was betwixt them, and withal becauſe he would [2] *Dr. P. not be thought so mean spirited as to fall upon an Enemy that wanted Power to resist him, he let him go off with his Forces, and then the Welsh Prince passing on to Brecknock, made himself Master of it with the Desire of the People of that Country, who thereupon swore Fidelity to him, and then he returned to North-Wales.

The Prince makes himself Master of Brecknock and the adjacent Country.

This is the Account the [3] Welsh Chronicles give of this Action, and is (I suppose) the same which Matt. Westminster relates; only he calls it the Castle of Kenet, and further adds, that it was taken by Surprize, and not delivered for want of Victuals; yet says nothing of the Earl's enclosing himself within its Ruines, nor of Prince David's Licence for his Retreat; but, on the contrary, that Roger Mortimer being highly incens'd at this Affront, called to his Assistance some of the Lords Marchers, who not only destroy'd the Welshmen by frequent Excursions, but also laying Ambush for them in fit Places, sometimes slew three or four hundred of them at a time; and they likewise in return surpriz'd and slew about the like Number belonging to the Marchers.

[3] Dr. P's Chron. Sub hoc anno Mat. Westminst. gives somewhat a different Account of this Action.

Anno Dom. MCCLXIII.

The King and Queen being now returned out of France, (according to [4] Matt. Paris's Continuator) kept their Christmass in the Tower of London; but I rather credit [5] John Eversden's Chronicle, and the Annals of St. Augustine, which do both assure us, that the King and Queen landing at Dover on St. Thomas's Eve, came to Canterbury, where the Lord Philip Basset, and John Mansel the Justitiary, meeting them, with some others of their Party, they kept this Festival at that City; and it is very certain, that not long after the old Quarrel between the King and his Barons began afresh. [1] For the Earl of Leicester, and those of his Party, (being much the greater Number) positively insisted, and were very urgent with the King, that the Provisions of Oxford might be again observed and proclaimed anew through the whole Kingdom: This the King refused to grant, insisting upon the Pope's Absolution from his Oath, being seconded by the King of the Romans, Prince Edward, and divers other Great Men, who were the King's chief Counsellors and Ministers; so that (as the [2] City Annals relate) the King was so far from agreeing to the Baron's Demands, that about the same time he issued out his Writs throughout England, expressly forbidding the said Statutes or Provisions to be any more observed.

Yet however a Civil War did not presently break out, both Parties being either not sufficiently prepar'd, or else taken up in putting a stop to the Incursions of the Welshmen; [3] who in the beginning of the Spring, under the Conduct of their Prince Llewellyn, being confederated with such Barons of those Parts as were Prince Edward's Enemies, invaded the Earldom of Chester, and taking the Castles of Dysert and Tygarway, the latter of which (being one of the strongest in the Marches) was delivered up to him for want of Provisions.

Whereupon Prince Edward being newly returned home, about Easter, with a great number of Foreign Souldiers, some time before Whitsuntide he was ordered by his Father to march with them against the Welsh; thereupon entring the Country, and advancing towards Snowdun, the Prince found them retreated into their Fastnesses in the Mountains

Mountains and Woods; ſo that not being able to attack them by reaſon of the Roughneſs of the Countrey, and Thickneſs of the Woods, all he could do was, to ſecure the reſt of his Caſtles, by providing them very well with Souldiers, and all things neceſſary for Defence: At laſt having made a ſhort Truce with Prince Llewellyn, he return'd into England ſome time after the above-mention'd Feſtival; but the main Deſign being thus defeated, this Truce ſerved rather to encourage than abate the Preſumption of the Welſhmen.

Anno Dom. MCCLXIII.

He makes a Truce with that Prince.

[5] So ſoon as the Prince return'd from the Welſh Expedition, he went down into the Iſle of Sheppey, and ſending for the Barons of the Cinque Ports, he made them (tho' with ſome difficulty) to renew their Oath of Fealty to the King; however it ſignified little, for it being done out of fear, they broke it upon the firſt Opportunity.

[5] A. S. A. The Prince goes down to the Iſle of Sheppey, and makes the Barons of the Cinque Ports renew their Oath of Fealty to his Father.

[1] Preſently after the Prince's Return to London, one of the firſt things he did, was to go to the New-Temple, and there entring the Treaſury of the Knights-Templars, without their Conſents he broke open the Locks of the Cheſts, and took away Ten thouſand Pounds Sterling, belonging to ſeveral Noblemen and Merchants of the City; at which raſh Action both the King and Queen, and the King of the Romans ſeem'd much offended; but the Prince, ſo ſoon as he had got the Money, carried it preſently to Windſor Caſtle, where he ſtaid with his Foreign Souldiers in Gariſon, till the War broke out, tho' very much to the diſcontent of the Earl of Leyceſter and the Barons of his Party: In the mean while the King and Queen, with John Manſel, and other their Counſellors, kept themſelves cloſe in the Tower of London.

[1] M. Pa. The Prince breaks open the Treaſury of the Knights Templars, and there ſeizes 10000 l. belonging to divers Perſons, and carries it away to Windſor Caſtle.

[2] At Whitſontide a Great Council of the Nobility, headed by the Earl of Leiceſter, was held at London, (as it ſeems without the King's Summons) where they openly declar'd againſt the King and Prince, as guilty of Perjury, in thus receding from the Proviſions of Oxford; and having then a great many of the Younger Noblemen of their Party, they ſummon'd the reſt to come in to them, threatning to treat all thoſe as Enemies who refuſed; ſo that moſt of the Barons now joined with them, ſome out of an honeſt Deſign, ſome out of fear for their Perſons and Eſtates, and others out of hopes of Gain by fiſhing in theſe troubled Waters.

[2] T. W. A great Council of the Nobility met at London, where they accuſe the King and Prince of Perjury, and ſummon all the reſt of the Barons to appear.

[3] Theſe being thus aſſembled, made up a great Army, under the Command of Simon Montfort Earl of Leiceſter, as their General, and declared for the late Oxford-Proviſions. And farther (according to the City Annals) they ſent the King a Letter or Declaration, (ſeal'd by the Lord Roger Clifford in the Name of the reſt) in which they firſt petition'd his Majeſty to obſerve the Proviſions of Oxford, and defied all thoſe that oppos'd them, (the King, Queen, and their Children excepted) [4] after which, about the end of June, they proceeded to Acts of open Hoſtility, falling upon all Strangers (towards whom the ſaid King and Prince had ſhewn too much Favour) as alſo on the King's Counſellors, and all thoſe that adhered to him; and plundered their Houſes, and deſtroyed their Eſtates, without any Mercy or diſtinction of Perſons; [5] but the Storm fell moſt ſeverely upon John Manſel and Robert Walerand, as thoſe whom who they thought had chiefly adviſed the King not to come to an Agreement with them; and they had likewiſe the greater Spleen againſt Simon de Walton, Biſhop of Norwich, and John Manſel, becauſe they had, by the Pope's Command, publiſh'd his Bull of King Henry's Abſolution from his Oath to obſerve the Proviſions of Oxford, and had declar'd all that reſiſted him Excommunicated.

[1] M. W. A great Perſecution of Strangers, whereupon John Manſel quits the Kingdom.

[1] And indeed it now went very ill with the Foreigners, for who ever could not ſpeak Engliſh were very roughly treated by the common People; ſo that many for fear of Death or Impriſonment left the Kingdom, as did John Manſel, the King's Chief Miniſter, who thought it his ſafeſt way to get over beyond Sea, and leave all his rich Benefices behind him; but Henry, Son to the King of the Romans perſuing him, out of an eager deſire to ſeize him, he himſelf was taken Priſoner at Boloigne, by the Queen's Procurement; and being brought back was here committed to ſafe Cuſtody.

Henry Son to the K. of the Romans going over to ſeize him, is made a Priſoner at Boloigne.

[2] Id. ib. T. W. Some of the moſt active Barons marched to Hereford, and there made the Bp. Priſoner, becauſe he was a Foreigner.

[2] In the mean time, Roger de Clifford, and Roger Leyburn, with others of the moſt active Barons marched up and down the adjacent Countries, ſeizing the Goods, and ſpoiling the Eſtates of thoſe that declared againſt the Oxford-Proviſions, and marched down to Hereford with a ſtrong Army, where they took Peter Egue-blank, Biſhop of that See, Priſoner, [3] becauſe he was a Burgundian, together with thoſe Chanons of the Church that were his Countrey-Men, whom he had brought into it, and carried them all Priſoners to Eardeſly Caſtle, plundering them of all their Money and Goods: after this the Army marched to Glouceſter, where they took the outward Caſtle after five Day's Siege; but not being able preſently to poſſeſs themſelves of the main Tower into which Matthias de Beſille, the Governour (then Sheriff of Glouceſter-ſhire) had retreated, they at laſt broke open the Iron Door of that Place, and taking him Priſoner carried him away (becauſe he was a Stranger) to keep the Biſhop company: From thence they march'd back, and took Worceſter, and then went to Bridge-North (a Town of the King's) but tho' it held out at firſt, yet it was ſurrend'red the next Day upon Articles, leſt the Welſh-men (a great number of whom likewiſe beſieged the Town) ſhould enter it by force.

[3] M. W. They marched alſo to Glouceſter, and took the Caſtle and carri'd the Sheriff away Priſoner.

[4] Id. ib. A. S. A. Briſtol is alſo ſurrend'red, but the Caſtle holds out.

[4] Some time after they had likewiſe the Town of Briſtol ſurrend'red to them by the Citizens, tho' the Caſtle ſtill held out for the King: then theſe Barons return'd back towards Windſor, which Caſtle was ſtill kept by Prince Edward's Men; but in the mean while the Prince, and the Noble-men of the King's ſide, that were then in the Marches of Wales, took the Caſtle of Haye, Brecknock, and other Places. [5] Thus on both ſides they waſted, burnt, and deſtroyed each other's Houſes and Eſtates, whilſt the Barons, and the Earl of Leiceſter, did what they pleaſed about London, by reaſon that the greateſt part of the Men of Eſtates came in to them.

The Prince takes ſeveral Caſtles in Wales.

[5] T. W.

The Barons write a Letter to the City, to know whither they would ſtand to the Proviſions of Oxford.

But after theſe Military, we ſhall now give you ſome Civil Tranſactions, not to be found among our printed Authors, but in the City-Annals already cited, which tell us, that about Midſummer, the Barons ſent a Letter to the City of London, under the Seal of the Earl of Leiceſter their General, to know from the Citizens, whither they would hold firm to the late Statutes or Proviſions of Oxford, Oxford, which they ſuppoſed to be for the Honour of God, and the Good of the King and Kingdom, or whither they would adhere to thoſe that broke them. Anno Dom. MCCLXIII.

[1] Upon the receipt of theſe Letters, the chief Citizens carried them to the King, being then in the Tower with his Counſellors, and plainly told them, that the Community of the City were obliged by Oath to obſerve thoſe Statutes, which they thought tended to his Benefit, and that of the whole Realm; and therefore hoped he would not take it ill, if for the future they ſhould not permit any Foreign Knights, or other Strangers, to continue or lodge within the City: then ſome of the principal Citizens were ſent to the Earl of Leiceſter, and the Barons, lying then at Dover, to aſſure them that they would ſtand to the former Engagements they had made, ſaving their Allegiance to the King. [1] Id. ib. The Citizens carry the Letter to the K. and let him know, that they were reſolved to obſerve the Oxford-Proviſ.

[2] About the ſame time, the Barons, that they might not ſeem deficient in their Duty to the King, ſent him an humble Petition in Writing, wherein they deſired, that the abovementioned Statutes, or Proviſions, might be obſerved, ſince they had been confirmed by his own Oath, and that of the Great Men of the Kingdom; yet however, if it could be made appear, to the Judgment and Conſideration of worthy and honeſt Perſons, that any thing in them was prejudicial to the King and Kingdom, thoſe things ſhould be annull'd; or if they were obſcure, explain'd, ſo that what was good and profitable might be preſerv'd and maintain'd; they further deſir'd, that for the future the Kingdom ſhould be govern'd by the Native Subjects thereof, as was practiced in all other Kingdoms. [2] Id. ib. The Barons ſend the King an humble and modeſt Petition.

This Petition, tho' it ſeem'd very modeſt and reaſonable, I do not find the King would then agree to, [3] but keeping ſtill cloſe in the Tower, expected the Prince, his Son, to come and relieve him; [4] to prevent which the Earl of Leiceſter drew up a powerful Army near London, and lay encamped with it in the Park at Thiſtleworth, [5] having before he left Kent, engaged the Cinque-Ports to revolt from the King, and take an Oath to live and die with the Barons. [3] M. W. The K. keeps cloſe in the Tower. [4] T. W. The Earl of Leiceſter draws up his Army near London. [5] A. S. A.

[1] But the King now finding himſelf diſappointed in his hopes of Relief, and ſeeing he was on every ſide ſurrounded with Enemies, and fearing the Succeſs, thought it his beſt way to agree to all the Propoſals of the Barons, and once more promiſed to obſerve the Proviſions of Oxford; [2] whereupon the Barons of both Parties being now outwardly reconciled, receiv'd each other with mutual Embraces; after which, the King adventur'd to truſt himſelf out of the Tower, and go to his Palace at Weſtminſter; ſo that there was now a temporary Agreement clap'd up, that laſted for a while, which is alſo confirm'd from the City Annals (already mention'd) relating, that on the Morrow after the Feaſt of St. Margaret (that is, on the 21ſt of July) the King's Writ or Letter to the Mayor and Citizens of London, was read in the Guild-Hall, ſetting forth, 'That the Difference between the King and the Ba-'rons was now made up; and therefore he Commanded, that his 'Peace ſhould be kept; and if any one broke it, he ſhould be ar-'reſted, and his Goods alſo ſeiz'd and kept ſafe till the King's fur-'ther Order concerning them ſhould be known. [1] T. W. M. W. [2] J. G.

But

Anno Dom. MCCLXIII.

But as for the chief Articles of this Agreement, they are in [3] Matt. Weſtminſter, and William Riſhanger (tho' falſly enter'd by this laſt Author under the next Year) being to this effect:

[3] Sub hoc Anno.

Firſt, 'That Henry, Son to the King of the Romans (who was 'then kept Priſoner in France) ſhould be releaſed. Secondly, That 'the King's Caſtles ſhould be put into the hands of the Barons. Thirdly, 'That the Statutes or Proviſions of Oxford ſhould be again 'inviolably obſerved. Fourthly, That all ſhould be baniſh'd the 'Realm by a certain Time, except ſuch as ſhould be allowed of by 'the unanimous conſent of the King's Loyal Subjects; and that only 'Natives of the Kingdom, being ſuch as were faithful and diligent, 'ſhould be admitted to tranſact the Publick Affairs thereof.

But the Terms of this Peace were too ſtrict to be obſerved, either by the King, or Prince Edward his Son, longer than till they could find an opportunity to break them; as you will ſee anon.

But I have no more to obſerve concerning the making of this Peace, only that it was for the preſent concluded, notwithſtanding all the Queen's endeavours to the contrary, which tho' done out of her great Zeal, for the King her Husband's Intereſt and Prerogative, yet our [4] Authors make it rather to proceed from a Feminine Malice, and that for this, the ordinary Citizens of London were ſo incenſed againſt her, that as ſhe was ſome time after in her Paſſage from the Tower (where ſhe till then kept her ſelf) to Windſor by Water, juſt going to ſhoot the Bridge, ſhe was from thence ſet upon, not only by foul and vile Reproaches, but alſo with Dirt and Stones, with which ſhe being much affright'ned, was forc'd to return back to the Tower. This Story, tho' it ſeems of ſmall Moment, yet will ſerve to inform the Reader, why the Prince her Son was afterwards ſo eager in the perſuit of the Londoners at the Battel of Lewes, which happen'd to their Prejudice, as well as the loſs of the Victory to the King his Father, as you will find hereafter. But to return to our Hiſtory.

[4] M.W. G.R.

As this Peace was ſuddenly made, ſo it was as ſuddenly broken, and that on this occaſion. The Earl of Leiceſter being gone toward the Sea-Coaſt, in order to ſet Henry, Son to the King of the Romans, at liberty, in the mean while the Garriſon of Foreigners in Windſor-Caſtle laid hold on this opportunity to Sally out and plunder the adjacent Countrey of their Proviſions, whilſt Prince Edward, their Lord, was march'd with ſome other Forces to the Caſtle of Briſtol, which was ſtill in his Cuſtody, where having continued ſome Days, there aroſe ſuch a Quarrel between the Prince's Soldiers, and the Townſmen, as could by no means be compos'd, ſo that they wholly withdrawing themſelves from his Obedience, were about to beſiege the Caſtle.

Prince Edw. marches to Briſtol, where, upon a Quarrel between his Soldiers and the Townſmen, he is by them beſieged.

[5] But the Prince finding himſelf in a ſtreight, and that the greateſt part of England was now ſet againſt Strangers, he had no ways to ſecure himſelf from being taken, but by ſending for Walter Biſhop of Worceſter (who then joyn'd with the Barons) and making him believe, that he would conclude a firm Peace with them, and wholly be guided by his Advice; he thereupon ſo far prevail'd with [5] Id. ib. And is ſet free by the Bp. of Worceſt. the Prince making him believe, that he would join with the Barons.

with the Citizens, that they let the Prince go away free: But he prov'd too cunning for the Biſhop and them too; for tho' he pretended to go along with him to Court, in order to perſwade his Father to agree to what he had promiſed, yet ſo ſoon as he came near the Caſtle of Windſor, he left the Biſhop, and clapping Spurs to his Horſe rode directly thither, to the Biſhop's great diſappointment, who reſented it very highly to be thus over-reach'd. And when he had inform'd the Earl of Leiceſter, and the Barons of it, they gathered what Forces together they could, and about the beginning of Auguſt march'd towards the Caſtle, in order to beſiege it: But when the Prince receiv'd intelligence of it, he went out of the Caſtle, as far as Kingſton, to meet the Earl of Leiceſter, and offer him a Treaty of Peace; but they not coming to any Agreement, the Earl, by the Advice of the Biſhop of Worceſter, ſeiz'd upon the Prince's Perſon, and would not let him return again into the Caſtle, ſo that he was forc'd to make the beſt Terms he could for himſelf, and to order thoſe Strangers that kept it, to ſurrender it upon Condition, that they might all have liberty to march out with their Horſes and Arms, and leave the Realm, as they immediately did, being guarded to the Sea-ſide by ſome of the Barons.

Anno Dom. MCCLXIII.

But as ſoon as he came to Windſor, he elaps himſelf into the Caſtle.

Whereupon the Earl of Leiceſter reſolves to beſiege it.

The Prince going out to parly, is ſeiz'd by the Earl of Leiceſter, and forc'd to ſurrender the Caſtle to the Barons.

[1] Upon this ill Succeſs, the King being now deſtitute of all Aſſiſtance, together with the Prince his Son, were neceſſitated at preſent to be outwardly reconcil'd to the Earl of Leiceſter, and the Barons of his Party: [2] whereupon the Lord Hugh le d' Eſpenſer was again made Juſticiary of England, in the room of the Lord Philip Baſſet; and the Earl of Leiceſter was made High Steward of England; and Sir Roger de Leyburne, who had been looked upon as one of the King's greateſt Enemies, was likewiſe made Steward of his Houſhold.

[1] M. W. T. W. The K. now deſtitute of Aſſiſtance is fain once more to be reconcil'd to the Barons.

[2] A. S. A. And ſeveral new great Officers are thereupon made.

[3] Then to perfect this Agreement, about the beginning of September, there was a great Council or Parliament aſſembled, and that ſo numerous, as the like had not been known for a long time before; at which the Proviſions of Oxford were appointed to be publickly proclaim'd, and inviolably obſerv'd through the whole Kingdom; yet to do ſomewhat in favour of the oppoſite Party, Peter, Biſhop of Hereford, and Matthias de Bezile, and thoſe that were Impriſon'd with them, were all ſet free, and the Spoils and Depredations which had been committed upon the Goods of Eccleſiaſticks, and ſuch Noblemen as took part with the King (about which there had been ſo much Diſcord) were ordain'd to be made good.

[3] M. W. Another Parliament call'd, in which the Proviſions of Oxf. are again eſtabliſh'd.

The Biſhop of Hereford, with others are ſet at liberty.

[4] Thus all Differences being ſeemingly huſhed up for a time, the King found ſo much leiſure, that He, with his Queen, about Michaelmaſs went over into France, to confer with King Lewis, who then held a Great Council at Boloigne, in order to make up and compoſe all the Differences between the King and the Barons; for it ſeems there remained ſome Things ſtill to be adjuſted.

[4] M. W. T. W. A. S. A.

All Differences being again compoſed, the King and Queen go over to a Parliament in France.

But what the Event of this Aſſembly was, I can find in no other Author, but the Annals of St. Auguſtine, and another nameleſs Writer in the Cottonian Library; and they both relate, that the Earl of Leiceſter, and divers Barons of his Party, went alſo over thither, where they were met by Boniface Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and those Foreigners that had been before baniſhed England, who complain'd of it to the French King, as a great piece of Injuſtice and Tyranny, and therefore deſired leave to return home; to which Demand the Earl of Leiceſter, and the reſt of the Deputies, who went over on behalf of their Party, replied, That they were not obliged to give any Account of what had been done in England in the Court of the King of France, but only in that of their own Prince, and that only by Judgment of their Peers: Inſomuch that the Barons of England not complying with any of those Things that were propoſed to them on the King's behalf, the Aſſembly broke up.

Who not complying with ſome Propoſals, the Aſſembly broke up.

K. Lewis perſuades the E. of Leiceſter to comply with K. Henry, but in vain.

The King returns home, but leaves the Queen behind him.

[5] But the French Hiſtorians give it us thus, That Simon Montfort being ſummon'd by King Lewis to come to this Council, he earneſtly entreated him to comply with his King's Deſires, and not to preſs him too far, leſt whilſt he ſet himſelf up for a Patron of the Laws, he raiſed an inveterate Civil War, in which he might both ruine himſelf, as well as the Publick; but this Earl pretending the Defence of the Laws, which he was bound by Oath to obſerve, would by no means hearken to King Lewis his reaſonable Requeſt; who finding he could by no means be prevail'd upon, diſmiſs'd him: Whereupon the Earl of Leiceſter and his Aſſociates returned preſently home, nor did the King ſtay long behind them; but leaving the Queen (who did not care to come back into England in ſuch troubleſom Times) with her Siſter the Queen of France, [1] he return'd into England preſently after Michaelmaſs, to keep the Feaſt of St. Edward the Confeſſor, to whom he always paid a ſingular Devotion.

The Archbiſhop of Canterbury excommunicates the two Sons of the Earl of Leiceſter, with ſeveral other Noblemen, and on what occaſion.

And that we may here intermix ſome Eccleſiaſtical Affairs, to this time alſo may be referred what is found at the end of certain Manuſcript Annals of the Abbey of Hide in the * Bodleian Library, viz. that Boniface Archbiſhop of Canterbury, being then at Boloigne, did at this time iſſue out an Excommunication againſt Henry and Simon, Sons to the Earl of Leiceſter, Humphrey de Bohun Son to the Earl of Hereford, and divers other Barons that joined with Earl Simon, for laying violent Hands on Prelates and Churchmen, and ſpoiling and robbing of Churches, notwithſtanding their Priviledges; yet I do not find, that the Earl of Leiceſter himſelf is mention'd in this Excommunication; for he was too politick at that time to do any ſuch thing himſelf.

[2] T. W. ib.

Another Parliament held at Weſtm. but would not comply with the King's fair Propoſals.

[2] But the King having now celebrated the Feaſt of St. Edward, he forthwith held another Parliament at Weſtminſter, wherein he endeavoured, by offering the Barons very fair Conditions, to have ſettled a good Underſtanding between himſelf and them; but theſe Hopes were blaſted, by reaſon of the Obſtinacy of the Earl of Leiceſter, who relying on the Number of his Adherents, wholly refuſed the King's reaſonable Propoſals; ſo that the Parliament broke up without coming to any Concluſion; of which ill Fortune Prince Edward made this Advantage, that thereupon, by fair Promiſes and Perſuaſions, he drew off from Simon Montfort's Faction the Earl Mareſchall, [3] Henry Son to the King of the Romans, the Lord John Baſſet, and divers other Noblemen, with all the Barons of the Marches, who were unanimouſly reſolved to curb the Inſolence of the Earl of Leiceſter.

[3] G. R.

[4] The

Anno Dom. MCCLXIII.

[4] The King now finding his Party much ſtronger than it was, having held a private Council with his Brother the King of the Romans, Prince Edward, and the reſt of thoſe Noblemen above-mention'd, they all concluded, that it was the ſafeſt courſe for the King to force the reſt of the Barons to a complyance, by ſurpriſing what Caſtles he could, that were ſtill in the Cuſtody of the oppoſite Faction, which was thus put in execution: Prince Edward, under pretence of viſiting his Wife, preſently enter'd and ſurpriz'd the Caſtle of Windſor, turning out the Gariſon put in by the Barons; and the Morning following the King himſelf, together with his Family, privately withdrew from Weſtminſter, and went to the ſame place, and was immediately follow'd by the * Lord Henry, Son to the King of the Romans; John, Earl of Warren and Surrey, and ſuch of the Barons who had before ſecretly deſerted the Earl of Leiceſter's Party, who notwithſtanding kept himſelf cloſe in the City of London, whilſt in the mean time the King, attended by his Son Prince Edward, and the King of the Romans, with a good ſtrength of Horſe and Foot which they had now raiſed, marched down to Dover, to reduce that Caſtle into the King's Power; but thoſe that were within, and kept it for the Barons, would not deliver it upon the King's Summons; and the Beſiegers finding it too ſtrong to be taken by Force, were, to their Shame, obliged to march off and leave it.

[4] T. W. ib. The King and his Brother, with the reſt of the Noblemen of that Party, reſolve to force the Barons to a Complyance.

[5] Annal. de London. * M. W.

And all marched down to take Dover; but they are forced to retire re infectâ.

The Annals of St. Auguſtine farther add, that the Cauſe of the King's being denied Entrance into the Caſtle, was, from a Letter written by the Earl of Leiceſter to the Conſtable or Deputy-Governour, under the Lord Richard Grey, adviſing him not to give the King himſelf entrance, unleſs he would be content to come with only Nine or Ten in his Retinue, which he refuſed to accept, as that which would be of no advantage to him.

[1] The King being thus fruſtrated in his main Deſign, yet that he might not return without doing ſomething worth his Journey, took a Circuit round about the Cinque-Ports, and then ſummoning their Barons before him, made them renew their Oath of Fidelity to himſelf; after which he went towards London, about the beginning of December: But when the Citizens, who were headed by the Earl of Leiceſter, and Thomas Fitz-Richard, heard of his coming, they peremptorily denied the King and the Prince his Son entrance into the City, tho' moſt of the elder and wiſer Sort did all they could to oppoſe it.

[1] Id. ib. The K. goes to the Cinque-Ports, and makes them renew their Oath of Fidelity to himſelf, and then returns to London, where he is denied Admittance by the Citizens.

[2] In the mean while the Earl of Leiceſter had raiſed a great Army to relieve Dover-Caſtle, if the King had actually beſieged it, but now he lay encamped about Southwark, to hinder his coming to London; whereupon Prince Edward, lying at the ſame time with his Forces about Merton, marched towards the Borough of Southwark, and joining his own Forces to his Father's, had like to have ſurprized the Earl of Leiceſter (who was then inferiour to the King in Number;) [3] for ſome of the Chief Citizens being ſecretly of the King's Party, had, unknown to the reſt, ſhut up the Gates of the Bridge, and taken away the Keys, ſo that the Earl could not retire into the City, nor could the Citizens march out to his Aſſiſtance: The chief Contriver of this Deſign was one John de Giſors (a Norman by Birth:) But the Common Citizens hearing of the Earl's Danger, Danger, broke open the Gates and Chains, and presently got out to his Relief, upon whose Arrival the Earl commanded his Men to their Arms, and to put white Crosses on their Breasts, and then he marched out with them into the Fields near Lambeth: but so soon as the King, and the Prince his Son, had notice of it, they retir'd, and so both Parties went back to their former Quarters; upon which a Truce was agreed on for Eight Days, but it continu'd on till Christmass.

but the common Citizens break them open, and march out to his Relief.

[4] T. W. After divers Treaties of Peace, the K. and his Party, as also the E. of Leicester & the Barons agree to refer all Differences to the Arbitration of the K. of France.

[4] During this Interval, there were frequent Treaties of Peace carried on by some of the Bishops, and divers other moderate Persons, who foresaw the Ruine and Mischief that this Civil War would bring upon the whole Kingdom; so that at last the King, with his Brother King Richard, Prince Edward, and the rest of the Earls and Barons who espoused the Royal Interest; as likewise on the other side, the Earl of Leicester, and all the Barons of his Party, did by an unanimous Consent, agree to refer all their Differences about the Provisions of Oxford, as also concerning the other Matters in dispute, to the Arbitration of Lewis King of France.

All Degrees and Orders of Men on both sides agree to it, and swear to observe it.

See the Copy of the King's in Dr. B.'s Ap. N. 206. from the Pat. Roll. 48. H. 3. M. 18. N. 75. where is also that from the Barons.

But whither the King and the Earl's Party ever met in one Assembly or Council, about this great Affair, our Authors do not expresly tell us, only Thomas Wikes reckons up all Degrees and Orders of Men, of the whole Clergy and Laiety, who agreed to the said Arbitration, and confirm'd it by an Oath, as also by mutual Charters under the Seals of the King, and the Prince his Son, on the one Part, and the Earl of Leicester and the Barons on the other, provided the King of France gave his Sentence in this Matter, before the Feast of Pentecost following.

[5] A. S. A. Prince Edw. going over into France, is in great danger by a Storm.

[5] Then Prince Edward, with the Lord Henry, Son to the King of the Romans, and some other Lords, went beyond Sea on the Sunday before Christmass; the occasion of their going over was, to meet the King of France, who then held an Assembly of the Estates at Amiens, on purpose, that he might, by their Mediation and Advice, make a Reconciliation between King Henry and the Barons; but most of them, together with the Earl of Leicester, pretended they were not able to appear there in Person, by reason of the War that Roger de Mortimer, and his Adherents, then made against the Earl of Leicester in Wales: However the Barons sent over the Lord Peter Montfort, and Mr. Thomas de Cantelupe, (to whom Wikes adds, the Lords Adam of Newmarket and William Blund) as their Deputies, to the Assembly of Estates above-mention'd; whither also came Queen Eleanor to meet the King her Husband; as also did the Archbishop of Canterbury, and all the exil'd Foreigners, in hopes of being restor'd.

The Earl of Leicester, and most of the Barons decline going over, and the reason of it.

Yet send their Deputies to appear for them at the Parliament of France.

Anno Dom. MCCLXIV. [1] But the King resolving to keep his Christmass in England, did not go over thither till about the 28*th* or 29*th* of December, and as soon as he Landed, he made all the speed he could to meet King Lewis at Amiens, who having accepted the Arbitration, after a full hearing of whatever could be said on both sides in that Great Assembly of his Bishops and Nobility, gave Sentence, tho' perhaps too hastily (as our Author says) in favour of his Brother the King of England, against the Earl of Leicester, and the Barons of his Party, and and by declaring the Proviſions of Oxford to be null and void, reſtor'd the King to his antient Power; adjudging further, that the King might nominate his Juſtitiary, Chancellor, Treaſurer, and other Officers of the Kingdom, as he pleaſed himſelf; and that Foreigners were as capable of Offices and Dignities in England as the Natives. Anno Dom. MCCLXIV.

* This Award or Arbitrement of the King of France (which I have given you at large at the end of this Volume, from Father Dacherie's  Specilegium) bears date the 3*d* Day of Febr. A. D. 1263. The French not beginning their Year till our Lady-Day, in which they are there alſo follow'd by moſt of our own Writers, who then begin the Year according to the Eccleſiaſtical Account, which about this time took place; whereas according to that obſerv'd by Matt. Paris, and all our former Engliſh Hiſtorians, the Year was to have begun on Chriſtmaſs-Day, as I my ſelf have alſo here plac'd it; ſo that according to our Account, this Aſſembly of Eſtates was held, and King Lewis's Award above-mention'd was Sign'd A. D. 1264. The not obſerving of which difference in Accounts, hath led Speed, and all our modern Hiſtorians, into a great Miſtake in point of Time; ſo that Dr. Brady himſelf, blindly following William of Riſhanger, has plac'd all this tranſaction after Chriſtmaſs, in the Year 1263. whereas if he would but have conſulted Matt. of Weſtminſter, or any other Author of that time, he would have there found, that they place this great Affair not in the beginning, but latter end of this Year, reckoning as we do now from our Lady-Day. * Vid. Append. N. 11. * Vol. 18. Edit. Paris.

[2] But W. Riſhanger, above-mention'd, is wholly inexcuſable, who tho' he begins the Year at Chriſtmaſs, yet places thoſe Actions at the beginning of the former Year, which did not happen (according to his own Account) till this; and that which is yet more prepoſterous, he places all thoſe Actions under this preſent Year, as done after the King of France's late Sentence or Award, which indeed happen'd the Year before it; and that they did fall out in the laſt Year, and not under this (as he falſly places them) is prov'd by a great Eclipſe of the Sun, which fell out on the Nones or 5*th* of Auguſt, about Three of the Clock, as Matt. Weſtminſter, and ſeveral of our Manuſcript Chroniclers agree. [2] Mat. Paris p. 992.

But it muſt be confeſs'd, that the Tranſactions of theſe two or three laſt Years are Regiſter'd very confuſedly by our Printed Hiſtorians, who Writing long after theſe things were done, and not well attending to the time in which the Actions they ſet down were perform'd, have fallen into great Miſtakes in the Account of the Time, when they were done; which I have, by the help of the Manuſcript Annals, belonging to the City of London, as alſo thoſe of the Abbey of St. Auguſtine above cited, I hope ſufficiently rectified; but it is time to return to our Hiſtory, from whence we have too much digreſſed.

It is not to be doubted, but King Henry receiv'd this Award of the King of France (being ſo highly for his Advantage) with much Joy and Satisfaction, as it gave the Deputies of the Barons no leſs Grief and Indignation: But they ſaying little while they were in France, immediately return'd back into England, and communicating what had been done to the Earl of Leiceſter, and the reſt of the Barons who had ſent them, they found no other way to evade the King of [3] M.W.T.W. The Barons being highly diſpleaſed at this Award return'd to Engl. and conſulting with the E. of Leiceſt. reſolve not to ſubmit to it, and on what pretence.

of France's Sentence, than by laying hold of one conſiderable Article of it, wherein it was declar'd, That he did not intend thereby to abrogate the antient Liberties granted by King John's and the preſent King's Charters, of which Clauſe, the Earl of Leiceſter, and thoſe of his Party taking advantage, would not ſtand to the King's Arbitrement, alledging, that it contradicted it ſelf; and that the Oxford-Proviſions, and all things that had been acted by vertue thereof, was only in perſuance and corroboration of the ſaid Charters.

[4] T. W. This Sentence of the King of France makes the Barons begin the War afreſh, and ſeize the City of London.

[4] Thus this Sentence of the King of France was ſo far from procuring Peace (as was intended) that it rather made the War break out more fiercely than before; for no ſooner did the Deputies of the Barons arrive in England, but they began to renew the War afreſh, ſeizing again upon the City of London, and ſallying out from thence, ſpoil'd and plunder'd the Goods of their Enemies in the adjacent Countries, as you will hear further anon.

[5] A. S. A. T. W. Prince Edw. arriving in England, and hearing his Friends were like to be worſted towards Wales, marched down thither to aſſiſt them.

[5] Prince Edward, with his Couſin Henry, Son to the King of the Romans, arriving in England about the end of February, from the late Aſſembly in France, and hearing, that notwithſtanding Sir Roger de Mortimer, Sir Robert de Clifford, and Sir Thomas Corbet, with divers other Barons of the King's Party, ſtill proſecuted the War againſt the Earl of Leiceſter, and his Sons in the Marches of Wales, with a ſufficient vigour, yet that by Prince Llewellyn's joining his Forces with thoſe of the Earl of Leiceſter's Sons, they had deſtroyed the Eſtates of the Lord Mortimer, and other Lords Marchers, and burnt the Caſtle of Radnor, ſo that the King's Friends in thoſe Parts were like to be worſted; therefore to put a ſtop to this, Prince Edward reſolved to go with all ſpeed to their Aſſiſtance, and raiſing what Forces he was able in ſo ſhort a time, he march'd from Dover, quite croſs the Countrey, as far as Hereford; but there receiving Intelligence that the Earl of Leiceſter's Sons were coming againſt him with a powerful Army of Engliſh and Welſh, and being apprehenſive that he ſhould not be ſtrong enough to encounter them, he fortify'd himſelf as ſtrongly as he could in the Caſtle of that Town.

But hearing of the approach of the E. of Leiceſt. Sons he fortifies himſelf in Hereford.

[1] Id. ib.

[1] In the mean time, as ſoon as the King his Father could receive the King of France's Award drawn up into Form, he made no delay, but taking leave of that Prince in the beginning of February, he went to Whitſand, and there ſtaying ſome time, in order to go for England, he thought fit, before he took Shipping to ſend over Meſſengers to Dover to demand admittance into that Caſtle, in obedience to the French King's late Sentence; but they could receive no other Anſwer from thoſe that kept it, than that they could not do it without the conſent of Sir Richard de Grey, their Conſtable; however the King reſolved to paſs over thither himſelf, and being ſafely arriv'd, was there honourably receiv'd in the Priory, and from thence He again ſent to demand the delivery of the Caſtle into his hands; but being ſtill deny'd it, he went forthwith to Canterbury, and ſpent there ſome Days; but to what Place he went from thence is not certain, our Authors being ſilent in it; only we find from Tho. Wikes's Chronicle, that he was in the beginning of Lent at Oxford, (which fell out then about the firſt Week in March) and that he continu'd there till the end of that Month, as we find by a * Commiſſion ſtill upon Record (tho' not mention'd by any of our Hiſtorians

But one of the firſt things I perceive the King did, after he came to Oxford was, (as the Manuſcript * Annals of the Abbey relate) that he then ſummon'd all his Military Tenants to attend him there with Horſe and Arms to march againſt his Enemies.

[2] Prince Edward having done all he could for the King's Intereſt in the Borders of Wales, (tho' without any great Succeſs) left Hereford, and plundering and deſtroying the Houſes and Eſtates of the Barons in his March, came to his Father at Oxford, who having ſent away all the Scholars of that Univerſity, there was in Mid-Lent, held another great Council of the Barons and Gentlemen of his Party, who being inform'd, that a great part of the Barons then in Arms againſt the King, had poſſeſs'd themſelves of the Town and Caſtle of Northampton, they adviſed him to march thither againſt them, which he approving of, [3] on the 15*th* of April (being Eaſter-Eve) He ſet out from Oxford, for that Town, with a great Army, being attended by his Son Prince Edward, and his Brother King Richard, and many other Earls and Barons (for whoſe Names I refer you to my Author) moſt of whom had now come over to him from the Earl of Leiceſter's Party, of whoſe Actions it is time to give you ſome Account; for the Earl having ſtay'd all this while in England, expecting the Event of the King of France's Determination, and finding it wholly againſt his Intereſt, was reſolved to make his beſt Advantage of theſe Diſturbances, and having again poſſeſs'd himſelf of the City of London (as you have already heard) into which the Citizens had willingly admitted him, he did all he could to fix it to his Party, which was not at all difficult for him to bring about, the City being then ſo naturally diſpoſed to it.

[3] G. R.

The Earl of Leiceſter ſtrengthens himſelf in London.

And here I think it may not be impertinent, from the Annals of the City (already cited) to ſhew you by what means this was effected. Thomas Fitz-Thomas being choſen Mayor the laſt Year, was ſtill kept in Office, as one highly for the Earl of Leiceſter's Faction; this Man, to flatter the Rabble or vulgar ſort of Citizens (who then call'd themſelves the Community of the City) permitted them to give their Votes in the firſt place, and if the major part of them cried out Ta, Ta, (which was then the ſame thing with our Yea) the thing (tho' never ſo violent and unreaſonable) was preſently put in execution; ſo that during theſe Commotions, little or nothing was done by the Aldermen and * Chief Men of the City; by which means the common People became ſo proud and headſtrong, that they Canton'd themſelves into divers particular Aſſemblies or Combinations, ſome of which conſiſted of a Thouſand Men, who, under pretence of keeping the Peace, were the moſt notorious breakers of it, for their principal deſign being to enrich themſelves, they plunder'd the Houſes of whomſoever they had a Pique at, under pretence of their their being of the King's Party, (or Malignants, as they have been call'd in our Times) tho' indeed their Fury mainly fell upon the Italian Bankers call'd the Caurſini and the Jews: nor did this mad Faction prevail in London alone, but (as Thomas Wikes informs us) was alſo in other Cities and Towns in England, where the ungovernable Mob calling themſelves by the name of * Batchellors, ran down and overpower'd the better ſort of Citizens and Townſmen, much to the prejudice of the whole Community; and it was theſe ſort of People that kept the King out of the City, when he would have laſt return'd thither; but to give you ſome account of their Exploits.

[4] T.W. G.R. The Citizens fortify the City of Lond.

[4] The War being thus again renew'd, theſe Factious Citizens of London having new fortify'd their City, they preſently ſeiz'd the King's Juſtices, and the Barons of the Exchequer; and then their next Expedition was in the beginning of Lent, when, under the Conduct of Henry d' Eſpencer (whom the Barons had lately made Juſtitiary of England) and Thomas Pynpleſdon, and Stephen Buckerel (the former of whom they call'd their Conſtable, and the latter their Mareſchal) upon the Ringing of the Great Bell at St. Paul's they marched out early in the Morning, with Banners diſplay'd as far as Thiſtleworth, where they burnt a moſt ſtately Mannor-Houſe of the K. of the Romans, who had hitherto been a great Friend to the Community of the City, and then in their return they pulled down and deſtroyed a fair Summer-Houſe of the King's in the Suburbs of Weſtminſter; then afterwards they fell upon the Jews, and not only plunder'd, but cruelly Maſſacred above Five Hundred of them, ſparing neither Age nor Sex, and more had then periſh'd, had not the Juſtitiary and the Mayor interpoſed their Authority: ſo that whoever will compare the preſent Temper of the vulgar People of that City, when left to themſelves, with what it was in that Age, may find, that tho' it is often violent and headſtrong to do Miſchief, yet are not the effects ſo cruel and fatal as they were in thoſe Times.

And then marched out, and burnt the King of the Roman's Houſe at Thiſtleworth.

[5] T.W.M.W. The King beſieges Northampton.

[5] But to return to the King, whom we left in his March againſt Northampton, before which Place, ſo ſoon as He and the Barons that attended him arriv'd, they preſently laid cloſe Siege to it, and ſtorming the Town, enter'd it by a Breach, that was made by undermining the Wall; where, after a great Slaughter of the Gariſon in the Streets of the Town, there were taken Priſoners Fifteen Barons bearing Banners, and Sixty Knights, beſides common Souldiers, whoſe number is not related; alſo Peter Montfort, Couſin to Earl Simon, who had retir'd into the Caſtle, finding it no longer Tenable againſt ſo great a Force, ſurrend'red it the next Day, together with himſelf; [1] but Simon de Montfort, ſecond Son to the Earl of Leiceſter, before the Town was taken, was made a Priſoner, by a very ſtrange Accident, which was this. He riding too near the Breach, his Horſe being frighten'd at ſomewhat, ran headlong with him through the Ruines of the Wall, down into the Ditch, where his Rider hardly eſcap'd breaking his Neck, but he was taken up by the King's Souldiers, who now got great ſtore of Spoil, ſparing neither Churches nor Monaſteries.

And takes it by an Aſſault; many Barons and Knights being taken Priſoners.

[1] T. W. Ib. Simon Montfort the younger is taken Priſoner by a very odd Accident.

[2] Ib. The manner of taking the Town is ſomewhat differently related by the Annals of S. Auguſtine.

But the [2] Annals of St. Auguſtine relate the taking of this Place more particularly, and alſo differ in ſome Circumſtances of it from other Writers; for after giving us the Names of the Barons that were within it, they tel us, that it was taken by the ſpringing of a Mine, which which made the Wall fall down, whilſt there was a Treaty on foot for the Deliverance of the Town upon Terms; as alſo that Simon Montfort the younger was taken in the Town fighting Valiantly even to the laſt; and that he, with the reſt of the Noblemen were ſent Priſoners to Windſor-Caſtle. Anno Dom. MCCLXIV.

But I cannot here omit a very remarkable Paſſage related by Walter Hemingford, concerning the Carriage of the Oxford Schollars at this Siege; who after their Baniſhment from thence, being now ſettled at Northampton, did the King's Men a great deal of Miſchief during this Siege, wherefore at the taking of the Town, the King ſwore that he would hang them all; however, ſeveral of them made their eſcape by flight, and others ſhav'd their Heads like Friers; but at laſt all being over, the King commanded his Oath to be put in Execution upon thoſe Schollars that were taken Priſoners; but his Courtiers interceding for them ſaid, It was by no means convenient to be done, for that they were the Sons of Great Noblemen and Gentlemen of his Kingdom; and if he ſhould now cauſe them to be Executed, their Fathers and Relations would certainly riſe againſt him as one Man; whereupon the King pardon'd them all. [3] Lib. 3. Cap. 29. The K. being very angry with the Oxford Scholars for their aſſiſting him in the Siege, ſwears to hang them all, but is perſwaded to the contrary by his Courtiers.

This I take notice of to let you ſee how ſtrong and numerous a Body the Schollars of Oxford were in thoſe Days, and what a great Intereſt they then had in the Kingdom. But to return to the Hiſtory.

[4] The K. flush'd with this Victory preſently march'd to Leiceſter, and took it, and from thence advanc'd to Nottingham, which Caſtle was held by William Bardulph, a Valiant Baron; yet he now thought it his ſafeſt way to ſurrender it to the King, upon the moſt advantageous Terms he could. Here the King, with his Noblemen kept his Eaſter, but receiving News, that the Earl of Leiceſter, with a great multitude of Londoners had, on the Paſſion-Week, beſieg'd the Earl of Warren in the Caſtle of Rocheſter, he was reſolv'd to raiſe the Siege and relieve it; ſo marching almoſt Night and Day, he arriv'd in five Days at Rocheſter, but the Earl of Leiceſter hearing of his approach, durſt not ſtay to give him Battel, but went back to London, leaving only a few Souldiers behind, whom thoſe of the Garriſon, in a Sally they made, quickly deſtroy'd. [4] M. W. T. W. The King takes Leiceſter, Nottingham-Caſtle ſurrenders. The King marching to relieve Rocheſter-Caſtle, the E. of Leiceſter, and the Londoners raiſe the Siege.

[5] Upon this good Succeſs the King ſent his Son Prince Edward, and great part of his Army into Derby-ſhire, where he waſted the Lands of Robert de Ferrars, Earl of Derby, and took his ſtrong Caſtle of Tutbury, and razed it; ſo that where-ever the Prince marched, there appear'd nothing but Slaughter, Burning, and Deſolation, no Peace nor Security being to be found in the whole Kingdom; but about the ſame time (in return) John Gifford, Governour of Kennelworth-Caſtle, for the Earl of Leiceſter ſurpriz'd Warwick, and demoliſh'd the Caſtle, leſt the Royalliſts ſhould again fix themſelves in it. [5] M. W. The K. ſends Prince Edw. into Derby-ſh. who there waſtes the Lands of Earl Ferrars, and takes Tutbury-Caſtle. John Gifford ſurpriſes Warwick.

[1] In the mean while the King march'd with his whole Army directly towards London, but when the Citizens heard it, they went out to meet him with a great Body of Foot very well Armed; upon the News of which he declin'd Fighting, and march'd back into Kent to ſecure the Sea-Coaſts, and prevail with the Cinque-Ports either by Fear or Perſwaſions, to ſend their Ships to block up the River Thames, and thereby hinder Proviſions and other Commodities, from being carried up to London by Water; but this Advice, tho' it ſeem'd plau- [1] *T. ſible, almoſt ruin'd the King's Affairs; for tho' he took the Caſtle of Tonbridge (and in it the Counteſs of Glouceſter) and then went as far as Pevenſey and Winchelſea, thereby ſecuring the Cinque-Ports to his Intereſt; yet in his March thither, through the wild and hilly Parts of Kent, by reaſon of the ſtreightneſs of thoſe Paſſages, the King's Army were ſcarce able to get through them; the light-armed Welſhmen, that belong'd to the Barons, taking this Advantage, did much damage to the King's Forces, tho' they were at laſt cut off by the Royal Party, who were better Arm'd, and againſt whom the Welſhmen's Darts and Arrows ſignified little.

[2] Id. ib. The K. comes to Lewes in Suſſex.

[2] The King met with no Oppoſition in his return back, but came with his whole Army to Lewes in Suſſex, and he took up his Quarters in the Priory, and his Son Prince Edward his in the Caſtle: * In the mean time, the Earl of Leiceſter having Aſſembled all the Barons of his Party, with a ſtrong Body of Londoners, march'd down towards Lewes, and encamp'd at a Place call'd Flexninge, within Seven or Eight Miles of that Place; from whence the Earl, and thoſe of his Party, either ſeemingly or elſe really deſiring Peace, wrote to the King a very reſpectful Letter, profeſſing ſtill to obſerve their Oaths and Fidelity to Him, and deſiring that He would not believe the Lies that thoſe about him made of them, affirming, that they put themſelves into Arms, not only againſt their own but his Enemies, and thoſe of the whole Kingdom: this was Seal'd by the Earls of Leiceſter and Glouceſter, at the requeſt of the reſt of their Faction.

To which the King return'd Anſwer, 'That not Himſelf, but they 'were indeed the cauſe of all the War, Deſtruction, Rapine, and 'Miſery which had befallen the Nation; that their Intentions were 'not according to their Profeſſions, nor their Actions agreeable to 'their Pretences, and therefore defied them. This Letter bears date at Lewes the 12*th* of May, 1264. In like manner, Richard King of the Romans, Prince Edward, and all the Barons and Knights that adhered to the King, charged them with Falſhood, and defied them; and withal challenged them to ſtand to the Judgment of the King's Court, to which they themſelves were ready to ſubmit, and make their Innocence appear. The Letters bear date the ſame with the former.

[4] Id. Ab. They ſend certain Biſhops to mediate for Peace, upon very reaſonable Offers, which the K. refuſes, and ſends them a defiance, which is alſo return'd him by the Barons.

[4] Upon this the Barons being much weaker in Men, were afraid of the Succeſs, and ſent Henry, Biſhop of London, and Walter, Biſhop of Worceſter, as their Mediators for Peace, to the King, and offer'd, in conſideration of the Damages done by them through the Kingdom, no leſs than Thirty Thouſand Pounds, yet ſo that the Statutes of Oxford might ſtand good: nevertheleſs, the King truſting in his Numbers, ſent a freſh defiance to S. Montfort and his Accomplices, with which they being provok'd, at length defy'd him, and renounc'd the Fealty they ow'd him; ſo upon the 14 of May the Earl and his Army (having with great ſhew of Piety Confeſs'd themſelves, and put white Croſſes on their Shoulders or Breaſts) march'd before Day towards Lewes, with Banners diſplay'd, [5] and came ſo near it, before the King's Forces were aware of them, that they had very near ſurpriz'd them in their Beds; but receiving the Alarm, they arm'd themſelves, and march'd out into the open Field, with the King's chief Standard, which was then a Dragon. His Army being divided into three Bodies or Squadrons, the Firſt of them was commanded by Prince Edward, together with William de Valence Earl of Pembroke (his Uncle,) John Earl of Warren and Surrey; the Second was led by Richard King of the Romans and his Son Henry; and the Third the King himſelf commanded in Perſon. Anno Dom. MCCLXIV.

The K's Army divided into three Bodies.

[1] In the mean while Simon Montfort, with the Barons of his Party, perceiving the King's Forces drawing out of the Town, made a Halt upon the Hill above it, where they placed their Baggage, and beyond that the Chariot of Earl Simon, with his Banner diſplay'd upon it, as if he had been ſick, and ſo was forced to repoſe himſelf in it; but in ſtead of himſelf, the crafty Earl had therein cunningly ſhut up Four of the chief Citizens of London, whom, being againſt him, he durſt not truſt elſewhere in his abſence, as refuſing to bear Arms againſt the King; or, as R. Wendover relates, thoſe who had been the Authors of having ſhut the City Gates againſt him, whom he now treated as Enemies; ſo that if this Chariot ſhould be aſſaulted, or ſhot through with Arrows, they might be thereby deſtroyed [2]: then the Barons put their Army in Battel-array, dividing it into Four main Bodies, the Firſt of which was commanded by the Earl of Hereford and Eſſex, with Henry de Montfort, Son to Earl Simon; the Second by Gilbert de Clare Earl of Glouceſter, John Fitz-John, and William de Montcamis; the Third, in which were the Londoners, was commanded by a Baron called Nicholas de Seygrave; whilſt Earl Simon himſelf, and Thomas de Pulyſton, led the Fourth and Laſt Diviſion. So ſoon as the Two Armies approached each other, the Battel began with great fury, and the Earl of Leiceſter, with the Body that was under him, as alſo that next to him, fell upon the Forces commanded by the King himſelf, and Richard King of the Romans; for the Earl judged very rightly, that if they were either routed or taken Priſoners, it was moſt likely the Victory would fall to the Barons. As [3] for the Noble Prince Edward, he with the Flower of his Army, ſet upon the Londoners, who tho' many in Number, yet being raw and undiſciplin'd, ran away with Henry de Haſtings at the Head of them; whom Prince Edward, out of Revenge for the Affront they had done to the Queen his Mother at London-Bridge, fiercely perſued, killing all he overtook, and making a miſerable Slaughter of them for near Four Miles together; likewiſe the main Body of the Barons was broken, and John Gifford, one of their valiant Knights, was led Priſoner into the Caſtle of Lewes: But whilſt Prince Edward thus perſued the Londoners, his Anger carried him too far; for in the mean time, the Bodies commanded by the Earls of Leiceſter and Glouceſter, having furiouſly aſſaulted thoſe commanded by King Henry and his Brother King Richard, (which were only ſome Troops conſiſting of their Retinue and Domeſtick Guards) and they making but a ſlight Defence, were utterly routed, ſo that the Two Brothers being left almoſt alone in the Field, were forced, after a long and brave Reſiſtance, to ſurrender themſelves, the King to the Earl of Leiceſter, and King Richard to the Earl of Glouceſter, who were preſently ſecured in the Priory of Lewes; whereupon all the reſt of their Men that had fled into the Town, laid down their Arms, and yielded themſelves, as thinking it no ſhame to undergo the ſame Fortune with the King himſelf, and his Brother. Then the Earls and Barons entring the Town, took all Priſoners whom they found without the Caſtle and Priory, which ſtill held out

[4] But the Continuator of Matt. Paris is more particular in this Relation, and ſays, that the Prince, upon his Return from the Perſuit, finding his Father's Army routed and diſperſed, but that the Caſtle of Lewes ſtill made a vigorous Defence againſt the Barons, he took Courage, and rallied his Forces, with a Deſign to try the Fortune of another Battel; which Montfort and his Confederates perceiving, [5] the next day ſent two Friers Minors as Meſſengers for Peace, promiſing by them reaſonable Terms: So that the Night following a Peace between the Prince and the Barons was made up, tho' upon very hard Conditions, viz. That he and his Couſin Henry ſhould yield themſelves as Hoſtages for the obſerving of it, and for its farther Settlement, both Parties ſhould refer themſelves to the King of France, and procure him to chuſe Three Prelates, and Three Noblemen of France, who ſhould nominate Two Frenchmen, and they coming into England, ſhould chuſe a Third Perſon, an Engliſhman; which Three ſhould determine all Controverſies between the King and the Barons, and order all Things concerning the State of the Kingdom: And for the Performance of this Agreement, they were to take their Corporal Oaths on both Sides.

With the Terms of the Prince's Surrender of himſelf to the Barons.

A more probable Account of the Articles of this Agreement, from the City Annals.

Yet the Annals of London give a different, and more probable Account of the Articles of this Peace: As Firſt, That the Proviſions of Oxford ſhould be again obſerved; yet ſo, that if there were any thing in them that needed Amendment, it ſhould be corrected by Four of the Great Men of England, either Biſhops or Barons, to be choſen by the Community thereof: And if any Difference ſhould ariſe between them, concerning thoſe Amendments, they were to ſtand to the Arbitration of Charles Count of Anjou, Brother to the King of France, with four other Noblemen of that Kingdom, there named; and that in the mean while the Two young Princes abovemention'd ſhould remain as Hoſtages in the Cuſtody of the Barons, till all theſe Things ſhould be ſettled; and for this end a Parliament was to be ſummoned at Whitſontide following. Theſe Articles being put into an Inſtrument or Charter, was ſealed with the King's Seal, and the Seals of all the reſt of the Earls, and Chief Barons. This Agreement was called the * Miſe of Lewes, tho' it was never put in Execution.

all outward Honour and Reſpect, but ſent King Richard with his Son Henry Priſoners to the Tower; but all the reſt who were taken in the Battel, were ordered to be impriſon'd in ſeveral Caſtles; and then they plundered and ſpoiled the Eſtates of all thoſe that had adhered to the King, or at any time had ſerved him, as well Clerks as Laicks. Anno Dom. MCCLXIV.

[1] The King and the Prince his Son being thus in the Power of the Earl of Leiceſter, one of the firſt things he made him do, was, on the Day after the Battel, to iſſue a Proclamation, giving Licence to all thoſe that had taken his Part, and were not made Priſoners, to go home; and at the ſame time he alſo wrote to thoſe in the Caſtle of Tonbridge (which ſtill held out for him) not to fall upon thoſe Barons who were returning to their own Homes: But for all this, thoſe in that Gariſon hearing that the Londoners, who had fled from the late Battel, had ſheltered themſelves in Croyden, they immediately marched thither, and falling upon them, killed a great many of them, and carried off a great deal of Plunder; from whence they marched away to Briſtol, which Place they kept for the King till the Prince's Delivery, who for the preſent was ſent to Wallingford-Caſtle, to be there kept ſafe; [2] but as for the King, the Earl carried him along with him, as it were on Progreſs (but rather in Triumph) about the Countrey, that he might by the Authority of his Preſence take in all the Places that ſtill held out in thoſe Parts; and then coming to Battle-Abbey in Suſſex, the King directed his Writ or Letter, bearing Date the Seventeenth of May, to Drogo de Barentin, Conſtable of the Caſtle of Windſor, to releaſe Simon Montfort the Younger, who had been taken Priſoner at Northampton, and committed to his Cuſtody by Prince Edward: In like manner he wrote to William de la Zouche, to deliver Peter Montfort the Younger; and to James Audley, to deliver Robert Montfort his Brother, (Sons of Peter Montfort.) Then, on the Twenty eighth of the ſame Month, Henry de Montfort, eldeſt Son to the Earl of Leiceſter, was made by the King's Commiſſion Conſtable of Dover-Caſtle, and Warden of the Cinque-Ports, and had the Chamberlainſhip of Sandwich committed to him during Pleaſure, as appears by the Original * Writ upon Record in the Tower.

There is likewiſe farther expreſs'd, at the end of each of theſe Commiſſions, a particular Precept to theſe Conſervators, reciting, That 'whereas at the enſuing Parliament the King intended to treat with 'the Prelates, Great Men, and Others his faithful Subject, concern-'ing his own and the Kingdom's Affairs, he therefore Commanded 'the ſaid Conſervators to ſend up to him, Four of the moſt Legal 'and Diſcreet Knights of each County, to be choſen by the Aſſent of 'that County, for the whole County to appear at London, on the 'Octaves (i. e. Eight Days after the Feaſt) of Holy Trinity at far-'theſt, there to treat with him concerning the ſaid Affairs. 'That a certain Ordinance made in the Parliament held at London, 'about the Feaſt of St. John Baptiſt laſt paſt, for preſerving the Peace 'of the Kingdom, until ſuch time as the Peace between the ſaid Lord 'the King, and the Barons at Lewes, according to the Form of a cer- 'tain Miſe or Agreement, ſhould be fully concluded; which Peace 'was to endure firm and unalterable all the Days of the ſaid King, 'and alſo during the time of Prince Edward, after he ſhould become 'King, * unto the Term which it ſhould then be judged fitting to be 'moderated. This is the Preface, then follows the Statute or Ordinance it ſelf, which is to this effect:

The Contents of this Ordinance.

'That for the Reformation of the State of the Kingdom, there 'ſhould be choſen out of it Three diſcreet and faithful Men, who 'ſhould have Power and Authority from the King, of naming and 'chooſing Nine Counſellors, out of whom Three at the leaſt, by 'turns, ſhould always be preſent at the Court; and the King by the 'Advice of thoſe Nine, ſhould order and diſpoſe of the Cuſtody of 'his Caſtles, and all other Affairs of the Kingdom, and ſhould make 'his Juſtitiary, Chancellor, Treaſurer, and all other Great and Small 'Officers that belonged to the Government of the Court and 'Kingdom: and the firſt Electors of them, were to ſwear 'that according to their Conſciences they ſhould chooſe and 'nominate ſuch Counſellors for the Honour of God and the 'Church, as ſhould be faithful and profitable to the Kingdom; the 'Counſellors alſo and all Officers both great and ſmall, were to ſwear 'at their Creation, that they would, to the utmoſt of their Power, 'execute their Offices to the Honour of God and the Church, and to 'the Profit of the King and Kingdom, without any other * Preſent or 'Reward than things to Eat and Drink; and if theſe Counſellors, or 'any of them, ſo miſdemeaned themſelves as to be thought no longer 'fit to hold thoſe Employments; then the King, by the Advice of 'the Three firſt Electors, might change and remove as many of them 'as he judged neceſſary; and in the place of them ſo removed, to 'ſubſtitute other fit and faithful Perſon or Perſons; and if any other 'Officers, whither Great or Small, behav'd themſelves amiſs, they 'were likewiſe to be remov'd by the Council of the Nine, and others 'ſhould be by them appointed in their Places; and if the ſaid Three 'Electors could not agree in the choice of Counſellors, or that they 'agreed not in the Creation of Officers, or in diſpoſing of, or diſ- 'patching the other Affairs of the King and Kingdom, that then what 'ſhould be ordain'd by Two Parts of the Three, ſhould firmly be ob- 'ſerved, ſo as of thoſe Two Parts, one ſhould be a Prelate, if it were 'in Matters concerning the Church; and if it ſhould happen that 'Two Parts of the Nine ſhould not agree in any buſineſs, then it was 'to be determined by the Three firſt Electors, or the major part of 'them; and if it ſhould be thought expedient by the Community of 'the Prelates and Barons, that all, or any of the Three firſt Electors 'ſhould be removed, and others ſubſtituted in their rooms, the King 'ſhould ſubſtitute them by the Advice of the Community of the Earls 'and Barons.

Anno Dom. MCCLXIV.

'All theſe things the King was to do by the Council of the Nine, 'in ſuch Form as was to be ſubſcribed by Him, or by them in his ſtead, 'by his Authority. This Ordinance was to endure until the Miſe or 'Agreement made at Lewes ſhould be compleated, or another Form 'provided and appointed by the Agreement of all Parties. In Wit-'neſs whereof, Richard, Biſhop of Lincoln; and Hugh, Biſhop of Ely; 'Roger, Earl of Norfolk, and Mareſchal of England; Robert de Vere, 'Earl of Oxford; Humphry de Bohun; William de Montchenſey, and 'the Mayor of London, put their Seals to this Charter, dated at the 'Parliament at London in June 1264.

Note, But tho' the Day of the Month be wanting in the Record, yet in an antient Tranſcript of this Agreement in Manuſcript, in the Bodleian Library, it is recited in the Concluſion to have been made by the Conſent of the Prelates, Barons, and Communalty of England, on the Vigil of St. Peter and Paul, (i. e. June 29.) &c.

This is the ſubſtance of that Form of Government which Simon Montfort, and thoſe of his Party then thought fit to impoſe upon the King; and having the Power in their own Hands, it was an eaſie Matter for them to make thoſe whom they had appointed Conſervators of the Peace in each County, to return none but ſuch Knights who they were very well ſatisfied would perform whatever they deſir'd; and that this Inſtrument was ready drawn, and ſo there could be little or no debate about ſo great and weighty an Affair, appears by the next * Record (which Dr. Brady has alſo given us) wherein the King declares, that he hath given Power to Stephen, Biſhop of Chicheſter; Simon Montfort, Earl of Leiceſter; and Gilbert de Clare, Earl of Glouceſter and Hereford, to name Nine of the moſt skilful, faithful, and uſeful Men of the Kingdom, as well Prelates as others, by whoſe Advice he would Govern, according to the Laws and Cuſtoms of the ſame, until the Miſe lately made at Lewes, or any other Form (if any better could be provided) ſhould be fulfill'd; and at the end of this Declaration it is farther ſpecified, that the ſaid Biſhops and Earls were authoriz'd to nominate theſe Electors. This bears date the 22*d* Day of June, the Day after the Parliament ſate; and could not therefore be drawn up in ſo ſhort a Time, by their Deliberation or Advice.

* Pat. 48. H. 3. M. 10. n. 37. Append. N. 204.

It appears by a Record, that this Ordinance was drawn up before the Parliament ſate.

And the ſhort Account * Matt. of Weſtminſter gives of this Matter, in moſt things agrees with theſe Records; for (ſaith he) the Prelates, Earls, and Barons of that Party who now Seditiouſly held their King Priſoner, met at London, and unmindful of the Compromiſe made at Lewes, or the Oath they had taken, contrived certain new Ordinances for the Government of the Kingdom, and ordained among other new things, viz. That Two Earls, and one Biſhop, Elected by the Community, ſhould chooſe Nine Barons, Three whereof ſhould conſtantly aſſiſt the King; and by the Counſel of thoſe Three, and theſe Nine, all the Affairs as well of the King's Houſhold, as of the Kingdom ſhould be tranſacted; and that what the King ſhould do without the Advice of at leaſt Three of them, ſhould be void, and of none effect; and then the Earls of Leiceſter and Glouceſter, and Biſhop of Chicheſter (who had promiſed to all that fought ſtoutly againſt the King, and were killed in the Battel of Lewes, immediate entrance into Heaven) were conſtituted Three of theſe Chief Counſellors.

* Sub Anno 1265. Matt. of Weſtminſter's Account of theſe Tranſactions agrees in moſt things with the Records.

Then

Then they and the reſt of the Barons threat'ning the King, that they would Depoſe him and chooſe another, and alſo keep the Prince perpetually in Priſon, if they refus'd to conſent to this Ordinance, they thereby compell'd them both to agree to it. Having thus contriv'd and perfected theſe Ordinances, they preſently ſent Letters to Cardinal Guido, Biſhop of Sabine, then the Pope's Legate for England, (at that time in France) and to the French King himſelf, to excuſe what they had done, as that it was but in regard of their preſent Circumſtances, that they ſet aſide the Compromiſe or Agreement made at Lewes, and eſtabliſh'd this new Form of Peace, made, as they pretended, by the amicable Conſent of all Parties: and then the Biſhops of London, Wincheſter, and Worceſter, and ſome others of the Province of Canterbury, alſo wrote to, and earneſtly beſeeched the aforeſaid Legate, that he would uſe his endeavours to promote this Peace on the Terms agreed upon in England. Yet it ſeems by a * Record in the Tower, that to pacifie the King of France, and to put the better Colour upon their Proceedings, Simon Montfort, and thoſe of his Faction, made the King (being now at Canterbury) ſeal a Charter, whereby He himſelf, as alſo the Earl of Leiceſter, and all the Barons of England, who had refus'd the late Sentence of King Lewis, oblig'd themſelves to refer the late Sentence of that King, to the further Judgment and Examination of Henry, Biſhop of London; Hugh le Diſpenſer, Juſtitiary of England; Charles, Duke of Anjou, Brother to the King of France; and to the Abbot of Bocon, who had thereby full Power given them, of adding, or taking away from it what they ſhould think fit; as alſo of ordaining what they ſuppos'd would tend to the amendment, or better obſervation thereof; and for the true performance of this, the King, and all the reſt of the Parties therein mention'd, ſubmit themſelves to the Juriſdiction of the Pope's Legate, to be proceeded againſt by Sentence of Excommunication, againſt thoſe that ſhould preſume to contradict it. There are alſo divers other Clauſes in this Charter, which are needleſs to be recited, only I ſhall take notice of ſome of the moſt remarkable; One of which is, That it ſhall not be lawful for the ſaid Arbitrators to Ordain, that the Kingdom ſhall be govern'd by any other than the Native Subjects thereof. There is alſo another Clauſe whereby it is provided, That all Perſonal Quarrels, Contentions, and Demands, which the King and the Earl of Leiceſter have now againſt each other, and for which they have refer'd themſelves to the King of France, ſhall be ended and concluded in the firſt place, before the Sentence or Ordinance of theſe Arbitrators ſhall be made and finiſhed. In Teſtimony whereof, the ſaid King Henry, with the Earls of Leiceſter and Glouceſter, and ſome other Barons there named, do, for themſelves, and the reſt of the Barons of England, put their Seals. This bears Date at Canterbury on the Thurſday after the Feaſt of our Lady's Nativity (being the 18*th* of September) * A. D. 1263. This Record is omitted by Dr. Brady in his Hiſtory, tho' he hath given us † another which immediately preceeds the former in the ſame Roll (and to which I ſuppoſe that Charter refers) And by this, the King conſtitutes the Biſhops of London, Worceſter, and Wincheſter, with Hugh le d' Eſpenſer, Peter Montfort, and Richard de Mepham, Arch-Deacon of Oxford, Procurators and Commiſſioners to to treat in the Preſence of the illuſtrious Prince the King of France, and the Venerable Father, Guido, Biſhop of Sabine, and Legate of the Apoſtolick See, or either of them, about the Reformation of the Kingdom of England, with Power to do whatever they thought fit in this Matter, and to give ſuch Security for it as the buſineſs requir'd, with a ſpecial Clauſe to Peter Montfort to take an Oath on the King's behalf to perform what they ſhould agree to in his Name.

[5] P. 64. Thomas Wikes's Account of what theſe Commiſſioners acted in France, and what was the occaſion of their Journey.

What theſe Commiſſioners did, Dr. Brady ſays he cannot tell, but had he conſulted [5] Thomas Wikes's Chronicle, then in Manuſcript, in the Cottonian Library, that would have inform'd him, not only of what theſe Biſhops then acted in France, but alſo what was the occaſion of their Journey thither, viz. That Pope Urban the Eighth, pitying the ſad and deplorable State of the Engliſh Nation, had the Year before ſent an Order to his Legate, Cardinal Guido, Biſhop of Sabine, a wiſe and eloquent Prelate, to come over into England to arbitrate and compoſe the Quarrels and Differences between the King and the Barons; but the Earl of Leiceſter, and thoſe of his Party, would not permit the Legate to come hither, or at all to intermeddle with the Affairs of England: when the Cardinal found this, he with the Archbiſhop of Canterbury (who had then in diſcontent retir'd into France,) ſummon'd all the Biſhops of England, eſpecially thoſe of London, Wincheſter, Chicheſter, and Salisbury, (as the chief Favourers of the Barons Cauſe) to appear before them at Bologne; but they either really, or otherwiſe pretended to be hinder'd by the Barons from going over thither, but the Legate look'd upon it as only a feign'd Excuſe, and thereupon Excommunicated them for Contumacy; but they, to fence off this Blow, appeal'd from the Legate to the Pope: Yet at laſt the Biſhops of London, Wincheſter, and Worceſter being better adviſ'd, went over into France about the Nativity of the Bleſſed Virgin; the Juſtitiary, and ſome other Noblemen of England, accompanying them, who all appear'd before the Legate, to juſtifie themſelves as well as they could; and upon this Account it was, that Matt. Weſtminſter ſays, the Biſhops abovemention'd went over into France, with a Power from the King to treat with the Pope's Legate, concerning the ſettling the State of England, as is expreſs'd in the laſt mention'd Record.

The Biſhops of London and Wincheſter are ſummon'd to appear before the Pope's Legate at Bologn, but are hinder'd by the Barons from going over.

Yet at laſt they go over with ſome Lay-Noblemen.

[1] Id. ib. The Legate by the Pope's Authority commands theſe Biſhops to return into England, and Excommunicate the Earl of Leiceſter and his Accomplices.

[1] The ſame Author tells us alſo what was farther done thereupon in this Affair, viz. That the Legate being ſupported by Apoſtolical Authority, enjoyn'd theſe Biſhops forthwith to return into England, and there to Excommunicate the Earl of Leiceſter and his Sons, with all their Favourers and Accomplices by Name; and likewiſe to put the City of London, with all the Lands of the Earl of Glouceſter, and the Cinque-Ports under an Interdict; the Biſhops having thus receiv'd the Pope's Brief or Commiſſion, preſently ſet Sail for England, but being ſeiz'd in their Paſſage over, by ſome Seamen that belong'd to the Cinque-Ports, they were ſtraightway ſearched, and the Pope's Bull to Excommunicate the ſaid Lords being found about them, it was, without any farther Ceremony, torn to pieces and flung into the Sea; and the Biſhops themſelves were alſo threaten'd with the loſs of their Heads, if they ſhould preſume to publiſh this Sentence: Thus (ſays our Author) the rudeneſs of theſe Mariners ſtruck thoſe lukewarm Prelates quite Dumb, as having now a good pretence not to execute what they before did not approve of.

But being ſeiz'd by ſome of the Cinque-Ports the Pope's Bull to Excommunicate them is taken and torn to pieces.

[2] Now

[2] Now this Guido, the Pope's Legate, ſeeing his Deſigns thus diſappointed, took his Journey towards Rome, but before he got thither, he receiv'd the news of the Death of Pope Urban the Fourth about Michaelmaſs, and that the Cardinals had choſen him Pope in his ſtead; and he being Conſecrated in the beginning of February following, was called Clement the Fourth; and ſo ſoon as he was ſettled in his Seat, he ſeverely revenged that Affront, which the Engliſh had put upon the Roman See, as you will find anon.

Anno Dom. MCCLX IV.

[2] Id. ib. Whereupon the Pope's Legate goes for Rome, and by the way receives News of the Pope's Death, and of his being choſen in his ſtead.

With this Relation [3] Mat. Weſtminſter alſo agrees concerning the Excommunication iſſued forth by the Legate, and its being taken and deſtroyed by the Men of Dover; but he ſays it was done after the Biſhops had Landed, yet mentions nothing of their going over to the Legate, (which I much wonder at) only that they were ſummon'd to appear, and that the Legate iſſued out his Sentence of Excommunication and Interdict againſt the City of London and the Cinque-Ports; and that to prevent this Sentence, they appeal'd to the Pope, or the General Council; but to return to Civil Affairs,

[4] About the beginning of July the Earl of Leiceſter, being Allarm'd at the report that a great multitude of Foreigners were preparing to make an Invaſion here, cauſed the King to iſſue out a Writ or Proclamation, directed to the Archbiſhops, Biſhops, Abbots, Priors, Earls, Barons, Knights, Freemen, and to the whole Commonalty of moſt of the Counties of England, wherein was ſet forth, 'That he 'had receiv'd certain Information of a horrid Conſpiracy intended by 'a numerous Company of Foreigners that were preparing Shipping 'and other Warlike Ammunition, in order to Invade the Kingdom, to 'the diſinheriting of himſelf, and every Perſon thereof, unleſs due 'care were taken by a ſufficient Force to prevent it. He therefore 'Commands all Knights and Free Tenants to make ready themſelves 'with Horſe and Arms, ſo as to be at London on Sunday after the 'firſt of Auguſt, to march with him from thence for the defence of 'his Royal Perſon, themſelves and the whole Nation, againſt theſe 'Foreigners; and alſo requires all Sheriffs to take with them the Keep-'er of the Peace of the County, to ſummon and firmly enjoin, in the 'King's Name, the aforeſaid Archbiſhops, Biſhops, Barons, and all 'others, who ow'd the King Military Service, by the Faith and 'Homage in which they were bound to him, and as they loved them-'ſelves, their Lands and Tenements, to come to him, not only with 'the Service they ow'd him, and were bound by their Tenure to per-'form, but with what other Horſes and Arms they could ſpare, or 'ſend them with as many choice Foot as they could raiſe, that ſo by 'their help he might effectually reſiſt the impendent Danger. The reſt of this Proclamation being very long, I ſhall contract it as much as I can: And Firſt of all it ſets forth, 'That no Man was to be ex-'cuſed for non-appearance, by reaſon of the ſhortneſs of the Time, 'nor yet of the approaching Harveſt, ſince it was better for them to 'ſuffer ſome loſs of Goods, than the deſtruction of the King and 'Kingdom; and beſides the Forces abovemention'd, the Sheriffs were 'to cauſe to come at the ſame Day, Four, Six, or Eight of the beſt and 'ſtouteſt Foot Souldiers from every Town, according to the extent 'of it, with their Arms then in uſe, who were to have their Ex-'pences born for Forty Days; and that the Cities and Boroughs

[4] Id. ib. Upon the Report of an Invaſion by Foreigners, Simon Montfort makes the K. iſſue out Writs commanding all Perſons to be ready with Horſe and Arms.

'ſhould alſo ſend in both Horſe and Foot according to their Large-
'neſs and Abilities. This Command of the King's, the Sheriffs were forthwith to publiſh, and thereby give notice to all Men, that they might prepare themſelves to be ready at the time appointed; letting them know withall, that if the King ſhould find any Contemners of his Command, or that ſhould be remiſs in the performance of it, he would ſeize their Perſons and Goods, as of thoſe that neither valued his, nor their own Preſervation. This Declaration was dated at * St. Paul's, London, on the 6th of July. Which is tranſlated and inſerted at large in [5] Dr. Brady's Hiſtory; and the Latin Original is alſo in his † Appendix, taken from the * Record in the Tower; And this does indeed deſerve the Reader's Notice, it being the firſt Commiſſion of this kind that is extant, and ſhews not only the manner of raiſing the Militia in thoſe Times, but that all Men, even the meaneſt Houſholders, were then by Law to be furniſh'd with Arms, ſuitable to their degree. And then alſo for the ſecuring of the Sea-Coaſts, the King, on the 9th of July, iſſued forth his * Writs to the Good Men of Len, Yarmouth, Donwich, Oxford, Ipſwich, and all other Cities, Burghs, and Towns upon the Coaſts of Norfolk and Suffolk, to be obedient to the Directions of Hugh le D' Eſpenſer, his Juſtitiary, in ſecuring the Coaſts of thoſe Counties, and whom he had ſent to them for that purpoſe.

The Earl of Leiceſter takes a Licenſe to ride Armed, and for what reaſon.

At this time likewiſe, foraſmuch as the Earl of Leiceſter would be thought a ſtrict Obſerver of the King's Commands, he received his Licence to ride armed, tho' by the Council of his Barons he had before ſtreightly forbad all Men, on the peril of their Lives, to ride about with Horſes and Arms: But this was allow'd the Earl, becauſe of the many Hoſtages and Priſoners he was to carry about with him; which Writ of Licence is dated at St. Paul's, London, the Sixth of July, and is upon * Record, as is alſo this that follows in the ſame Roll.

The Forces not coming in, the King cauſes a Proclamation to be made to enforce them under great Penalties.

The Forces to be raiſed againſt the Invaſion of the Foreigners, not coming in ſo faſt as was expected, the King on the Ninth of Auguſt wrote to the Sheriffs of Cambridge and Huntington-ſhires, to make Proclamation, that all that were commanded to be at London on the Sunday next after the Firſt of Auguſt, with their Horſes and Arms, &c. ſhould march thither in all haſte, under pain of loſing all their Lands, Tenements, and Goods, and be in danger of Life and Limbs; and he there alſo orders, that after Proclamation made, if they did not then march, the Sheriff ſhould take and detain in Priſon all Defaulters until farther order, and out of the Profits of their Eſtates to ſend as many armed Men as they ought to maintain.

The People weary of watching and guarding the Sea-Coaſts being about to go home, are reſolving to keep to their Duty.

* Rot. Pat. 48. H. 3. M. 3. Dorſ.

But when the People, tired out with watching and guarding the Sea-coaſts in Norfolk, Suffolk, and Eſſex, againſt Foreigners, were about to go to their own Homes, they alledg'd, they had been there Forty Days, and would ſtay no longer; and the King having notice of their Intentions, on the Seventeenth of September wrote * Letters to all that were aſſembled for that purpoſe in thoſe Counties, importing, 'That whereas he was apprehenſive of ſeveral Things that 'might happen, by reaſon of ſome News he had lately heard, it was 'neceſſary for them to ſtay a while longer upon the Coaſt; there-'fore commanded them, by the Faith in which they were bound to 'him,

'him, and under pain of losing all they had in the Kingdom, that 'for His, and the common Defence of the Nation against Stran- 'gers, they should stay there, and not depart until they received 'his Licence; and further commanded the Sheriffs to provide Money 'from the Counties, for such as were not able to bear their own 'Charges, for the space of Eight Days ensuing, or longer, if there 'were need; and directed them, under the like Penalties (as before) 'to seize the Lands and Goods of all Defaulters. Anno Dom. MCCLXV.

And there is also on * Record another Writ or Letter from the King to the Sheriffs of Oxford and Buckingham-shire, to command and enjoin all Knights and Free-holders in their Bailiwicks, that were able to bear Arms, and had Lands to the Value of an Hundred Shil- 'lings, or Ten Pounds a Year, under the Penalty of losing all their 'said Lands and Tenements, to come to him in their proper Persons 'with Horse and Arms, where-ever he was in England, with all pos- 'sible speed, to oppose the Strangers that were now suddenly expect- 'ed from beyond Sea; and to furnish themselves with Money for 'their Expences in the Army, until three Weeks after Michaelmas; 'and the Sheriffs were to provide for the Expences of such Foot Soul- 'diers as were not able to do it for themselves, by Taxing the Coun- 'trey for that purpose. * Rot. Pat. 48. H. 3. M. 3. Dors.

Another Writ to the Sheriff of Oxon and Bucks, to warn all the Free-holders of those Counties to attend the K. in Person.

I have been the more exact in setting down the substance of these Records, because they serve to prove the King's Power over the Militia of the Kingdom in those Times, and that independent from Authority of Parliament.

The King's antient Power over the Militia in those Times.

But tho' I must here own Dr. Brady's diligence is much to be commended, in collecting and printing these Records at the end of his History, yet I can by no means assent to his [5] Opinion, that notwithstanding all these reiterated Writs or Letters for the raising and arraying the Militia of the several Counties in England, and for the setting out of Ships for the guard of the Sea-Coasts, yet that all this was only a Politick fetch of Simon Montfort's to cheat the People, and make them afraid of a Foreign Invasion; and that these Rumours were only spread abroad on purpose to keep the Peoples Heads warm with Jealousies and Fears, that an Army might always be ready to baffle all attempts of rescuing the King out of the Power of the Barons, who was all this while forc'd to own them to be true and faithful Subjects to him, by sending out the above-mentioned Declaration and Letters; but the Doctor gives us no other authority for this Opinion, than a * Record already cited in the beginning of this Year, and which he has Printed in his † Appendix to this effect, That whereas divers Persons had raised Reports, that the King intended to bring an Army of Strangers into the Kingdom to destroy the Nation, &c. therefore to undeceive the People, he then wrote to all the Sheriffs of England to make Proclamation in their County-Courts, that he intended no such thing, with other Matters, for which I refer you to the Record it self already cited. But here I must observe, that the Doctor is guilty of a double Mistake, first in positively asserting from this Record, that Montfort and his Confederates were the raisers of this Report, when it names no body in particular, but only says, that they were Quidam, some Persons, who had spread it abroad; nor is his Consequence any better grounded, that granting Simon Mont-

Anno Dom. MCCLXIV.

ſort and his Party had been formerly the raiſers of this Report, and that it had been then altogether falſe and groundleſs, therefore they muſt likewiſe be ſo at this time, when all the Kingdom was actually in Arms; for when the King iſſued out the firſt Writ or Letter, mention'd by the Doctor, which bears Date September the 20th in the 47th Year of his Reign, concerning the above-mention'd Report, he was then wholly at his own diſpoſal, it being ſeveral Months before the Battel of Lewes, which happen'd in May following; and tho' there might be no juſt Ground for any ſuch Report then, yet there might very well be ſo now, when (the King being kept againſt his Will under Montfort's Cuſtody, and Prince Edward alſo a Priſoner) Queen Eleanor, who was then in France, together with the Earls of Pembroke and Warren, and ſeveral other Great Men that had lately been driven out of England; when, I ſay, She and they endeavour'd all they could to ſet them free, and Simon Montfort had then very good Intelligence, that the Queen had really borrow'd Forces of the King of France, and other Foreign Princes, to free the King her Huſband, and the Prince her Son, from that force they then lay under; and ſo much the [1] Doctor himſelf owns, when he cites this Paſſage out of Matt. Weſtminſter, who ſays, That almoſt all France, as far as the Alps, by the Inſtigation of that King; Peter, Earl of Savoy; Boniface, Archbiſhop of Canterbury; and the Biſhop Elect of Lyons, and other of the Queen's Relations, were greatly incenſed againſt the Engliſh, that thus traiterouſly oppoſed their King, which might (ſays the [2] Doctor) raiſe a Suſpicion in them, of the Inclinations and willingneſs of thoſe People to aſſiſt the King, but ſpeaks not of any Shipping provided, or Forces raiſed there to reduce them to Obedience. And I very much admire at this Author's careleſneſs; for had he but conſider'd the precedent Page in the ſame Author, he would have found that he ſays the direct contrary; therefore I ſhall here give you the whole Relation at large, ſince it falls in very opportunely in point of Time, and ſerves to clear ſo conſiderable a Matter of Fact, which the Doctor has either negligently or wilfully omitted. And M. Weſtm. relates it thus; [3] That the Lords Marchers of Wales, to wit, Roger de Mortimer, James de Audley, Roger de Clifford, Roger de Leyburn, Haimo L' Eſtrange, with divers others that had made their eſcape from the Battel of Lewes, now muſter'd up freſh Forces in the Marches, and did all they could to oppoſe the Barons; wherefore Simon Montfort being in Confederacy with Llewellyn, Prince of Wales, march'd into thoſe Parts with a great Army, and taking the Caſtles of Hereford and the Haye, waſted the Lands of Roger de Mortimer with Fire and Sword; whereupon Hugh his Brother was compell'd to ſurrender himſelf to the Barons, with his Caſtle of Richar, which was committed to the Cuſtody of John Fitz-John; and Ludlow was alſo deliver'd at the ſame time: from whence the Welſh and Engliſh Army went forward to Montgomery, where the ſaid Roger and James made a feign'd Peace with the Barons, as it afterwards prov'd. But now the Earl of Leiceſter was forc'd to quit this Expedition, and to march toward the Sea, againſt the Foreigners, whoſe coming over in great Numbers, under the Conduct of the Queen, and Peter Earl of Savoy, was very much fear'd; to reſiſt whom, all the ſtrength of the Kingdom being ſummon'd by the King's Edict, was then aſſembled bled upon Barham-Down, and towards which Expedition the Biſhops likewiſe had receiv'd a Tenth of their Livings from the Rectors of Churches, as alſo from Religious Houſes; and one might have then ſeen on that Heath ſo great an Army both of Horſe and Foot, as you would not have believ'd could be then rais'd in England. Anno Dom. MCCLXIV.

[4] In the mean time Queen Eleanor, with an Army that ſhe had gather'd from divers Nations, and which was commanded by ſo many Dukes and Earls as ſeem incredible, remain'd at Bruges in Flanders; a great Fleet lying alſo in the Port of Dam, in Flanders, to tranſport them hither, which they were mighty deſirous of; yet the Engliſh, and eſpecially the Seamen belonging to the Cinque-Ports ſeem'd not in the leaſt to be afraid of them; but at laſt all this vaſt Army of Noblemen and mercenary Souldiers were forc'd to return home, for (God otherwiſe ordering it) their Expedition was quite fruſtrated by contrary Winds. But there were thoſe who knowing the ſtrength and number of that Army, affirm'd, that if they had once Landed here, they would certainly have ſubdu'd the whole Kingdom; yet God the Father of Mercies having then compaſſion on the People of England, caus'd the Hearts of ſo great a Multitude to fail, ſo that, I ſay, they return'd home without doing any thing, after they had ſpent ſo much Treaſure in vain. However thus much muſt be own'd for the Honour of Queen Eleanor, that ſhe then acted like a courageous Virago, to the utmoſt of her Power, for the delivery of the King her Husband, and her Son Prince Edward. [4] Id. ib. A full Account of the manner of it from the ſame Author.

Thus far Matt. of Weſtminſter (whom the Doctor himſelf has but now cited) and tho' this Author appears highly concern'd for this King's Intereſt, and lived and wrote in his Grandſon's Time, about Fourſcore Years after theſe Tranſactions, yet he was ſo true an Engliſh-man, that he did not think it at all ſafe or beneficial for the Nation to have had the King reſtor'd by an Army of Foreigners, which I could wiſh ſome Men in our Time would take notice of. And now I ſhall leave it to the Doctor to conſider, whither Matt. Weſtminſter mentions nothing of any Shipping provided, or Forces raiſed beyond Sea to reduce the Barons to their Obedience.

And to put this quite out of doubt, Thomas Wikes, under this Year relates, that the Queen, with her Son Edmund, ſtaying in France, and hearing what had happen'd to her Husband, ſhe ſtraight borrow'd great Summs of Money, and therewith raiſing an Army of all thoſe Nations he there names, they marched down to Dam aforeſaid, in order to reſcue the King out of the hands of the Barons, and reſtore him to his former Authority. With whom alſo agrees the Continuator of the Chronicle of Mailroſe, who wrote ſhortly after, (and which the Doctor muſt needs have ſeen when he was writing his Hiſtory;) but this Author does not only agree with the two former, in his Account of the vaſt Army which the Queen had then raiſed, and brought down to the Sea-ſide, but alſo gives us the reaſon of their diſappointment, viz. That all the while they lay on the Coaſt of Flanders, which was for Two Months together, they were ſo kept in by contrary Winds, that they could not paſs over into England, inſomuch that at laſt being neceſſitated to ſell their Horſes and all their Baggage, to their very Cloaths, for want of Money to ſubſiſt, they were forced to return into their own Countries. Thomas Wikes's Relation of what the Qu. now did in France, to carry on this Invaſion. The true reaſon of the failing of this intended Invaſion, was the contrary Winds, ſo that this Army which lay ready to come over was forc'd to diſband.

I write

Anno Dom. MCCLXIV.

I write not this to vindicate the Actions of Simon Montfort, for whoſe Memory I have as little kindneſs perhaps as the Doctor himſelf, but to let the Reader ſee how far prejudice againſt either a Perſon or Cauſe may carry an Hiſtorian to paſs by, or conceal, ſo conſiderable a piece of Hiſtory. But to return to our Own.

[5] M. W.

Whilſt the E. of Leiceſter, is taken up in preventing the Invaſion, the Lords Marchers make Incurſions upon the Engliſh Counties.

[5] Whilſt the Earl of Leiceſter was thus imployed in preventing the Invaſion of theſe Foreigners, and had drawn off great part of his Forces, the above mentioned Lords Marchers of the King's Party breaking the Peace they had lately made, again renewed the War, and invading the Counties on this, as well as on the other ſide the Severn, ſtruck ſuch a terrour into the Inhabitants thereabouts, that they took Sanctuary, by making Huts in the Church-yards for the preſervation of their Perſons and Goods againſt theſe Invaders. The principal Author of this miſchief was Haimo L'Eſtrange a noted Plunderer, who altho' he had often fought ſtoutly, yet had by his Cruelty caſt a great Blot upon his Reputation: But theſe Barons being fixed in their Caſtles, had poſſeſſed themſelves of all the Marches between Briſtol and Cheſter in the Name of King Henry and his Son the Prince: then Robert de Walleran and Warren de Baſſenborne, Governors of Briſtol, marched thence one Morning by break of day with a Party of Horſe to the Caſtle of Wallingford, in which Henry, Son to the King of the Romans, and Prince Edward were then kept Priſoners, tho' under the ſpecious name of Hoſtages, thinking to have ſurprized it, and thereby to have ſet theſe Princes free, yet it proved to no purpoſe; for the Gariſon being awakened, gave them a brisk repulſe; however they were in hopes by the Succour and Reinforcement of the Lords Marchers, (who were making all the haſte they could up to their aſſiſtance) that they ſhould have carried the Place.

And poſſeſs themſelves of all the Marches between Cheſter and Briſtol in the King's Name.

[1] Id. ib.

The Earl of Leiceſter being provok'd by this Inſurrection calls a Council of the Barons at Oxford, where it is reſolv'd that the King, with the Earl, ſhould go into thoſe Parts, which is done accordingly.

[1] The Earl of Leiceſter being now provoked with this late Inſurrection and Breach of the Peace, held a Council of the Nobility at Oxford concerning this matter; and therein they reſolved, That he with a potent Army ſhould go immediately into thoſe Parts; whereupon (carrying with him the outwardly complying King) he marched to Worceſter in order to reduce the Lords Marchers to obedience; towards whom nevertheleſs the King was thought too much inclinable, tho' he durſt not then ſhew it, ſince they fought not only for his Deliverance, but alſo for the Liberty of the Prince his Son; therefore theſe Lords, who were much inferiour in number to Leiceſter's Forces, drew back their own beyond the Severn, and there ſtopt; and the better to reſiſt the Earl and his Forces, they broke down the Bridge at Worceſter, and ſunk the Ferry-boats, that ſo they might by that means hinder their Enemies from paſſing over; yet for all this they found it in vain to fight againſt ſo many brave and valiant Men, eſpecially when they had Simon Montfort, an experienced Warriour, to command them; and having alſo Prince Llewellyn (who was now marched out of Wales) upon the back of them, they were ſo put to it, that they were forced to make peace with that Earl on theſe hard Conditions, viz. That they ſhould leave the Nation for a Year, and deliver up all their Caſtles to the Earl; and to theſe Terms they the more readily conſented, becauſe they were in hopes that Prince Edward by that time might be freed of his Impriſonment, Whereupon the Lords Marchers retreat over Severne.

The Lords Marchers being hard put to it by Simon Montfort, are forced to make Peace upon very hard Conditions.

priſonment, when there were none in Arms to take either his or his Father's Part, ſo that by this means the Earl of Leiceſter became poſſeſſed of almoſt all the Caſtles upon the Marches from Briſtol to Cheſter; which City and Caſtle, with the Earldom and all its Appurtenances, Prince Edward was ſome time after forced to grant him in exchange of other Manours and Lands, before his Liberty could be ſo much as treated of; This Grant was confirmed by the King on the 20th of March following: and alſo the Caſtles and Honours of Pec, the Caſtle and Town of Newcaſtle underline in Staffordſhire were then granted with them, to him and his Heirs. But tho' this was propoſed, and perhaps agreed to between them, yet was it not confirm'd by the King till the year following, as appears by his Patent upon Record in the Tower: yet that this Exchange was real, and not meerly pretended, as Dr. Brady aſſerts, ſee a Record of 49 of Henry the 3d. * Compl. Hiſt. p. 648.

But to come to ſomewhat more conſiderable; the London Annals inform us, that about the Feaſt of St. Simon and Jude, it was provided by the Council of the Great Men, who had then the Adminiſtration of the Government in their hands, that three Biſhops ſhould be choſen who ſhould have full power to aſſeſs the Damages, and make ſatisfaction for all Loſſes received by Clergy-men during the late Troubles, and that if any refuſed to ſtand to their Judgment, they were to be Excommunicated: theſe Biſhops were alſo to keep in their hands and receive the Profits of all Benefices of ſuch Foreigners as had been baniſhed the Kingdom, and they were to keep them till the Settlement of a more firm Peace could be made.

But that the King continued in the Marches of Wales till towards Chriſtmaſs, appears by his Writ to the Sheriff of Middleſex dated at Worceſter the 13th of December, whereby he commands certain Statutes ſent down along with it, to be proclaimed and obſerved under great Penalties. But ſince I have ſpoken farther of this Body of Laws, at the end of this Reign, I refer the Reader thither, if he deſires farther ſatisfaction about them; only he may take notice, that a Copy of the Writ ſent down with them, is Printed in the * Appendix to this Volume.

* N. 12.

Thus all things being for the preſent quiet in the Marches of Wales, the King went directly to his Palace of Woodſtock, there to keep his Chriſtmaſs, whilſt the Earl did the like at his Caſtle of Kenelworth in Warwick-ſhire, and is reported to have had no leſs than Two Hundred Knights in his Family, who received his Stipend or Wages, beſides many others that follow'd him when he took the Field; inſomuch that all England was now in ſubjection to him, except the moſt Northern Parts of it, which by the means of the King of Scots, and John Balliol, ſtill held out againſt him. All Affairs being thus under his Government, the King that had now reign'd Fifty Years, ſignified no more than a Cypher, ſo that he could not go any where on Progreſs without a Keeper, and under the diſpoſal of others, who were commonly one or more of the Earl of Leiceſter's Sons; Hugh d' Eſpenſer, the Juſtitiary; the Earl of Glouceſter being excluded, whom they chiefly ſuſpected and feared, as One that was moſt able to break this Confederacy; and all the King's Caſtles and ſtrong

[2] In hoc Anno. The ſad Condition of the Kingdom undom under the management of the Earl of Leiceſter, and thoſe of his Party.

I ſhall now give you from [2] Thomas Wikes a farther Account of the deplorable State of England, during this Oligarchy of the Earl of Leiceſter, and the Lords of his Party, under whom the Inhabitants of the Cinque-Ports were grown to that height of Inſolence, that ſetting out a great number of Privateers, they cruized about the Engliſh Seas, and taking all Veſſels they met with, as well Engliſh as Foreign, they ſeized their Goods, killed their Men, and flung their Bodies into the Sea; by which means England, that uſed to excel all other Nations in plenty of Foreign Commodities, was now become ſo indigent, that Wines, Salt, Iron, and all other Wares that came from beyond Sea, roſe to that exceſſive Rate, that they were ſold at above Four times their former Price; ſo that no Commodities being able to be carried in or out, the Merchants were reduced to great Extremities: The Earl perceiving this, and being willing to pacifie the People, gave out, that England could very well ſubſiſt without Foreign Commodities (which was very hard to ſuppoſe, ſince all Kingdoms ſubſiſt by a mutual exchange of Wares or Manufactures with their Neighbours;) yet ſome Perſons who were deſirous to curry Favour with the Earl, leſt they ſhould ſeem to be any ways beholding to Foreign Countries, left off coloured Cloaths, and wore them white.

From whence we may obſerve, that we were not then able to Dye a Piece of Cloath in England in thoſe Days; as alſo how miſerable a State this Nation was then in, and would be again, when ever a free Trade ſhall be obſtructed, either through the too great Naval Force of our Neighbours, or of thoſe of our own Countrey, when employ'd to its prejudice.

[3] Id. ib. The ſordid Covetouſneſs of Henry de Montfort.

[3] Beſides theſe Depredations, Henry de Montfort, eldeſt Son to the Earl of Leiceſter, very much ſullied his Military Honour, by ſeizing and applying to his own uſe all the Wooll of the Kingdom in the very Ports, and which the Merchants of England and Flanders had lately bought to tranſport into Foreign Parts; and thus of a Warriour he became a Wooll-Merchant: With theſe and other Grievances England, of a Flouriſhing Kingdom, was now ſo poor and deſpicable, that it became a by-word and ſcorn to its Neighbours; yet during this Winter things continued pretty quiet, but the War broke out afreſh the Summer following with greater violence, as you will find anon.

Nothing happen'd further conſiderable in the Eccleſiaſtical Affairs, except * the Death of Godfrey, Archbiſhop of York; a Prelate remarkable for no great Learning, or other good Qualities: Walter Gifford, Biſhop of Bathe and Wells ſucceeded him by the Pope's immediate nomination.

Anno Dom. MCCLXV.

The K. under the Guardianſhip of one of Sim. Montfort's Sons.

We have already told you, that the King this Year kept his Chriſtmaſs at Woodſtock, being then under the Guardianſhip of one of Simon Montfort's Sons; the Earl of Glouceſter being, upon ſome late Jealouſies and Quarrels that had ariſen between the Earl of Leiceſter and him, wholly excluded from having any thing to do in the Government, except in ſome publick Affairs, from which he could not

not well be exempt: But I will give the Reader a further light into this Quarrel, ſince it was the cauſe of that great Revolution which not long after followed. Anno Dom. MCCLXV.

[4] Leiceſter was now become ſo very great, that the Earl of Glouceſter envied him, and thought himſelf ſlighted and ill uſed by him; ſince it was not ſufficient for him thus to carry about the poor Captive King, but he alone muſt order all the great Affairs of the Kingdom as he pleas'd; yet that which moſt offended Glouceſter was, that he took to his own uſe the Profits and Revenues of the Kingdom, and all the Money that was paid for the Ranſom of Priſoners, which by Agreement was to have been divided between them, and which indeed muſt have amounted to a vaſt Summ; for the Earl of Glouceſter claim'd the King of the Romans and his Son Henry for his ſhare, who had ſurrend'red themſelves to him at the Battel of Lewes, but they being detain'd by Simon Montfort, and kept as his Priſoners ever ſince, it ſo highly provok'd the Earl of Glouceſter, that he only waited for an opportunity to be revenged of him. [4] Id. ib. T.W. The original of the Quarrel between the Earls of Leiceſter and Glouceſter.

The Earl of Leiceſter being ſenſible enough of the ill Conſequences of this Quarrel, engaged the King to interpoſe his Intereſt to reconcile it; and alſo made uſe of the Mediation of ſome of the Biſhops, (as appears upon * Record) altho' to no purpoſe; for the Earl of Glouceſter knew very well, that what the King did, was only in compliance to Simon Montfort who had him then in his Power. * Rot. Pat. 49. H. 3. M. 13. N. 54.

And that all Diſcourſe of this Difference between theſe Earls might (if poſſible) be ſtifled, it appears farther on * Record, that he cauſed the King to write to all the keepers of the Peace, and Sheriffs in England, to apprehend ſuch as ſhould offer to ſay, there was any Diſcord between thoſe Two Earls; but That had the common Fate of all ſuch Methods, to make what they deſired to conceal, to be the more talk'd on. But to return to the Hiſtory. * Rot. Pat. 49. H. 3. N. 54.

[5] On the Morrow after the Feaſt of St. Hilary (being the 14th of January) there was a great Aſſembly of the Nobility held at London, wherein it was decreed, That all the Lords of the Marches of Wales, who had been concern'd in the late Inſurrection againſt Simon Montfort and the Barons, ſhould by Eaſter following paſs into Ireland, there to remain as it were in Baniſhment for Three Years, and not to return without the conſent of the Governours of the Kingdom; but they being forewarn'd, that if they went over, there were deſigns laid againſt their Lives, they thought it better to put it off; and thereupon they took ſhelter in the Lands of the Earl of Glouceſter, who then connived at it, beginning now to incline to the Party of the Lords Marchers. [5] T.W. A.W. Sub A. D. 1264. A great Parliament in which the Lords Marchers are baniſh'd into Ireland.

[1] In this Meeting there was alſo a grievous Accuſation brought in the King's Name againſt Robert de Ferrars, Earl of Derby, (whom [2] Simon Montfort had cauſed to be committed to Priſon in the Tower of London) for divers Miſchiefs, and burnings of Towns, which this Earl had committed both before and after the Battel of Lewes; but the truth of it was, that this Earl was looked upon as too powerful, by reaſon of his great Eſtate; and having ſtood in a manner Neuter during the late War, it was thought convenient by the Earl, that he ſhould be hinder'd from joining with the Earl of Glouceſter's Party, whom [3] Simon Montfort intended likewiſe to have ſurprized and [1] Id. ib. The Earl of Derby is accuſed of great Miſdemeanors. [2] A. W. [3] T. W.

clapp'd up in Priſon, laying to his Charge the late harbouring of the Lords Marchers in his Territories, being the declar'd Enemies of the ſaid Earl and his Faction; but the Earl of Glouceſter not being willing to truſt himſelf in his hands, thought it his ſafeſt Courſe to withdraw from this Aſſembly; and therefore taking with him a ſmall Guard of Men, he retir'd to his ſtrong Holds in the Borders of Wales.

The Earl of Glouceſter, fearing to be clapp'd in Priſon, withdraws from the Parliament.

[4] Then likewiſe John Gifford, a Baron of great Courage and Reputation, being impeach'd by the Earl of Leiceſter, that contrary to the late Miſe or Agreement at Lewes, he had enter'd upon divers Lands, which belong'd to other Lords in right of their Priſoners; wherefore he fearing the Earl's great Power, tho' he gave Security to appear and Anſwer his Accuſations, yet at laſt not being willing to truſt him, he follow'd his Patron the Earl of Glouceſter, and retir'd to him into the ſaid Marches, where we ſhall leave them for a time.

[4] A. W. John Gifford being likewiſe impeach'd, fearing Simon Montfort's Power withdraws into the Marches of Wales.

But notwithſtanding this great Council of the Nobility that had now met at London, Simon Montfort and his Faction did not think it ſafe to rely upon their Authority; and therefore he had alſo iſſued out the King's Writs for a Parliament to meet at Weſtminſter, on the Octaves of St. Hilary (or 22d of January) next enſuing, to which were ſummon'd not only the Archbiſhops, * Biſhops, Earls and Barons, but alſo all the Abbots and Priors of England; and beſides theſe, Writs of Summons were alſo ſent to the Sheriffs of the Counties to elect and return Two Knights for each Shire, and Two Citizens, and as many Burgeſſes for each City and Borough of England, and for each of the Cinque-Ports as many Barons, as appears ſtill upon * Record in the Tower, which is alſo taken notice of by the Writer of the City-Annals, only he miſtakes in the number of the Knights of Shires, making them to have been Four inſtead of Two, and the like he does in the number of the Citizens, Burgeſſes, and Barons of the Cinque-Ports that were ſummon'd to this Parliament. But this Author is the only one that (as I can find) makes any mention of their appearing at this Parliament, tho' without any Remark of its being a new Inſtitution; which I obſerve, becauſe theſe being the firſt Writs of Summons to the Commons that are now extant on the Rolls, [5], therefore Dr. Brady will needs infer from hence (tho' without any juſt grounds) that theſe were the firſt Writs of this kind that were ever iſſued, and that neither Knights of Shires, nor Citizens, nor Burgeſſes, &c. were ever ſummon'd to Parliament before this Critical and Rebellious Year; but of this I ſhall ſay more in another place, therefore ſhall here only inquire into the Cauſe of this great and ſo general Aſſembly, which was on Two Accounts; the One to ſet the Prince at liberty, with the ſafety of Simon Montfort, and thoſe of his Party; the Other to obtain the King's Charter of Pardon and Indemnity for all that had been paſt.

But the great end of ſummoning this Parliament was the delivery of the Prince out of Priſon, where he had now continued above halfa Year, which was not well reſented, even by ſome of the Barons themſelves; who, tho' they were of the oppoſite Faction, yet thought it reaſonable that he ſhould be ſet free, ſince he had only deliver'd himſelf up at the Battel of Lewes, as a Hoſtage for the performace of the Articles then agreed to by the King his Father; wherefore, in order to this, the Earl of Leiceſter, and the Lords Hugh d' Eſpenſer, and John

Fitz-

Fitz-John, with the Biſhops of London, Worceſter, and Chicheſter, and others their Adherents (who manag'd all things in this Parliament at their pleaſure) thought fit to contrive a certain Form of Articles or Conditions for delivering the Prince out of Priſon, which, tho' not agreeable either to Law or Juſtice, yet being reduc'd into Writing, and by him agreed to, as alſo by the King his Father, the Earls, and all the other Great Men of his Party corroborated with their Seals; which Agreement, tho' ſeemingly made with his own conſent, rendred his Condition almoſt as bad when he was ſet free, as whilſt he continued a Priſoner. Anno Dom. MCCLXV. The Prince is reſtor'd to a ſeeming Liberty, but upon very hard Terms.

But tho' Dr. Brady has not thought fit here to give us the Articles or Conditions upon which the Prince was then deliver'd (or rather from a cloſe Priſoner to be kept in a more free Cuſtody) I ſhall here recite the Subſtance of them from the Original * Record in the Tower, which I find alſo enter'd in an antient Manuſcript Book of the Laws and Statutes of England, in Bennet-College Library; and is likewiſe printed in the Annals of Waverly, to which I refer the Reader; as alſo to the * Appendix to this Volume, where you will find it at large. * *Rot. This Agreement is by way of Charter or Conceſſion from the King himſelf, beginning thus.

'I Henry, King of England, Lord of Ireland, Duke of Acquitain, 'to the Community of England, Greeting, &c. The Form and Subſtance of the Agreement, or Conditions for the Prince's Liberty.

Then in the Preface he recites the Agreement that had been made after the late hoſtile Diſturbance in the Kingdom, by his own aſſent, 'and by the free Will of Edward his eldeſt Son, as alſo of the Pre'lates, Earls, Barons, and Commonalty of the Kingdom; and that 'then for the Peace and Security thereof, the ſaid Lord Edward, and 'Henry his Nephew, Son to the King of the Romans, had been gi'ven as Pledges; and farther, that an Ordinance lately made by the 'King's own aſſent, and the free Will of his ſaid Son Edward, as alſo 'of the ſaid Prelates, Earls, &c. in the Month of June laſt paſt, be'ing the 48th Year of his Reign, ſhould be for ever inviolably ob'ſerved; wherefore he now lets the whole * Body of the Kingdom 'underſtand, that he had ſworn upon the Holy Evangeliſts, that he 'would faithfully obſerve the ſaid Ordinance, and not in any thing 'contradict it; and there was to that end expreſly added in the 'ſame Oath, that he would not, by reaſon of what had been done 'during the time of the late War and Diſturbance, accuſe or puniſh 'any of thoſe who had fought againſt him, or whom he had defied 'as Enemies, to wit, the Earls of Leiceſter and Glouceſter, and their 'Adherents, as alſo the Barons and Citizens of London, and thoſe of 'the Cinque-Ports; neither would he do them any damage, or per'mit it to be done by his Officers: and that he had further ſwore to 'obſerve all thoſe things which had been agreed upon or provided 'for the delivery of his ſaid Son and Nephew; expreſly willing and 'conſenting, that if He himſelf, or his Son Edward ſhould do any 'thing againſt the ſaid Ordinance, Promiſe, or Oath, or diſturb the 'Peace and Tranquility of the Kingdom, or by reaſon of former 'Actions done in the time of the War, ſhould do, or cauſe to be done, 'any damage to any of thoſe Perſons above-mentioned, whom he 'had formerly defied, it ſhould then be lawful for all thoſe of his Communitatis. * Univerſitatem Veſtram.

'King-

Anno Dom. MCCLXV.

'Kingdom to riſe up againſt him, and do their utmoſt endeavour to '* diſtreſs him, ſo that he would have all and ſingular Perſons obliged
* Ad Gravamen. 'to do it by this preſent Precept or Command, notwithſtanding any
'Fealty or Homage formerly done to him, to pay him their Obedi-
'ence; but ſhould do all things to diſtreſs him, as if they were no
'ways obliged to him; until ſuch time, as what had been done a-
'miſs ſhould be reform'd and reſtor'd with due ſatisfaction, accor'ding to his ſaid Ordinance and Promiſe; and this being perform'd,
'they were then to obey him, as they had done before: but if any
'Perſon of the Kingdom ſhould preſume to act againſt the Premiſes,
'or ſhould diſturb the Peace and Tranquility thereof, or aſſiſt either
'him, his Son Edward, or any other, by Aid, Advice, or Counſel, to 'act againſt any of the Premiſes, and that he be thereof Convicted
* Conſideratione. 'by the * Judgment of this Counſel, and of the Great Men of the 'Kingdom; it was thereupon agreed, by the unanimous conſent of 'himſelf and his Son Edward, with the Earls, Barons, and Commonalty
'of the Kingdom, that the Body of ſuch Perſon might be taken, if it 'could be found, and if it could not be found, that then he ſhou'd be 'Outlawed, but whither he were found or not, he and his Heirs ſhould
'be for ever diſinherited, as if they had committed Felony or Treaſon:
'and it was further agreed, by the unanimous Will and Conſent of 'Himſelf and his Son, and all the reſt above-mention'd, that the an-'tient Charters of common Liberties and Foreſts, which had been 'formerly granted to the Community of the Kingdom, and againſt the 'Violaters of which, Sentence of Excommunication had been de'nounced by the Pope, at the Requeſt of the King, and the Great 'Men of the Kingdom, lately aſſembled at Worceſter; wherefore the 'King Wills, that the Charters before unanimouſly agreed on ſhould
'be inviolably obſerved for ever; to the obſervance of all which,
'the King here ſolemnly obliged himſelf by Oath upon the Holy E-
'vangeliſts; as alſo commanded all Juſtices, Sheriffs, and Bayliffs of the 'Kingdom, to be bound by the like Oath, ſo that no Man ſhould
'obey any Bayliff until he had taken it; and farther, if any ſhould
'preſume to break the ſaid Charters, or Articles, he or they were to 'be grievouſly puniſhed by the Judgment of his Court, both for his 'Perjury, as alſo for the Sentence of Excommunication by him in'curr'd (all Clerical Privileges being only preſerved as it ought): and 'that all theſe things ſhould be firmly obſerved, he farther enjoins
'the whole Body of the Kingdom, that all and every Perſon of them
'ſhould perform and keep all and ſingular the Premiſes, and alſo 'oblige each other by Oath ſo to do. In witneſs of which he tranſ-
'mits the ſaid Ordinances, together with theſe Letters Patents under 'his Seal, to be kept for their perpetual Memory in each County,
'under the Cuſtody of Faithful Men to be choſen for that purpoſe;
'and that no Man might pretend Ignorance of them for the future,
'they were to be proclaim'd in a full County-Court Twice in the 'Year, once after Eaſter, and again after Michaelmaſs. Alſo that the Premiſes might remain firm and unſhaken, the Biſhops had then thundered out their Sentence of Excommunication againſt all thoſe who ſhould wittingly endeavour to break them, to whoſe Juriſdiction the King alſo here willingly ſubmits himſelf as to the Premiſes, renouncing all Privileges and Diſpenſations already obtain'd, or that might be

be obtain'd from the Pope to the contrary: In teſtimony of which he now tranſmits to them the ſaid Letters Patents, dated at London, 14 Martii, in the 49th Year of his Reign, Anno Dom. MCCLXV.

There is alſo in the above-cited Manuſcript Volume of Laws, a like Charter of Prince Edward, to the ſame effect with this of the Kings, and which being alſo almoſt in the very ſame words, need not to be repeated. I find likewiſe in the ſame Book a Writ that was ſent down into the Counties with Magna Charta, and that of the Foreſts, which were now alſo confirm'd in the ſame manner and Form as they were in the Ninth Year of this King's Reign.

There is alſo a larger Form of this Agreement in the next * Roll, which Dr. Brady hath printed in his † Introduction to his Engliſh Hiſtory, and is in the French of that time; it alſo recites verbatim the Ordinance above mentioned, made the year before for the Government of the Kingdom, and for the better keeping and performance of which, it is alſo recited, that the enſuing Form of Articles for the deliverance of the Prince, was made and provided, which Articles being to the ſame effect as thoſe in the above mentioned Charter, and alſo very long, I ſhall not take further notice of them, but refer the curious Reader to the Copy of it, which is printed in the Appendix at the end of this Volume, and where are divers remarkable Clauſes in it which are not in the Latin Charter; in which I ſuppoſe there was no more inſerted, than what was abſolutely neceſſary for all the Subjects of the Kingdom to take cognizance of at their peril; only I ſhall obſerve, that therein is further contain'd theſe following Articles.

* Rot. Cart. 49. H. 3. M. 5.
† P. 32.
A larger Form of this Agreement for the Prince's delivery.

With the particular Articles therein contain'd.

First Prince Edward was to take care that the Knights or the Military Tenants in the Marches of Wales ſhould perform what they had promiſed; and if they did not, that he would become their Capital Enemy, and compell them to it by force of Arms.

2. He promiſed that for three years next enſuing, he would not leave the Kingdom without the conſent of the King's Council of Barons:

3. That he would neither bring over himſelf, nor procure to be brought over, any Foreigners into England; and that if any came, he, being thereto required by the ſaid Council, would do his utmoſt to ſubdue them.

4. That whereas the King had before the Battel of Lewes openly * defied the Earls of Leiceſter and Glouceſter, with their Adherents, therefore all the Freemen of the Kingdom ſhould renew their Oath of Fealty to the King; ſtill ſaving all the Articles above-mention'd: Beſides which, there were alſo theſe private ones relating more particularly to the Prince; viz. That he ſhould immediately make over to the Earl of Leiceſter the Caſtle and Town of Cheſter, together with the County in Fee, as alſo the Caſtle of Pec and Newcaſtle under Line, together with their Appurtenances, in lieu of other Lands in England, which the ſaid Earl had made over to him in Fee, near the value of the Lands he had parted with; alſo the Caſtle of Briſtol, with the Town and its Appurtenances, were to remain in the Hands of the Earl, until all theſe Things were perform'd, who was yet to be anſwerable to the Prince for the Iſſues and Profits thereof, (the Charges in keeping the ſaid Caſtle being deducted;) and this was to be

* Deſiderunt, i. e. given up their Fealties.

Anno Dom. MCCLXV. be done within Two Years enſuing, after which the ſaid Caſtle and Town, &c. were to be delivered as a Pledge, by the Appointment of the King's Council and of the Good Men of the Kingdom, in the ſame manner as Five other Caſtles of the King's were alſo to be held by thoſe appointed by the * Diſcreet or Wiſe Men of the Kingdom: To this Agreement the King and Prince Edward his Son, with the Lord Henry Son to the King of Almaine, the Biſhops of London, Worceſter, and Wincheſter, and divers other Biſhops, together with the Priors of the Orders of the Knights-Templars and Hoſpitallers, as likewiſe the Mayor of London, did put their Seals; This bears date at Weſtminſter, in the Parliament at London, on the Eighth of March, 1264.

* Prodes homes.

Notwithſtanding which Agreement, thus made and perfected, Prince Edward could not be immediately releaſed; for it ſeems there was another Treaty about it with the Great Men of that Party, upon Thurſday (being the Morrow after Aſhwedneſday) when the Diſcharge from the King to Henry de Montfort, the Prince his Keeper for the Receipt of his Body, bears date the Tenth of March, as appears by Two ſeveral * Records, the former unprinted, but the latter Dr. Brady has given us in his † Appendix.

Notwithſtanding the Agreement the Prince is not releaſed till Two Days after its Date.

* Rot. Pat. 49. H. 3. n. 100.
† Rot. Pat. 49. H. 3. M. 19. N. 219.

Yet that the Prince was releaſed during this very Parliament (notwithſtanding [1] Dr. Brady's aſſerting the contrary) appears from the Date of this very Writ for his Diſcharge, which is but Two Days after the Charter laſt mention'd, and was certainly ſeal'd during the Seſſion of this Parliament, which ſtill continued.

[1] Comp. Hiſt. p. 649.

But to put this out of all doubt, the London Annals give us a more particular Account of the manner of the Prince's Deliverance out of Priſon, relating it to be now done in the great Hall at Weſtminſter, where the Prince was deliver'd to the King in the Preſence of a great Aſſembly; after he had ſeal'd the above-mention'd Agreement, and which being then publickly read, the Biſhops, in their Pontificalibus, ſolemnly Excommunicated all thoſe that ſhould preſume to Act any thing againſt the Charters of Liberties and Foreſts; and then for the better ſecuring of the ſaid Agreement, the Lord Henry, Son to the King of Almain, did, of his own Accord, proffer himſelf to remain in the Cuſtody of Henry de Montfort, as a Hoſtage, to the Feaſt of St. Peter ad Vincula (being the firſt of Auguſt) till it were ſeen how the Prince would carry himſelf in reſpect of the Foreigners who were ſtill expected to invade the Kingdom.

A more particular Account of Prince Edward's delivery from the London Annals.

[2] Id. ib. [2] But on the 7th of March before this, the Mayor and Aldermen renewed their Oath of Fealty to the King in Perſon; and on the Sunday following, all the Males within the City, of Twelve Years old, took the ſame Oath before the Aldermen of their ſeveral Wards. But to return to our Hiſtory.

Tho' the Prince was now releaſed out of Dover-Caſtle, he was ſtill but a Priſoner at large, under a Guard, and carried about together with his Father whitherſoever the Earl of Leiceſter pleaſed; and farther, the Caſtles of Dover, Scarburgh, Nottingham, and Corfe, were to remain in the hands of the Barons for Five Years, as a Security for themſelves, but, as they pretended, for the publick Peace of the Kingdom, as appears by another unprinted * Record, the Contents of which [3] Dr. Brady hath alſo given us.

* Rot. Pat. 49. H. 3. n. 87.
[3] Id. p. 649.

But

But notwithſtanding, theſe ſolemn Acts of Agreements and Treaties above-mention'd were but of very ſhort continuance, and indeed laſted no longer than till a fit opportunity was offer'd the King and Prince to break them, which they quickly found by this means; the Earl of Leiceſter was ſo puffed up, that he and his Sons carried themſelves very inſolently towards the Earl of Glouceſter, as you have already heard; but tho' there had been divers Diſputes between them, yet they did not break out into any publick Act of Hoſtility, until upon this Occaſion. Anno Dom. MCCLXV.

The Two Eldeſt Sons of Leiceſter had now proclaimed a Tourneament for all the young Nobility of England to meet at Northampton, Fifteen Days after Eaſter, to ſhew their Proweſs; where, tho' moſt of the Noblemen of the Kingdom were alſo to Aſſemble, yet the Earl of Glouceſter (who was invited thither) fearing a ſurpriſe from Simon Montfort's Wiles, excuſed his non-appearance there, and inſtead of coming up, as was then expected, he fortified his Caſtles, and privately confederated with the Barons of the Marches, who were now got again in Arms; which as ſoon as the Earl of Leiceſter heard, he immediately diſmiſſed the Torneament to make War in earneſt: and therefore preſently raiſing all the Forces he could, and [4] taking the King and the Prince along with him, about the end of April he marched towards the Borders of Wales, againſt the Earl of Glouceſter and Lords Marchers, whom he then declared publick Enemies to the Kingdom.

[4] A. Wig. 218.

[5] So ſoon as he came to Glouceſter, (with the King and Prince in his Company) he ſtrongly fortified the City and Caſtle, becauſe he heard that the Earl thereof, with the Lord John Giſford, was then in the Foreſt of Dean, being reſolv'd to defend themſelves againſt him and his Accomplices. But whilſt the King and Leiceſter continued there, which was Fifteen Days, divers Meſſengers of Peace paſs'd between the Earl of Glouceſter and Simon Montfort; ſo that at laſt they agreed to refer their Differences to Four Arbitrators, to wit, Walter de Cantelupe, Biſhop of Worceſter; the Lord Hugh d' Eſpenſer; John Fitz-John; and William de Munchanſie, by whoſe Mediation there was an Agreement patched up for the preſent between them; and I could wiſh our Author had told us upon what Conditions; but it ſeems it was not ſo fixed, that the Earl of Glouceſter would thereupon truſt himſelf in the other's Power; for all we can find is, that notwithſtanding this ſeeming Reconciliation, the ſaid Earl deſign'd to have ſurpriz'd the Earl of Leiceſter by an Ambuſh (together with the King and Prince) in their March between Glouceſter and Hereford, But the Earl being warned by his Spies of this Stratagem, he eaſily avoided it, and ſo they arriv'd ſafe at Hereford; but not long after their coming thither, the Earl of Glouceſter having now again declar'd himſelf an open Enemy, and rais'd conſiderable Forces, poſſeſs'd himſelf of the adjacent Countrey, ſo that Simon Montfort could not depart from Hereford with any ſafety, becauſe the Army he had there with him, was not ſtrong enough to encounter that of his Adverſaries in the Field; in this condition things continued till Prince Edward's eſcape from thence, and his joining himſelf with the Earl of Glouceſter and the Barons of his Party.

The Prince eſcapes and joins the E. of Glouceſter.

Of the manner of which, as alſo of the Earl of Glouceſter's joining with him, I ſhall give you this ſhort Account from [1] Walter Hemingford's Chronicle, which relates, that the Earl of Glouceſter being much diſpleaſed at the inſolent and arbitrary Carriage of the Earl of Leiceſter and his Sons, and having refuſed to come to the Torneament at Northampton, (as you have already heard) preſently retired to his Caſtles in Wales; and reſolving abſolutely to break with him, he ſent again to demand thoſe Priſoners of Quality who had fallen to his ſhare at the Battel of Lewes, (of whom the King of the Romans was the chief;) but the Earl utterly refuſed to ſend them, anſwering haughtily, That it was ſufficient that he had ſaved his Life and Eſtate for him in that Battel: which rude Return ſo highly incenſed the Earl of Glouceſter, that he was reſolved to be revenged of him; wherefore ſending forthwith to the Lord Roger Mortimer (who had been always on the King's ſide) he deſired a Conference with him for the benefit of the King and Kingdom; but he doubting ſome Treachery from him, deſired a Hoſtage, which was preſently granted; thereupon meeting together, the Earl made great Complaints againſt Simon Montfort, proteſting, That he repented he ever had offended the King, and was now reſolved to wipe off that Reproach: Wherefore they ſent privately to Robert de Clare, Glouceſter's Brother, (who was then ſeemingly of the Earl of Leiceſter's Party.) to let him know that they Two were now agreed, and reſolved to ſet the Prince free as ſoon as ever they were able to effect it; alſo the Lord Mortimer ſent privately to Prince Edward a very ſwift Horſe, the better to facilitate his eſcape.

[1] Script. Ang. Vol. II. Oxon. p. 585.

A further account of the manner of it.

The Earl of Glouceſter is reconciled to the Lord Mortimer, and the manner how it was brought about.

They reſolve to ſet the Prince at liberty.

All things being thus laid, [2] the Prince deſired leave from the Earl of Leiceſter to ride abroad and Air himſelf, which being granted, and that he had pretty well breathed Two or Three Horſes, he mounted that which had been lately ſent him by the Lotd Mortimer, and when he had got a pretty way from thoſe that were appointed to guard him, he turn'd about to Robert de Roſs, and thoſe that accompanied him, and plainly told them, that he had been long enough in their Cuſtody, and therefore now took his leave of them; ſo laying the Reins on his Horſe's Neck, he galloped away from them as hard as he could drive; they followed him with all the ſpeed they could, but without overtaking him; at laſt ſeeing ſome Men that were ſent by the Lord Mortimer meet him, to conduct him to the Caſtle of Wigmore, his Perſuers were forced to deſiſt, and return to Hereford, where the Earl of Leiceſter being highly concerned at his eſcape, gave them a very bad Reception.

[2] Id. ib. Who not long after makes his eſcape from Hereford.

To prevent the ill Conſequences of which Accident, on the 30th of May he made the King write [3] Letters to all his Tenants in Capite, as well Archbiſhops, Biſhops, Abbots, Priors, as Earls, Barons, Barons, Knights, and all others (except thoſe that were of the Party of the Earl of Glouceſter) letting them know, that whereas he and certain of his Great Men and Feudataries, ſometime ſince came to Hereford to take care of the Peace of thoſe Parts, hoping to have found his Son Edward a great and chearful aſſiſtant in that buſineſs; he, to the contrary, on the Thurſday in Whitſon-Week, about the Evening, had made his eſcape from the Perſons that accompanied him, and were his Guard; and this by the contrivance of certain Knights and Eſquires that were privy to the Deſign, and that he went off, (as he certainly believed) to John de Warren, and William de Valence, and the Barons Marchers, his Rebels and Diſturbers of his Peace; he therefore commanded them, by the faithful Homage and Love in which they were bound to him, to come with what haſt they could with Horſe and Arms, and all their force to Worceſter, in order to go with him againſt his Enemies and Rebels. Dated at Hereford the 30th of May.

Anno Dom. MCCLXIV.

The K. makes the King give notice of it to the Biſhops and Nobility, commanding their ſpeedy attendance.

[4] But not thinking this ſufficient, on the Seventh of June following, the King alſo wrote to the Guardians of the Peace, and Sheriffs of every County, to prohibit, by Proclamation, all People of their reſpective Counties from giving any Aid or Aſſiſtance to his Son Edward, the Earl of Glouceſter, or any Rebels of their Confederacy; and that ſince he had commanded, that all Men ſhould take an Oath to preſerve the late Ordinances made at London, therefore they ſhould all riſe againſt the ſaid Rebels, as diſturbers of the Peace, and tranſgreſſors of that Ordinance, and arreſt their Bodies, and keep them in ſafe Cuſtody: theſe Letters or Writs were directed into the ſeveral Counties, by the King, the Earl of Leiceſter, the then Juſtitiary, and others.

[5] Then the Earl of Leiceſter, to engage the Clergy as much as he could in this Quarrel, cauſed * another Letter to be written in the King's Name to the Biſhop of London, and the other Biſhops of the Province of Canterbury, in which they were required to Excommunicate by Name in their ſeveral Dioceſſes, his Contumatious and Rebellious Son, and the other Rebels, as they were then termed, who aſſiſted the Prince. But I do not find that the Biſhops obey'd this Command.

And then to ſecure the City of London to the Barons Intereſt, another Letter was written in the King's Name, directed to the Mayor, Aldermen, Sheriffs, and the whole * Community of London, wherein he thanks them for their Fidelity and Conſtancy to him and his Friends, and deſires them to continue therein, and to contribute their utmoſt aſſiſtance to ſuppreſs and deſtroy his Rebels, where-ever, or of what Quality ſoever they were, and their Adherents, by all ways and means they ſhould think expedient. This was Sign'd by the King, the Earl of Leiceſter, &c. and Dated at Monmouth, as were alſo the former.

Theſe Letters are not to be found in our printed Hiſtorians, but being upon Record, we muſt own our ſelves obliged to Dr. Brady's Induſtry in finding out and collecting them, as alſo in noting the Rolls where they are to be found: and tho' ſome of them are of no great conſequence, as to the main of the Hiſtory, yet ſince they ſhew us how much the King was then over-aw'd by Simon Montfort, and thoſe of his Party, and the great concern they were in for Prince Edward's eſcape, and joining with their Enemies, I have thought fit likewiſe to take notice of them. But now to return to our Hiſtory.

[1] W. H. The Prince is joyfully received by the Lord Mortimer at Wigmore; and thence goes to Ludlow.

[1] So ſoon as Prince Edward had thus given Simon Montfort the ſlip, and was got to the Caſtle of Wigmore, he was there joyfully received by the Lord Roger Mortimer, its Owner; and the Day following the Prince went to Ludlow, where he met the Earls of Glouceſter and Surrey, and being fully reconciled to them, [2] he ſolemnly promiſed and ſwore, that when by their Aſſiſtance he ſhould obtain the Victory over his Enemies, he would cauſe the antient and approved Laws of the Kingdom to be obſerved, and would abrogate all the evil Cuſtoms which had prevail'd in the Kingdom; and that he would perſwade the King his Father to baniſh all Foreigners from his Councils, and not ſuffer them to have the Cuſtody of his Caſtles, nor any ſhare in the Government; whereupon the Earl of Glouceſter ſupplied the Prince (being now wholly deſtitute) with all things neceſſary for his high Quality, as well as for their preſent undertaking.

[3] Id. ib. A great number of Warriours flock into the prince, who is alſo join'd by William de Valence and Hugh Bigot.

[3] Then there flocked in to Prince Edward not only the Lords Marchers, but alſo a great multitude of Warriours from all Parts of the Kingdom; and William de Valence and Hugh Bigot, who a little before had Landed in Pembroke-ſhire with a ſtong Party, now came in to him, whereby his Army was very much augmented: Alſo John Gifford, the Second Man to the Earl of Glouceſter in Military Affairs, brought in ſo great a Force both of Horſe and Foot, as ſtruck Wonder in their Friends, and a Terror in their Enemies; with which powerful Aſſiſtance the Prince and the Barons of his Party preſently march'd to Worceſter, which the Citizens, upon his Arrival, as preſently ſurrender'd to him, without making any Oppoſition.

The Prince having got Worceſter hinders the E. of Leiceſter from paſſing the Severne.

They being thus poſſeſſed of this Important Place, that ſo they might hinder the Paſſage of the Earl of Leiceſter, and his Army, over the River Severne, they not only took away all the Ferry-Boats, but alſo dug deep Holes in the Fords.

[4] Id. p. 68.

The Prince takes Glouceſter.

[4] In the mean time, the Lords Robert de Roſs, and William de Veſcy, had put themſelves with ſome Forces into Glouceſter, hoping thereby to hold it out againſt the Prince's Army, but they found themſelves miſerably miſtaken, for the Prince marching thither with all ſpeed, took the Town in Two Days time; the Lords above-mention'd, with all the Gariſon, betaking themſelves to the Caſtle; which, after Three Weeks Siege, was likewiſe, for want want of Proviſion ſurrend'red, on the 30*th* of June, upon theſe honourable Articles, viz. That the Beſieged might march out with their Horſes and Arms, engaging by Oath, not to take up Arms againſt the Prince for Forty Days. Anno Dom. MCCLXV.

He having thus made himſelf Maſter of the Town and Caſtle, [5] put a ſtrong Gariſon into both; and then he, together with the Earl of Glouceſter, led their Army toward Hereford, with hopes to ſurprize there the Earl of Leiceſter, and ſo to reſcue the King out of his Power; but [1] the Earl having had Intelligence of it, would not venture to ſtay there any longer, but taking the King along with him, retreated to Monmouth, where ſoon after John Gifford with part of the Army coming before the Town, offered him Battel, but he finding the Place ſcarce tenable durſt not engage him, and ſo was forc'd to quit that alſo: Therefore marching from thence he took the Caſtle of Hulks, belonging to the Earl of Glouceſter, but he being very quickly at the Heels of him, retook it within Three Days after. In the mean time the Earl of Leiceſter marching farther into South-Wales, took the Town of Newport, lying near the Sea, and thence ſending away to Briſtol, order'd all the Ships of Burthen that lay there to be brought to Newport, to carry the King and himſelf, with all the Army to Briſtol; but the Earl of Glouceſter having notice of it, ſent ſome light Galleys, very well mann'd to lie at the Mouth of that River; and they meeting with thoſe Veſſels that were coming down from Briſtol to tranſport them, took and ſunk eleven of them, which utterly broke the Earl of Leiceſter's Deſigns, tho' well enough laid; but the reſt of the Ships got ſafe back to Briſtol.

[5] A. W. p. 219.

[1] T. W. p. 68. Montfort receiving Intelligence of Glouceſter's approach quits Hereford, together with the King, and goes to Monmouth, which he is alſo forc'd to quit.

Leiceſter takes Newport, and ſends to Briſtol for Ships to tranſport himſelf and his Army, but the Ships are either taken or ſunk.

[2] Upon this Succeſs Prince Edward, and the Earl of Glouceſter, marched againſt the Town of Newport, and engaging with Simon Montfort's Forces upon the Bridge leading to the Town, they drove them back into it, and had certainly taken it, had not the Enemies ſet fire on that end of the Bridge which was in their Power, and thereby prevented it; whereupon the Prince's Men returning to their Camp, and the Earl of Leiceſter not daring to ſtay there any longer, [3] he ſtole away by Night, into the Territories of Llewellyn, Prince of Wales, deſiring his Aſſiſtance, which he promiſed him, upon condition that the King would reſtore him the Inheritance of his Anceſtors, which the Earl of Leiceſter was forced to grant in the King's Name, and ſent him a Charter for it under the Great Seal, the Cuſtody whereof was then committed to Peter de Montfort, and R. de Sandwich, Knights, which (ſays my Author) had been unknown for a long time before; but whither he makes the ſtrangeneſs of it to lie in its being committed to Lay-men, or elſe to Commiſſioners, I will not take upon me to determine: but under pretence of thus reſtoring Prince Llewellyn's Rights, there were Five ſtrong Caſtles belonging to the King preſently given up, which that Prince cauſed to be levell'd to the Ground; but the Engliſh not being uſed to the Welſh way of living only upon Fleſh and Milk, without any any Bread, were ſoon forc'd to quit the Countrey, and retreat to Hereford, which being not as yet taken was the King's Head Quarters: But to look a little back. Not long before this, about the end of June, it appears on * Record, that whilſt the King, and the Earl of Leiceſter were at Monmouth, he caus'd Letters to be written to Simon, his Second Son, then Guardian of the Peace in Surrey and Suſſex, in the King's Name, declaring, that whereas his Son Edward, and Gilbert de Clare, Earl of Glouceſter, together with John de Warren, William de Valence, Roger Mortimer, James Audley, and other Rebels adhering to them, had ſeized ſeveral Towns and Caſtles, and raiſed new War in the Kingdom; he therefore comanded and enjoined him to give him his utmoſt Aſſiſtance, to deſtroy and ſuppreſs thoſe Rebels, and all others their Abettors and Favourers; Dated June 28*th* at Monmouth. The ſame Letters were directed to Brian Goniz, Guardian of the Peace for Somerſet and Dorſet-ſhires; to Hugh Peveril, Guardian of the Peace for Devon-ſhire; to Ralph Arundel, and Adam de Gurdun, by the King, the Earl of Leiceſter, and the others, as before.

Whilſt the K. was at Monmouth he writ Letters to S. Montfort the Younger, and other Guardians of the Peace, commanding them to deſtroy all the Adherents of Prince Edw.

[4] Whilſt the King continued in Wales, Simon Montfort the Son, in obedience to the King's (or rather to his Father's) Commands, left the Siege of Pevenſie (in which he had no Succeſs) and return'd to London, and there having muſter'd up what Forces he could, he came on the 12*th* of July to Wincheſter; But the Citizens denying him entrance he took it by Storm, and then plundering the Town, and killing many of the Jews he found therein, went from thence to Oxford, but the Towns-men there being more wary, received him peaceably: And from thence marched triumphantly to Northampton, where, being very confident of his own Strength, he reſolved to go on towards Hereford to relieve his Father; or elſe if he could meet the Prince by the way, to give him Battel; in order to which, on the laſt Day of July, Simon Montfort arrived at the Town of Kennelworth, where he and his Army quarter'd that Night; but Prince Edward, who had now paſs'd through Worceſter-ſhire with his Forces, having Intelligence of it, was reſolv'd to try if he could ſurprize them, before they could have any notice of his coming: wherefore making a ſpeedy March all Night, he came by break of Day to Kennelworth, and ſetting upon Simon and his Men (who were then in their Beds, and, as it ſeems, had no Scouts abroad) he either kill'd or took Priſoners the greateſt part of them, the chiefeſt of whom were the Lord Robert de Ver, William, Lord Munchanſey, and Adam of Newmarket, with many others; but Simon Montfort eſcap'd into the Caſtle and there ſtaid. This great Defeat happen'd the Firſt of Auguſt, and prov'd the Ruine of the Earl of Leiceſter and his Party: For,

[4] T. W. A. W. p. 619. Simon Montfort the younger quits the Siege of Pevenſie, and then takes and Plunders Wincheſter.

And thence coming to Northampton, is reſolved to march towards Hereford to relieve his Father.

But being ſurprized and routed by Prince Edw. is forc'd to take refuge in the Caſtle of Kennelworth.

[5] His Army not being able to ſtay any longer in Hereford-ſhire, for want of Forage and Proviſions, the Earl reſolved to lay hold on this opportunity of the Prince's Abſence to paſs the Severne, which he did, and ſo march'd towards Warwick-ſhire, to meet and join his Forces to thoſe of his Son Simon's, who (as he heard) was then marching that way towards him, hoping by that means ſo to ſhut up the Prince and his Men between his own and his Son's Army, that they ſhould certainly fall into his hands: but that Miſchief which he deſign'd to others fell upon himſelf; for having no Intelligence of his Son's Misfortune, he [1] came to Kemſey, a Mannor of the Biſhop of Worceſter's, and there lay all Night, and the next Morning marched by break of Day to Eveſham, where, when they came, the King (who was now with him, and whoſe Name and Authority he made uſe of) would needs ſtop there and breakfaſt, and ſo make a ſmall halt. Anno Dom. MCCLXV.

[1] A. W. The Earl with the K. comes to Eveſham, and there make a halt.

In the mean while Prince Edward, who was marched back with his Army from Kennelworth to Worceſter where (having left his Priſoners in ſafe Cuſtody) he advanced forwards towards Eveſham, intending (if he could) to meet with and ſurprize the Earl of Leiceſter, for he heard he was not then far from that place: wherefore to hinder all Intelligence by the Earl's Spies, he at firſt made as if he would go towards Shrewsbury or Stafford, but went not above two or three Miles that way before he changed his courſe, and ſo marching all Night, arrived next Morning not far from Eveſham: [2] And the Earl of Leiceſter's Barber happening to go up into the Tower of the Abbey (where the King and his Lord then were) from thence diſcover'd the Prince's Army marching in Three Bodies, the Firſt led by himſelf, the Second by the Earl of Glouceſter, and the Third by the Lord Roger Mortimer; this being told the Earl, he was in hopes at firſt, that it might be his Son coming to his Aſſiſtance; but not long after being aſſured by their Enſigns that they were the Enemy, the Earl then began to deſpair, and ſaid, Lord have Mercy upon our Souls, for our Bodies are theirs; and ſince it was now too late to Retreat, he was reſolved to fight it out, and either Conquer or Die. Then (as [3] the ſame Author relates) his eldeſt Son Henry deſired him not to deſpair, ſeeing that the chance of War was doubtful; he anſwered, Son, I do not deſpair, but I fear your own and your Brother's Pride and Preſumption have ruined us. Nevertheleſs, I hope I ſhall die for the cauſe of God and Juſtice. Upon this all of them arming themſelves as faſt as they could, marched out of the Town to give them Battel, the King being likewiſe (tho' unwillingly) made to put on his Armour, and march out againſt his own Son, at the Head of thoſe that were his Enemies: but when they came out into the open Field, above the Town, the Two Armies met and joined Battel, when at the very firſt Onſet, the Welſh-men that were with the Earl of Leiceſter ran all away, many of whom were drown'd in the River Avon; nevertheleſs the Battel was very fierce, and laſted a long time, from about One of the Clock till Night; wherein the Earl (his Forces being overcome) was there Slain, together with many Lords and Noblemen, (to wit) Henry Montfort, his Son; Hugh d' Eſpenſer, the Juſtitiary; Peter de Montfort; William de Mandeville, Ralph Baſſet, Roger de St. John, and many other Knights and Eſquires of Note: there

[4] This Battel was fought near the Town of Eveſham, on the 4*th* Day of Auguſt: And [5] Walter Hemingford relates, that King Henry being there Wounded in the Shoulder, was like to have been kill'd, had he not cried out, I am Henry of Wincheſter, your King, kill me not; at which Adam de Montalt runing in, ſaved him; and the Prince his Son, not being far off, ran to him, and having only begged his Bleſſing, as being then in great haſte, left him to be guarded by ſeveral of his Knights, till the Fight was over and the Victory compleated.

[1] After which the King and the Prince his Son marching back into the Town, left the Bodies of Simon Montfort and Henry his Son, with Hugh le Deſpenſer, to be buried by the Monks of Eveſham, before the High Altar of that Church; but the Earl's Body was firſt diſmembred, the Head, Arms, Legs, and Privy Parts being cut off: [2] But his Head was ſent to the Wife of Roger Mortimer, as a Token of the Victory, at which the Monkiſh Writers of that Time make great Exclamations; for ſince he paid ſo great a Deference to the Clergy, no wonder if they looked upon him as a mighty Champion for the Liberties of the Church and Kingdom; and I have ſeen at the end of an antient Manuſcript in the Publick Library at Cambridge, after a great many rhyming Verſes in his Praiſe, certain Prayers directed to him as a Saint, for no leſs did moſt of the Clergy and Common People of that Age eſteem him; inſomuch that ſeveral Miracles being ſaid to be done at his Tomb, the Pope's Legate by his order forbad that Superſtition.

Simon Montfort is counted a Saint by the Monkiſh Writers of that Age.

The Annals of Waverly, as well as other Writers, alſo take notice, that about the time of his Death there was a very great Storm of Thunder and Lightning and Rain, attended with a wonderful Darkneſs, of which there may be made a bad as well as a good Interpretation; but he was certainly a great Pretender to Godlineſs, and outwardly very ſtrict in Religious Duties, never beginning any Battel without Publick Prayers and Confeſſion, which gained him a great Reputation for Sanctity among the Clergy of that Age: yet notwithſtanding all his good Qualities, he was certainly a very ambitious Man, and very ungrateful to his Prince, who had raiſed him ſo high from a French younger Brother of a ſmall Fortune, that he not only permitted him to marry his Siſter, but made him one of the greateſt Men of England; yet nothing leſs would ſatisfie his Ambition, than the Sole Government of the Kingdom. He was alſo perfidious, as appears by his not ſtanding to the Arbitrement of the King of France, which he himſelf had agreed to; but as a juſt Reward of his Demerits, he and all his Family periſhed and came to nought, and that in a few Years. But to return to the Matter from whence we have digreſſed.

[4] When Simon Montfort the Younger heard of the Death of his Father and Brother, and the total Rout of their Army, he was extreamly diſmayed; and tho' he would not then ſurrender the Caſtle of Kenellworth, in which he had remain'd ever ſince his late Defeat, [5] yet did he not think it convenient to detain his Uncle the King of the Romans, and divers other Noblemen, who had been there kept Priſoners, any longer in Cuſtody, but ſet them free without any Conditions; hoping (I ſuppoſe) by their Mediation to gain better Terms from the King, if ever he ſhould be forced to implore his Mercy: Alſo the Wife of Hugh le D'eſpenſer, who then held the Tower of London for her Husband, upon the News of his Death diſcharg'd all the Priſoners whom ſhe had there in her Cuſtody (except the Earl of Ferrars) and ſhe her ſelf retired to her Father the Lord Philip Baſſet, there to bewail her Misfortune. The Wife of Hu. le D'eſpenſer diſcharges the Priſoners in the Tower.

[1] Then the King left Eveſham, and went back to Worceſter, where he ſtaid a few Days; and having now regain'd his Liberty, whileſt he continued there revoked moſt of the Patents he had been obliged to paſs whileſt he was in the Power of Simon Montfort, as being made without his Conſent. Thus (for inſtance) we find among the Rolls in the Tower, that the Earl of Leiceſter having paſs'd a Grant of the Treaſurerſhip of the Church of York upon Almeric de Montfort, a Kinſman of his own, the King having now got his Seal into his own Hands, revoked that Grant, and beſtowed the Place upon Edmund Mortimer, Brother to the Lord Roger Mortimer: This *Patent bears Date the Seventh of Auguſt, at Worceſter; and may ſerve as a Reaſon, why ſo many Writs and Commiſſions were this Year iſſued out in the King's Name againſt his own Son, and all his Adherents, after his Eſcape from Hereford. [1] W. H. The King comes to Worceſter, and there revokes the Grants he had been made to paſs whilſt he was in the Cuſtody of Simon Montfort. * Rot. Pat. 49 Hen. 3. m. 11. intus in ſcdula conſuta.

And it farther appears upon the ſame Roll, that the next Day the King (being willing to ſhew Mercy upon Offenders) by the Mediation of ſome Biſhops and others, offered to receive the Burgeſſes of Hereford into his Protection, provided they would pay a ſufficient Fine for all their Offences againſt him and his Son Edward: Wherefore on the Twenty fourth of the ſame Month (as appears by the * Record) they were fined at Five hundred and ſixty Marks, which was a great Sum in thoſe Days to be paid by ſo ſmall a City. The King receives the Burgeſſes of Hereford into his Protection, upon payment of a Fine. * Rot. Pat. 49 H. 3. m. 38.

Theſe Affairs being thus diſpatch'd, [2] the King left Worceſter, and marched to Wincheſter, and there held a Parliament, to which all the Biſhops and Abbots and Great Men of England were ſummon'd, who had not been engaged in the War againſt him, only Four Biſhops were excepted, (that is) the Biſhops of Lincoln, London, Worceſter, and Litchfield, they having been entirely of the Baron's Faction. [2] A.W. G.R. The K comes to Wincheſter, and there holds a Parliament.

Anno Dom. MCCLXV.

[3] M. W. The King and the Nobility decree, that the City of London ſhould forfeit its Liberties.

[3] In this Parliament the King and the Great Men decreed, that the City of London ſhould for her Rebellion forfeit all her Liberties, and that the Poſts and Chains therein ſhould be taken away, and the Richer ſort of Citizens committed to Priſon, which was ſoon after ſeverely put in execution: But Will. Riſhanger is certainly miſtaken, for he makes theſe Things to have been actually done now, which were not perform'd till the King's coming to Windſor.

* Rot. Pat. 49 H. 3. m. 8. Dorſ.

It alſo appears upon * Record in the Tower, that this Parliament gave the King the preſent Seiſin or Poſſeſſion of all the Rebel's Lands; and he now appointed Two Commiſſioners in each County, who with the Sheriff were to extend them, and return the Extent, with the Names of the Lands, and their late Owners, to himſelf at Weſtminſter, by the Feaſt of St. Edward, (that is, the Thirteenth of October) next enſuing; and they were to appoint Two Collectors in every Hundred, to gather the Michaelmaſs-Rents, and to deliver to the Commiſſioners a Note what they were, as appears by the Commiſſion it ſelf, bearing Date at Wincheſter the Twenty firſt of September; by which William Bagot and Robert du Grendon were appointed for the Counties of Warwick and Leiceſter: and Commiſſioners were ordered after the ſame manner for the reſt of the Counties of England, whoſe Names you may find immediately after the Commiſſion it ſelf, in Dr. Brady's * Appendix, to which I refer the Reader. [4] But the Doctor is certainly under a Miſtake, when he makes theſe Lands to have been then abſolutely beſtowed upon the King in this very Parliament; for this Record now cited does not ſay ſo much, only that they were to be ſeized into the King's Hands; but they were not veſted in him till the next Seſſion of this Parliament at Weſtminſter, as you will ſee anon.

[5] A. W. Prince Llewellyn had newly invaded Cheſhire:

The K. ſends Forces againſt him, but with ill Succeſs.

[5] Yet Matters could not be then throughly ſettled, becauſe Prince Llewellyn had newly invaded Cheſhire with a great Army, and had taken and raſed the Caſtle of Hameclin; wherefore there being a neceſſity to ſend ſome Forces thither, to ſtop his further Progreſs, the Parliament was adjourned to the Feaſt of St. Edward at Weſtminſter: then the King ſent the Lord Maurice Fitz-Gerard, and Hamond L'Eſtrange, againſt Llewellyn, who marching into thoſe Parts, and fighting with him, had but very ill Succeſs, being ſhamefully put to flight, and many of their Knights and Souldiers ſlain.

But to return to the Affairs of England, from which this Account of the Welſh is but a Digreſſion.

[1] Annal. de Civit. Lond. The K. comes to Windſor, and the Citizens of London get ſome Monks to intercede for them, but in vain.

[1] So ſoon as this Seſſion of Parliament was over, about Michaelmaſs, the King removed from Wincheſter, and came to Windſor with a great Force, intending (as the Report went) to have deſtroyed the City of London, for her obſtinate Rebellion againſt him; which when the Mayor and Aldermen heard, they were terribly afraid, tho' many of the mad-headed Commoners were for defending the City againſt the King; yet after ſeveral Conſultations and Debates, it was at laſt agreed by the major Part of the Better Sort of Citizens, Citizens, to get ſome Religious Perſons or Monks (for whom the King had a great Reſpect) to intercede for them: But all their Interceſſions ſignified nothing, ſo much was the King at that time incenſed againſt the City, thro' the inſtigation of ſome of his Chief Counſellors. Anno Dom. MCCLXV.

[2] So that this Courſe not prevailing, they were at laſt adviſed by ſome of their Friends at Court to paſs an Inſtrument under their Common Seal, whereby they ſhould wholly ſubmit themſelves and all they had to the King's Mercy; which being done accordingly, it was forthwith ſent to him by Eight Citizens, who had the beſt Intereſt at Court; but in their Way thither, they were met by Sir Roger Leyburn, who told them, it was the King's Pleaſure they ſhould return home, ſince he was entruſted to deliver them his Majeſtie's Commands; ſo going with them till they came pretty near the City, he then left them, and went the neareſt Way to the Tower, where he took up his Quarters; but at his departure ordered the Mayor, and all the Principal Citizens, to meet him the next Morning at Barking-Church; which Order they punctually obey'd, and then Sir Roger in a long Speech laid before them the Heinouſneſs of their Crime, and the great Interceſſion that had been made for their Pardon; therefore their only Way to obtain it, was, to ſend the King their above-mentioned Submiſſion by him, under their Common Seal, which they preſently delivered up to him. [2] Id. ib. The City is forced to ſeal a Charter to the King under their Seal, whereby they wholly ſubmit themſelves to his Mercy.

[3] Then about Six Days after he returned, and meeting them at the ſame Place, let them know, that the King at the Interceſſion of their Friends had received their Submiſſion, and as a Tryal of their future Obedience, commanded all their Poſts to be pulled up, and the Chains taken away, with which the Ends of their Streets were barricado'd; and that his Majeſty's farther Pleaſure was, that the Mayor, and about Forty of the Principal Citizens, ſhould come the next day to Windſor, and further confirm the ſaid Inſtrument, and that they ſhould have the King's Safe-Conduct for Four Days, both to go and return, which he then alſo delivered them under his Seal; upon Confidence of which, the Mayor and Forty of the Chief Citizens went to Windſor, but finding the King gone abroad for his Recreation, they ſtaid for his Return: When he came home, tho' he ſaw them waiting for him, yet he took no notice at all of them, only they were bid to attend: But tho' the King preſently commanded, that no Man of what Degree ſoever ſhould do them any Injury in Word or Deed, yet he ſent them word, that he would not ſpeak with them that Night; whereupon they were delivered to the Cuſtody of the Conſtable of the Caſtle, who locked them up in a large Tower, where they had hard Fare, and worſe Lodging. [3] Id. ib. The Mayor and Citizens are required to pull up their Poſts and Chains. The Mayor and Forty of the Principal Citizens attend the King at Windſor, and are put in Priſon, notwithſtanding his Safe-Conduct.

[4] Then the next Day they were diſcharged out of the Caſtle, and kept by the Conſtable in ſeveral Lodgings in the Town, as he thought fit, except Thomas Fitz-Thomas (then Mayor,) Michael Thony, Stephen Buckerell, Thomas Pynelſdon, and John de Fleet, whom, as being Principal Ringleaders of their late Rebellion, he had granted to his Son Prince Edward, by whoſe Order they were kept [4] Id. ib. But are all ſet free, yet kept in Cuſtody in the Town, except the Mayor and Four more.

Anno Dom. MCCLXV. kept cloſe Priſoners a long time, (notwithſtanding their Safe-Conduct,) till they had paid him ſufficient Ranſoms for their Lives, Liberties, and Eſtates: But when the reſt of the Citizens heard of this ſevere Uſage, many of the moſt guilty privately conveyed away their Goods and Perſons, and never return'd back any more, which tended much to the City's Impoveriſhment.

And indeed Thomas Wikes here very well obſerves, that tho' theſe Citizens had juſtly deſerved the King's Diſpleaſure, yet that it was mean, and unworthy his Character, thus to break the Safe-Conduct and Protection he had ſo ſolemnly given them, and without which they would never have appear'd before him: Nor can I ſee any Excuſe could be made for theſe Proceedings, unleſs that they were only in perſuance of the late Ordinance of Parliament at Wincheſter, with which the King might ſay, he had no Power to diſpenſe.

The King having ſeized the Liberties of the City, makes ſeveral Noblemen Keepers of it.

And I ſuppoſe it was during this Interval, that the King whileſt he was at Windſor, ſeized all the City-Liberties, and in ſtead of a Mayor, appointed Humphrey de Bohun Earl of Hereford, John de Baliol, Roger de Leyburn, and Roger Walerand, Guardians of the City, by his Writ (ſtill upon * Record) directed to them, farther reciting, That whereas the Mayor, Citizens, and whole Community of the City aforeſaid, had ſubmitted themſelves both as to their Lives and Limbs, as well as their Lands, Tenements, and Eſtates, to the King's Mercy, therefore they were to cauſe Proclamation to be made, that his Peace ſhould be firmly kept in the City and Parts adjoining: Dated at Windſor the Sixth of October.

* Rot. Pat. 49 H. 3. n. 8. id. Append. n. 225. And appoints Phil. de Covel to keep the Sheriff's Court.

The King then iſſued forth another * Writ of the ſame Date, whereby he commands thoſe who were to appear at the County-Court for Middleſex, to appear before and obey Philip de Covel, whom he then appointed Sheriff, and who was to hold the Court that Day in the Record above-mentioned.

[5] When the King had thus humbled the City, he went to his Palace of Weſtminſter, [1] and there celebrated the Feaſt of St. Edward, at which he appearing among his Nobility in Majeſtick State, with his Crown on his Head, ſeemed to have recovered that Royal Splendour which had been ſo long eclipſed: So ſoon as the Feſtival Solemnity was over, the Parliament, which was adjourned hither from Wincheſter, was again aſſembled, and laſted Eight Days, where the King and the Great Men treated of the Affairs of the Kingdom; and one of the Chief Things they then did was, [2] to paſs Sentence of Diſheriſon and Forfeiture of Eſtate upon all the King's Enemies in the late Rebellion; whoſe Lands being now given to Him, he preſently beſtowed them on thoſe who had ſerved him faithfully in this War, tho' this was, not long after, the Cauſe of a new Rebellion, as you will find anon: yet however, ſome of theſe diſinherited Noblemen were now admitted to redeem their Eſtates for Money; among whom was Robert Ferrars Earl of Derby and Leiceſter, who was then reſtored reſtored upon certain Conditions, which he never perform'd; whereof it ſeems this was one, That if ever he again fell off from his Allegiance to the King, he ſhould be depriv'd of his Earldoms; which was afterwards put in Execution againſt him for another Rebellion, as you will ſee hereafter. Anno Dom. MCCLXV.

Theſe Affairs being thus diſpatch'd, the King, by Commiſſion (ſtill upon *Record) committed the Cuſtody of the City, and Tower of London, to Sir Hugh Fitz-Otto during pleaſure, he anſwering the Profits of them to the Exchequer, and Sir Roger Leyburn (one of her former Guardians) was ordered to deliver them to him; and the Citizens and Community of London were commanded to be anſwerable, and ſubmit to this Fitz-Otto, in all things relating to his Office. This new Guardian (according to the City [3] Annals) appointed Two Citizens in whom he could confide to act as Bailiffs under him.

[3] Annal. de London. ib.

[4] After which the King began to act more ſeverely, and beſtowed upon his Favourites the Houſes and Goods of about Sixty principal Citizens, who were fain to compound for them with thoſe to whom they were granted; then the King took pledges of the beſt Men's Sons in the City, for their Father's peaceable behaviour; and theſe being put into the Tower, were there kept at their Parent's Charge; but after great Suit made to the King, he diſcharged all the reſt of the Citizens, who were under the Cuſtody of the Conſtable of Windſor-Caſtle, except Four of the Richeſt and moſt notorious Offenders, who ſtill remain'd in Priſon.

[4] Id. ib. The King beſtows the Eſtates of 60 of the principal Citizens upon his Favourites.

[5] Then after freſh Interceſſions on the City's behalf, to know His Majeſty's pleaſure, what Fine he expected for their Offences; he demanded no leſs than Forty Thouſand Pounds, and then fell to Fifty Thouſand Marks; but upon the Citie's humble Remonſtrance, that it was the poorer ſort of Citizens who had been the chiefeſt Offenders, and had ſpoil'd and plunder'd the richer; and that they had alſo received great Loſſes from the Pyrates of the Cinque-Ports, during theſe Troubles, they obtained his gracious Favour and Pity.

[5] Id. ib. The King demands a Fine of 50000 Marks of the Citizens for their Offences.

[1] But whileſt this Affair was depending, on the 6*th* of December, the King at his going from Weſtminſter to Northampton (upon an occaſion of which you will hear more by and by) committed the Government of the City to Sir John de Linde, Knight, and Maſter John Walden, Clerk, who were to be Guardians or Seneſchals both of the City and Tower; and the Day following the King's Council ſent for Four and Twenty of the moſt notable Men of the City, who when they appear'd before them at Weſtminſter, they were inform'd, that it was the King's Pleaſure, that they, under the ſaid Seneſchals, ſhould ſee Peace and good Order kept in the City; and for this they took an Oath before the Council. But to return to more publick Affairs.

[2] T.W. p. 72. The main Tower of Dover-Caſtle being ſurprized by the Priſoners, P. Edward goes to their Relief, whereupon the Caſtle is ſurrender'd.

[2] Some time after the Parliament broke up, the King had Intelligence that Fourteen Gentlemen, who were Priſoners in the Caſtle of Dover, by the means of Two of their Keepers of Confederacy with them, having ſurpriz'd the main Tower of that Caſtle, reſolutely defended it againſt the Gariſon; whereupon Prince Edward preſently marched down to the Relief of thoſe Gentlemen who adhered to him in the ſaid Caſtle; and then the Beſieged finding themſelves Attack'd by thoſe within, as well as the Prince's Forces without, thought beſt to ſurrender it upon theſe Conditions; That they might march out with Horſe and Arms, their Lives and Liberties being ſaved. In this Caſtle was alſo taken the Counteſs Dowager of Leiceſter, the King's Siſter, and Widow of Simon Montfort, who being extreamly Mortified by the late fatal Loſſes of both her Husband and Son, had leave to paſs over into France, where ſhe ſpent the reſt of her Days in a Monaſtery.

The Counteſs of Leiceſter has leave to go over into France.

[3] Id. ib. The Queen returns into England, and is met by the King at Canterbury.

[3] Not long after this, about All-holland-tide, Queen Eleanor, and her Son Earl Edmund, who had been Two Years beyond Sea, Landed at Dover with Ottobon the Pope's Legate, and were met by the King at Canterbury, the King of the Romans, and many Earls and Barons attending them thither, to Welcome them; and preſently after they all return'd to London, where they paſs'd ſome Weeks with as much Satisfaction as the unquietneſs of the Time would permit: But they were ſoon diſturbed on this occaſion.

[4] Id. ib. A.W. Simon Montfort leaves Kenellworth Caſtle, and retires to the Iſle of Axholme, where many of the Diſinherited Barons reſort to him. Againſt whom the Prince marches with a ſtrong Force, and beſieges them in the Iſle, till they were forced to ſurrender it.

[4] About the end of November, young Simon Montfort, who ſtill kept the Caſtle of Kenellworth, fearing a ſpeedy and hazardous Siege, thought it the ſafeſt courſe to quit that Place; wherefore leaving a ſtrong Gariſon in it, and taking along with him Two Barons, John d' Ayvil, and Baldwin Wake, with a ſtrong Body of Horſe and Foot, he marched from thence (reſolved to make ſome freſh Diſturbance) into the Iſle of Axholme in Lincoln-ſhire, which being almoſt ſurrounded with Water, he eaſily fortify'd all the Avenues to it, and no ſooner was he there, but many of the diſinherited Barons reſorted to him: So ſoon as the King heard of it, he left London, (as you have already heard) and went to Northampton, where he muſter'd up a ſufficient Army, which he preſently ſent into thoſe Parts, under the Command of his Son Prince Edward, who cloſely beſieged his Couſin Simon in that Iſle till after Chriſtmaſs, and then he was forced to ſurrender himſelf, as you will find hereafter.

[5] A. W. The Inhabitants of the Cinque-Ports again renew the War.

[5] I have nothing more to add concerning Civil Matters, but that the Inhabitants of the Cinque-Ports were provoked at the late ill Treatment of the Londoners, as alſo becauſe Prince Edward had taken and hanged ſome of the Townſmen of Winchelſea; whereupon the reſt, together with thoſe of the other Ports, again renew'd the War, and ſetting forth a Fleet, ſail'd to Portſmouth about the end of November, and not only took that Town, but burnt it to the Ground, and beſides this, did a great many other Miſchiefs both by Sea and Land.

Anno Dom. MCCLXV.

[1] As for Eccleſiaſtical Affairs, this Year affords not many; only Ottobon the Pope's Legate, immediately after his Arrival, ſummoned a Synod of all the Clergy at Weſtminſter, where he ſolemnly declared Simon Montfort, late Earl of Leiceſter, and all his Adherents excommunicated, as well thoſe that were alive, as thoſe that were dead: Notwithſtanding which, the Monkiſh Writers of theſe Times look'd upon this Man as a Saint, and ſuppoſe many Miracles to have been wrought at his Tomb: So credulous is Superſtition, join'd with a high Opinion of thoſe whoſe Actions their Party admire and cry up for meritorious.

[1] M. W. The Pope's Legate holds a Synod, where he excommunicates the late Earl of Leiceſter, and all his Adherents.

This Year affords very little of Foreign Matters worth our noting, only that Pope Clement the Fourth finding the Affairs of England in great Confuſion, and that King Henry was never like to aſſiſt him in the Conqueſt of the Kingdom of Naples and Sicily, he iſſued out his Bull, whereby he annull'd the Grant made of that Kingdom by Pope Innocent his Predeceſſor, to Edmund the King's Second Son, (as you have already heard) upon pretence that the Conditions thereof were not duely obſerved on the King's Part: But the true Reaſon was, that the Pope had newly conferr'd this Kingdom upon Charles Duke of Anjou, and Earl of Provence.

* See it at large in D'acherie's Spicilegium, Tom. 9. p. 207.

Anno Dom. MCCLXVI.

The King and Queen continued ſtill at Northampton, where they kept their Chriſtmaſs, together with the King of Almain, the Legate, and a great number of Noblemen; in which Aſſembly it is moſt likely (as being a Great Council of the Barons) [3] was made this temporary * Ordinance, That in every County of England a Captain ſhould be maintained at the King's Charge, who, with the Aſſiſtance of the Sheriff, ſhould command the Forces or Militia of the County, to reſtrain the Violence of Robbers and Thieves, with which the Nation, ever ſince the late Wars, was then very much infeſted.

[2] G. R. A Great Council at Northampton, where is made an Ordinance againſt Thieves.

[3] M. W. * Note, Matt. Weſtm. relates this Law to have been made at that Place; but that could not be, for the Reaſon already given.

[4] But to give the remaining Particulars of the Rebels in the Iſle of Axholme; where as ſoon as Prince Edward arrived, by the means of ſeveral Bridges of Timber laid from the main Land into that Iſle, he ſo ſtraitned Simon Montfort and his Accomplices of Proviſions, that they were at laſt forced Three Days after Chriſtmaſs, to ſurrender the Place, upon theſe Conditions: That he and his Accomplices then in the Iſle of Axholme, [5] ſhould ſubmit themſelves and ſtand to the Judgment of the King of the Romans, and his Nephew Prince Edward, ſo that whatever they Two ſhould determine concerning them, ſhould be inviolably obſerved: (To whom William Riſhanger alſo adds the Pope's Legate, and the Lord Philip Baſſet.) Yet ſtill ſaving to himſelf and his Adherents their Lives and Limbs, and alſo excepting Perpetual Impriſonment. Then Simon Montfort was brought by Prince Edward to Northampton, and there preſented to the King, his Uncle King Richard interceding for him, and telling his Brother, that Anno Dom. [1] But at laſt it was agreed, that Simon ſhould deliver up the Caſtle of Kenellworth to the King, and depart the Kingdom, and receive out of the Exchequer every Year Five hundred Marks, whileſt he remain'd in Baniſhment: but thoſe within the Caſtle not liking theſe Conditions, would neither yield it to the King nor to Simon, but ſaid, they received not the Cuſtody of it from him, but from the Counteſs his Mother, and would ſurrender it to none but her ſelf: And on that Pretence they held that Caſtle near a Year longer, againſt all the Forces the King could bring againſt it. [2] But as for the reſt of the Noblemen and Gentlemen who were in the Iſle of Axholme with Simon Montfort, upon their taking an Oath never more to bear Arms againſt the King, they were ſet at Liberty, tho' many of them did not long obſerve it.

[1] A.W.W.R. He conſents to deliver up the Caſtle of Kenellworth, but it is refuſed by thoſe that kept it.

[2] M.W.

I ſhall now give you an Account of the Concluſion of the King's Diſpleaſure againſt the City of London: [3] Whileſt the King continued at Northampton, not long before Chriſtmaſs, the Citizens, by the Interceſſion of the Queen and the Pope's Legate, compounded with the King, upon their obliging themſelves to pay him the Sum of Twenty thouſand Marks, for a full Remiſſion and Pardon of all their Treaſons and Miſdemeanors; reciting, That whereas they had made a Fine of Twenty thouſand Marks for their ſaid Offences towards him, his Queen, King Richard his Brother, and his Son Edward, therefore the King gave them leave again to receive the Rents of their Lands and Tenements, within the City and without, due from Chriſtmaſs laſt paſt; and alſo granted that they ſhould have the Goods and Chattels of ſuch Malefactors as had been againſt Himſelf, or his Son Edward, in the late War, and had been or were to be indicted; except the Goods and Chattels of thoſe Perſons (already mentioned) whom he had given to his Son Edward, with divers other Exceptions, needleſs here to be repeated: And then He further granted to the Citizens Liberty to Trade by Land or by Sea, as freely as they had done in former Times, diſcharging them from all Cuſtom, Toll, &c. until the State of the City ſhould fully be ſettled by his Council; and farther ordered, that no Citizens who in the late Troubles had notoriouſly appeared to have been Enemies to himſelf or Son, for the future ſhould abide or be converſant in the City. This Pardon is dated at Northampton, the Tenth of January, as remains upon * Record in the Tower, in a Schedule faſtned to the Roll, the Original of which is in the Cuſtody of the City.

Dr. Brady

Dr. Brady hath given us ſomewhat a larger Abſtract of this Pardon and Reſtitution, which the Reader may conſult if he pleaſes; and at the end of it there follows the King's Order to John Walerand and John de la Lind, his Guardians of the City of London, reciting, that whereas he had received into his Peace (or Favour) the Citizens of London, according to a Form granted in his ſaid Letters Patents, that they ſhould therefore releaſe the Pledges or Security of the Citizens whom they had in their Cuſtody, and permit them to go whither they would, except thoſe before excepted. The like Letters were directed to the Conſtable of Rocheſter Caſtle, with the ſame Teſte, viz. the King at Northampton, (dated the 11*th* of January.)

Anno Dom. MCCLXVI.

The Guardians of the City are order'd to releaſe their Pledges.

Theſe Records will ſerve to confute a great Error in Matt. Weſtminſter, who will needs perſuade us that the King kept his Chriſtmaſs this Year at that Place which bore this Author's name; and that there alſo the King held a Parliament, which is likewiſe a miſtake.

[3] The King's Affairs being now pretty well ſettled, he return'd to London a little before Lent, bringing Simon Montfort his Nephew, as a Priſoner at large, along with him, who preſently after, either not liking the Conditions upon which he was to be ſet free (one of which was, that he ſhould take an Oath not to act any thing during his Baniſhment, againſt the King) and fearing leſt he ſhould be perpetually impriſoned, ſtole away with divers of his Party, and going down to Winchelſea, there joined himſelf with a great many Privateers, belonging to the Cinque-Ports, who expected his coming; and then going to Sea with them, he lived there a long time as a Pirate. But when the King heard of Simon's departure, about the end of February, or beginning of March, he ſent down Prince Edward with a ſtrong Party to reduce the Rebels of the Cinque-Ports; who coming to Winchelſea, and aſſaulting the Town, they had a ſharp conflict in the Streets, where ſome were killed, and many more driven into the Sea; and Henry de Peham their Captain being taken, the Prince would have hanged him, had not the E. of Glouceſter diſſuaded him from it; which Clemency met with ſo good Succeſs, that not long after all the Cinque-Ports came in, and made their Peace upon Condition, that they ſhould enjoy all their Liberties and Cuſtoms contained in their Antient Charters, without being diſinherited, or making any reſtitution for the damages they had done: which ſhews what a great Power thoſe Ports had in that Age, in Men and Shipping.

[3] I.W. A.W. The K. returns to London, and brings Simon Montfort with him, who immediately makes his Eſcape.

And joins with the Privateers of the Cinque-Ports.

P. Edward is ſent down to reduce thoſe Rebels.

I find nothing elſe conſiderable done by the King this Year, in favour of the late diſinherited Noblemen and Gentlemen, but that he now iſſued out a ſafe Conduct, whereby all the diſinherited (for by that name all the rebellious Barons, and their Confederates, were known and diſtinguiſhed) had time allowed them to come to the King until Eaſter, to treat with him, and to return without Injury to the Places from whence they came; this is upon * Record, and bears date at Weſtminſter the 11*th* of February: but what Effect it had upon theſe Outlaw'd Gentlemen, I do not find, tho I ſuppoſe they did not approve of the Terms upon which they were to be reſtored, or elſe ſo many of them would not have continued in Arms in divers Parts of England.

Anno Dom. MCCLXVI.

Not long after this the King wrote to the Biſhops, and all other Prelates, a * Letter (found upon Record) directed to all the Abbots, Priors, &c. of England, reciting, that when he was in the Cuſtody of Simon Montfort, they had collected a Tenth of all the Church Revenues in England, for one Year, for the Defence of the Kingdom and Church of England, (as was then pretended) and he now being willing it ſhould be expended for the true Defence and Profit of both, commanded them to pay the ſaid Tenths ſo collected, to the Biſhops of † Bathe and Litchfield appointed Receivers of it by himſelf, and Ottobon the Legate, according to the Form of the Mandate of the ſaid Legate to them directed, dated at Weſtminſter the 15*th* of March.

[4] T.W. G.R. The Rebels in Kenelworth Caſtle ſally out, and plunder the Country, and cut off the Hand of the K's Meſſenger.

[4] In the mean time the Rebels that were in Kenelworth Caſtle, made it their buſineſs to ſally out, and plunder the adjacent Countries, thereby ſtoring it ſo well with all ſorts of Proviſions, that it was thought able to hold out for a long time; and they grew ſo inſolent upon it, that in contempt of the King's Authority, they cut off the Hand of his Herauld or Meſſenger, whom he had ſent into the Caſtle to ſummon them to ſurrender it, and ſo ſent him back in that woful Condition: wherefore the King being highly provoked with this Barbarity, commanded by his Writ (ſtill upon † Record) that all the Sheriffs of England ſhould make Proclamation in their ſeveral Counties, and all Market Towns, that all who owed him Service ſhould perſonally appear with Horſe and Arms; and beſides their ſaid Service, they ſhould meet him at Oxford with all the Force they could raiſe, within three Weeks after Eaſter, to go along with him againſt his Enemies and Rebels in Kenelworth Caſtle; and ordered Watches to be ſet in Towns and Burghs of every Country. The reſt being of no great Moment, I omit. This bears date at Weſtminſter the 15*th* of March.

† Clauſ. 50. H. 3. M. 5. Dorſ. The K. ſummons all that owed him Service, to meet him at Oxford, to march againſt Kenelworth Caſtle.

[5] A. W. The K. comes to Oxford, and marches from thence to beſiege that Caſtle.

[5] About the middle of April, the King came to Oxford with a great Army, and lodged in the Caſtle, and after about a Week's ſtay there, marched (with the Forces that then met him) to Northampton, in order to beſiege Kenelworth Caſtle; [1] yet the King did not go thither preſently, but continuing ſome time at Northampton, ſent his Son Prince Edward to reduce the City of Lincoln, which had been lately ſurprized and plunder'd by ſome of thoſe Rebellious Barons, who had formerly taken the Iſle of Axholme; but ſo ſoon as the Prince approached the City, the Rebels quitted it, and for a time diſperſed themſelves into other Places, tho before the end of Autumn they again rallied, and ſeized the Iſle of Ely, as you will find anon.

[1] Id. ib. W. H. The City of Lincoln is ſurprized, but retaken by P. Edward.

[1] Id. ib. W. H. A freſh Rebellion breaks out, which hinders the K. from beſieging Kenelworth Caſtle.

[5] The E. Ferrars, and ſome other Noblemen begin another Rebellion.

But in the mean time a freſh Rebellion broke out in the [2] North Parts of England, which for a while diverted the King from marching againſt Kenelworth Caſtle. For about the end of April, or beginning of May, Robert Earl of Ferrars, who had been lately ſet at Liberty by the King, and was to have compounded for his Eſtate, upon the payment of a great ſum of Money (hoping it ſeems to better his Condition) began a freſh Rebellion, and joining with two other Noblemen, Baldwin Wake, and John Daywill, with a great number of other Barons and Knights, they again took up Arms, and fell to plunder and ſpoil the North-Weſt Counties, and ſettled their Quarters in a great Wood or Foreſt in thoſe parts, called Suffeld Frith;

Frith; which the King hearing of, resolved to put a stop to their Insolence: but his Son, the Prince, being then otherwise imploy'd, he sent the Lord Henry, eldest Son to the King of the Romans, to command in chief over a strong body of Noblemen and Gentlemen, who marching down into those Parts, [4] came on Whitson-eve to the Town of Chesterfield in Derbyshire, where they surprized the Earl Ferrars, and the other Noblemen abovementioned (who were then in Bed) but they strait getting up, made the best Resistance they could, which occasioned a very sharp Fight for a time in the Town; but at last the King's Forces obtain'd the Victory, and killing divers of them, took most of the rest Prisoners: but the Earl made a shift to get away and hide himself in a Church; yet being soon after discovered there by a Woman, he was likewise taken Prisoner, and immediately sent to be kept in Windsor Castle: But John Dayvill and Baldwin Wake, who were of his Party, with some others, escaped, and got into the Isle of Ely, there to do more Mischief, as you will hear anon.

Anno Dom. MCCLXVI.

[4] M. S. W. H. Henry, Son to K. Richard, surprizes the E. of Ferrars, and puts his Forces to flight, and he himself is taken Prisoner.

Again, another Knight called Adam de Gurdun, had about the same time taken up Arms in Hampshire, and lay in certain Woods between Aulton and Farnham, where with a great number of Men that followed him, he spoiled and plunder'd the Country; but the Prince arriving there, and with his Forces scowring the said Wood, about Sun-set found Adam with his Party just going to take up their Quarters: but here the Prince had like to have been in no small Danger, for leaping over a Ditch or Trench (which encompassed the Rebels Camp) to make his way to them, and his Forces not being able presently to follow him, he was necessitated for some time to engage hand to hand with this Adam their Leader, who was a strong and valiant Warrier; but at length Prince Edward got the better of him, and wounded him; and by that time the Prince's Men came in to his Assistance, quite routed the Rebels, and took Adam Prisoner, and sent him, by the Prince's Order, in Chains to Windsor-Castle, there to keep Earl Ferrars Company.

Prince Edward marches against Adam de Gurdun.

Fights with him, and takes him Prisoner.

But Matt. Westminster and Nicholas Trivet, relate it somewhat otherwise, and say, that tho the Prince caused all the rest of the Rebels he then took to be hanged, yet being in love with this Adam's Valour, he order'd his Wounds to be dress'd; and presenting him that Night to the Queen his Mother at Guilford, not only obtain'd his Pardon, but got him restored to his Inheritance, and then took him into his particular Favour, who ever after served him faithfully; which was certainly a very remarkable Act of Generosity in this brave Prince.

But the Prince gets his Pardon, and restores him to his Inheritance.

[5] But somewhat to abate the Joy of these Victories, about the same time the Welsh gain'd a great Victory over the Lord Roger Mortimer, so that his Army being almost wholly cut off, he himself hardly escaped.

[5] A. W.

[6] Whilst these things were transacting, Earl Edmund the King's younger Son, was sent with a strong Party to Warwick, to restrain the Excursions and plunderings of those that kept the Castle of Kenelworth, and not long after the King himself followed with his Army, and remained at Warwick for some days, expecting more Recruits, together with his Engines of Battery. But the Annals of Waverly

[6] T. W. The K's 2d Son is sent to Warwick, to restrain the Excursions of the Garison in Kenelworth Castle.

Anno Dom. MCCLXVI.

Waverly relate (and that with greater probability) that before Midſummer the King ſent his Son the Prince before, with a great part of the Army from Warwick towards Kenelworth, in order to beſiege it, but that the Gariſon ſallying out, fell upon the Prince's Forces with ſuch Violence, that they beat them back as far as Warwick; [2] however it is certain, that preſently after, the King, attended by all the great Men of the Kingdom, (who owed him Knight's Service, by reaſon of their Fees) being arrived in Perſon, began to lay cloſe Siege to the Caſtle on Midſummer-Eve, and batter'd it with all ſorts of warlike Engines: but it was altogether in vain; for the Rebels being well victualled, truſted to the ſtrength of the Place, and defended it ſo obſtinately, that a great many Men were killed on both ſides. But when the Siege had continued till towards the end of Auguſt, Ottobon, the Pope's Legate, with the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and Biſhop of London, went down thither to try if they could propoſe any terms of Peace between the King and thoſe beſieged, but it was all to no purpoſe; for they expecting a ſpeedy and powerful Relief under Simon de Montfort from beyond Sea, would hearken to no reaſonable Conditions; wherefore the Legate excommunicated all thoſe that held the Caſtle, together with their Adherents in other Places. So that all the King's Forces could then do, was to keep it cloſe block'd up, in hopes they might be forced to ſurrender it at laſt for want of Proviſions.

[2] Id. ib.

The Caſtle being beſieged by the King, is defended by the Rebels with great obſtinacy.

The Pope's Legate, ABp of Canterbury, &c. go down to try if they can make a Peace, but in vain; whereupon the Caſtle is cloſely blockt up.

[3] In the mean while Baldwin Wake and John Dayville, with the reſt of thoſe Rebels who had fled from the Battel of Cheſterfield, encreaſing their Forces, had about Michaelmaſs ſeized upon the Iſle of Ely, (the Inhabitants being too weak to reſiſt them) and there raiſed a dangerous Rebellion; then ſallying out from thence, they ſpoiled the adjacent Counties of Norfolk, Suffolk, and Cambridgeſhire, of all their Goods and Proviſions, which they carried away with them into the Iſle: and beſides this, they plunder'd divers other Towns, not ſparing the Ornaments of the Churches.

[3] Id. ib. W. H.

John Dayville, and divers others, ſeize the Iſle of Ely, and ſallying out, ſpoil the adjacent Counties.

But the King and Prince were at the ſame time taken up with the Siege of the Caſtle of Kenelworth, tho they could not reduce it till near half a Year after: And the King being now reſolved to ſettle the Kingdom by the moſt healing Methods he could, at the Requeſt of Ottobon the Pope's Legate, and others of his own Biſhops and Nobility, [4] He ſummoned a Parliament to meet at Kenelworth Town, on the 24th of Auguſt following, and there it was agreed by the common Conſent of the Biſhops, Abbots, Priors, Earls, Barons, and all others then preſent, that ſix Perſons, viz. the Biſhop of Exeter, the Biſhop of Bathe, the Earl of Worceſter, Sir Alan de la Zouche, Sir Roger Sommery, and Sir Robert Walerand, ſhould be appointed on their Oaths to chooſe ſix others, as well Biſhops as great Men, whom they judged the leaſt Partial, and of the greateſt Experience, who together (according to their beſt underſtanding) were to do what they ſhould think moſt proper for the Security and Peace of the Kingdom. To thoſe twelve were to be committed the Caſe and Facts of all the diſinherited Noblemen, with full Power from the King, and great Men of the Kingdom, to determine and conclude concerning them; and if there aroſe any difference between the ſaid twelve, then that Opinion was to ſtand good and firm, which received the Aſſent and Approbation of the Legate and the Lord Henry, Son to Richard King of Almain; and theſe together were to ſettle all matters by the Feaſt of All-Saints next enſuing. Anno Dom. MCCLXVI.

The Preface of which Sentence or Decree, called in Latin Dictum de Kenelworth, begins thus: "In the name of the Holy and Undi-"vided Trinity, Amen, to the Honour of God, &c. Then follow "the Names of the compoſers of it, viz. William Biſhop of Exon, "William Biſhop of Bathe and Wells, Henry Biſhop of Worceſter, "Thomas Biſhop of St. Davids, Gilbert de Clare Earl of Glouceſter, "Humphrey Earl of Hereford, Philip Baſſet, John Bayloffe, Robert "Walop, Alein de la Zouche, Roger de Somery, and Warryn de Ba-"ſyngburne, together with the Pope's Legate, and the aboveſaid "Henry of Almain, who were appointed to provide for the good "Eſtate of the Realm, and namely for the Redemption of certain "Perſons diſinherited; having thereunto full Power from the King, "and the other Barons, and Counſellors, according to the Form "written and confirmed in the general and ſpecial Letters of the "ſaid King, and as the other aforenamed had ordered and agreed in "manner following, &c. They draw up the Decree, called Dictum de Kenelworth.

From whence we may obſerve, that this * Decree or Statute derives its Authority, not only from the King, but alſo from his Barons and Counſellors in Parliament; and is ſaid to be a Statute, being entitled Dictum de Kenelworth; that is, the Award or Agreement made at Kenelworth by the King, his Noblemen and Commons: * Dictum. Vide Raſtal's Statutes, Vol. I. P. 13.

It being intended to better the Condition of the Diſinherited, and to turn the Forfeitures, and loſs of their Eſtates, into a Compoſition in Money for them; therefore the Offenders were divided into ſeveral Ranks and Articles, according to the greatneſs of their Offences, after the following Order. The Heads of this Decree.

1. Concerning them that began the War, and perſevered in it.
2. They that were at Cheſterfield, againſt that King in Battel.
3. All thoſe that violently and malitiouſly kept Northampton againſt the King.
4. All thoſe that had fought againſt the King at the Battel of Lewes.
5. All them that were in Kenelworth Caſtle, who came from the ſacking of Wincheſter, or were in any other place againſt the King, whom he had not pardoned.
6. All them that fought againſt him at Eveſham.
7. All that were in the Fight at Cheſterfield.
8. All that freely, wilfully, and uncompelled, ſent any Aid or Service, againſt the King, or his Son.
9. The Bailiffs, and Servants of the Earl of Leiceſter, that plundered their Neighbours, burnt their Houſes, or killed them, or did other Miſchiefs.

All theſe abovementioned were to pay the value of their Lands for five Years; and if they paid their Redemption Money within that time, they were to have their Lands again: this Compoſition was to be paid at two or three payments, but if they paid the whole Sum at once, then all their Lands were to be delivered them preſently; ſently; if half, then but half; if a third part, then they were to have no more than a third part of their Lands reſtored.

Anno Dom. MCCLXVI.

But if they were not able to raiſe any Money at all, then their Lands were to remain in the Hands of thoſe to whom the King had given them, till the Money was raiſed out of the Profits of their Eſtates: and out of thoſe Compoſitions the King was to gratify ſuch as had done him faithful Service.

10. Then follow certain Clauſes concerning the Heirs of ſuch of the Diſinherited whoſe Fathers were dead, they being as yet under Age; for theſe their Lords were to pay their Fines for them, and to raiſe them out of their Eſtates.

11. Alſo all the King's Grants of Wardſhips of ſuch Heirs were to hold good till they came of Age, and then they were to be reſtored to their Eſtates upon the ſame Terms as others, in the ſame Condition.

12. All thoſe that were then in the Caſtle of Kenilworth, were to be admitted after the common Form, or Terms of Peace with the reſt, except Henry Haſtings, and thoſe who maimed the King's Meſſenger.

He was at this time Governour, or Commander in Chief at Kenilworth Caſtle.

13. The Earl Ferrars and Henry Haſtings were to pay ſeven years Profits of their Eſtates.

14. Thoſe who had committed leſs Offences than theſe abovenamed, might compound ſome for three Years, ſome two Years, others one Year, or half a year's Rent of their Lands, according to the nature of their Crime: thoſe that had no Lands were to be puniſhed in their Goods.

Note, in the Manuſcript Copy in the Cottonian Library, there are divers other things which need not be here recited; only this is worthy our Obſervation, that at the beginning of this Edict, are theſe remarkable Clauſes following, viz.

All Obligations, Writings, or Inſtruments made by the King or his Son, concerning the late Oxford Proviſions, or made or entered into by any of the King's faithful Subjects, by reaſon of the Troubles, were declared Null and Void by this Sentence; and thereby alſo it was declared that the King might and ought to exerciſe his Royal Power and Authority, without the hindrance or contradiction of any one, yet that the Great Charter, and Charter of the Foreſt, were to remain in full force by this Judgment.

Theſe Commiſſioners alſo humbly beſeech the King and Legate, that under the Penalty both of corporal Puniſhments, and eccleſiaſtick Cenſures, they would ſtrictly forbid any to ſpeak of Simon Montfort as a Saint, or to ſpread abroad the vain and fooliſh Miracles reported of him.

They alſo farther beſeech the Legate to abſolve the King, and all others of the Kingdom, both great and ſmall, from the Oaths they had taken, to obſerve thoſe Charters (concerning the late Oxford Proviſions) to the obſervation whereof they were bound by the Sentence of Excommunication pronounced againſt ſuch as did not obſerve them.

* This

This Decree or Statute called Dictum de Kenelworth was publiſhed and proclaim'd in the * Camp at, or before Kenelworth, on the 31ſt of October, in the Year of Grace 1266. and of the Reign of King Henry the 51ſt. Anno Dom. MCCLXVI.

This Law or Edict is much more prolix in the Original; but being now of no other uſe than to inform the Curious, I have only given you the Heads of it: what is here added, and not in the Latin Copy printed by Tothil, nor in Raſtal's Engliſh Statutes, is to be found in the † Manuſcript in the Cottonian Library, with which I have compared this Tranſlation.

* It is in Caſtris in the Manuſcript Copies, and not Caſtro, as in the printed Raſtal, and Dr. Brady's Tranſlation of it.

† Claudius, D. 2.

And therefore in the printed Copies of this Edict, theſe words, dat. in Caſtro de Kenelworth, (as if the Caſtle was then, or ſome time before ſurrendered) are Erroneous, for indeed it held out till almoſt Chriſtmaſs following, as all our Hiſtorians, both printed and Manuſcript, agree.

A great Error in the printed Copies of this Statute, which hath led Dr. Brady into the miſtake of making this Caſtle to have been ſurrender'd in July.

[5] And this perhaps might lead Dr. Brady into that miſtake, that it was delivered about the twentieth of July before; yet the Writ which he cites from the * Record, dated the twenty firſt of that Month, directed to the Sheriffs of Staffordſhire and Shropſhire, not to diſturb ſeveral therein named, who were then admitted to the King's Peace, having been before in Arms (tho in other Places, and not there) does not prove that the Caſtle was then taken, unleſs the Doctor could likewiſe make it out that the Perſons therein mentioned had been actually in it, which I believe would be very hard for him to do; for tho the Summons for this Parliament to meet at Kenelworth bears date the twenty ſecond of Auguſt, yet does it not from thence follow, that the Caſtle was at that time in the King's Power; ſince tho they certainly met at the Town of Kenelworth before the Caſtle was taken, yet they did not all continue there till ſuch time as this Sentence or Decree could be finiſhed and proclaim'd, but were either Diſſolved or Adjourned to Northampton (a Place of better Reception) as you will find by and by.

[5] Compl. Hiſt. p. 657.

* Cl. 50. H. 3. M. 2.

But notwithſtanding the great Clemency and Moderation of thoſe Biſhops and Lords, who were authorized to draw up this Statute or Decree of Kenelworth; yet it wrought no effect at all upon the Rebels, for thoſe in the Caſtle ſtill continued obſtinate, and refus'd to ſubmit to them; as did alſo John Dayville, and his Party in the Iſle of Ely, who not only ſlighted it, but ſtill continued to make freſh Excurſions, waſting and plundering the Countries round about.

T. W.

[1] To put ſome ſtop to theſe Violences, the Legate called a Synod of the Clergy at Northampton, at the Feaſt of All-Saints, and excommunicated all thoſe who were then in Arms againſt the King, and all Clergymen that favour'd Simon Montfort, and gave him any Aſſiſtance, as particularly John Biſhop of Wincheſter, Henry Biſhop of London, and Stephen Biſhop of Chicheſter; who being alſo ſuſpended, were all not long after fain to go to Rome, to beg the Pope's Abſolution.

[1] G. R. W. H. The Legate holds a Synod at Northampton.

But the Reader may take notice, that tho the Continuator of Matt. Paris places this Council under the next Year, yet he is certainly miſtaken; for the Annals of Waverly and St. Auguſtin, as well as Walter Hemingford's Chronicle, all agree, that beſides the Synod Anno Dom. MCCLXVI. Synod abovemention'd, the King held alſo a Parliament at the ſame time at Northampton, wherein all thoſe who ſtill maintain'd the Faction of Simon Montfort were diſinherited; that is, (as the Annals of Waverly well explain it) the late Statute or Decree made at Kenelworth was then confirm'd in another Aſſembly, I ſuppoſe either becauſe many of the Biſhops and Clergy were not preſent before, by reaſon of the Army that was then quarter'd about Kenelworth, or rather for want of Lodgings and other Accommodations in ſo ſmall a Place.

A Parliament alſo at Northampton, wherein the Statute of Kenelworth is confirmed.

[2] But it ſeems, notwithſtanding the late Excommunication of the Rebels, thoſe in the Iſle of Ely were arrived to that Inſolence, and became likewiſe ſo powerful, as to march out of the Iſle as far as the rich City of Norwich, which they ſurprized and plundered, to the value of above twenty thouſand pounds; and in their return did the like to the Town of Cambridg, carrying away from thence not only ſeveral Jews, but alſo the richeſt of the Townſmen, whom they kept Priſoners till they would ranſom themſelves at exorbitant Rates.

[2] T. W. The Rebels of the Iſle of Ely plunder Norwich and Cambridg.

[3] But it is now time to return to the Siege of Kenelworth Caſtle, which having been blocked up moſt of the laſt Summer, and all this Winter, the Beſieged were thereby driven to that Extremity, as to eat their Horſes; at length all manner of Proviſions and Fewel failing, (the Cold being very ſevere) they began to make a much more feeble Defence than they had hitherto done; ſo that about the beginning of November they were forced to Capitulate, and at laſt agreed for the delivery of the Caſtle within the ſpace of forty days, if it were not relieved by their Lord, Simon Montfort, before that time: and for the true performance of this, Sir Richard de Edmundevill, and ſeven other Knights, were delivered as Hoſtages till that time was accompliſhed; during which it was alſo agreed, that if their Lord Simon relieved the Caſtle, then theſe Hoſtages were to be again return'd into it; but if otherwiſe, the Caſtle was to be delivered when the forty days were expired: but no Relief coming to them within that time, they were forced to ſurrender upon St. Lucy's day, or the 13*th* of Decemb. but when the Beſieged march'd out, it was a miſerable ſight to ſee how pale and meager they looked, by reaſon of the great want of Victuals they had ſo long been under; and when the King's Men went into it to take Poſſeſſion, they were almoſt choak'd with the horrid ſtench of the dead Carcaſes, and other Naſtineſs they met there; but as for the Beſieged, they had but too good Terms given them (conſidering their great obſtinacy) for they did not only march out with their Arms and ſuch Horſes as they had left, but alſo with all the rich Plunder they had taken from the adjacent Country before the Siege began; all which, together with their Lives and Liberties, were to be ſecured to them.

[3] Id. ib.

So that if we conſider the paucity of the Defendants, in compariſon of the great Army that lay before it for near half a Year, in all which time they received no Recruits, either of Men or Proviſions, we muſt grant that this was one of the longeſt Sieges that we can find in Hiſtory of a place remote from the Sea or any Navigable River; and I wonder that ſo conſiderable an Action is ſo ſlightly taken taken notice of by moſt of our Hiſtorians, many of whom (tho they mention it as it were by the by) yet all of them, as well in Print as Manuſcript, place the ſurrender of it on the day abovemention'd; tho I ſuppoſe Roger Wendover and Matt. Weſtminſter, their ſilence as to this particular, has been the occaſion of Dr. Brady's great miſtake about it, as hath been already obſerved: but ſo ſoon as the King was poſſeſſed of this ſtrong Caſtle, (being forfeited to him by the Treaſon of the late Earl of Leiceſter, his Brother in Law) he beſtowed it upon Earl Edmund his ſecond Son, who was alſo ſometime before created Earl of Derby, upon the Attainder of Robert de Ferrars the late Earl thereof. And as ſoon as the King had ſettled his Affairs in thoſe Parts, he went to Woodſtock, and there ſtayed till Chriſtmaſs. Anno Dom. MCCLXVI.

[1] As for the Eccleſiaſtical Affairs of this Year, they are not many more than what hath been already related, only in the late Council or Synod at Northampton, there was by the Pope's Legate's Decree granted to the King the Tenths of all the Revenues of all Biſhops, Abbots, and other Clergymen throughout all England, Wales, and Ireland. [1] A.W. ib.

[2] In February this Year, Walter de Cantelupe Biſhop of Worceſter, who had been a zealous maintainer of the Baron's Party, and therefore had been excommunicated by the Pope's Legate, but lying upon his Death-bed, he was very penitent for his Fault; and therefore ſending to the Legate for Abſolution, he obtained it, and then departed this Life. Anno Dom. MCCLXVII.

*This Year (according to the Continuator of Matt. Paris, who ſtill begins it at Chriſtmaſs) the King kept that Feſtival at Oxford, in the Abbey of Oſney, together with his Queen and the Pope's Legate, where there were great endeavours uſed to make a Reconciliation between the Earl of Glouceſter and the Lord Mortimer, but without any Effect; but Matt. Weſtminſter ſays he kept this Chriſtmaſs at Coventry, tho the matter is not much which of them is in the Right; but whereever it was, [3] it is certain that before the Holy-days were over, he removed to Weſtminſter, there to celebrate the Feaſt of St. Edward's Departure, which was always kept on the Vigil of Epiphany, at which Solemnity (as William Riſhanger relates) many Prelates, Earls, and Barons being preſent, the King cauſed the Pope's Legate to ſit at Dinner in his own Royal Seat, he himſelf ſitting below him, which was a plain owning of the Pope's Superiority even in Temporals. To this Feaſt the Earl of Glouceſter was invited, but being again diſcontented at ſome of the King's late proceedings, refuſed to come, yet ſent a Meſſage to the King, admoniſhing him to remove all Strangers from his Councils, and alſo to cauſe the late Proviſions of Oxford to be obſerved throughout his Kingdom; which ſhews great fickleneſs in this Lord, ſince he himſelf had been one of thoſe who had contrived the Statute of Kenelworth, whereby theſe Proviſions were declared void.

But the true reaſon of his Diſcontent ſeems to have been the King's failure in ſome Promiſes which he had made to him, when he met him at Eveſham, the performance of which he now demanded; and the King not answering according to his expectations, it produced a fresh Rebellion, as you will find anon.

[4] A. S. A. A Colloquy or Treaty with the Nobility at London.

[4] About Candlemass, the King held a Colloquy, or Treaty with the Nobility at London, where I find nothing transacted, but that Matthias de Bezilles, who had been sometime before made Constable of Dover Castle, was now for some Misdemeanours removed, and the King gave the Custody of it to Edward Stephens of Portchester.

[5] G. R. The K. summons a Parliament to meet at St. Edmundsbury.

[5] Not long after this lesser Council was over, the King summon'd the Earls, Barons, Archbishops, Bishops, Abbots, and all others that owed him Military Service, to meet him at St. Edmundsbury, within eight days after Candlemass, with Horse and Arms, to march against those that had taken and still held the Isle of Ely: whereupon all but the Earl of Glouceſter obeyed the King's Command, and he was then very busy in the Confines of Wales, raising a great Army. But John de Waren and William de Valence were sent to admonish him to come to the Parliament; yet they could not prevail with him any farther, than to obtain certain Letters or Charters, sealed with his own Seal, by which he engaged never to bear Arms against his Lord the King, nor his Son Prince Edward, unless in his own Defence; nevertheless he declared that he would resist Roger de Mortimer, and other his Enemies, to the utmost of his Power: This he cunningly pretended, because he would not be thought to run again into a downright Rebellion.

The K. summons the E. of Glouceſter to come to Parliament, who refuses it, yet seals a Charter never to fight against the K.

When all the Bishops and Abbots, and Clergy, summon'd to this Parliament, were met at the Place abovemention'd, the King and the Legate required their immediate compliance with these following Articles, viz.

The Bps and Clergy being met, the King and the Legate desire their Compliance to several Articles.

[1] Id. ib.

[1] First, that the Prelates and Rectors of Churches, should grant them the Tenths of their Churches for three years next to come, as also for the Year last past, in like manner as they gave them the Barons to guard the Sea-Coasts against the Incursions of Strangers. But to this they answered, That the War was begun by evil Designs, and by the same did still continue, and for that reason it was necessary to lay aside those unjust Demands, and to treat of the Peace of the Nation, and make use of this Parliament for the benefit both of Church and Kingdom; and not go about to extort Money, especially when the Nation was so much impoverish'd by War, that it must be a long time before it could be able to recover it self.

With their Answers.

Secondly, They required, that their Churches might be taxed by Lay-men, according to the just and true value. To this also they answered, that That was not reasonable, but contrary to justice, for Lay-men to meddle with collecting of Tenths; nor would they ever consent to a new way of taxing, but that the old one should stand.

Thirdly, That the Bishops and Abbots would pay the Tenths of their Baronies and Lay-fees fully, according to the true and highest Value: to this they answered, That being impoverished by Depredations and Plunderings, and by following the King in his Expeditions, they had already spent all their Money, and were run so much behind-hand, that their Lands were forced to lie untilled.

Fourthly, They required, that all Clerks holding Baronies or Lay-Fees, should go armed in Person against the King's Enemies, or

or find ſo much Service as belong to their Lands or Tenements: But to this they anſwered, That they ought not to fight with the Material, but the Spiritual Sword (to wit) with Prayers and Tears; that by their Benefices or Fees, they were bound to maintain Peace, and not War; and that they held their Baronies in Frank-Almoign, (i. e. in pure Alms) and therefore owed no military Service but what was certain, and would not perform any that was new. Anno Dom. MCCLXVII.

Fifthly, They required on the behalf of the Pope, that with all ſpeed, the Expedition of the Croſs might be preached through the whole Kingdom: to this they anſwered, That a great part of the People had been killed in War already, and that if now they ſhould undertake the Cruſade, few or none would be left to defend the Nation.

Laſtly, It was urged, that the Prelates, whether they would or not, were obliged to comply with all theſe demands by the Oath they had taken at Coventry, to aſſiſt the King by all the honeſt means they could: but to this too they anſwered, That when they took that Oath, they only meant ſpiritual Help and wholeſom Counſel, and not Money nor Arms.

[2] What was done further in this Parliament I cannot tell, only that being ſummon'd for the repreſſing of the Rebels in the Iſle of Ely, it is certain, that ſo ſoon as it was diſſolved, the Lords and Tenants by Military Service, then marched with the King from St. Edmundsbury towards the ſaid Iſle; yet before the King left that Place, he prevail'd with the Pope's Legate (who had accompanied him thither) to ſend certain Biſhops to thoſe diſinherited Barons in the Iſle, admoniſhing them,

[2] T. W. The K. with his Army of Military Tenants marches to the Iſle of Ely, accompanied by the Pope's Legate, who ſends certain Bp's to the Rebels, to perſuade them to return to their Allegiance.

Firſt, to return to the Faith and Unity of the Catholick Church; but to this Meſſage they anſwered, that they firmly held the ſame Faith they had learned from the holy Biſhops, viz. St. Robert (that is, Groſteſt or Grout-head, late Biſhop of Lincoln) and St. Edmund and St. Richard (both Archbiſhops of Canterbury) and other Catholick Men; that they believed the Articles of Faith contained in the Creed; the Goſpels alſo and Sacraments, which the Univerſal Church held and believed, they did believe, and in that Faith they were reſolved to live and die.

Secondly, he admoniſhed them to return to the Obedience of the Roman Church: to this they anſwer'd, They did obey the Roman Church as the Head of all Chriſtianity, but not the Luſt, Covetouſneſs and Exactions of thoſe that ought otherwiſe to govern it.

Thirdly, He admoniſhed them to return to the King's Peace according to the late Award: to this they anſwered, Firſt, that the Legate was ſent into England to make Peace, but he rather kept up the War, becauſe he manifeſtly joined with the King's Party, and encouraged it, and in ſo doing, maintained the War. Secondly, they ſaid, the Award was void, for that the Pope commanded the King and Legate that none ſhould be diſinherited, and they had ſuch high Fines ſet upon them, that they amounted to a diſinheriting.

Fourthly, He admoniſhed them to receive Abſolution from the Sentence of Excommunication pronounced againſt them according to the Form of the Church: to this they anſwered, That their firſt Anno Dom. MCCLXVII. Oath (which was to maintain the Oxford Proviſions) was for the Advantage of the Kingdom, and the whole Church, and all the Prelates of the Kingdom thundered out the Sentence of Excommunication againſt all thoſe that ſhould act contrary thereto; that they reſolved to ſtand to that Oath, and were ready to die for it, and exhorted the Legate to revoke his Sentence, otherwiſe they would appeal to the Apoſtolick See, or to a General Council, as the Supreme Judg.

Fifthly, He admoniſhed them not to commit any more Robberies, nor to damnify any one: to this they anſwered, That ſince they fought for the benefit of the Kingdom and Church, they ought to live upon the Goods of their Enemies, who detained their Lands.

Then from anſwering, they proceeded further, to deſire the Legate to admoniſh the King to remove Strangers from his Council; and they likewiſe requir'd of the Legate, that their Lands might be reſtored without any Fines or Ranſoms; that the Oxford Proviſions might be obſerved, that they might have Pledges or Hoſtages ſent them into the Iſle for their Security; and that they might peaceably enjoy it for five Years, until they ſaw how the King would keep his Promiſes. Then they proceeded to complain of the King's late turning the Biſhops of Wincheſter, London and Chicheſter (being prudent Perſons) out of his Council, as alſo of the Legate's taking to his own uſe the Goods and Revenues belonging to Biſhopricks: they alſo declared againſt his great Charges and Exactions from Monaſteries, whereby they were diſabled from giving Alms, and beſtowing Hoſpitality.

That the Churches or Livings of England, and the Eccleſiaſtical Revenues, were beſtowed upon Strangers who were her Enemies, ſo that they had none but mean Curates, and thoſe too hired for a very ſmall matter.

As for what concerned Eccleſiaſtical Matters, they were real Grievances, and ſuch as the Nation then groan'd under, yet had neither Power nor Courage enough to redreſs them. But as for thoſe relating to Civil matters, they were no other than what Simon Montfort and thoſe of his Party had before inſiſted on. [3] But the King and the Legate being highly exaſperated at theſe demands; the Treaty broke off, and the King prepared to beſiege the Iſland, which this * Author (tho erroneouſly) ſuppoſes not to have been undertaken till the Year following, whereas it was indeed beſieged and taken this very Year, as I ſhall ſhew farther by and by.

[3] G. R. The K. and Legate being diſpleaſed with the Rebels demands, the Treaty breaks off.

* Id. p. 1004.

And I ſuppoſe this miſtake led [4] Dr. Brady into a greater, when, contrary to the order of Time, he ſeparates this Treaty with thoſe in the Iſle of Ely, from the Parliament at St. Edmundsbury, and places it juſt after the Council at Northampton, without the Authority of any Author to juſtify his ſo doing; whereas if he had conſulted [5] Wikes's Chronicle, he might there have found, that the Parliament at St. Edmundsbury, when this Treaty began, was held at Candlemaſs near four Months after the other at Northampton.

[4] Hiſt. p. 659.

[5] P. 78.

But I ſhall now from this Author laſt mentioned (being the moſt exact I can find) proceed to give you an Account of the reſt of the the Tranſactions relating to theſe Rebels, as well as other matters. Anno Dom. MCCLXVII.

[1] The King, finding he could not prevail with the Rebels in the Iſle of Ely, removed from St. Edmundsbury to Cambridg, reſolving to block up all the Avenues which led to it, that ſo he might hinder the Rebels from going out, and plundering the Country as they had done before. [1] R. W. p. 78. The K. not being able to take the Iſle of Ely, retires to Cambridg.

Here the King paſſed all the Lent, keeping his Army with him to little or no purpoſe; and tho he had got together a great many Veſſels from Ipſwich, Dunwich, Yarmouth and Lyn, and had put a great many Souldiers on board them, yet ſo ſoon as they landed upon the Iſland, they received a Repulſe, and were forced to return.

[2] But whilſt the King thus waſted both his Time and his Money at Cambridg to little purpoſe, Prince Edward was better imploy'd; for the Lord John Veſci (one of the late diſinherited Barons) had then raiſed ſome Forces in the North, and therewith recovered his Caſtle of Alnwick and other Lands Adjacent, of which he had been lately diſſeized: whereupon Prince Edward marching down with a brave Army into thoſe Parts, he reduced that Lord to ſuch ſtreights, that he was forced to crave pardon for his Crime, and ſurrender himſelf and his Eſtate to the Prince's Mercy; who to ſhow himſelf generous, freely pardoned him, upon which the reſt of his Accomplices being likewiſe forced to yield, that Rebellion was ſoon quell'd. [2] Id. ib. P. Edward in the mean while ſubdues John de Veſci and other Rebels in the North.

[3] Whilſt the King ſtaid thus at Cambridg (as I have ſaid) to little purpoſe, the Earl of Glouceſter, and ſeveral other Barons of his Party attended with a great Army, went from the Marches of Wales to London, pretending it was for the King's Service; by which means the Citizens gave him entrance into the City, which he fortified as well as he could, and then ſent to the Legate forthwith to deliver up the Tower, and being refuſed, he forbad all People to ſend in any Proviſions to him: then the Rabble of the City and Counties adjacent, plundered all thoſe who they thought were not of their Faction. [3] M. ib. M. W. The E. of Glouceſter marches up and ſeizes the City of London.

But ſince the Annals of the City of London (already cited) do very much excuſe the Citizens for ſo eaſily admitting the Earl of Glouceſter with his Adherents into the City, and do alſo give us a more particular Account of theſe Tranſactions than any other Author, I ſhall here therefore add what they relate concerning this Affair, viz. That the Earl of Glouceſter pretending he only came up to aſſiſt the King againſt the Rebels in the Iſle of Ely, the Pope's Legate was ſo far deceived therewith, that when the Earl came to Windſor, the Mayor and Citizens attended the Legate (who was then left chief Governour in the King's Abſence) to know whither the Earl ſhould be admitted into the City or not; the Legate's Anſwer was, That they ſhould admit him by all means, for he verily believed he was the King's Friend: whereupon about a Week before Eaſter, the Citizens ſent ſome of their Body to meet the Earl upon the Road to London, and deſire him not to quarter his Army within the City, which he readily granted, only demanded leave to march his Army through it, and ſo he did, and took up his Quarters in Southwark; and the day following, when the Legate (who then lay in the A more full Account of theſe Tranſactions from the City Annals. The E. of Glouceſter is admitted into the City by the Legate's Order.

Anno Dom. MCCLXVII.

the Tower) would not go over the Bridg to meet the Earl, he thereupon came into the City with many Attendants, and met the Legate in Trinity Church, and there had a long Conference with him; but what the iſſue of it was our Author does not tell us, but it is very probable that the Earl required the Legate to deliver up the Tower into his Hands (as hath been already ſaid) which being refuſed, the War began between them, as you will ſee by and by.

[4] Id. ib. The Earl quarters his Army in the City. And John Dayville, with many of his Accomplices come up to London.

[4] After this the Earl pulled off the Vizard, and began to act more openly, and quartering his Army in the City, thereby made himſelf maſter of it; but his Intentions more plainly appear'd, when John Dayville, the chief Ring-leader of the Rebels in the Iſle of Ely, came up with a great many of his Party, and join'd with him: but the City fearing this plundering Crew, drew up their Draw-bridg againſt them, and ſhut their Gates; whereupon Dayville and his Company were fain to take up their Quarters in Southwark: but preſently after Eaſter the Earl took away the Keys of the City from the Mayor, and delivered them to thoſe in whom he could confide; by which means the Rebels in Southwark came in and out of it at their Pleaſure, which ſo alarm'd the better ſort of Citizens, that they left the Town for fear of the King's Diſpleaſure, and the Earl thereupon preſently ſeized their Eſtates.

Whereupon many of the beſt Citizens leave the City.

[5] Id. ib. * Communiam. The meaner ſort of People begin again to domineer, and plunder the chief Citizens.

[5] Then the meaner ſort of People began again to domineer, calling themſelves the * Community of the City, as they did in Simon Montfort's time; ſo that many of the chief Citizens, who were looked upon to favour the King's Party, were impriſoned, and their Goods plundered; and the Mayor being now diſcharged from his Office, one Richard de Culworth was made chief Baily of it under the Earl of Glouceſter: then all thoſe who had been outlaw'd for breaking the King's Peace during the late War, and had fled for the ſame, return'd into the City without any controul, and thoſe that were Priſoners in Newgate for their late Rebellion, were ſet free; which when the Legate heard, and that thoſe whom he had formerly excommunicated, did now what they pleaſed, he put the City under a kind of Interdict, commanding that the Bells ſhould not be rung for Divine Service, and that it ſhould be read and not ſung, the Church-doors to be kept ſhut, leſt the excommunicated Rebels ſhould come in to hear it.

The Legate forbids ſinging of Service in the City Churches.

[1] T. W. ib. The fair Pretences of the E. of Glocester make a ſtrong Party for him.

[1] But to return to our firſt Author; notwithſtanding all the Legate could do, the Earl of Glouceſter had a ſtrong Party as well within the City, as without; for his pretences ſeem'd very popular, viz. That he only took up Arms for the good of the Commonwealth, and to make the King reſtore the diſinherited Barons in the Iſle of Ely to their Eſtates upon reaſonable Conditions; and further, to force Prince Edward better to obſerve the Oath which he had formerly took to him at Hereford: but as for the particular Articles of that Treaty, our Author for brevity ſake thinks it not fit to give them us.

[2] Id. M.W.

[2] Then the Earl fell cloſely to beſiege the Legate in the Tower, who, for want of better Defendants, was forced to call in the Jews for his Guard, the Earl's Men endeavouring all they could by Engines and other means to take it, whilſt the Defendants on the other hand did their utmoſt to repel them, and hold it out till the King's Arrival; who ſo ſoon as he had heard of the ſurprize of the City, preſently preſently left Cambridg, and his unſucceſsful deſign of blocking up the Iſle of Ely, and marched up towards London. Then Prince Edward being now return'd victorious out of the North with a powerful Army, joined his Forces with the King his Father's; who then ſent to the Earl of Glouceſter, commanding him to leave the City, and if he refuſed it, he would come thither in Perſon, and force him and the diſinherited Barons of his Party, to quit what they had unjuſtly ſeized on. Anno Dom MCCLXVII.

The K. having join'd his Forces with his Son's, marches up to London, and commands the E. of Glouceſter to depart.

So the King and Prince about three Weeks after Eaſter marched as far as Windſor, where their Army daily encreaſed, inſomuch that he finding himſelf now ſtrong enough to march, drew nigh the City, and came by the favour of the Night and encamped very near its Walls; then drawing up his Forces next morning in ſight of the Citizens, he relieved the Legate, who got out of the Tower by a Poſtern on that ſide next the River, whom the King received very joyfully; and he preſently after marched with his Army to Stratford, a Town within three Miles of London, and there incamped without any Oppoſition: but both Parties being mindful of the former chances of War, deferr'd fighting as much as they could; tho Matt. Weſtminſter relates, that they challenged the King to a Battel upon Hundeſlow-heath; and how the next day the King went thither, but found no Enemy; which does not ſeem likely, that ſo great a Man as the Earl of Glouceſter, who had a great Army of his own, beſides moſt part of the ordinary Citizens at his beck, ſhould provoke the King to fight, and then not dare to march into the Field. But this is certain, that the Earl of Glouceſter continued in London, and the King remained with his Army at Stratford for above two Months this Summer.

And relieves the Legate from his Confinement in the Tower.

The K. incamps at Stratford; where both Armies lie in ſight of each other, without fighting.

[3] But nevertheleſs thoſe of the Earl's Party in London, marched down into Kent and Surrey, and plundering thoſe Counties, they brought great ſtore of Proviſions into the City, which was then almoſt blocked up on the Eſſex ſide: and not being contented with this, the miſchievous Rabble ſpoiled the King's Palace at Weſtminſter, breaking the very Windows and Doors, and falling upon all thoſe that they thought took the King's part; and they either kill'd, or drown'd in the Thames, without any Mercy, all Perſons whomſoever they ſuſpected. [3] T.W. p. 80.

The Earl's Party in London plunder Kent and Surrey, and ſpoil the K's Palace at Weſtminſter.

I muſt not here omit, that during theſe Combuſtions, [4] the King being in great want of Money, the Pope's Legate took out the Jewels and golden Images belonging to the Church of Weſtminſter, which he pawned to certain Merchants for a great ſum of Money to ſupply the King's preſent Neceſſities, which Jewels were again reſtored to the ſaid Church ſome time after the Concluſion of the Peace. But to return to matters more Material. [4] M. W.

The Legate pawns the Jewels, &c. belonging to the Church at Weſtminſter, to ſupply the K's Neceſſities.

At laſt, when the Earl of Glouceſter perceived that the King's Forces daily encreaſed, and that the Earls of Boloigne and St. Paul were come to his Aſſiſtance out of France, with two hundred Knights and their Retinue; and the Gaſcoins likewiſe, with many great Ships well mann'd and provided, were arrived in the Thames, and only expected the King's Orders: and likewiſe found that he could not take the Tower by Force, but his Army was like to be blockt up and ſtarved in the City, he then applied plied himſelf to Richard King of Almain, and the Ld Philip Baſſet; and they after many Meetings and Treaties, about the middle of June, made his Peace with the King, in which he and all his Favourers and Adherents, together with the Londoners, were included, and by the King's Charter he was pardon'd all Actions done from the beginning of April, when he firſt came from Wales, either within or without the City. But this Pardon was not to extend to thoſe that were diſinherited by the Decree of Kenelworth, and that were not in the King's Peace the day the Earl began to march: and that the King might be farther aſſured he never would make War againſt him any more, he gave his Oath and Charter, under the Penalty of ten thouſands Marks for Security. This Accord bears date at Stratford the day after, and is upon * Record in the Tower, as is alſo the Charter of Pardon, being both cited by [4] Dr. Brady.

Which is at laſt concluded, with the Terms on which it was made.

* Rot. Pat. 51. H. 3. M. 16. N. 49.

[4] Compleat Hiſt. p. 662.

To which it is further added in the City Annals, that by this Agreement the aforeſaid Penalty was to continue in force againſt the Earl, till the Pope's Judgment were known, and whatſoever he ſhould determine concerning this matter the Earl ſhould be bound to obſerve; ſo that this Judgment was given before Candlemaſs next enſuing.

The K. remits to the City of London all ill Will, by reaſon of the late Troubles.

There is alſo in theſe Annals another Charter of the King to the City of London, whereby he remitted to the Citizens all Rancor and ill Will, which he might bear againſt them by reaſon of the late Diſturbances: this Charter is in French, and bears date ſome days after the Charter of Pardon to the Earl of Glouceſter; by whoſe Interceſſion John Dayville, Nicholas de Segrave, and other Barons (who came lately out of the Iſle of Ely) were alſo pardoned and reſtored to their Eſtates, according to the Articles ordained by the Decree of Kenelworth.

Several Barons are alſo pardon'd at the E. of Glouceſter's Interceſſion.

And ſome time after there was a great Treaty or Colloquy of the Nobility at Windſor, where by the mediation of the King of the Romans and the Lord Henry his Son, a perfect Reconciliation was made between Prince Edward and the Earl of Glouceſter.

Theſe troubleſom Affairs being thus diſpatched, and the K. having diſcharged and ſent home all thoſe foreign Forces that came over to his Aſſiſtance, very well rewarded for their Pains; he then reaſſumed [5] the Siege of the Iſle of Ely, which had been for ſome time intermitted; and where ſince the departure of John Dayville, late Governor of Kenelworth Caſtle, Henry de Haſtings had made himſelf Commander in chief, tho contrary to the Oath he had given at the taking of that Place: for upon the drawing off of the King's Forces towards London, thoſe in the Iſle had renewed their wonted Depredations upon the adjacent Counties, [1] of whoſe ſad Condition Prince Edward having great Compaſſion, was reſolved to put a ſtop to their Violence as ſoon as poſſible; wherefore taking with him a ſtrong Army, he firſt marched down to the Abbey of Ramſey, and there by great Promiſes and Rewards, brought in the Inhabitants of the neighbouring Parts, who knew all the Channels, Fords, and ſecret Paſſages that led to the ſaid Iſle; theſe making Bridges of Reeds, or (as William Riſhanger relates) of Hurdles and Timber, the Prince and his Forces got into the Iſle with little or no Reſiſtance, which too was the eaſier compaſſed, becauſe the Summer being very dry, moſt of of the boggy and marſhy Places were now become firm Ground: and to prevent any ſudden Aſſaults or Reſiſtance from the Beſieged, who he ſaw were drawn up to hinder his landing, he cauſed Proclamation to be made, that whoſoever of the Rebels offer'd to aſſault his Men, or any ways to hinder their Paſſage over, he would not fail to make them pay for it with the loſs of their Heads, if it ſhould pleaſe God to grant him ſucceſs; promiſing alſo pardon to all thoſe who would ſubmit to his Mercy: ſo granting them two days Truce to conſider of theſe Conditions, their courages were then ſo cool'd, that they quietly ſubmitted to the Prince's Pleaſure, and ſurrender'd the Iſle without any other Conditions than only their Lives and Liberties ſaved; into which Place the Prince with all his Forces marched in Triumph.

Anno Dom. MCCLXVII.

The Rebels ſurrender the Iſle to the Prince.

This good Succeſs happened about St. James-tide, by which this long and dreadful Civil War that had for above five Years tormented this ſinful Nation, was now abſolutely extinguiſh'd; and the Engliſh Nobility leaving the troubleſom and dangerous trade of War, had now time again to follow their Country Employments and Recreations.

But before I diſmiſs this Subject, I cannot but take notice that the Continuator of Matt. Paris, by placing this reduction of the Iſle of Ely under the Year following, has led [2] Dr. Brady into the ſame Error, who has alſo placed this Action under the Year 1268. whereas it was indeed undertaken and finiſhed this very Summer 1267. not long after the Earl of Glouceſter's making his Peace with the King, as all the Authors (except he and the Doctor) agree.

The miſtake of Will. Riſhanger, about the Time of taking this Iſle, has led Dr. B. into the ſame Error.

The Civil Wars being thus happily concluded, the King had now time to correct the inſolence of the Welſh, [3] who taking Advantage of the diſſenſions in England, had lately, under the Conduct of Prince Llewellyn, waſted the Engliſh Borders, notwithſtanding the League made with him about two Years ago: wherefore the King, as I ſay, to repreſs his Inſolence, came with a great Army as far as the Caſtle of Montgomery, with an intention to march into the Bowels of Wales it ſelf; but when Llewellyn heard of it, and was now deprived of his uſual Aſſiſtance, the rebellious Barons, his Heart beginning to fail him, he by the Legate's perſwaſion (who came along with the King for that purpoſe) deſired a Treaty of Peace, which was ſoon concluded upon theſe Conditions.

[2] Compleat Hiſt. p. 664.

[3] R. W. M. W. P. Llewellyn having invaded the Engliſh Borders, the K. marches againſt him with a great Army.

Upon which News the Welſh Prince deſires a Treaty of Peace.

Firſt, all Lands were to be reſtored on both ſides, and that the Laws or Cuſtoms of the Marches ſhould ſtill hold good; that King Henry ſhould grant unto Him and his Heirs, the Principality of Wales, and that they ſhould always be ſtiled Princes of Wales, and ſhould receive the Homage and Fealty of all the Barons of Wales, who were to hold their Lands of them in Capite, except the Homage of Mereduc the Son of Rheeſe, which the King retained to himſelf and his Heirs; and if ever the King ſhould grant it to the Prince of Wales, he ſhould pay for it five thouſand pound. The King likewiſe granted him the four Cantreds of Borthwald, to hold them as fully as ever the King and his Heirs had poſſeſſed them; for which Principality, Lands, &c. the ſame Prince and his Succeſſors were to ſwear Fealty and do Homage, and perform the accuſtomed Services due to the King and his Heirs, as they had been done by him and his Predeceſſors to the King and his Anceſtors;

Which is concluded upon certain Conditions to be performed on both ſides.

Anno Dom. MCCLXVII. and further, he was to give him twenty five thouſand Marks in Money. This Agreement bears date at Shrewsbury the 25*th* of September 1267. at which Place the King and Prince then met for their better Accommodation; and this agrees with the * Record in the Tower, cited by † Dr. Brady in his Hiſtory.

[4] As for Eccleſiaſtical Affairs, this Year affords little conſiderable; but that the Pope now exceeding even the plenitude of his Power, (as my Author words it) burdened the Engliſh Church by an unuſual kind of Contribution; granting to the King by his Bull, a tenth part of the Rents and Annual Revenues of all Archbiſhops, Biſhops, as alſo of all the Clergy, as well Regular as Secular, for three Years to come, ſome few Religious Orders only excepted; who, inſiſting upon their Privileges, and that they might not ſeem to contribute with the reſt, compounded, by paying down at once a great Sum of ready Money, very near the true value of their Revenues: and that the Laiety might have nothing to do with the levying of it, it likewiſe appears upon || Record, that the Biſhops aſſigned Walter the (Archbiſhop) Elect of York, Stephen of Canterbury, and Rufin Clivel, Archdeacons in that Church, to receive and pay it to the King; one third part at Eaſter following, another third part at Midſummer, and the laſt at Michaelmaſs, and ſo for every one of the three Years: and the King by aſſignment of the Legate, appointed Collectors of this Tenth in every Dioceſs, as appears by two [5] ſeveral Records to that purpoſe; and divers Deans and Chapters did likewiſe compound with the King for their Tenths, as did all the Clergy of the ſeveral Dioceſſes, as you may further ſee by other † Records alſo cited by Dr. Brady, tho he is a little miſtaken in placing the Pope's Grant of theſe Tenths under the following Year; when it appears not only from the Hiſtorians above cited, but alſo from the Record it ſelf by him cited, that it was granted this very Year, tho it is true, the Compoſitions laſt mentioned were not made till the next.

The Pope granted the King a Tenth of all Eccleſiaſtical Revenues, without the conſent of the Clergy.

But before I diſmiſs this Subject, I muſt needs take notice of what Thomas Wikes alſo informs us, viz. that the Pope was ſo cunning that he would not grant the King this Tenth from the Clergy, until he had firſt agreed to pay all the Arrears of the Tribute or Acknowledgment which had been now unpaid for ſeveral Years, during the late Diſturbances; and that he then appointed Maſter Simon his Chamberlain to receive the ſame of thoſe that were to pay it.

Anno Dom. MCCLXVIII. Where the King kept his Chriſtmaſs this Year is ſomewhat uncertain, but Matt. Weſtminſter ſuppoſes it to be held at that place; yet the Annals of Waverly (I believe with greater certainty) ſuppoſe him, together with the Pope's Legate, to have celebrated that Feſtival at Wincheſter; from which time nothing happen'd conſiderable till Midſummer, when the King ſummoned a Parliament at Northampton, [1] and (as our Author words it) there aſſembled a great Multitude of the || Engliſh Knighthood; where by the ſolemn preaching of Ottobon the Pope's Legate, Prince Edward and Earl Edmund his Brother, the King's Sons, as alſo Henry eldeſt Son to the King of the Romans, with the Earls of Glouceſter, Warren, and Pembroke, and about a hundred and twenty other Knights, being ing touched with the great loſſes in the Holy Land, they all received the Croſs at the hands of the Legate; and by the like ſuperſtitious Devotion a great multitude of Perſons of inferior Quality likewiſe undertook the Cruſado, in the Cities and Boroughs, by the preaching of the Franciſcan Friars. Anno Dom. MCCLXVIII. As do alſo a great Multitude of other Perſons.

[2] Then the Pope's Legate having diſpatched his Buſineſs in England, and filled his Bags with Money for his Maſter's Uſe, reſolved now to return to Rome; and ſo taking his leave of the King at Northampton, paſſed over into France, and from thence proſecuted his Journey homeward. About the ſame time alſo Richard King of the Romans having been by occaſion of the late Civil Wars, and his Captivity, long abſent out of Germany, paſſed over thither in the beginning of Auguſt, to ſettle his Affairs in thoſe parts; where all that my [3] Author informs me he did, was, that at a great Diet of the Princes and free Cities held at the City of Wormes, he cauſed a Law or Decree to paſs by their General Conſent, whereby all new impoſed Cuſtoms or Exactions upon Commodities, that paſſed up and down the River Rhine, ſhould be wholly taken off and aboliſhed, and only the antient and received Cuſtoms which were wont to be paid to the Kings of the Romans, to be kept up and preſerved; and that if any City ſhould refuſe to ſubmit to this Decree, all the reſt of the Eſtates of the Empire ſhould make War upon it, and waſte their Territories, and pull down their Forts upon the River: by which Action King Richard, as he ſatisfied the Germans, ſo he highly advanced his own Reputation. This, tho it properly belong'd to the next Year, I have added under this, that I might here lay together whatever this Prince perform'd during his reſidence in Germany.

[4] This Year alſo the King held a Colloquy at Wincheſter, about the 17*th* of November, and therein he made his Son Pr. Edward Lord High Steward of England; which I take notice of, becauſe I do not find this Parliament mentioned in any other Author; and it is the more remarkable, becauſe we find that within a Month after, (that is, eight days after Martynmaſs) the King [5] held a Parliament at Marlebridge, (now Marlborough in Wiltſhire) where the wiſe or diſcreet Men of the Kingdom, as well of the greater as the leſſer Order, being ſummon'd, many Laws were made [1] by their unanimous Advice and Conſent, for the amendment of the Kingdom, and the due Adminiſtration of Juſtice; of which body of Laws, called in our Law Books the Statutes of Marlebridge, I ſhall give you the chiefeſt Contents at the end of this King's Reign. And here I muſt alſo take notice, that Dr. Brady being deceived by William Riſhanger, (whoſe Authority he principally follows toward the end of his Hiſtory) places this Parliament under the next Year, whereas it appears by the * Title of this Statute, that it was made in the fifty ſecond Year of this King's Reign, being in this very Year 1268.

There remains nothing more conſiderable to be remarked this Year, [2] but that the King being now reſolved to ſettle the Peace and Tranquillity of his Kingdom, cauſed it to be proclaimed in every County throughout England, that whoſoever ſhould invade or unjuſtly uſurp any one's Goods or Poſſeſſions, ſhould be liable to a a Capital Puniſhment, which was ſoon after executed upon one at Dunſtable, for having driven away twelve Oxen of the Villaines of Colney (belonging to the Abbey of St. Albans) who perſued, took him, and brought him before the Bailiff of the Liberty of St. Albans, who read to him in Engliſh the King's Proclamation before the whole Multitude, and then by virtue of this Royal command, he ſentenced him to be beheaded. This I take notice of, tho of no great importance, becauſe Dr. Brady has mentioned it as if it were an inſtance of the King's Prerogative, to cauſe Men to be executed by his ſole Proclamation without any legal Trial; whereas it is certain, that Theft of live Cattel was puniſhable with Death before this Statute was made; and tho Offenders in that kind have now the benefit of the Clergy, yet that is only allowed by later Statutes: nor does it follow that the Bailiff or Steward (who was then Judg for the Abbey in criminal Cauſes) condemned this Man preſently to be hang'd by the King's ſole Power and Prerogative, without any Trial by Jury: tho this Circumſtance be not particularly mentioned by the Author, from whom the Doctor has taken this Relation.

[3] T. W. Ottobon the Legate holds a Synod, wherein ſeveral Eccleſiaſtical Canons or Conſtitutions were ordained.

[3] The Eccleſiaſtical Affairs of this Year fall out to be more conſiderable, than they have been for ſome Years before; for about the beginning of April, Ottobon the Pope's Legate, ſummoning both the ſuperior and inferior Clergy, held a General Synod or Council in the Church of St. Paul's at London, of all the Archbiſhops, Biſhops, and other Prelates, with the inferior Clergy; where after he had confirm'd the Decrees or Conſtitutions that were made in the time of Otto his Predeceſſor, he then publiſhed certain new ones, which he cauſed to be read before all thoſe that were there preſent; and being thus publiſhed, he by his Legantine Authority commanded them to be obſerved through the whole Kingdom. Theſe Decrees or Conſtitutions being very long, and wholly relating to Eccleſiaſtical matters, I ſhall refer the Reader to Lyndwood's Volume of Eccleſiaſtical Conſtitutions for them, where he may obſerve, that both theſe made in this Synod, as well as thoſe of Otto abovemention'd, do contain the greateſt part of our Eccleſiaſtical or Canon Law.

A Bull of the Pope's is read in this Synod, whereby he abſolved Simon Montfort, and all thoſe that were ſlain with him, from the Sentence of Excommunication.

I find alſo in the Annals of St. Auguſtins of Canterbury, that there was read in this Synod, a certain Brief or Bull of the Pope's, whereby he abſolved Simon Montfort, late Earl of Leiceſter, and all thoſe that were ſlain with him at the Battel of Eveſham, from the Excommunication which their Souls hitherto lay under; alledging, that the Court of Rome had been miſinform'd concerning the grounds of the Sentence given againſt them; which if it were ſo, (as I find it in no other Author) it plainly ſhews, that the Pope did not then take upon him to be infallible; but whither they were thereby diſcharg'd out of Purgatory, or only made it lawful for Men to pray for them, I will not take upon me, as a Caſuiſt, to determine.

[4] P. 86. The Seculars are ſain to grant a Twentieth part of all their Livings.

And according to [4] Thomas Wikes's Chronicle, notwithſtanding the Tenths of all Eccleſiaſtical Revenues already granted by the Pope to the King, yet the Secular Clergy were likewiſe forced this Year to contribute (through the too great eaſineſs of the Biſhops) a Twentieth part of all their Eccleſiaſtical Livings; which Money by the King's conceſſion was to be diſtributed among the diſinherited

diſinherited Noblemen and Gentlemen, whoſe Lands the King had indiſcreetly beſtowed upon others, from whom by this means the Perſons diſinherited might redeem them at a certain value; which being done, thoſe Gentlemen were to be pardon'd all former Offences. Anno Dom. MCCLXVIII.

And this ſame Author ſays [5] (but a little before this time) that tho the King had received by Fines or Ranſoms from the Citizens of London for their Crimes, above 20000 Marks, yet it ſignified nothing, for it all went away to pay the Queen's Debts, which ſhe had contracted whilſt ſhe was beyond Sea: and [1] he alſo tells us further, that tho the annual Income ariſing from the Tenths of the Clergy, exceeded the whole Revenues of the Crown; yet the King's Treaſure was thereby little or nothing encreaſed, which proceeded from his two great eaſineſs; ſo that this was alſo ſquander'd away after the uſual manner upon unworthy Favorites, and ſoon diſperſed like the morning Dew before the Sun. I have taken notice of this, that ſo the Reader may obſerve, that if never ſo much be given by the Subject, yet if it be not iſſued out with frugality and good Management for the publick Good, it contributes little or nothing towards the end for which it was intended.

[5] P. 74. The vaſt Sums the K. received are all ſquander'd away.

[1] P. 86.

I have no more to note concerning Eccleſiaſtical Affairs, [2] only that about the end of November Pope Clement the fourth departed this Life. He was of ſomewhat a better Character than his Predeceſſor for Piety and Acts of Mortification, yet I do not find he was leſs greedy of Money than thoſe that went before him: the beſt thing I meet with recorded of him, being this, that he would by no means be prevailed upon to grant Diſpenſations for Pluralities of Eccleſiaſtical Benefices: but after his Deceaſe the Cardinals not agreeing upon an Election, the Papal Throne continued vacant for above three Years.

[2] Id. ib. The Death of Pope Clement the 4th, with his Character.

But before I conclude this Year, it will not be amiſs to mention ſome foreign Affairs of great Moment, viz. that Conradin Duke of Swevia, Grandſon to Frederick the Emperour, being confederated with Henry Brother to the King of Caſtile, (who was at that time chief Senator of Rome, and General of her Forces) they marched with their Armies to the Kingdom of Naples, which Conradin claim'd as Heir to his Grandfather, that they might thereby deprive the new King Charles of Anjou, of that Crown; who preſently quitting the Siege of Nocera, went with his Army to meet them near the Lake of * Celano, where he gave them Battel, which was very Bloody; yet King Charles at laſt obtain'd the Victory, the Duke's Army being totally routed, and he himſelf and Henry abovementioned, were forced to ſave themſelves by flight: but they were both ſoon after taken in Diſguiſe, and delivered up to the Conqueror, who being the Year following about to undertake a Voyage to the Holy-Land (with his Brother the King of France) the better to ſecure this new acquired Kingdom in his Abſence, he cauſed Duke Conradin to be beheaded in the Market-place of Naples, and thereby confirm'd that old Obſervation, That Princes ſeldom ſpare the Competitors of their Thrones, eſpecially if they know they have a better Title to them than themſelves: but to return to the Hiſtory.

Anno Dom. MCCLXVIII. King Charles being now eſtabliſhed in his Kingdom, he alſo took upon him his former Dignity of Senator of Rome, and Vicar of the Roman Empire in Thuſcany and Romania,* over both which he appointed Guido de Montfort, younger Son of Earl Simon deceaſed, his Lieutenant: this Simon had about two Years ſince made his eſcape out of priſon in England, and having married the Daughter of an Italian Count called Aldebrandino, by his Advice he did great miſchiefs to the Romans and Thuſcans, and a few Years after treacherouſly murdered his Couſin Henry, Son to the King of the Romans, as you will find when we come to that Time.

* M. W.

Anno Dom. MCCLXIX. [3] The King kept his Chriſtmaſs at Weſtminſter, after which I find nothing conſiderable to have happened till fifteen days after Eaſter; and then [4] a great Multitude of the Noblemen of England were aſſembled at London, (by which expreſſion I ſuppoſe our Author means a Parliament) but the King ſeem'd only to trifle away the time with them, they [5] having no great matters then brought before them, ſaving (and that chiefly by the means of Pr. Edward, and the Lord Henry Son to the K. of the Romans) that it was ordain'd, that the Jews (who had till then intolerably oppreſt the Chriſtians, under pretence of certain yearly Fees, or quit-Rents, which they were obliged by their Bonds to pay them at certain ſtated times) ſhould be forbidden to receive ſuch Extortions for the future; and it was further order'd, that all ſuch Muniments or Writings which the Jews had from them, ſhould be delivered up to the Chriſtians.

The Jews forbid to hold Eſtates in Fee, to take exceſſive Uſury, or receive any Quit-Rents in Fee.

But what was the meaning of theſe annual Fees abovemention'd, will be beſt underſtood by this following Writ upon * Record, directed to the Mayor and Sheriffs of London, which (tho dated near two Years after) refers to this Law, and gives us the beſt Interpretation of the words of our Author: for in this Writ the Law is thus recited, "That whereas the King has provided, by the Advice of "the Prelates and Great Men who are of his Council, that no "Jew ſhould enjoy a Freehold in any Mannor, Lands, &c. and by "Charter, Gift, Obligation, or other ways, only that they might "keep the Houſes, wherein they then inhabited, in Cities, Boroughs "and Towns: then after other Clauſes, forbidding Jews to plead by the King's original Writs, any where but before his Juſtices appointed for them, it follows, that they ſhould only receive their principal of Chriſtians, according to their Bonds or Chirographs; and at laſt concludes with another Clauſe, whereby they are alſo forbid to receive any perpetual Rents, called Fees, out of the Eſtates, or by the hands of Chriſtians: wherefore the King hereby ſtraitly enjoins, that the Perſons to whom this Writ is directed, cauſe the ſaid Proviſion, Ordinance and Statute to be proclaimed throughout their Bailywick, &c. Given at Weſtminſter 25° die Julii A. [1] T. W. E. Edmund the K's Son, marries the Daughter of the E. of Albemarle.

[1] Before the Diſſolution of this Parliament, about the beginning of April, Earl Edmund, the King's ſecond Son, was married to Avelina, Daughter and Heir to William late Earl of Albemarle and Holderneſs; and ſhe was alſo to have been, after her Mother, (who was Daughter to the Earl of Devonſhire) Lady of the Iſle of Wight. The Wedding was kept at Weſtminſter with great Solemnity, the King and Queen, with all the Nobility being preſent. But this Joy did not laſt long, [2] for the young Lady died before the Year was ended: and I muſt here obſerve, that Matt. Weſtminſter places this Marriage under the precedent Year, and William Riſhanger under the next; but they are both miſtaken, and Thomas Wikes is in the right, who places it in this Year, which is alſo confirm'd by a * Record in the Tower.

Nothing elſe happened remarkable this Summer, till the [3] beginning of Auguſt, when Richard King of the Romans being return'd out of Germany, landed at Dover, bringing over along with him a beautiful young Lady named Beatrix, the Daughter of Theodoric de Falkmorite, a German Nobleman of great Reputation, whom he had married about Midſummer, more for her Beauty than Portion, which was but ſmall. But they were both received with great Joy, many of the Nobility of the Kingdom going out to meet them, and the King and Queen ſhewed them great Honour and Reſpect.

[3] T. W. A. W. Rich. K. of the Romans arrives in England with a young Wife.

[4] Some time after this Lewis King of France ſent over his Envoys on purpoſe to Pr. Edward, deſiring him that (with the King his Father's leave) he would come over into France, to treat with him concerning matters of great Moment; whereupon the Prince preſently made haſt to go over to that King, and as ſoon as they met, he told the Prince, that ſince he himſelf had vowed an Expedition for the recovery of the Holy Land, he deſired the Prince, as a young and valiant Warrier, and experienced Commander, to accompany him thither: to which requeſt the Prince replied, that his Majeſty might very well know that the King his Father's Revenues were extreamly waſted and reduced by reaſon of the late Civil Wars; and that as for his own particular Appenage, it was much too ſmall for ſo great an Undertaking; whereupon the King of France generouſly offer'd to lend Prince Edward the ſum of thirty thouſand Marks, which he accepting of, immediately mortgaged to the King of France the Revenues of Bourdeaux, for the true payment of the Money.

[4] G. R. K. of France ſends Envoys to P. Edw. deſiring his Preſence in France;

And his Company to the Holy-Land, but the Prince excuſes himſelf.

The French K. offers to lend P. Edw. 30000 Marks, which he accepts.

As ſoon as the Prince had finiſhed this Agreement with the French King, he return'd into England about the beginning of September, that he might prepare all things ready for his Voyage to the Holy-Land, and at his Return was received by the King his Father with great tenderneſs, who ſince he could not go that Pilgrimage himſelf, was highly pleaſed with his Son's undertaking it.

The Prince returns into England,

The Annals of London do here alſo further inform us, that the Prince now alſo brought over with him the King of France's Charter, containing the Articles between them for the intended Expedition; which being ſet down at large in thoſe Annals, and are no where elſe to be found (as I know of) I ſhall give you the Heads of them from the French Original, which begins thus.

And brings over a Charter concerning the late Agreement between himſelf and K. Lewis.

Lewis by the Grace of God King of France, to all thoſe to whom theſe Preſents ſhall come, Greeting, &c. and then it recites, that whereas he and the Lord Edward, eldeſt Son to the King of England, were agreed to go on Pilgrimage beyond Sea, they have entered into theſe mutual Covenants.

The Heads of this Charter.

1. The

Anno Dom. MCCLXIX.

1. The King of France agrees to lend the ſaid Lord Edward, the ſum of ſeventy thouſand Pounds Turnois, of which two thouſand five hundred pounds were to be paid to Gaſton Viſcount Byern, for the Paſſage of the Lord Edward and his Forces through the Country of the ſaid Viſcount.

2. All the reſt of the ſaid Sum was to be laid out for Horſes, Victuals and Shipping, for the tranſport of the ſaid Lord Edward and his Forces, and was to be paid according to his Orders by King Lewis's Officers, to ſuch Perſons to whom the ſaid Money ſhould become due.

3. The aforeſaid Sum of ſeventy thouſand pounds Turnois ſo lent, was to be paid in the ſpace of ſeven Years, at two half yearly payments to be made at Paris, during the ſaid Term, and was to be raiſed out of the Cuſtoms of the City of Burdeaux, by the Conſtable or Lieutenant thereof. The firſt payment of which Sum was to begin from the Year of our Lord 1273. and for the better aſſurance of this Obligation, the Lord Edward was to procure the King his Father's Letters of Confirmation.

4. But for default of ſuch payment, the King of France might ſeize all the Goods, both moveable and immoveable, belonging to the ſaid Lord Edward, within the Kingdom of France.

5. Alſo the Lord Edward further covenants with the ſaid King, that he will by the Feaſt of Aſſumption of the Bleſſed Virgin next enſuing, be ready at Aigues mortes, to ſail to the Holy-Land.

6. The Lord Edward further engages in good Faith, that he will come and paſs over ſooner if it be poſſible; and that in his Journey through France, he will do no damage neither by himſelf nor his People, in the Territories of the ſaid King, nor either of his Brothers within that Kingdom, either in his going, ſtaying, or returning from the ſaid Pilgrimage.

7. Laſtly, when the Lord Edward ſhall be engaged in this Expedition, he ſhall be obedient to King Lewis as one of the Barons of his Realm, and perform his Service to him as his Sovereign Lord.

All which Articles the ſaid Lord Edward hath ſworn upon the Holy Evangeliſts to do and obſerve in good Faith: and for the true performance of which, the ſaid Lord Edward was to deliver at Paris one of his Sons as a Hoſtage, to be redelivered upon the return of his Father from the ſaid Pilgrimage; but if he died before that time, the Child was to be delivered to his Mother, or to the King of England if ſhe were then dead: and for the true performance of this the King of France obliges himſelf and his Heirs. Then the Charter thus concludes.

In witneſs whereof the ſaid Lord Edward has delivered to the King of France his Letters Patents, ſealed with his Seal.

Then alſo follows this Memorandum,

And further, Henry eldeſt Son to the King of Almaign, Gaſton Viſcount of Byern, Thomas de Clare, Brother to the Earl of Glouceſter, and the Lord Roger Leyburne, have at the Requeſt of the Lord Edward, ſworn upon the Holy Evangeliſts, that they will do their endeavour, and will truly counſel and adviſe him to obſerve and keep all the aforeſaid Covenants; and in Teſtimony of which the ſaid King Lewis hath alſo cauſed his Seal to be put to this Charter, dated Ann. Dom. 1269.

Anno Dom. MCCLXIX.

[5] Not long after Prince Edward's return, the King was reſolved to tranſlate the Reliques of Edward the Confeſſor (for which he had a great Veneration) into a richer Shrine, and therefore ſummon'd to meet at Weſtminſter on the 13*th* of October all the Prelates and Great Men of England, as alſo the richeſt Men of all the Burroughs and Cities in the Kingdom, that they might render this Solemnity the more illuſtrious; who being all aſſembled, beſides a vaſt confluence of ordinary People, the King himſelf and his Brother King Richard began the Ceremony, by taking up the Coffin wherein the ſaid Bones or Reliques were laid, upon their Shoulders; to which alſo the Princes Edward and Edmund, with divers other Earls and Great Barons put their helping hands: and being ſo carried, it was placed in a Shrine of Gold, adorn'd with precious Stones, which was then ſet in a high and eminent place with all due Reverence, where I ſuppoſe they continued till the 27*th* year of Henry the Eighth, when the greater Monaſteries being diſſolved, all ſuch Shrines and Reliques were removed as ſuperſtitious.

[5] T.W. p. 88.

K. Henry ſummons the Nobility, &c. to be preſent at the Tranſlation of St. Edward's Reliques into a richer Shrine.

[1] And our Author further adds, that all theſe things were perform'd in the Abbey Church of Weſtminſter, which the King had then newly rebuilt at his own expence, of ſuch a Structure as the like was not to be ſeen in Chriſtendom; and then alſo the Monks firſt conſecrated the Sacrament in it after this new building: when the Service was over, there was a great Feaſt in Weſtminſter-Hall, at which the King intended to have worn his Crown, but for ſome reaſons he alter'd his Reſolution. And it is here to be noted, that at this Feſtival the Archbiſhop of York (who in the Abſence of the Archbiſhop of Canterbury then beyond the Seas, perform'd all the ſacred Functions at this Solemnity) had his Croſs carried before him as Primate of England, which gave great Offence to moſt of the Biſhops, becauſe they had not ſeen the like before.

[1] Id. ib.

The Abbey of Weſtminſter, being newly rebuilt, is new Conſecrated.

But to return to matters of greater moment: As ſoon as this Solemnity was over, the Nobles of the Kingdom began to treat in Parliament concerning the weighty Affairs thereof, in which there was granted to the King, by the conſent of the major part of the great Men, a Twentieth part of the moveable Goods of all Perſons in the Kingdom.

A Parliament gives the King a 20*th* part of all moveables.

But the Annals of London are more expreſs in this matter, and ſay, that all the Freemen of the Kingdom of England, as well of the Towns, as of the Cities and Burroughs, gave the King a Twentieth part of all their moveable Goods, towards his expences in his intended Voyage to the Holy-Land; for it ſeems he had not yet declared that he would not go himſelf in Perſon.

A fuller Account of it from the Annals of London.

I cannot but here obſerve from our former [2] Author, that altho the Perſons aſſign'd by the King's Council for collecting this Tax of a Twentieth part, had been named for all the Counties of England, yet could not the Money be ſuddenly rais'd, ſo that the Aſſeſſment was delay'd till toward Lent, and the Collection of it till Midſummer following, which cauſed great murmuring and diſcontent among the People; becauſe altho a great deal of their Stock was now ſold off, or killed, and their Barns emptied, yet were they forced to pay the Tax, not only according to what they were then poſſeſſed of, but as their Stock was at Michaelmaſs before, by which means a much greater ſum of Money was raiſed than at firſt intended; but the beſt uſe made of it then, was, that a great part of it was reſerved to aſſiſt Prince Edward in his intended Expedition to the Holy-Land.

The E. of Glouceſter being diſcontented, refuſes to come to Parliament.

[3] About this time the Earl of Glouceſter following ill Advice, refus'd to appear, tho ſummon'd to the two laſt Parliaments, ſometimes pretending that he was afraid to be taken and put in Priſon, by the contrivance of Prince Edward, who it ſeems was very jealous of his Proceedings; ſometimes that he was afraid of the Incurſions of the Welſh, if he ſhould leave Wales, where he then reſided, and come up to London with his Attendants: but at laſt, after many Diſputes and angry Meſſages, leſt a Civil War might again break out, it was by the mediation of divers Prelates and Noblemen agreed between the aforeſaid Prince and Earl, that they would ſubmit all differences to the determination of Richard King of the Romans; which Agreement the King himſelf not only approved of, but both the Parties abovementioned engaged by their Charters and mutual Oaths to ſtand to it; but this Buſineſs did not take effect till the beginning of the next Year.

The Pr. and Earl agree to refer all their Differences to the K. of the Romans.

Anno Dom. MCCLXX.

When the King and Queen had kept their Chriſtmaſs (together with ſeveral of the Great Men of the Kingdom) at his Mannor of Eltham, he removed from thence to London, and on Hock-monday, that is, on the Monday after Eaſter (according to the [4] City Annals) all the Biſhops, Earls, Barons, Knights, and Freeholders of the whole Realm, aſſembled at Weſtminſter by the King's Writs of Summons, and there they treated of divers matters relating to the State of the Nation, but were chiefly taken up in reconciling the Differences between Prince Edward and the Earl of Glouceſter; for it ſeems, they were not ſatisfied in ſome Points of the Award or Sentence, that the King of the Romans was ready to make; and therefore the time for the perfecting of it was put off till eight days after Midſummer, and the Parliament was thereupon adjourned to that Time.

The Bps renew the Sentence of Excommunication againſt all Tranſgreſſors of the Great Charters.

[5] But in the mean while (viz. on the 13*th* of May) the Biſhops of Wincheſter, Worceſter, and Hereford, with divers others of their Order, came to St. Paul's Church, and there cauſed the Bull of Pope Honorius the Third to be publickly read, whereby he confirm'd the Charters of Liberties and Foreſts, which had been granted by King Henry at the beginning of his Reign; and at the ſame time alſo the Biſhops ſolemnly pronounced the Sentence of Excommunication againſt all infringers of thoſe Charters, as had been formerly publiſhed in Weſtminſter-Hall, A. D. 1253. But to return to Temporal matters.

The Award of the K. of the Romans at laſt publiſhed, with the Heads of it.

[1] Then eight days after Midſummer, almoſt all the Great Men met again at London, to try how they could beſt accommodate the aforeſaid Differences between Prince Edward and the Earl of Glouceſter; and at laſt, after many Conferences and Conſultations had with the ſaid Noblemen, King Richard finiſhed his Sentence or Award between the Parties, which was then openly read, and was to this effect.

1. That if the Lord Edward went beyond Sea for the Holy-Land in September following, the Earl of Glouceſter ſhould alſo go over the next March, if he were not hindred by ſickneſs, or ſome other reaſonable Cauſe, ſuch as ſhould be allowed by the ſaid King of the Romans. Anno Dom. MCCLXX.

2. And if the ſaid Earl ſhould aſſiſt the Lord Edward with any Men in this Expedition, then the King of England was to allow him the ſum of eight thouſand Marks, and ſhould alſo find him an able Ship for his Tranſportation; but if he did not aſſiſt the Prince with any Forces, the Earl was then only to receive three thouſand Marks, which was to be expended upon this Voyage, and on nothing elſe.

3. That whither the Earl went over beyond Sea or not, he ſhould not move or make any War or Diſturbance in England.

4. And for the true Obſervation of the Premiſes, the ſaid Earl was to ſubmit himſelf to the Juriſdiction of the Archbiſhops and Biſhops of England, to be by them excommunicated if he any ways tranſgreſſed the ſaid Articles, and ſhould alſo ſubmit all his Lands to an Interdict.

5. And for the farther performance of all theſe things, they were bound under the Penalty of twenty thouſand Marks, to be in the diſpoſition of the King of the Romans, how it ſhould be laid out.

6. And laſtly, for the better ſecurity of the Earl's ſincere intentions, he was preſently to deliver up two of his Caſtles in the Marches of Wales (called Tenbrig and Henly) to ſuch Perſons as the King of the Romans ſhould appoint for the ſafe keeping of them, till ſuch time as it ſhould be certainly known, that the Earl was arrived in the Mediterranean.

Theſe (our Authors tell us) were the chief Heads of this Award drawn up in the French Tongue, which are very long and intricate; and which the King himſelf wiſely obſerving, that he might take away all occaſion of Diſpute, he, by the conſent of all Parties took upon him to explain and moderate the ſaid Sentence in divers particulars. This Declaration was publiſhed at Reading on the eighteenth of July, and was ſo much to the Satisfaction of the Earl of Glouceſter, that he willingly ſubmitted to it: and he with his Dependants again attended at the King's Parliaments and * Treaties, together with the other Noblemen of the Kingdom, who all rejoiced that this troubleſome Diſpute was ſo happily brought to an end. * Tractatus.

But to look a little back to the beginning of this Summer, when the Peace had like to have been interrupted by a fooliſh Quarrel that fell out between two Noblemen, which might have proved of dangerous Conſequence, if it had not been ſtopped in time; and it happened thus:

[2] There had been (it ſeems) a long Suit depending between John Earl of Warren and Surrey, and Alan Lord Zouche, concerning a certain Mannor; which coming to a Trial before the King's Juſtices in Weſtminſter Hall, there happened to paſs very reproachful and unſeemly Language between the Earl and the ſaid Baron, which at laſt came to blows, inſomuch, that the Earl and his Followers being privately armed, ſet upon the Lord Zouche and his eldeſt Son [2] Id. ib. A Relation of the Quarrel between the E. of Surrey, and the Ld Zouche. The E. wounds the Ld Zouche and his Son.

Anuo Dom. MCCLXX. Son in open Court, and wounded them both, but the Father mortally, as it was then fear'd.

[3] Id. ib. [3] But as ſoon as the Earl had done this raſh and wicked Action, he with his Attendants being too ſtrong to be apprehended, preſently took Boats, and paſſing over the Water, fled to his Caſtle of Rygate in Surrey, where he fortified himſelf, and ſtood upon his Guard. The King, and Prince Edward his Son, being highly provoked at this Inſolence, and reſolving not to let it paſs unpuniſhed, ſent to the Earl and ſummon'd him to appear at Court, and abide the Law of the Kingdom: but the Earl fearing the Impriſonment of himſelf and his Adherents, raſhly refus'd to ſubmit; whereupon Prince Edward, with ſome Forces, was ſent down to bring him to Obedience; but as ſoon as the Prince arrived before the Caſtle, the Earl conſidered better of the bad Conſequences of this matter, and being perſuaded by the Earl of Glouceſter, and the Lord Henry, Son to the King of the Romans, yeilded himſelf Priſoner, and was by the Prince brought up to the Court the laſt of June, where he underwent the Judgment of the Law, and was fined five thouſand Pounds to the King, and two thouſand to the Lord Zouche and his Son, for the Wounds and Injuries they had received.

Flies to his Caſtle of Rygate.

But being about to be beſieged, ſurrenders himſelf.

[4] Id. ib. [4] And it was alſo further enjoyn'd the ſaid Earl, that he with fifty of his Followers, who had been all concern'd in this Fray, ſhould walk from the New Temple to Weſtminſter Hall on Foot, and ſhould there take an Oath before the King's Juſtices, that they had not acted what they did out of any Prepenſe Malice, but only out of ſudden Heat and Paſſion; and ſo this threatning Tempeſt was happily blown over.

[5] Id. ib. [5] But I muſt here obſerve, that our Author farther relates (and that very truly) that the Lord Zouche, who was pretty well in Years, fell into a Fever by reaſon of his Wounds, and died thereof in a few days following, to the great Grief of all his Friends. [1] And Sir William Dugdale, in his Baronage of England, (from an antient Inquiſition ſtill upon Record, and found upon the Death of this Lord) hath proved, that he indeed deceaſed this Year; tho he is himſelf miſtaken, when following the Authority of Matt. Weſtminſter, he makes this Fray to have happened in the Year 1268, whereas it appears by Wikes's Chronicle, and the Annals of Waverly, that it fell out this very Year, not long before Prince Edward's Voyage to the Holy-Land, which has (I ſuppoſe) led ſome of our Modern Hiſtorians into the like Miſtake; and Mr. Speed places it in 1269, and falſly ſuppoſes the Lord Zouche to have been chief Juſtitiary of England. But to leave this Digreſſion; theſe things being thus concluded, Prince Edward was preparing himſelf for his Voyage to the Holy-Land, which he now reſolved to undertake with all the ſpeed he could.

[1] Vol. I. p. 689.

[2] T. W. [2] In order to which, I muſt here give you an Account of what had already paſſed this ſpring in France, where not long after Eaſter King Lewis, together with his two Sons, Prince Philip and John, and a great multitude of the French Nobility, had begun their Journey for the Holy-Land; but before he departed, Prince Edward paſſed paſſed over into France, as well to take his leave of that King, as alſo to ſettle ſome Affairs that were ſtill to be concerted between them; and when he had diſpatched what he had to do, return'd immediately into England to ſubmit to the Award of his Uncle, the King of the Romans, and ſo this Affair reſted till the beginning of July, as you have already heard. Anno Dom. MCCLXX.

[3] About this time alſo Prince Edward reſolving to make himſelf Popular, and to take away all occaſion of Diſcontents at home, interceded with the King his Father to reſtore to the City of London their antient Privileges, and particularly the Power again to elect their own Mayor and Sheriffs in the ſame manner as they had done before the late Civil Wars; in conſideration whereof, the Farm which the City ſhould for the future pay the King, was the ſum of four hundred Pounds per Annum, out of the Fines and Iſſues of the City, whereas before they paid but three hundred Pounds per Annum for the ſame; and then the ſame Week the Citizens choſe John Adrien for their Mayor, and Philip Taylor, and Walter Potter for their Sheriffs, who on the eighteenth of July following, were preſented to the King, and ſworn before him. I mention this, becauſe that ſince their laſt Pardon they had not yet choſen thoſe Officers, but they had been ſolely nominated by the King, out of ſuch Citizens as he could beſt confide in. [3] Annal. London.

The King in a Parliament at Wincheſter delivers up the Croſs to the Prince, and gives him what remain'd of the late Tax.

And the ſame Annals further relate, that in a Parliament or Council held this Year at Wincheſter (not long before the Prince's departure for the Holy-Land) the King, with the Aſſent and in the preſence of the Biſhops and Great Men of England, with great ſolemnity took off the Croſs (which till then he wore) and deliver'd it to his Son Prince Edward, in token he was to undertake the Cruſado in his Father's ſtead. Which is alſo confirmed by the King's Writ or Declaration (ſtill upon * Record) wherein he ſets forth, that whereas it was not thought ſafe or expedient by the Prelates, Great Men, and * Community of the Kingdom, for himſelf and his Son to be both abſent from England at once; therefore to perform this Vow, he ſubſtitutes the Lord Edward his Son to undertake that Expedition, and thereby alſo beſtows upon him all that remain'd to be gather'd of the late Tax of the Twentieth part: This was dated at Wincheſter Aug. 4. A. R. 54. and it was to help to defray the charge of this Expedition. Rot. Pat. 54. H. 3. M. 7. Int.

But to give you ſome Account of the Prince's Actions before his Departure.

The Prince being ready to ſail, ſtops his Voyage on the death of Boniface ABp of Canterbury.

[4] It was now about the tenth of Auguſt, when he went from this Parliament at Wincheſter, down to Portſmouth, in order to begin his Voyage; but when the Forces he carried with him were ready to go on Board, and the Fleet only wanted his Order to ſail, he received the News that Boniface, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, was lately deceaſed in his own Country of Savoy, being a Perſon not fam'd for Learning, or any other extraordinary Quality, except his Charity to the Poor, and Nobility of Birth. [4] T. W. p. 92.

The Prince hereupon having a great deſire to make one Robert Burnel his Chaplain (and a great Favourite of his) Archbiſhop, immediately left the Fleet, and rode away to Canterbury, to ſee if he could prevail with the Monks to elect him; but they having newly before

before received from the King their Congè d' elire, had already Elected their Prior Archbiſhop, with an unanimous Conſent; whereupon the Prince finding himſelf fruſtrated in his Deſign, return'd back again to Portſmouth, and going on Board, paſſed over into his own Dominion of Gaſcoigny; for the Princeſs his Wife was gone over thither before him, in order to accompany him in this long and hazardous Expedition; having left their two Sons, John and Henry, to the care of King Richard their Uncle: for the King of France was ſo generous as to truſt to Prince Edward's Honour, without taking either of his Sons as a Hoſtage, for the performance of the Conditions.

And goes to Canterbury to get the Monks to elect his Chaplain ABp who had choſe another before.

The Prince and Princeſs paſs through France to Aigues Mortes, but find K. Lewis gone from thence before.

The Prince and Princeſs being ſafely arrived, quickly left Gaſcoigny, and took their Journey through France and the Borders of Spain, as far as Aigues Mortes, where he intended to take Shipping for the Holy-Land; but when he came thither, he found the King of France had ſome three Months before ſail'd for Tunis, his Brother Charles King of Sicily promiſing ſpeedily to follow him, who was the chief cauſe of King Lewis's making this unfortunate Voyage into Africa, and thereby diverting him from his principal Deſign, which was for the Holy-Land.

[5] Id. p. 93.

The K. of France goes over to Tunis, and on what Occaſion.

[5] But to give you the true ground and motive of this Expedition, it was, that the King of Tunis having for ſome time been Tributary to Frederick the late Emperor, as King of Sicily, therefore the preſent King Charles (tho of another Family) expected the ſame Tribute to be paid to him, as was before to the Emperor, which the King of Tunis refuſing, Charles was reſolved to make uſe of this lucky Opportunity of the French Fleet and Army to force him to it: ſo King Lewis and his Noblemen landing near the City of Tunis, they began vigorouſly to beſiege it; but when the Mooriſh King ſaw the danger he was in, he thought it his beſt way to offer the payment of the whole arrears of this Tribute; and this being accepted of by the two brother-Kings, they made a Truce with him for thirty Years, upon which he made them, and the great Lords their Attendants, divers rich and noble Preſents. This account of our Author, as alſo of Vignier in his Hiſtorical Bibliotheque, ſeems more probable than that of moſt of the French Hiſtorians, who relate, that their King with his Brother Charles, ſail'd to Tunis with this Army, as well becauſe it was of great Conſequence to their main Deſign to be maſter of thoſe Coaſts from whence the Sultan of Egypt received great Aſſiſtances, both in Men and Money, as alſo becauſe the King of Tunis had given great hopes of his turning Chriſtian, in caſe they would help him to force his Subjects to ſubmit to it. But certainly the Mooriſh King pretended this latter only to amuſe them; for I cannot ſee that the taking of this City could have been any Advantage to the Conqueſt of the Holy-Land, which lay ſo far remote from it; or if the King of Tunis had deſired their Company, why ſhould he refuſe them admittance when they came thither, as he certainly did? and therefore I rather adhere to Vignier, and to our Author, who agree in the Account of the reaſons of this Expedition as above related. But to return to our Hiſtory.

The King thereof proffers to pay them Tribute, which is accepted.

[1] Prince

Anno Dom. MCCLXX.

[1] Prince Edward having left the greateſt part of his Forces behind, to follow him with his Fleet, paſſed over the Mediterranean from Aigues Mortes to Tunis, where he arrived preſently after the concluſion of the Truce abovementioned; but being not at all pleaſed with this Undertaking, nor finding the King of France at that time ready, nor indeed (as he thought) deſign'd to ſail for the Holy-Land, he took his leave of him and repaſſed thoſe Seas, reſolving to winter at Trepani in Sicily: but the Prince had not been long gone, when the Chriſtian Army that lay encamped at Tunis were taken with malignant Fevers, and bloody Fluxes, thro the extreme heat of the Country, as alſo for want of Water and freſh Proviſions; ſo that beſides common Soldiers, a great many of the higheſt Rank died there; with both which Diſtempers King Lewis himſelf being alſo ſeized, deceaſed on the five and twentieth of Auguſt in the fifty fifth Year of his Age, and forty fourth of his Reign, with all the marks of Devotion and entire Reſignation of himſelf to God; being a Prince of that ſignal and extraordinary Piety and Charity, that he was ſome Years after canonized for a Saint. His Son Philip the Third, ſirnamed the Hardy, a young Prince of great Courage, and who attended his Father in this Expedition, ſucceeded him in the Throne, and preſently return'd home, carrying back his Father's Body to be buried at St. Dennis.

[2] But whilſt Prince Edward paſſed the Winter in Sicily, he conſulted with his Couſin the Lord Henry, and the other Great Men that accompanied him, how he might beſt ſecure the Peace of Gaſcoigny during his Abſence, who all adviſed him to ſend back Henry into that Province, to command and defend it for him; whereupon in compliance with the Prince's Deſires, he paſſed over into Italy in order to get into Gaſcoigny, and coming as far as the City of Viterbo in Italy, he there met the new King of France, and his Uncle the King of Sicily, in their return home; where ſtaying with them ſome time to promote the Election of a new Pope (which the Cardinals there Aſſembled were then very buſy about) as this Prince was one Morning betimes hearing Maſs at the Church of St. Laurence, his two Couſin Germans Simon and Guido de Montfort (who were then baniſh'd England) entring the Church with divers armed Attendants, taking this Advantage, broke in, and falling upon him murdered him before the High-Altar, in revenge (as they pretended) for the deaths of their Father and Brother, who had been ſlain at the Battel of Eveſham: an Action both cowardly and cruel; for neither this Prince nor his Father the King of the Romans were ſo much as preſent at that Battel, being then both Priſoners, nor (if they had) could they have been guilty of their deaths, unleſs they had killed them with their own Hands. [3] The Body of the murdered Prince was the next Year after brought over into England, and buried at the Monaſtery of Hayles in Glouceſterſhire, which his Father King Richard had ſome Years before founded for the Monks of the Cyſtercian Order.

But to return to Prince Edward: he ſpent all the reſt of this Winter in Sicily, exerciſing his Men, and preparing his Fleet in order to ſail for the Holy-Land the Spring following; on which Expedition he was ſo reſolutely bent, that upon the caſting away great part part of the [4] Fleet belonging to the King of France and Sicily by a violent Storm, as it lay at Anchor in a Haven of that Iſle, and thoſe about the Prince endeavour'd to diſcourage him by this ill Succeſs, from undertaking his intended Voyage, he ſmote his Breaſt, and ſwore, by the Blood of God, that tho they all deſerted him, yet himſelf would go to Acon, if he were not attended with any more than Fowen his Groom.

But before I conclude this Year, I ſhall give you an Account of ſome Affairs of leſs moment, which ſince they could not be inſerted in due order of Time, becauſe it was not expreſs'd in my Author, are therefore reſerved for this Place: the moſt remarkable of which is, [5] that a War was now like to break out between England and Flanders, by reaſon that the Counteſs of that Province had ſeized the Goods of all the Engliſh Merchants, as alſo of all others the King's Subjects of Ireland, Wales, and Gaſcoigny, trading in that Country, to the value of forty thouſand Marks, in ſatisfaction of certain annual Penſions and Payments, which ſhe alledged were due to her from the King of England, and he in requital did the ſame by her Merchants, who were alſo all ſeized, and put in Priſon, and all Commerce and Trade of Wools and other Commodities, were forbidden with thoſe of Flanders; and becauſe the Merchants of other Nations, that had ſtill Liberty to carry out Wool, were found to ſell it in Flanders, therefore all Exportation of Wool was forbid by the King's Writ, or Proclamation, not only into Flanders, but any other Parts beyond the Sea, until the Feaſt of St. John Baptiſt next enſuing. I mention this, to ſhew that our Kings could antiently, by their bare Proclamation, hinder the Exportation of what Commodities they thought fit.

[5] Annal. Lond. A War like to break out between England and Flanders, and on what Occaſion.

Anno Dom. MCCLXXI.

This Year the King kept his Chriſtmaſs with his Queen, and many of the Nobility at Weſtminſter, but in the end of February following [1] he was ſeized with ſo great a fit of Sickneſs, that deſpairing of his Recovery, he cauſed himſelf to be prayed for in moſt Churches; and the Monks of Weſtminſter went barefooted in a Grand Proceſſion from their own Church, to that of the Knight's-Templars in Fleetſtreet, and there ſung a ſolemn Maſs for his Recovery, which ſoon after followed; but whither for that reaſon I will not determine.

[1] M. W. The King falls deſperately ſick, but recovers.

But I ſhall here give you the Contents of two Records in the Tower, ſince they ſerve to let us know ſome things relating to the Hiſtory of this Time, which are not to be found elſewhere. The * firſt is a Latin Letter of the King's to Prince Edward, written preſently after his Recovery, commanding his Son's return into England with all convenient ſpeed, for divers Reaſons therein mention'd; it is dated the ſixth day of February, this Year. The other is French, in nature of † a Deed or Obligation; wherein it is firſt recited, that the King having in his late Sickneſs vowed, that if he recovered he would go in Perſon to the Holy-Land, had now taken up a great ſum of Money, of his Brother K. Richard; and therefore for the ſecurity of the ſaid Money, he hereby engaged all the Revenues of his Kingdom (except ſome few particulars there expreſſed) till the ſaid Money be paid, but how much it was is not ſaid; nor do I believe it was ever received at all, K. Henry dying this Year, as you will find anon.

anon. Note, This laſt Record bears date the ſixth of April, after the former, and are both printed in Pryn's * ſecond Volume of Papal Uſurpations. But it is time to ſay ſomewhat of Prince Edward, whom we left in Sicily. Anno Dom. MCCLXXI. * Page 1056, 1057.

[2] This Year early in the Spring, that Prince putting his ſmall Army on board, ſet ſail from Trepani for the Holy-Land, and taking Cyprus in his way, was kindly received by the King and great Men of that Iſland; and having there refreſhed himſelf a while, he again ſet ſail for the City of Acon, where he came very ſeaſonably, it being then like to be taken by the Sultan of Babylon, had not this Prince's arrival with freſh Forces prevented him: but when he had ſtayed there about a Month to refreſh himſelf, as well as his wearied Souldiers, he then marching out at the head of ſeven thouſand Chriſtians, took the City of Nazareth; but when in their return to Acon the Enemies perſued them, watching for ſome Advantage, they ſuddenly turned, and making head, vigorouſly repulſed them, killing many of the Saracens. Then about Midſummer, Prince Edward having heard that they had got together in great numbers at a place called Cakcow, being about fifteen Miles diſtant from Acon, he marching out one morning early before break of day, ſurprized the Saracens, and killing about a thouſand of them, put the reſt to flight, taking great ſtore of rich Booty from them; and then going as far as the Caſtle of Pilgrims near the Sea, they lodged there that Night, and return'd to Acon next day: the Prince alſo with the Chriſtians then in the Town, made not long after a third Expedition, as far as a place called St. George's, where they kill'd ſome Saracens, and finding none able to reſiſt them, they return'd home in ſafety. [2] W. H. p. 590. An Account of Pr. Edward's Actions after he arrived at the Holy-Land.

[3] Things had hitherto proceeded proſperouſly, for Prince Edward had now gain'd ſo great a Reputation, that the chief Commanders of the Saracens began to be in great fear of his Succeſs, and therefore they reſolved, if they could, to diſpatch him; for which end the Admiral or Governor of Joppa ſent privately to Prince Edward, as if he would become a Chriſtian, but the Meſſenger that brought the Letters (tho it was unknown to the Prince) was one of thoſe Aſſaſſins who were bred up on purpoſe that they ſhould diſpatch whatſoever Chriſtian Prince, or great Man, was judged to be an inveterate Enemy to their Superſtition, upon a belief that they merited Paradiſe for ſo doing; ſo this Fellow going two or three times with Letters and Meſſages from his Maſter to Prince Edward, his Servants began to have the leſs Suſpicion of him: however before they admitted him, they ſearched his Girdle, and other places for Weapons, as the Cuſtom then was; but it ſeems it was not done ſo throughly as it ought; for one time having delivered his Letters to the Prince, who was then bareheaded, ſitting near a Window, with only a looſe Coat about him becauſe it was very hot, he ſeemed well ſatisfied in the Account this Meſſenger gave him, that the Admiral his Maſter intended to be with him in a few days, in order to fulfil his Promiſe: but when the Prince called this Fellow again to him, to ask him ſome further queſtion, he, bowing towards the Prince, as if it had been in way of Reſpect, pulled out a poiſon'd Dagger on the ſudden from under his Girdle, and was juſt going [3] Id. p. 591. going to ſtab the Prince into the Belly; but he ſeeing the blow coming, warded it off with his Arm, and there received a dangerous Wound; yet as the Villain was about to redouble the ſtroke, the Prince had no other way to ſave himſelf, but by lifting up his Foot, and ſtriking him ſuch a blow on the Breaſt, that he beat him down backward; [4] then the Prince leaping up, ran in to him, and wreſted the Dagger out of his Hand with that Violence, that he gave himſelf a ſlight hurt in the Forehead, but however he quickly diſpatched him: whereupon his Servants (who it ſeems were not then preſent) came running in, and one of them (his Muſician) being in a great Rage and Fright, took up a Stool and ſtruck the dead Man's head with that force, that he beat out his Brains, for which the Prince ſeverely reproved him, as he had good reaſon.

[5] Id. ib.

The Prince is in great danger from the Wound.

[5] So ſoon as this ſad News was diſperſed into the Palace and Town, all Places were filled with Outcries and Lamentations; but notwithſtanding all the Remedies the Chirurgeons could apply, the Wound within a few days began to gangreen, inſomuch that all People deſpair'd of his Life, except one Engliſh Chirurgeon who would undertake to cure him, provided he might be left entirely to his Management, and that the Princeſs his Lady (who was then in the Room) might be removed, and not permitted to come to him till he was paſt Danger; which being done (tho not without great Grief and Reluctancy on her part) the Chirurgeon preſently began to cut off the gangreen'd Fleſh to the quick, which put the Prince to great Torment, but then by the application of proper Remedies, the wound was ſo well heal'd in fifteen days time, that he was able to mount on Horſeback. Thus was this magnanimous Prince by his own Courage, aſſiſted through God's particular Providence, twice delivered when he was in the utmoſt danger of his Life.

But is recover'd by the skill of an Engliſh Chirurgeon.

The Story of the Princeſs Eleanor, her ſucking the Venom out of her Husband's Wound, a meer Romance.

* In Middleſex.

But I cannot leave this Subject without taking notice, that the vulgar Story of the Princeſs Eleanor her ſucking the Venom out of her Husband's Wound, and to which he owed his Recovery, is a meer Romance; this action of hers not being mention'd by any antient Author of, or near that time: the firſt in whom I can find it, being Mr. Camden in his * Britannia, from whom it is alſo tranſcribed by Mr. Speed in his Chronicle, and both of them cite Rodericus Toletanus, or Roderick Archbiſhop of Toledo for it: but tho I have diligently ſearched that Author's Hiſtory of Spain, yet I cannot find it any where there, nor I believe any body elſe; for at the end of his Work he tells the Reader, that he finiſh'd it Ann. Dom. 1243. Æra Hiſpan. 1281. which was above ten Years before Prince Edward married the Princeſs Eleanor of Caſtile, and near twenty Years before this accident of the Aſſaſſin's wounding that Prince. But to return to our Hiſtory.

[1] Id. ib.

The Sultan of Babylon congratulates the Prince's Recovery, and proteſts his Innocency of the late Attempt upon his Perſon.

[1] When the Sultan of Babylon heard what had happened to Prince Edward, he could ſcarce believe he had been alive; but ſo ſoon as he was aſſured of it, he ſent Ambaſſadors to him, to congratulate his Recovery, and they ſolemnly proteſted in their Maſter's Name, that this Wickedneſs had never been done by his procurement or privity; with which the Prince ſeeming ſatisfied, he honourably diſmiſſed them. But what he did further, our Authors do not tell us, only it is certain, that he ſtaid in Paleſtine till the Summer following, and that during his abode there, [2] the Princeſs Eleanor was brought to bed of a Daughter, who from the Place of her Birth, was named Joan de Acres, or Acon (as we call it in Engliſh) and was afterwards married to Gilbert Earl of Glouceſter.

* not

Anno Dom. MCCLXXI.

The Princeſs Eleanor is brought to Bed of a Daughter.

But it is now time to look back into England.

And here I can find nothing conſiderable happened after Prince Edward's departure, [3] except the death of John his eldeſt Son, a Child of great Beauty, and Wit, for his Age: he died about the beginning of Auguſt, and was buried in the Abbey Church of Weſtminſter, where his Tomb is ſtill to be ſeen.

[3] T. W. p. 96.

John eldeſt Son to P. Edward, dies.

As for Eccleſiaſtical Affairs, I can meet with nothing remarkable to have happened this Year, but that [4] the Cardinals after many delays, not being able to agree upon any one of their own Body, whom they could think fit to make Pope, at laſt agreed to chooſe Theobald Arch-deacon of Liege, who was then with Prince Edward to perform his Pilgrimage in the Holy-Land. So ſoon as this Prelate heard of his Advancement, he took his leave of the Prince, and went ſtraight for Italy, to receive his Conſecration, by the name of Pope Gregory the Xth.

[4] Id. ib.

Theobald Arch-deacon of Liege, choſen Pope, tho then in the Holy-Land.

Anno Dom. MCCLXXII.

Where King Henry kept his Chriſtmaſs this Year is uncertain; the Continuator of Matt. Paris makes it to have been at Weſtminſter, but I believe he is as much miſtaken in this, as in the Year it ſelf, which he falſly makes to be 1273. and the Annals of Waverley (whoſe Authority I prefer) ſay expreſly, that the King kept his Chriſtmaſs in the Caſtle of Wincheſter, and ſtayed there till after Twelfe-tide, by reaſon of ſome Indiſpoſition he then laboured under; but that preſently after the Holy-days he quitted that Place, and return'd to Weſtminſter, becauſe the Juſtices Itinerant (to wit) Maſter Roger de Seiton and his Aſſociates, were to ſit at Wincheſter; for the King being aged and infirm, had no mind to ſtay there during ſo great a concourſe as muſt needs come to ſuch a vaſt Aſſembly.

The King leaves Wincheſter, and comes to London.

I can find nothing worth relating to have happened in England, during this Spring and the following Summer, except [5] the death of Richard King of the Romans, who had been ſometime before Chriſtmaſs ſeized with the Dead-palſy, ſo that he had neither the uſe of his Tongue, nor other Members; and having languiſhed all Winter, he departed this Life at his Caſtle of Berkhamſted on the ſecond of April: his Body was buried at the Abbey of Hayles, but his Heart at the Priory of Rewly, which he had founded in the Subburbs of Oxford for the Ciſtercian Monks. He was a Prince of ſufficient Parts and Courage (tho in neither extraordinary, yet) in both which he excell'd the King his Brother, as he did alſo in the management of his Revenues, ſo that he was accounted one of the richeſt Princes of Europe.

[5] Id. p. 97.

The death of Richard King of the Romans, with his Character.

This enabled him to be very magnificent in his Buildings and Religious Foundations, beſtowing a great deal of Money upon Wallingford-Caſtle and other Places, but much more upon his two Monaſteries abovemention'd.

[1] About Michaelmaſs after his deceaſe, Edmund Earl of Cornwal, his ſecond Son, being newly return'd from the Holy-Land, (after the murder murder of his elder Brother Henry) married Margaret the Sister of Gilbert de Clare Earl of Glouceſter: the Wedding was kept at Wallingford-Caſtle with great Pomp and Solemnity, and he ſucceeded his Father in his Title of Earl of Cornwal, as alſo in his great Eſtate.

It is now fit we give you ſome Account of what Pr. Edward (whom we left laſt Year in the Holy-Land) performed there ever ſince that time; for he perceiving that he was like to expect no Aſſiſtance from France, by reaſon of the death of King Lewis, and the Succeſſion of his Son King Philip, whoſe Affairs were as yet unſettled, nor that King Henry was able to ſend him any further Aid, either of Men or Money, having already rais'd all he could to equip him out; as alſo that the Forces he carried over with him (being at firſt not very many) were now reduced but to a few; therefore all theſe things conſidered, [2] he thought it neceſſary to treat with the Sultan of Babylon concerning a Truce, who (being very glad to be rid of him out of thoſe Parts) readily conſented to it, and accordingly by Meſſengers that paſſed between them a Truce was concluded on for ten Years, ten Weeks, and ten Days, and both Parties in the mean while were quietly to poſſeſs all thoſe Towns and Places which they then held.

[2] W. H. p. 593.

Pr. Edward concludes a Truce with the Sultan of Babylon for ten Years, &c.

[3] Id. ib.

[3] This Truce being finiſhed, the Prince after above a Year's ſtay at Acon, took Shipping about the middle of Auguſt, to paſs over into Europe; and landing at Trepani in Sicily toward the end of September, went from thence to Meſſina, and ſo paſſed through the Kingdom of Naples to Rome, and ſo to Viterbo, where he was honourably received by the new Pope Gregory, who had been lately his fellow Pilgrim, and of whom he obtain'd a ſentence of Excommunication, and Baniſhment from the Territories of the Church, againſt Count Aldobrandino, Simon Montfort, and all others the murderers of the Lord Henry de Montfort.

The Prince takes Shipping, and lands in Sicily, and paſſes through Italy as far as Viterbo, to the Pope.

But whilſt Prince Edward was in Italy, he received the News of the Death of the King his Father, and thereupon took upon him the Title of King of England: however I ſhall leave him there for the preſent, and defer ſaying any thing more of his Actions in his return home through France till I come to his Reign, which I reſerve (if God grant me Life) for the next Volume.

It is now time for us to look back into England, where I find very little worth noting to have fallen out during this Prince's Abſence, more than what hath been already related; only that ſome unquiet Spirits, who love to fiſh in troubled Waters, deſiring to enrich themſelves with the ſpoil of other Men's Eſtates, thought the only way to obtain them, was by making freſh Diſturbances.

[4] M. W.

A ſmall Inſurrection in England.

[4] Of theſe ſort of People, there were to the number of about three hundred Horſe and Foot, beſides a great deal of unarmed Rabble, got together in the North parts; but Earl Edmund the King's ſecond Son, and Roger de Mortimer, ſoon diſperſed them, and forced the reſt to return to their own Homes, having kill'd a great many, and taken more of them Priſoners, ſo that they durſt not attempt any thing of the like kind for the future.

[5] R. W.

But in the Month of Auguſt, there aroſe a greater Diſturbance, [5] by reaſon of a Quarrel between the Citizens and the Monks of Norwich,

Norwich, which grew to ſuch a height, that the Towns-men ſet fire to the Cathedral Church, and that, together with the adjoining Monaſtery and Buildings, were all conſumed to the ground. Anno Dom. MCCLXXII.

The Townſmen of Norwich burn the Cathedral Church, and adjoining Monaſtery, &c.

But I ſhall give you a more particular Account of theſe Barbarities from ſome Authors, that are either in Manuſcript or but lately printed, than what is ſet down by Matt. Paris's Continuator; and of theſe [1] Bartholomew de Cotton, a Monk of the Priory of Norwich, relates, that in the beginning of this fray, the Citizens of that Place beſieged the Monaſtery, and when they could not enter it, they ſet fire to the Gates, which not only burnt the Gate-houſe, but a Pariſh Church adjoining to it; then ſome of the Seditious at the ſame time ſhot Arrows with Fire on them, from the Tower of St. George, into the great Bell-Tower beyond the Choir, by which means the whole Church was burnt (except the ſmall Chappel of St. Mary) as alſo all the Rooms and Lodgings belonging to the Prior and Monks: in the mean while the Rabble entring the Cloſe, plundered and carried away all the ſacred Veſſels of the Altar, and other Ornaments, that the Fire had not yet deſtroyed; and not content with this, they kill'd and wounded ſeveral Deacons, and Clerks belonging to the Monaſtery within the Cloſe it ſelf, and drove away all the Monks, and continued their Malice in killing and plundering for almoſt three days together.

A larger Account of this from other Authors.

[1] Annot. Eccleſia Norwic. in Anglia Sacra, Vol. I. p. 399.

But when theſe things were told the King, [2] he was extremely grieved, and reſolving to ſee ſpeedy Juſtice executed on the Malefactors, he ſummon'd all the Biſhops and Great Men of England to meet him at St. Edmundsbury on the firſt of September, to adviſe with them, how to proceed againſt them; whereupon the King being attended by the Earl of Glouceſter, and other Noblemen, went down thither, and there held a kind of great Council or Parliament: after good deliberation he was adviſed to go to Norwich in Perſon, and revenge this wickedneſs.

[2] Id. ib.

The King ſummons a Grand Jury or Inqueſt, out of four adjacent Counties.

But in order to this, before he went from thence, he iſſued out his Precept or Writ to William Gifford, Sheriff of Norfolk and Suffolk, dated September the ſixth at St. Edmundsbury, to ſummon all the Knights and Freeholders of both thoſe Counties, that held twenty Pounds per Annum and above, to appear before him at Norwich on the fifteenth of the ſame Month, to do as they ſhould be directed by him, with the Advice of his Council. The ſame Writ was likewiſe iſſued to the Sheriff of Cambridg and Huntington-ſhire, to ſummon twenty four Knights and Freeholders, that had twenty Pounds per Annum and above, to be alſo at Norwich the ſame day, as appears upon [3] Record.

[3] Rot. Pat. 56. H. 3. M. 4. intus.

But of theſe Knights and Freeholders (being eight and forty in all) returned from theſe four Counties, were choſen ſeveral Grand Inqueſts, or Juries, who were to enquire upon Oath into this Offence, and who were concerned in it, either in the City of Norwich, or elſewhere; and by theſe a great many being found Guilty before the King's Juſtices, they were condemned to be drawn at Horſe's Tails to the Gallows, and there to be hanged, and their Bodies to be burnt, which was executed accordingly.

But

Anno Dom. MCCLXXII.

But the Monk above cited, finds fault with the Injuſtice of theſe Proceedings.

But the abovecited Monk here finds great fault with the Injuſtice of theſe Proceedings; and that the richer ſort of Citizens, who had alſo (tho privately) engaged in, and promoted this Riot, corrupted with Bribes, not only the King's Juſtices, and his Council, but the Grand Inqueſt of Knights and Freeholders of the Counties already mention'd, who tho upon their Oaths, yet falſly found the Fire that burnt the Church to have firſt begun in the Bell-Tower belonging to it, ſo that all farther Proſecution againſt the Townſmen ceaſed; and divers things were alſo laid to the Charge of William de Burnham the then Prior, inſomuch that he was committed to the Biſhop's Priſon, and all the Lands belonging to the Priory were for ſome time ſeized into the King's hands, as likewiſe the Liberties that had been granted to the City of Norwich; ſo that the Prior not long after reſigned, and a new one was choſen in his ſtead. But the Biſhop of Norwich (having before, in a Synod of all the Clergy of his Dioceſs, excommunicated all Perſons concerned in this Sacrilege) kept the City of Norwich by times under an Interdict, for near three Years enſuing, till the Citizens could obtain their Abſolution from Rome, and compound for their Offence with King Edward, which they did for two thouſand Marks, having been condemned to pay three thouſand in his Father's Reign, had he not died before it could be levied. But of this I ſhall ſay more in the next Volume, if I have opportunity to finiſh it.

An Account of this Action from the Annals of London.

But ſtill it appears from what this Author has already ſaid, that the Monks themſelves were the chief Cauſe of the burning their Church and Monaſtery; for it is not at all probable, that (as he relates) the Citizens ſhould have ſo great a Purſe, and ſo conſiderable an Intereſt, as to bribe the Judges, the King's Council, and all theſe Grand Inqueſts, conſiſting of the moſt conſiderable Men of the four Counties abovenamed. Yet after all, I ſhall from the Annals of London, give you a truer Account of this Action, than is to be found in any of our Monkiſh Authors, who all take part with thoſe of their own Profeſſion, whereas this Writer being a Layman is more diſintereſſed, and leſs partial in his Relation of it; and informs us, that a Quarrel ariſing between the Citizens and the Monks of Norwich, about certain Privileges and Juriſdictions which the latter claimed, and the former would not agree to, the Monks in revenge ſent their Servants into the City to beat and outrage the Citizens, who being thereby provoked, and finding they could have no redreſs upon their Complaints, fell upon the Servants of the Priory where ever they met them in the City, and beating them ſoundly, the Prior thereupon ſent for a great many Seamen from Yarmouth, and made a kind of Gariſon in the Priory; and from thence with their Aſſiſtance again aſſaulted the Townſmen, who upon this joining together, repulſed the Seamen, and beſieged the Monaſtery; and in order to take it, ſet fire to the great Gates thereof, which burnt the Gate-houſe, and from thence the Church was at firſt ſuppoſed to have been ſet on Fire; but it was afterwards diſcover'd that a Prieſt belonging to it, having hired certain Smiths to forge Arrow-heads in the Bell-Tower, theſe when they ſaw the Gate-houſe on Fire, ran down to quench it, leaving their own fire of Coals burning

ing careleſly behind them, the ſparks whereof being blown about by the Wind into ſome combuſtible matter, ſet on fire firſt the Tower, and then the adjoining Church and Monaſtery; and it was found by the Inqueſt of eleven Knights of the County of Norfolk, that the Church was burnt by the means of that wicked Prieſt, who had brought up thoſe Workmen into the Bell-Tower, and which agrees with Bartholomew de Cotton's Relation. Anno Dom. MCCLXXII.

So ſoon as the [4] King had ſeen Juſtice done on theſe Offenders, and ſettled all things at Norwich, as well as the ſhortneſs of time would permit, he reſolved to return to London two days before Michaelmaſs; but ſtaying in his way thither, to repoſe himſelf a while at the Abbey of St. Edmundsbury, he was there ſeized with a languiſhing Diſtemper, which never left him ſo long as he lived. However he got from thence to Weſtminſter by eaſy Journies; but his Sickneſs ſtill daily increaſed, inſomuch that the Biſhops, Earls, and Barons, attended on him to pay him their laſt dutiful Reſpects. When he had performed all thoſe religious Offices that were then thought neceſſary for a dying Man, and given Orders that his Debts ſhould be firſt paid, and that whatſoever remain'd, ſhould be given to the relief of the Indigent; he departed this Life on the twentieth of November, after he had reigned fifty ſix Years, and twenty Days. His Body being arrayed in Royal Robes, with the Crown on his Head, was two days after carried with great mournful Pomp, to be buried in the Abbey Church of Weſtminſter, the chief Noblemen of the Kingdom bearing it to the Grave, where he was laid before the High Altar, near the Shrine of K. Edward the Confeſſor, and * where his Tomb with his Statue in Braſs remains to this day. [4] R. W. The King's Death. * Note, The Altar being ſince remov'd, the Tomb ſtands now behind it.

To give you a Character of this Prince's Perſon is not very difficult, ſince we find him deſcribed [5] to have been of a middle Stature, of a Body ſtrong and well ſet, having one of his Eye-lids hanging down, and almoſt hiding the pupil of his Eye: but I wiſh it were no leſs hard to make as true a Character of his Mind and Diſpoſition, which was ſo variable and uncertain, that we can't tell where to find a juſt Account of him; only that he was naturally wilful and very paſſionate, eaſily provoked to anger, and as eaſily appeaſed: he was alſo very fickle and unconſtant in his Love as well as Hatred, for he never had ſo great a Favorite whom he threw not into diſgrace at ſome time or other, nor ſo great an Enemy whom he received not again into Favour; as may appear from the Example of Hugh de Burgh, who was for a while his greateſt Confident, but being afterwards diſgraced, was proſecuted with the higheſt Rigour, and yet received into competent Favour again, as were alſo many other great Officers and Miniſters, who were diſgraced during his Reign. [5] Id. ib. K. Henry's Character.

The truth is, this Prince was of himſelf good-natured and merciful, ſo that if he did any thing too rigorouſly, it is to be imputed to the chief Miniſters of State that had the Aſcendant over him; for he was ſcarce ever Sui Juris, being always under the Government of one or other of the great ones moſt part of his Life: and indeed it might be juſtly ſaid of him, that he was a much better Man than he was a King; for tho he oppreſs'd his Subjects with many great and unneceſſary Taxes, and often broke his Coronation-Oath, and violated the Great Charter,

Anno Dom. MCCLXXII.

Charter, which himſelf had ſo ſolemnly ſworn (and that more than once) to obſerve; yet he was nevertheleſs very charitable to the Poor, and extreamly Devout, commonly hearing three Maſſes every day: and once when Lewis the King of France, and this Prince converſed together, and the former prefer'd Sermons before Maſſes, King Henry wittily enough defended his own practice, ſaying, That he had rather ſee his Friend often, than hear often from him; which was well ſaid according to his Principles. As for his Courage it was not very great, being never noted for any perſonal Valour in the Field; and indeed he had no great encouragement to it, for as his Temper was not martial, ſo it may be obſerved, that where ever he was in Perſon, his ſide commonly had the worſt on't. However it happened very well for him, when the Prince his Son overcame Simon Montfort; for he (tho againſt his Will) appeared chief Commander of the Army. In ſhort, his greateſt Happineſs was in his admirable Son, by whom all Civil Troubles being at length compos'd, he paſt the four laſt Years of his Reign in peace, and alſo left a Prince behind to ſucceed him, who by his Prudence and Valour raiſed the whole Engliſh Monarchy to great part of its antient Glory.

But his moſt ſhining Virtue, and that which made him the more eminently conſpicuous (as being at that time rare in Princes) was his Continence; for there is nothing mentioned either of any baſe Children he had, or of any Concubine he kept; which is more than can be ſaid of any of his Predeceſſors of the Norman Race, except King William the Firſt.

[1] M. W.

The Eccleſiaſtical Affairs of this Year.

I ſhall conclude this King's Reign with ſome few [1] Eccleſiaſtical matters that happened this Year. When (tho the exact time is not mentioned) Raymond the Pope's Clerk was by him ſent into England, with Authority to compel all Eccleſiaſtical Perſons to pay the whole Arrears of the Tenths of all their Temporal, as well as Spiritual Livings into his hands; ſo ſoon as he had received them, he beſtowed great part of them for the uſe of Pr. Edward, and E. Edmund his Brother, in conſideration of their Expences in the Holy-Land.

[2] W. R.

Alſo the new Pope [2] now vacated the Election of Adam Chelindon, the Prior of Canterbury, whom the Monks had choſen for their Archbiſhop, (the Prior himſelf reſigning what he ſaw he could not enjoy) and his Holineſs beſtowed the Archbiſhoprick upon Robert Kilwardeby, who was then Provincial of the Friers Predicants, and had, before he entered into that Order, taught Philoſophy in the Univerſity of Paris; and after his coming into it was in great reputation for his deep skill in School Divinity, as well as in the liberal Sciences: and the Pope had ſo great a Value and Reſpect for him, that he gave him leave to be conſecrated by what Biſhop he himſelf ſhould pleaſe to appoint.

The Wife and Iſſue of King Henry the Third.

I ſhall conclude this King's Reign with a ſhort Account of his Wife and Children; he married Eleanor, ſecond Daughter to Raymond Earl of Provence, who lived with him Thirty ſeven Years; was his Widow Nineteen; died a Nun at Ambresbury, and was buried ried in that Monaſtery, being then near fourſcore Years old. She was a Lady of a high Spirit, but recompenced the ſmallneſs of her Fortune by the greatneſs of her Prudence, and the many fine Children ſhe brought forth; and it is very remarkable, that tho her Father was but a mean Prince, yet all his Daughters were married to Real or Titular Kings.

By this Princeſs King Henry had ſix Sons, and three Daughters; the four youngeſt of his Sons died in their Infancy, and were buried three of them at Weſtminſter, and the fourth in the new Temple-Church near Fleetſtreet; and of whom nothing more is related.

His eldeſt Son [3] Edward, ſirnamed Long-ſhanks, (from his long Legs) who ſucceeded him in the Kingdom, was born at Weſtminſter upon the ſixteenth of June, 1239. [3] M. P. p. 488.

Edmund, his ſecond Son, [4] was born Jan. the ſixteenth, Anno Dom. 1245. in the thirteenth Year of his Father's Reign: he was Earl of Lancaſter, Leiceſter, and Derby; Lord of Monmouth, and High-Steward of England: he was alſo inveſted by the Pope with the Kingdom of Sicily. And Speed in his Chronicle has given us a Seal, having this Prince's Effigies with that Title round it; but being never poſſeſſed of that Kingdom, he ſoon left off the empty Title of King. [4] Id. p. 654.

Margaret, [5] his eldeſt Daughter, was married to Alexander the Third, King of Scots, being then a Child of about nine Years old; by whom, tho ſhe had ſeveral Children, yet the Sons dying before him, (and his Daughter Margaret, Wife to Erik King of Norway, having no more than one Daughter of her own name, who died in Childhood) that Line of the Kings of Scotland thereby fail'd. [5] Rot. Pat. 36. H. 3. M. 14.

[1] Beatrix, King Henry's ſecond Daughter, was born at Bourdeaux in Gaſcoigny on the five and twentieth of June, Anno Dom. 1242. and was married to John de Dreux, Duke of Bretaigny in France, and Earl of Richmond in England. [1] M. P. p. 514.

Katherine [2] his third Daughter, was born at London on St. Katherine's day, being the 25*th* of November, Anno Dom. 1253. and died at five years of Age. [2] Id. p. 879.

Taxes in this King's Reign.

Before I treat of the Laws, I ſhall give you an Account of the Taxes which were either given him by Parliament, or which he raiſed under colour of his Prerogative.

The Parliament called at Northampton [3] on the Octaves of Holy-Trinity, 1224, granted the King two Shillings of every Plough-Land: and the King then granted to the Great Men a Scutage of two Marks Sterling of every Knight's Fee. [3] M. P. p. 322. 9 H. 3.

The Parliament called at [4] Weſtminſter at Chriſtmaſs, 1224. granted him a Fifteenth of all Moveables, as well of the Clergy as Laiety of the whole Kingdom, for the Grant or Confirmation of Magna Charta; one half of this Fifteenth was collected ſoon after Eaſter, and the other half was to be gathered at Michaelmaſs following. [4] Id. p. 323. N° 10.

A Fortieth part of all Moveables were granted. A. D. 1224. Matt. Paris.

King Henry [5] compelled the Citizens of London to pay him five [5] 12 H. 3. A. D. 1227. F. 336. n. 10, 20.

five thouſand Marks, becauſe they had given ſo much to Lewis late King of France when he left England.

M. P. ib. At the ſame time he alſo took for an Aid from the Burgeſſes of Northampton twelve hundred Pounds, beſides one Fifteenth of their moveable Goods.

He likewiſe forced all Religious and beneficed Clerks, to pay a Fifteenth, as well out of their Spirituals as Temporals; and thoſe that were unwilling to pay, were compelled either by the King's Authority, or elſe by Eccleſiaſtical Cenſures.

12 H. 3. Ib. n. 40. Soon after the Religious and Others had notice, that unleſs they renewed their Charters, their old ones ſhould be of no Advantage to them; and for the renewing of which every one was to pay according to his Faculty, at the Juſtitiary's Diſcretion.

[1] Id. ib. F. 365. n. 10. 15 Hen. 3. A. D. 1230. In the [1] Year 1230. the Archbiſhops, Biſhops, Abbots, and Priors, gave a great ſum of Money for recovering the King's Rights beyond Sea. At the ſame time he put the Citizens of London to a grievous Fine or Ranſom, and forced the Jews to pay the third part of what they were worth.

Id. 16 H. 3. F. 367. n. 50. A. D. 1231. In the Year 1231. the King required a Scutage of three Marks of every Knight's Fee of all that held Baronies, as well Laicks as Prelates: but tho it was oppoſed by the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and ſome other Biſhops, yet it was agreed to by all others.

A. D. 1232. 17 H. 3. Id. F. 377. n. 5. and F. 380. n. 30. On the 14*th* of September, in a Parliament held at Lambeth, a Fortieth part of all the Moveables, both of Eccleſiaſticks and Laicks, was granted to the King, and was collected about the latter end of October following.

Id. A.D. 1235. 20 H. 3. Id. F. 417. n. 30. [2] Rot. Clauſ. 21 H. 3. M. 1. and M. 21. Dorſ. Anno Dom. 1235. He took two Marks of every Plough-Land for the marriage of Iſabel his Siſter to Frederic Emperor of Germany, and gave with her Thirty thouſand Marks. And [2] at the ſame time there was a Thirtieth part of all Moveables granted by the Biſhops and Lay Great Men.

[3] Rot. Pat. 20 H. 3. M. 8. n. 12. A. D. 1236. A [3] Scutage of two Marks on every Knight's Fee, granted by the Archbiſhops, Biſhops, Abbots, Priors, and other Eccleſiaſtical Perſons, &c. and 'tis very probable, that this was the ſame Scutage which was given for the Mariage of his Siſter to the Emperor.

M. P. F. 435. n. 10. 21 H. 3. A.D. 1237. A. D. 1237. a Thirtieth part of all Moveables was granted to the King.

Paris*, but as others only twenty Shillings; but we do not find that this was ever raiſed, tho Dr. Brady puts it down as paid.

Id. Fol. 643. n. 20. A. D. 1244. In a Council or Parliament held at London three Weeks after Candlemaſs, Twenty Shillings of every Knight's Fee was granted to the King for the mariage of his eldeſt Daughter, one half to be paid at Eaſter, the other at Michaelmaſs following.

The Clergy granted the Tenth of all their Eccleſiaſtical Revenues for three Years, and the Nobility or Knights three Marks of every Knight's Fee, for the Relief of the Holy-Land, upon his Confirmation of Magna Charta; whereby it appears, that three Year's Tenths of all Church Revenues were granted to the King by the Pope.

A. D. 1253.

* This

This Year alſo a Twentieth part was granted to the King, of all Grain, Live Stock, and other Moveables, as well by the Great Men and Knights, as other Lay-men, as appears by the [4] Record it ſelf at large, which you will find in the Appendix, N°. ult. And who theſe other Laymen were that are mention'd in this Record, appears from the City-Chronicle, in the Book de Antiquis Legibus, where, in the latter end of this King's Reign under this Year, are theſe words, Eodem Anno omnes Liberi homines de Regno, tàm de villis quàm de Civitatibus & Burgis & alibi, dederunt Regi viceſimam partem omnium Bonorum ſuorum mobilium ad Expenſas faciendas in Itinere ad Terram Jeroſolimatanam. [4] Rot. Claus. 54 H. 3. M. 11. Dorſ.

I have been the more particular in this Quotation, becauſe Dr. Brady has given us only a ſhort Note of this Tax, without mentioning by whom it was given; I ſuppoſe, becauſe it confutes his falſe Notion, that the Knights of Shires were after the 48*th* of this King, no more ſummon'd to Parliament, till the 18*th* of Edward I. and the Citizens and Burgeſſes not till the twenty third of the ſame King, becauſe the Doctor can find no Writs of Summons for them till thoſe Years; of the falſeneſs of which Aſſertion, I ſhall (God willing) treat farther in the Introduction to my next Volume, and therefore ſhall ſay no more of it here.

But the Reader is to obſerve, that all ſuch Tailliages and Exactions as were contrary to Magna Charta, and raiſed by this King, without the conſent of Parliament, or Clergy in a Synod or Convention, were unjuſt and illegal, and are ſo noted by Matt. Paris and other Authors, tho Dr. Brady has not thought fit to take any notice of it.

Of the Laws and Ordinances made in this King's Reign.

Having given you an Account of the Taxes raiſed by, or granted to this King, and which indeed (unleſs it were thoſe that were impoſed under pretence of his Prerogative) may be alſo reckoned amongſt his Laws, I ſhall now proceed to give ſome brief Heads of ſuch Statutes and Ordinances, that were made during this Reign; for I ſhall not trouble the Reader with more, ſince he may find them at large in our Statute Books.

I ſhall begin with the Great Charter, called in Latin Magna Charta, which is affirm'd by * Matt. Paris to contain (for the moſt part) thoſe Laws and Liberties that were granted by King Edward the Confeſſor to the Church, Great Men, and People of England; and which Charter is by ſeveral ſubſequent Acts of Parliament alſo called a Statute, as being enacted by the joint conſent of the King, Clergy, Nobility, and People, tho the Grant was drawn up in the King's name alone. * Page 252.

But as for the Charter it ſelf, having already given it you at large, and being almoſt the ſame in the moſt material and conſtituent Parts thereof, mutatis mutandis, with that at the end of the Reign of King John, I need not here repeat it, but ſhall only take notice, that the ſame Charters, both of Liberties and Foreſts (except ſuch Clauſes as were thought fit to be left out) were new granted and confirm'd by King Henry the Third, his Son, Anno Dom. 1217. in the ſecond Year of his Reign; which Charters bearing date at St. Paul's, the

* i.e. Richard de Mariſco. sixth day of November, were deliver'd by the hand of * Richard Biſhop of Durham, the King's Chancellor, and for which there was then given by the Archbiſhops, Biſhops, Abbots, Priors, Earls, Barons, Knights, Freeholders, and all Perſons of the Kingdom, an Aid of a Fifteenth part of all moveable Goods. Of this Charter, as alſo of that of Foreſts, tho the Originals are loſt, there are yet ſeveral antient Copies of them remaining in divers hands; and beſides one of them that is in the Cuſtody of the Right Honourable the Earl of Kingſton, I my ſelf have ſeen another fair Copy in the hands of my worthy Friend William Petyt, Eſq; Bencher of the Inner-Temple, and Keeper of the Records in the Tower; and I have heard from him, that there is alſo a third Copy of them in the keeping of John Cook Eſq; Prothonotary of the Court of Common-Pleas;

[5] Rot. Clauſ. 1 H. 3. M. 10. Dorſ. and the truth of all theſe is alſo confirmed by a [5] Record in the Tower, containing the King's Writ to the Sheriff of Worceſter-ſhire, commanding him to cauſe to be read in the County-Court, thoſe Charters of Liberties, which the King had lately granted by the Common-Council of his Kingdom, to the Barons and all others of his Realm, and which the Lord Legate had alſo confirmed with his Seal; becauſe the King being under Age, had no Seal of his own. This bears date the 23*d* day of June, in the ſecond Year of his Reign, and which is alſo printed in the Appendix to this Volume, N°. 8.

And theſe Charters were again confirm'd Anno Dom. 1224. in the ninth Year of this King; of both which, tho there were ſeveral Copies ſent to all the Counties, and moſt of the Cathedrals and Religious Houſes in England, yet they are not to be found at this day among the Records of the Tower: but there is a fair Original of this of the 9*th* of H. 3. under Seal, remaining in the hands of Sir Nathaniel Powel, one of his Majeſty's learned Council, which is ſuppoſed to have belonged to Battle Abbey, which I my ſelf have likewiſe ſeen. As for thoſe Charters of Liberties and Foreſts, which remain upon Record in the Rolls in the Tower, they are only the Charters of the 28*th* of Edward I. reciting by Inſpeximus verbatim, thoſe granted by King Henry III. (as aforeſaid) as appears both by the beginning of that Charter it ſelf, as alſo by the Concluſion, in [1] Vid. Rot. Pat. 28 E. 1. which (by miſtake) in the Print, (but not in the [1] Roll it ſelf) Boniface Archbiſhop of Canterbury is named as the firſt witneſs to it, whereas in the Original Charter he is truly named Stephen, i. e. Stephen Langton, who was then Archbiſhop; Boniface not ſucceeding him till long after, toward the middle of King Henry's Reign, and deceaſing at the latter end of it.

There are alſo two antient Copies of theſe Charters, the one printed in the Annals of Burton, under the 9*th* of Hen. III. and the

* L. 3. c. 6. other in * Walter Hemingford's Chronicle; which differ very little from one another, only, That in the Burton Annals is witneſſed by Stephen Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and moſt of the Biſhops, Earls, and Barons of England, whereas the latter concludes more briefly with Teſte meipſo, & aliis prænominatis, which I ſuppoſe might proceed from the careleſneſs of the Tranſcriber, who would not take the Pains to write over ſo many Names.

[2] Id. p. 570. [2] Then follows in the Author laſt mention'd, another Charter of Confirmation of the Great Charter and that of Foreſts, dated in the the 21*ſt* of this King's Reign, after he came of full Age; and this Charter is ſaid to be witneſſed by Edmund Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and all thoſe named in the Great Charter it ſelf: which confirms my Conjecture of the Reaſon of leaving out the Witneſſes Names in the Charter abovemention'd.

But ſince I have already told you, that this Charter of K. Henry's, and that of King John's were for the moſt part the ſame, and that it would be impertinent to tranſcribe it again, I ſhall therefore only here take notice of ſuch Clauſes in King John's Charter, as were not thought fit or neceſſary to be inſerted into this of Henry III. being theſe that follow.

1. The laſt Clauſe of the ſeventh Chapter or Article, about ſhewing to the next of Kin the Conſanguinity of the Heir, before his marriage, is omitted, as are alſo,

2. The twelfth and thirteenth Chapters concerning Debts owing to the Jews, and againſt payment of Uſury by the Heir, whilſt he is under Age; no more being there ſaid under that Head, except the following Clauſe, That if any one die, and owe Money to the Jews, his Wife ſhall have her Dower, and ſhall not pay any thing of that Debt.

3. The third is concerning Aids payable by the City of London, to make the King's eldeſt Son a Knight, and to marry his eldeſt Daughter, which is alſo omitted.

4. The fourth is the laſt Clauſe of the ſixteenth Chapter, That all other Cities, Boroughs, Towns, and Barons of the Cinque-Ports, ſhall have the common Advice or Conſent of the Kingdom, concerning the Aſſeſſment of their Aids, otherwiſe than in the three Caſes aforeſaid, of Knighting the King's Son, &c.

5. But the moſt conſiderable omiſſion is, that of the ſeventeenth Chapter, which ſays thus, And we ſhall cauſe to be ſummoned by particular Writs, the Archbiſhops, Biſhops, and Abbots, Earls, and greater Barons, for the Aſſeſſing of Scutages.

6. As alſo the whole eighteenth Chapter, concerning the general Writs of Summons to the other Tenants in Capite.

7. Together with the nineteenth Chapter touching Proceedings upon Buſineſs at the day appointed, tho they did not all appear that were ſummon'd; but I ſhall ſpeak nothing concerning the reaſon of the omiſſion of theſe three laſt Articles, ſince I intend to treat of it in another Place, if ever I live to publiſh a third Volume of this Hiſtory.

The next Statute or Ordinance of this King's is ſaid to be made at Weſtminſter, Feb. 9. Anno 14 H. 3. and Anno Dom. 1229. which, ſince it is no more than the King's Writ or Declaration directed to Gerald Fitz-Maurice, or rather Maurice * Fitz-Gerald, Juſtitiary of Ireland, to let the Knights or Tenants in Capite of that Kingdom know, how Lands holden by Knight's Service, and deſcending to Coparceners within Age, ſhall be divided according to the Laws and Cuſtoms of England, I ſhall not ſay any more of it, becauſe it had not the Conſent or Advice, either of the Lords or Commons. Stat. de Hibernia.

* Cox Hib. Anglic. p. 60, 61.

Then

Stat. of Merton. Then follow the Statutes or Proviſions made at Merton, 20th H. 3. Anno Dom. 1235. the Title of which runs thus,

" It is provided in the Court of our Sovereign Lord the King, † A Monaſtery in Surrey. " holden at † Merton on Wedneſday the morrow after the Feaſt of St.
" Vincent, in the twentieth Year of the Reign of King Henry, the " Son of King John, before William Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and " other his Biſhops and Suffragans, and before the greater part of " the Earls and Barons of England there, being Aſſembled for the " Coronation of the ſaid King, and Eleanor the Queen, about which " they were all called; where it was treated for the Common-" Wealth of the Realm, upon the Articles under-written, viz.
" thus it was provided and granted, as well of the aforeſaid Arch-
" biſhops, Biſhops, Earls and Barons, as of the King himſelf, and " others.

I have been the more exact in the recital of the Title to theſe Proviſions, or Statutes, becauſe they afford us ſome uſeful Obſervations; as firſt, That the Great Council or Parliament is here called the King's Court; ſecondly, That whereas many have too raſhly affirm'd, that all the antient Statutes go in the name of the King alone, and ſeem to be made by his abſolute Prerogative, it is here evident, that this Body of Laws (the moſt antient of any after Magna Charta) was made and granted not only by the King, who is named almoſt laſt of all, but alſo by the Archbiſhops, Biſhops, Earls, Barons of England, and Others. But who theſe were included under the Others here mentioned, having already diſcourſed of it in my Introduction, I ſhall not ſay any thing here farther concerning them, but will now proceed to give you a ſhort Account of theſe Proviſions themſelves, which are divided into eleven Articles or Chapters.

CHAP. I.

‖ i. e. refus'd to aſſign them their Dowers. The Firſt of which ordains what Damages Widows ſhall recover after the Death of their Husbands, from ſuch as have ‖ deforced them of their Dowers, that is to ſay, the value of the whole Dower to them belonging, from the time of the death of their Husbands, to the day of the Judgment obtain'd in the King's Court for the ſame, and the Deforceors withal to be amerced at the King's pleaſure.

CHAP. II.

Grants to Widows a Power to bequeath the Crop on the Grounds, as well of their Dowers, as of their other Lands and Tenements.

CHAP. III.

Appoints, how Diſſeiſors that have rediſſeis'd thoſe who have recovered Seiſin or Poſſeſſion from them by Aſſize of Novel Diſſeiſin, (to wit) that the Perſons thereof convicted, ſhall be forthwith taken and kept in the King's Priſon, and not be diſcharged, but by Fine or ſome other means; and the Plaintiff ſhall further have the King's Writ directed to the Sheriff, containing the plaint of Diſſeiſin ſin done upon diſſeiſin, upon the receipt of which he ſhall take with him the Keepers of the Pleas of the Crown, and other lawful Knights, and in his proper Perſon ſhall go unto the ſaid Land, &c. and if by the Inquiſition of the Jurors, and other Neighbours, they find him again diſſeiſed, the Sheriff ſhall then deliver him the Seiſin or Poſſeſſion; and if it be found otherwiſe, the Plaintiff ſhall be amerced, and the other go quit: and in the ſame manner ſhall be done to them that have recovered their Seiſin by Aſſize of Mort-d'auncestour, and ſo ſhall it be of all Lands and Tenements recovered in the King's Court by Inqueſts, if they be afterwards diſſeiſed by the firſt Deforceors, againſt whom they have before recovered by Inqueſt.

CHAP. IV.

Ordains, that Lords of Mannors may make Profit of the reſidue of their Mannors, as of their waſtes, Woods and Paſtures, provided their Feoffees and Free-Tenants have ſufficient Paſture, with free egreſs and regreſs from their Land unto the Paſture, for as much as belongeth to their Tenements; and if they alledg they have not ſufficient Paſture, according to their holdings, then the Truth is to be enquired into by Aſſize, &c. The reſt is needleſs to be here recited.

CHAP. V.

Provides, that from thenceforth Uſury ſhall not turn againſt any one under Age, from the time of the death of his Anceſtor, (whoſe Heir he is) unto his lawful Age; this Law is either obſolete, or repeal'd.

CHAP. VI.

Appoints the Penalties for Raviſhment of a Ward from his Lord's Cuſtody, and for the diſappointment of the Lord by his Ward's marrying himſelf without his Conſent alſo.

CHAP. VII.

Provides, that the Ward ſhall pay at his full Age, to his Lord, the value of his mariage, in caſe he refuſe the Party whom his Lord requires him to marry: both which Statutes are out of doors, ſince the taking away of all Wardſhips, Liveries, Tenants in Capite, and Knight's Service, by the Statute of the 12*th* of Charles II. C. 24. and therefore I ſhall ſay no more of it, and only mention the Title of

CHAP. VIII.

Which contains ſeveral limitations of Preſcription, relating to the dates of divers Writs; and becauſe they are now grown obſolete, I ſhall ſay no more concerning them neither; but the next is more conſiderable, for

CHAP.

CHAP. IX.

Declares, that he is a Baſtard who is born before the Mariage of his Parents; but to the King's Writ of Baſtardy, whither one born before Matrimony may inherit in like manner as he that is born after Matrimony, all the Biſhops anſwered, that they would not, neither could anſwer to it, becauſe it was directly againſt the common Order of the Church; and all the Biſhops were urgent with the Lords, that they would conſent, that all ſuch as were born before Matrimony, ſhould be Legitimate, as well as thoſe born within Matrimony, as to the ſucceſſion of Inheritance, for ſo much as the Church accepteth ſuch for Legitimate. But all the Earls and Barons with one voice anſwered, * That they would not conſent that the Laws of the Realm ſhould be changed, which hitherto had been uſed and approved of.

Nolumus Leges Angliæ mutari.*

This I have ſet down at large, becauſe it ſhews a worthy conſtancy of the Nobility of England, in not permitting the antient Laws thereof to be changed for the ſake of the Eccleſiaſtical, or Canon Law.

CHAP. X.

Provides and grants, that every Freeman who oweth ſuit to the County, Tything, Hundred and Wapentake, or to the Court of his Lord, may freely make his Attorney to do thoſe Suits for him; but as for the next,

CHAP. XI.

Concerning treſpaſſers in Parks and Ponds, it is not yet diſcuſſed; for the Lords demanded the proper Impriſonment of ſuch as they ſhould take in their Parks and Ponds: but it appears here that the King denyed, wherefore it was deferred.

As to the other Statute that follows in our Statute Books, viz. that de Anno Biſſextili, made at Weſtminſter, 21 H. 3. A. D. 1236.

It declares, That the day of the Leap-Year, and the day before, ſhall be holden for one day.

This certainly never was an Act of Parliament, but only the King's Writ to the Juſtices of the Bench, directing them how they ought to proceed in that matter, which was then doubtful; for it was uſual in thoſe times for the King, by the Advice and Conſent of his Great Council of Earls and Barons, &c. to make ſuch temporary Laws and Ordinances without the Conſent of the General Council of the Kingdom or Parliament.

So likewiſe the Statute intituled Aſſiſa Panis & Cerviſiæ, made Anno 51 H. 3. Anno Dom. 1266.

Setting forth, that the prices of Bread and Ale ſhall be according to the prices of Corn. This was no other than the King's Writ or Proclamation, inforcing certain Ordinances concerning the Meaſure, or Aſſize of Bread and Ale.

But as for the latter part of this Ordinance, or Declaration, becauſe it ſets forth, what was the Law of England concerning Meaſures, and the value of Money in thoſe times (and is worthy the knowing) I ſhall therefore put it down at large.

* By

By the conſent of the whole Realm of England, the Meaſure of our Lord the King was made, that is to ſay, that an Engliſh Penny called a Sterling, round, and without any clipping, ſhall weigh XXXII. Wheat Corns taken out of the midſt of the Ear, and that XX*d.* do make an Ounce, and XII. ounces one Pound, and eight Pounds do make a Gallon of Wine, and eight Gallons of Wine a London Buſhel, which is the eighth part of a Quarter: and foraſmuch as in our Parliament holden at Weſtminſter in the firſt Year of our Reign, we have granted that all good Statutes and Ordinances, made in the times of our Progenitors aforeſaid, and not revoked, ſhall be ſtill obſerved, we have cauſed (at the requeſt of the Bakers of our Town of Coventry) that the Ordinances aforeſaid, by tenor of theſe Preſents, ſhall be exemplified: in witneſs whereof, &c. Witneſs the King at Weſtminſter the 22*d* day of March.

Where you may obſerve, "That theſe Laws concerning Meaſures, and the value of Money, are here declared to have been "ſettled by the common Conſent of the whole Realm, whereas it is not ſo mentioned concerning the prices of Bread and Ale.

I ſhall likewiſe barely mention two other Ordinances made the ſame Year, and which follow in the ſame place: the firſt

Concerning general days in Bank in real Actions, and the ſecond concerning general Days in a Writ of Dower: becauſe they are only matters of form relating to Pleadings, and were no Acts of Parliament, I do but juſt mention them.

And the Year-Book of the 15 E. 4. fo. 13. a. ſays, That theſe two were not Statutes, but written in our Books to the intent that what was before doubtful, ſhould now be put in certain.

But as for the Statute de Diſtrictione Scaccarii, of the ſame Year, ſhewing what Diſtreſſes ſhall be taken for the King's Debts, and how they ſhall be uſed; tho it be not expreſly mentioned when and where it was made, yet ſeeing I take it to have been by Authority of Parliament, I ſhall here ſet down the ſubſtance of it.

That foraſmuch as the * Commonalty of the Realm hath ſuſtained great damage by wrongful taking of Diſtreſſes, which have been made by Sheriffs, and other the King's Bayliffs, for the King's Debt, or for any other cauſe: It is therefore provided and ordained, (to this effect) that when a Sheriff, or any other Man, doth take the Beaſts belonging to others, they to whom ſuch Cattle do belong, may give them Meat whilſt they are ſo impounded, without diſturbance, and that neither the Beaſts nor any other Diſtreſs taken for the King's Debt, nor for any other Cauſe, ſhall be ſold or diſpoſed of within fifteen days after the taking thereof, with power alſo, upon giving Pledges or Security, to replevy them; and that no Diſtreſs ſhould be taken of Ploughs, Sheep, or Beaſts which till the Land; as alſo that ſuch Diſtreſſes be reaſonable, according to the value of the Debt or Demand, and that the Receipt by the Sheriff or Bayliff ſhall acquit the Debtor of all further Diſturbance. * Communitas

So likewiſe the Statute made the ſame Year, intitled de Scactario, i. e. concerning the Exchequer; wherein it is ſet forth when the King's Farmers, Sheriffs, and Bayliffs, ſhall make their Accompts and Payments, and who ſhall be Eſcheators in ſeveral Shires. This, ſince it relates only to the Officers and Perſons mentioned in the Statute, and is not of any general uſe, and moſt of it grown obſolete, I ſhall content my ſelf with barely mentioning it.

Thoſe Directions concerning the Pillory and Tumbrel, and of the Aſſize of Bread and Ale, made the ſame Year, ſeem to be no more than a Proclamation of the King's, reinforcing, and repeating the former Law concerning the prices of Bread and Ale; and that Bakers and Brewers offending againſt it, ſhall be puniſhed by the Pillory and Tumbrel, that is, the former by the one, and the latter by the other.

Then follow the Statutes made at Marlebridge (now Marleborough) November 18. An. 52*d. H.* 3. the Title of which I ſhall give you at large.

" In the year of Grace, 1267. and the two and Fiftieth Year of
* i. e. The Octaves, or eight days after the Feaſt. " the Reign of King Henry, Son of King John, in the * Utas of " St. Martin, for the better Eſtate of this Realm of England, and " for the more ſpeedy Miniſtration of Juſtice, as belonged to the " Office of a King, the more Diſcreet Men of the Realm being " called together, as well of the Higher as of the Lower Eſtate; it
" was provided, agreed, and ordain'd, That whereas the Realm of " England had of late been diſquieted with many-fold Troubles and " Diſſenſions, for reformation whereof, Statutes and Laws be right
" neceſſary, whereby the Peace and Tranquillity of the People may " be obſerved, wherein the King intending to deviſe convenient " Remedy, hath made theſe Acts, Ordinances and Statutes under " written, which he willeth to be obſerved for ever firmly and
" inviolably of all his Subjects, as well high as low.

This Title I have put down at length, for the Reader hence to obſerve, that theſe Laws were provided and ordained by the Advice and Conſent, not only of the King and the Great Men, but by others of lower Eſtate or Condition; who theſe were, I have already diſcuſſed in my Introduction againſt Dr. Brady's cavils in his Anſwer to Mr. Petyt's Treatiſe of the Rights of the Commons, &c. and therefore I ſhall now only give you a brief Account of this Body of Laws, which are divided into nine and twenty Chapters, and refer the Reader to the Statutes at large, for his further Satisfaction.

CHAP. I.

Appoints, That all Perſons that ſhall diſtrain other Men's Goods and Chattles of their own Authority, without the Award of the King's Court, and be convict thereof, ſhall be puniſhed by Fine according to the Treſpaſs, tho they have had no Damage or Injury done them.

CHAP. II.

Ordains, that no Man ſhall be diſtrained to come to the Lord's Court, which is not of his Fee or Place, where he hath no Juriſdiction, by reaſon of Hundred, or Bailywick; nor ſhall take Diſtreſſes out of the Fee or Place, where he hath no Bailywick nor Juriſdiction.

CHAP.

CHAP. III.

Ordains, That ſuch as will not ſuffer ſuch diſtreſſes to be delivered by the King's Officers, after the Law and Cuſtom of the Realm, or will not ſuffer Summons, Attachments, or executions of Judgment given in the King's Court to be done, he ſhall be puniſhed in manner aforeſaid, as one that will not obey the Law; and that according to the Quantity and Offence: but excepts all Lords diſtraining their Tenants for Services, and Cuſtoms, or any other thing, being due to them, whereby the Lord of the Fee had cauſe to diſtrain; tho it be afterwards found that the ſame Services are not due, yet the Lord ſhall not therefore be puniſhed by Fine, but ſhall be amerced as hitherto had been uſed.

CHAP. IV.

Ordains, That henceforth no Diſtreſs ſhall be driven out of the County, where it was firſt taken; and that ſuch Diſtreſſes ſhall be reaſonable, and not too great; and he that ſhall do otherwiſe, to be grievouſly amerced for ſuch exceſſes.

CHAP. V.

Contains a confirmation of the Great Charter, and that of Foreſts, and that for the future they ſhall be obſerved in all points, and the Offenders when convict, to be grievouſly puniſhed.

CHAP. VI.

Ordains, That fraudulent Conveyances made to defeat Lords of their Wardſhips, ſhall be void, otherwiſe not.

CHAP. VII.

Ordains what ſort of proceſs ſhall iſſue out againſt Deforceors upon Wards, and who refuſe to anſwer proceſs in Communi Cuſtodia, needleſs to be further mentioned.

CHAP. VIII.

Reinforces the puniſhment of ſuch as commit Rediſſeiſin to the ſame effect as in the Statute of Merton, with this Addition, That if it be found that the Sheriff had ſet any Man free, contrary to this Ordinance, he ſhall be therefore grievouſly amerced.

CHAP. IX.

Ordains in what manner Suits to Courts of Great Lords or others ſhall be obſerved; that none who is infeoffed by Deed, ſhall from henceforth be diſtrained to do ſuch Suit in the Court of his Lord, without he be eſpecially bound thereto by the form of his Deed; thoſe only excepted, whoſe Anceſtors, or they themſelves, have uſed to do ſuch Suit, before the firſt Voyage of the ſaid King Henry into Bretaigny (which was thirty nine Years before the making of this Act) and if the Lords of the Fee do diſtrain their Tenants for ſuch Suits contrary to this Act, then at the complaint of the Tenants, ſuch Lords ſhall be attached to appear in the King's Court to make anſwer thereunto, at a ſhort day, and ſhall have but one Eſſoin therein, if within the Realm; and immediately the Beaſts, or other Diſtreſſes ſhall be delivered to the Plaintiff, and ſo to remain till the Plea between them be determined; and if ſuch Lords ſhall not appear at the day given them by their Eſſoin, the Plaintiff ſhall be diſmiſſed without any day aſſigned: ſo likewiſe Tenants that after this Act ſhall withdraw from their Lord their due Suits, ſhall be proceeded againſt after the ſame manner as the Lords are ordained to be.

CHAP. X.

Provides, That Archbiſhops, Biſhops, Abbots, Priors, Earls, Barons, or any religious Men or Women, ſhall not need to come to the Sheriff's Tourns, unleſs eſpecially required for ſome other cauſe; but the Tourn ſhall be kept as it hath been uſed in the times of the King's Progenitors: and they that have Hundreds of their own to keep, ſhall not be bound to appear at any ſuch Tourns, but in the Bailywicks where they dwell.

CHAP. XI.

Ordains, That no Fines be taken for Beaupleader, or fair Pleading.

CHAP. XII.

Appoints what days ſhall be given in Pleas of Dower, in Aſſizes of D'arraign preſentment, and in a Plea of Quare Impedit, of Churches vacant; which ſince they relate only to forms of Proceſs, need not be further inſiſted on.

CHAP. XIII.

Ordains, That when a Man hath put himſelf upon any Inqueſt (i. e.) after iſſue joined, the Plaintiff ſhall have but one * Eſſoin or one Default; ſo that if he come not at the day given him by the Eſſoin, or make default the ſecond Day, then the Inqueſt ſhall be taken by his Default, and according to the ſame Inqueſt, they ſhall proceed to Judgment. The reſt being not very material, I omit.

* i. e. Excuſe for Non-appearance.

CHAP. XIV.

Appoints in what caſes ſuch as have Charters of Exemption from Purchaſers being impannel'd in Aſſizes, Juries, and Inqueſts, ſhall be ſworn (that is) in ſuch caſes where their Oaths are ſo requiſite, that without them Juſtice cannot be adminiſtred, as in great Aſſizes, Perambulations, and in Deeds of Covenants (where they be named for Witneſſes) or in Attaints, and in other like caſes they ſhall be compelled to ſwear.

* CHAP.

CHAP. XV.

Declares, That it ſhall from henceforth be lawful for Perſons, for any manner of Cauſe, to take Diſtreſſes out of his Fee, not in the King's High-way, nor in the common Street, but only to the King or his Officers, having ſpecial Authority to do the ſame.

CHAP. XVI.

Appoints what remedy the Heir in Ward ſhall have, when he comes of full Age, againſt his Lord, if he refuſe to ſurrender his Land without Plea; all which proceſs being now taken away by the abovementioned Statute of Charles II. I only mention it.

CHAP. XVII.

Provides, That Guardians in Soccage ſhall, whilſt the Heir is within Age, make no waſte, nor Sale, nor any deſtruction of the ſame Inheritance, but ſhall ſafely keep it to the uſe of the ſaid Heir, ſo that when he cometh to his lawful Age, they ſhall anſwer to him for the Iſſues of the ſaid Inheritance by a lawful Accompt, ſaving to the ſame Guardians their reaſonable Coſts. And that ſuch Guardians ſhall make no Profit by the marriage of ſuch Heirs, but for the ſaid Heir's Advantage.

CHAP. XVIII.

Appoints, That Juſtices eſpecially aſſigned to take Aſſizes, or to hear and determine Matters, ſhall from henceforth have no power to amerce for default of common Summons, but only the chief Juſticers, or Juſticers in Eyre in their Circuits.

CHAP. XIX.

Appoints, That in Counties, Hundreds, Court-Barons, or in other Courts, none ſhall need ſwear to warrant his Eſſoine.

CHAP. XX.

None from henceforth (except our Lord the King) ſhall hold in his Court any Plea of falſe Judgment, given in the Court of his Tenants; for ſuch Plea eſpecially belongeth to the Crown and Dignity of our Lord the King.

CHAP. XXI.

Appoints, That the Sheriff after complaint to him, ſhall grant Replevins upon all Diſtreſſes taken within the County, unleſs they were taken within any Liberties; and if the Bayliffs thereof will not deliver them, then upon their Default the Sheriff may do it.

CHAP.

CHAP. XXII.

None from henceforth may diſtrain his Freeholders to anſwer for their Freeholds, without the King's Writ, nor ſhall cauſe his Freeholders to ſwear againſt their Wills; for no Man may do that without the King's Commandment.

CHAP. XXIII.

Provides, That if Bayliffs, who ought to make Accounts to their Lords, do withdraw themſelves, and have no Lands nor Tenements whereby they may be diſtrain'd, then they ſhall be attached by their Bodies, ſo that the Sheriff in whoſe Bailywick they be found, ſhall cauſe them to appear to make their Accompts.

Alſo Farmers during their Terms, ſhall not make waſte, ſale, nor * exile of the Houſes, Woods, &c. nor of any thing belonging to the Tenements that they have to farm, without ſpecial Licence had by Writing of Covenant, making mention that they may do it; which if they do, and thereof be convict, they ſhall yield full Damage, and be grievouſly puniſhed by Amercement.

* i.e. Deſtruction, or Spoil.

CHAP. XXIV.

Ordains, That the Juſtices in Eyre from henceforth ſhall not amerce Townſhips in their Circuits, becauſe all Perſons of twelve Years old came not before the Sheriffs and Coroners, to make inquiry of Robberies, burnings of Houſes, or other things pertaining to the Crown, ſo that there come ſufficient out of thoſe Towns, by whom ſuch Inqueſts may be made full, except Inqueſts for the Death of a Man, &c. and other Caſes there mention'd.

CHAP. XXV.

Ordains, That Manſlaughter where it is found by Misfortune, ſhall not be judged before the Juſtices.

CHAP. XXVI.

Provides, That none being vouched to Warranty before the Juſtices in Eyre in Pleas of Land, or Tenement, ſhall be amerced from henceforth, becauſe he was not preſent when he was vouched to Warranty; but that upon Summons by the Sheriff he ſhall have three or four days time to come in, and make his Appearance, and if he dwelt out of the Shire, then to have Fifteen days at leaſt for that purpoſe.

CHAP. XXVII.

Ordains, That where a Clerk (i. e. one in Holy Orders) is arreſted for any Crime or Offence touching the Crown, and is thereupon by the King's Command let to Bail, his Sureties (or Bail) ſhall not be amerced, if they bring him before the Juſtices, tho he will not

* nor nor cannot anſwer, by reaſon of his Clerical Privilege. But this is now taken away by the Statutes of 28 H. 8. cap. 1. and 32 Hen. 8. cap. 3.

CHAP. XXVIII.

Provides, That all Biſhops and Prelates of the Church, may have Actions to demand the Goods of the Church, againſt ſuch as have treſpaſſed upon, and taken them away from their Predeceſſors, whither they had ſued their Right for ſuch wrongs, or whither they did not perſue their Right during their Lives: the like Remedy alſo againſt ſuch as have intruded into the Lands and Poſſeſſions of any Biſhoprick or Abbey during its vacancy, in which caſe the Succeſſors ſhall have a Writ to recover their Seiſin; and Damages ſhall be awarded them, as in Aſſize of Novel diſſeiſin.

CHAP. XXIX.

Ordains, That a new Original Writ of Entry, called ſur-diſſeiſin in the Poſt, be provided by the Council of our Lord the King, in caſe of ſuch Alienations that may happen to be made in ſuch and ſuch Degrees there mention'd, when by reaſon thereof a common Writ of Entry cannot be made in the Form before times uſed; and as for the Form of the Writ, the Reader may conſult the Regiſter, Fol. 228. Fitzh. N. B. F. 291. if he pleaſes.

I cannot here omit taking notice that the greateſt part of theſe Statutes had been ſeveral Years before paſs'd into a Law, by a certain Statute made in the 47*th* Year of this King, being A. D. 1263. and were indeed part of the Laws and Proviſions that had been made at Oxford; and tho the greater part of thoſe Conſtitutions were then declared Null, yet theſe being looked upon as not at all derogatory to the King's Prerogative, were confirm'd, as they were alſo again by this Statute; but for what reaſon, whither they thought the Times were then Troubleſome when they were made, and therefore were not paſs'd in due form, is hard to determine at this diſtance of time.

But ſince the Edict or Statute, intituled, Dictum de Kenelworth, is only an Award, or Sentence given and confirmed at that Place, by the King, his Noblemen and Commons, in the 51*th* year of Henry the Third, and ſince the ſubſtance of it is already repeated in the foregoing Hiſtory, I need ſpeak no further concerning it.

There are likewiſe ſome other Temporary Edicts or Laws of this King, which tho they are not in any of our Records, or Law-Books, but only mention'd by ſome of our Hiſtorians, yet they ought not to be omitted; ſuch is that Edict of his that we find in Matt. Paris, and which is already taken notice of in this Hiſtory, under the Year 1228. when the King in his return from York to London, perceiving the meaſures of Grain, Wine, and Ale, to be extreme falſe and ſcanty, he commanded them to be all broken or burnt, and others of a larger ſize to be made in their Rooms; and alſo that the weight of Bread ſhould be increaſed, and ordered the Offenders Offenders againſt this Edict to be ſeverely fined; which I take notice of, becauſe they were made ſeveral Years before the Statute or Aſſize of Bread and Beer, * which you will find by the date, was not made till the 15*th* of this King. Beſides this, I find in the ſame Author's † Additaments, that in a Parliament held at London, A. D. 1246. there were ſome Laws made with ſeverer Penalties againſt thoſe that robbed Parks and Warrens, to this effect.

* Vid. Pulton's Statutes.

† P. 156.

If the Malefactor fled, or was killed, there was neither Law nor Appeal allowed for his Death; if an Earl, Baron, or Knight, complained to the King that his Deer were ſtolen, Inquiſition was to be made thereupon by the King's Writ; and if he that was indicted, was thereupon convicted, he was to lie in the King's Priſon a Year and a Day, and to pay three Years value of his Eſtate, having ſufficient allowed him out of it, to maintain him, of which Fine the King was to have two parts, and he that received the Injury, one; and then he was to find twelve Sureties, that he ſhould never offend in the like kind in any Parks, Warrens, or Foreſts, nor do any thing againſt the King's Peace; and theſe were to anſwer for his Body, and for his Tranſgreſſions: and if any one were taken in a Park or Warren, he was to be impriſoned and fined, and alſo to give Sureties as before.

There are likewiſe, beſides theſe temporary Statutes, certain other Edicts or Precepts of this King's, which not being found in any of our Statute-Books, are only extant among the Records of the Tower: ſuch are theſe that follow, viz. that of Rot. Pat. 3. of Henry III. m. 3. which contains the King's Writ to the Biſhop of Bathe and Wells, and to his fellow Juſtices Itinerant, for the Counties of Dorſet, Somerſet and Oxon, with divers other Shires therein mention'd, ſtraitly enjoining them, that in all Trials for the future, they omit thoſe of Ordeal, by Fire and Water, as being forbid by a Decree of the Pope and Council. And tho Ordeal was never taken away by any Act of Parliament, yet being forbid by the Pope, and look'd upon alſo as a ſuperſtitious and very uncertain way of Trial, it was therefore at the King's command laid aſide by the Judges, and ſoon after grew quite out of uſe.

The ſecond is, Rot. Clauſ. 19. H. 3. M. 22. Int. containing the King's Writ to the Sheriffs of London, ſtraitly commanding them to put down all publick Schools of Laws, or the teaching them within the City for the future: But I cannot here omit that Sir Edward Coke in his Proem to his ſecond Inſtitutes, makes this Prohibition to mean certain publick Readings upon Magna Charta, and that de Foreſta, but (as Mr. Selden hath very well proved in his Diſſertation upon Fleta) it was the Canon and not the Common, or Statute-Laws, that were hereby forbid to be taught; and King Stephen had long before iſſued out the like Prohibition againſt one Vacarius, whom Pope Eugenius the Second had ſent over hither to read at Oxford, upon Gratian's Decretals.

Neither can I here likewiſe omit taking notice of a great miſtake in Sir Richard Baker's Chronicle, which among the Laws ſaid to be made in Henry the Third's Reign, ſets down this for one, That by a Statute of this King's, the Wardſhip and Marriage of the King's Barons (he ſhould alſo have ſaid his other Tenants in Capite) was granted to the Crown; which Story, tho this Author has borrowed it either from Polydore Virgil, or Henry de Knyghton, yet to prove it falſe, I need but refer the Reader to Magna Charta in Engliſh, at the end of King John's Reign, or to the Latin Original in the Appendix, cap. 3, 4, and 6. as alſo to the Statute of Merton made the 20*th* of Henry the Third, by which it appears, that the Wardſhip and Mariage of the Heir were not granted by any Statute, but were always incident to Knight's Service.

This I thought good to note, that ſo ordinary Readers, not verſed in the Law, may not be miſled in reading our leſs Authentick Hiſtorians.

Matters relating to Ireland during the Reign of King Henry the Third.

SINCE Dr. Brady has given us at the end of his Hiſtory, a pretty exact Account of ſuch Writs and Letters as relate to the Affairs of Ireland, during this King's Reign, being ſuch as are to be found either upon Record in the Tower, or elſe in Matt. Paris, I thought fit to add them here for the Reader's Satisfaction; ſeeing that That part of Ireland which was then under the Engliſh Dominion, was a Juriſdiction quite different from that Sovereignty which the King claimed over the reſt of the Iriſh Princes of that Iſland.

King Henry by his Councellors in the firſt Year of his Reign (he being then but nine Years old) or by William Mareſchal his Governor, to gratify the Iriſh for their Loyalty to his Father and himſelf, granted out of his ſpecial Grace, that they and their Heirs for ever, ſhould enjoy the Liberties granted by his Father to the Kingdom of England, which were written and ſent ſealed thither, under the Seals of the Pope's Legate, and William Earl Mareſchal, the King then not having * a Seal of his own, and his Father's Seal being loſt with his other Regalia, in the Paſſage over the Waſhes.

Append 227. the Engliſh Hiſt.

King John's Charter of Liberties granted to the Iriſh.

* Rot. Cl. 7. H. 3. M. 5. Dorſ.

In the ſeventh Year of his Reign, upon Complaint made by the Citizens of Dublin againſt their Archbiſhop (who was then the King's Chief Juſtice) for proceeding contrary to the Laws and Cuſtoms of the Nation uſed in all places of England, and for his Uſurpation upon the Rights of the Crown, againſt his Truſt and Duty, as Chief Juſtice, in drawing ſeveral Cauſes belonging to the King's Temporal, to his Eccleſiaſtical Courts, to enlarge his Juriſdiction, to the Grievance and Diſhonour of the King; there was a Writ ſent to him to forbear ſuch things for the future, or elſe that he ſhould be ſeverely dealt with for ſuch practices.

The King prohibits the ABp of Dublin to meddle with ſecular Cauſes in Spiritual Courts.

† Rot. Cl. 11. H. 3. part 1. M. 21.

In the eleventh Year of his Reign, † there was a Writ ſent to Geoffrey de Mariſco, Juſtice of Ireland, for obſerving the ſame Cuſtoms and Law there, for taking Perſons continuing Excommunicate by the ſpace of forty days, upon the Archbiſhop and Biſhop's Certificate by a Capias Excommunicatum, as was uſed in England.

The ſame Law being in Ireland as England, concerning Excommunicate Perſons.

In the twelfth Year of his Reign, he wrote to * Richard de Burgh, his Juſtitiary, to call together the Archbiſhops, Biſhops, Abbots, Priors, Earls, Barons, Knights, and Free-Tenents, and his Officers in every County, and to cauſe the Charter of King John to be read before them, and to enjoin them to the ſtrict obſervation of the Laws contained in it.

* Rot. Cla. 12. H. 3. M. 8.

In the nineteenth Year of his Reign, the King iſſued a * Writ to Maurice Fitz-Gerald his Juſtitiary, for free Commerce and Trade between his Subjects of both Nations, without reſtraint.

* Rot. Cla. 19. H. 3. M. 20. Dorſ.

Free Commerce and Trade between England and Scotland.

The next Year † he wrote to the Archbiſhop of Dublin, and to his Juſtitiary, for the obſervation of the Statutes of Merton, eſpecially concerning Baſtardy, and in a caſe then depending before them.

† Rot. Cla. 20. H. 3. M. 13. Dorſ.

The Statutes of Merton concerning Baſtardy to be obſerved in Ireland.

In the twenty fourth Year of his ‖ Reign, the King ſent inſtructions under his Great Seal, how Lands holden in Knight's-Service, that deſcended to Siſters, being Co-heirs, ſhould be divided; and how, and by whom, Homage ſhould be done; and in what manner, and of whom the younger Siſter ſhould hold according to the Statute of Ireland, made the fourteenth Year of his Reign.

‖ Matt. Paris F. 526. n. 40.

How Coheirs Females were to hold in Knight's Service.

In the thirtieth of his Reign, he directed a * Writ to the Archbiſhops, and others in Ireland, that the Laws of England ſhould be ſtrictly obſerved in Ireland, as King John his Father had formerly commanded.

* Append. n. 228.

The Laws of England to be ſtrictly obſerved in Ireland.

Note, This was done without any Authority of Parliament, either in England or Ireland.

Yet notwithſtanding this Command, this Privilege of uſing the Engliſh Laws in Ireland, † was never deſigned by King John, or King Henry, that it ſhould extend to all the Native Iriſh, but only to the Engliſh Inhabitants that were tranſplanted thither, or were there born; and to ſuch native Iriſh as faithfully adhered to theſe Kings and the Engliſh in Ireland, againſt the Iriſh that complyed not with them; and thoſe were not to receive any benefit by them.

† Appen. n. 229

The Laws not intended for the benefit of the Native Iriſh.

The King in the Thirty eighth Year was in Gaſcoigny, and wanting Forces, ‖ ſent his Writ to John Fitz-Geoffrey, his Juſtice of Ireland, to come to him in Perſon with a good number of Men, if there were no danger of an Inſurrection in Ireland; otherwiſe to ſend Maurice Fitz-Gerald with the ſame Force, and to borrow Money from the Pope's Collector in Ireland for that Affair, to be repaid him at a certain day.

‖ Rot. Clau. 38. H. 3. M. 9. Dorſ.

The K. ſends into Ireland for Forces to be brought to him from thence into Gaſcoigny.

Prince Edward had the Kingdom of Ireland committed to him for his ſupport, with Power to make, and put in and out what Juſtices and other Officers he pleaſed, when the Barons were at Oxford, and had made their Proviſions, in the forty ſecond Year of this King's Reign.

It alſo appears upon * Record, that the King wrote to the Archbiſhops, Biſhops, Abbots, Priors, Barons, Knights, &c. of that Kingdom, that he heard his Son Edward intended to make a new Juſtitiary there without his Conſent, and put his Caſtles into ſuch Hands, as might be of great Damage to them, and not without danger of their Diſinheriting; and therefore commands them not to be obedient to any ſuch Juſtitiary, Conſtables, or Keepers of Caſtles, tles, made or appointed without his Letters Patents, by the Aſſent and Advice of his Council.

* Rot. Pat. 42. H. 3. M. 5.

After the ſame manner he wrote alſo to all Mayors and † Communities of Cities, and Towns in Ireland, and to the Conſtables of Caſtles, and commanded Alan de la Zouche his Juſtitiary, not to obey, or give up his Authority to any new Juſtitiary, or Conſtable, that ſhould come without his ſaid Letters Patents.

† i. e. Corporations.

The King wrote likewiſe * to the Archbiſhop of Dublin, the Biſhop of Meath his Treaſurer, Walter de Burgh, and Maurice Fitz-Gerald, that he heard there was like to be much Diſſenſion between the Great Men of Ireland, and therefore ordered them to ſecure the Peace of that Nation; and ſent them further private Inſtructions by Roger Waſpail, who carried theſe Letters, to whom he commanded them to give entire Credit.

* Rot. Claus. 40. H. 3. M. 7. Dorſ.

The K's Writs to ſeveral Great Men, to ſecure the Peace of Ireland.

This is all I find worth noting concerning Ireland in this King's Reign, who for the moſt part appointed courageous Juſtitiaries and other Officers, by whoſe Induſtry, and by putting the Engliſh Laws in due Execution, that Nation was kept in Peace and Quiet during his Reign.

FINIS.

An Advertiſement to the Reader.

WHEREAS in the end of King Richard's Reign, p. 574. I have there ſaid, that I had never ſeen any Charters of King John, wherein he was in direct terms ſtiled Lord of Ireland, I think it not too late to retract that miſtake; for ſince the printing off of that Reign, I have received Authentick Copies of two ſeveral Charters from Ireland, the one of Earl John, with the expreſs Title of Lord of Ireland, being a Grant to the Men of Briſtol, of the City of Dublin, to inhabit in: The Charter follows.

JOHANNES filius Domini Regis Angliæ & Dominus Hiberniæ. Archiepiſcopis, Epiſcopis, Abbatibus, Comitibus, Baronibus, Juſticiis, Conſtabulariis, Miniſtris, & omnibus Ballivis & Fidelibus ſuis Francis & Anglis & Hibernienſibus, ſalutem. Sciatis me conceſſiſſe & præſenti Carta mea confirmaſſe hominibus meis de Briſtowe Donationem quam Dominus Rex Angliæ Pater meus eis dedit, ſcilicet, Civitatem meam de Divilinâ ad inhabitandam. Quare volo & firmiter præcipio quod ipſi eam inhabitent & teneant illam de me & hæredibus meis bene & in pace, libere & quiete, integre & plenarie & honorifice, cum omnibus Libertatibus & liberis Conſuetudinibus ſuis, quas homines de Briſtowe habent apud Briſtowe, & per totam Terram Domini Regis Angliæ patris mei, ſicut Carta ipſius teſtatur. T. Hugone de Laci Conſtabulario, Bertino de Verdun ſervo meo, Gilberto Pypard, Willielmo de Wennes Dapifero, Albardo Camerario meo, Adamo de Heford, Philippo de Wireceſter, Roberto de Mortemer. Dat. apud Kildare.

Copia Vera Examinatur per Tho. Twigg, Cleric. Theol. CCD.

The Seal is in great part broke, but there is ſtill to be ſeen the Head of the Horſe upon it.

There is alſo another Charter precedent to this, from his Father King Henry the Second, in the ſame words, of which this above ſeems to be only a Confirmation, and therefore I would not trouble the Reader with it. But I muſt obſerve, that King Henry has not ſtiled himſelf in that Lord of Ireland, tho it was dated at Dublin, and he at that time there in Perſon. The Seal of this is pretty perfect, repreſenting him on the Foreſide as ſitting on a Throne, and on the Reverſe as riding on Horſeback, according to the manner of Seals in thoſe Times.

THE APPENDIX.

I SHALL begin it with the ſeveral Charters of Liberties, granted by our Engliſh Kings of the Norman Race, beginning with that of King William, and ending with the great Charters of Henry the Third, called Magna Charta, and Charta de Foreſta.

Firmantur Leges Edwardi Regis.

HOC quoque præcipimus ut omnes habeant & teneant Leges Edwardi Regis in omnibus Rebus, adauctis hiis, quas conſtituimus ad utilitatem Anglorum.

XIV.

De Juſtitiæ Publicæ fidejuſſoribus.

OMNIS homo qui voluerit ſe teneri pro libero, ſit in plegio, ut Plegius eum habeat ad Juſtitiam, ſi quid offenderit, & quiſquam evaſerit, talium videant Plegii, ut ſolvant, quod calumniatum eſt, & purgent ſe quodam evaſo nullam fraudem noverint. Requiratur Hundredus & Comitatus (ſicut Anteceſſores ſtatuerunt) & qui juſte venire debent & noluerint, ſummoneantur ſemel; & ſi ſecundo non venerint, accipiatur unus Bos; & ſi tertio, alius Bos; & ſi quarto, reddatur de rebus hujus hominis quod calumpniatum eſt, quod dicitur * Ceapgel, & inſuper Regis forisfactura.

XV.

De ſervis & eorum manumiſſione.

ET prohibimus ut nullus vendat hominem extra patriam; ſi qui vero velit ſervum ſuum liberum facere, tradat eum Vicecomiti per manum dextram in pleno Comitatu, quietum illum clamare debet a jugo ſervitutis ſuæ per manumiſſionem, & oſtendat ei liberas vias & portas, & tradat illi libera arma, ſcil. Lanceam & Gladium, deinde Liber Homo efficitur.

I. ET quia Regnum oppreſſum erat injuſtis exactionibus, ego reſpectu Dei & amore, quem erga vos omnes habeo, ſanctam Dei eccleſiam liberam facio, ita quod nec eam vendam nec ad firmam ponam, nec mortuo Archiepiſcopo vel Epiſcopo, vel Abbate, aliquid accipiam de Dominio Eccleſiæ, vel de hominibus, donec Succeſſor in eam ingrediatur.

II. ET omnes malas Conſuetudines, quibus Regnum Angliæ injuſte opprimebatur, inde Aufero, quas malas conſuetudines in parte hic pono.

III. SIQUIS Baronum meorum, Comitum, vel aliorum, qui de me tenent, mortuus fuerit, hæres ſuus non Redimet terram ſuam, ſicut facere conſueverat tempore Patris mei, ſed juſta & Legitima Relevatione relevabit eam: Similiter & * homines Baronum meorum legitima & juſta relevatione relevabunt terras ſuas de Dominis ſuis.

* i. e. Tenentes.

IV. ET ſiquis Baronum vel aliorum hominum meorum, filiam ſuam tradere voluerit, ſive ſororem, ſive nepotem, ſive cognatam, mecum inde loquatur, ſed neque ego aliquid de ſuo pro hac licentia accipiam, neque defendam ei, quin eam det, excepto ſi eam dare voluerit Inimico meo.

V. ET ſi mortuo Barone vel alio homine meo, filia hæres remanſerit, dabo illam cum conſilio Baronum meorum cum terra ſua.

VI. ET ſi mortuo marito, uxor ejus remanſerit, & ſine liberis fuerit, dotem ſuam, & maritagium habebit, & eam non dabo marito, niſi ſecundum velle ſuum. Si verò uxor cum liberis remanſerit, dotem ſuum & maritagium habebit, dum corpus ſuum legitimè ſervabit; & eam non dabo niſi ſecundum velle ſuum, & terræ Liberorum cuſtos erit ſive uxor, ſive alius propinquior, qui juſtus eſſe debet: & præcipio, ut homines mei ſimiliter ſe contineant erga filios & filias & uxores, hominum ſuorum.

VII. MONETAGIUM Commune, quod capiebatur per Civitates vel Comitatus, quod non fuit tempore Edwardi Regis, hoc ne amodo fiat omnino defendo.

VIII. SI quis captus fuerit ſive monetarius ſive alius cum falſa moneta, Juſtitia recta inde fiat.

IX. II. NIHIL me in Eccleſia, vel in rebus Eccleſiaſticis ſymoniace acturum, vel permiſſurum eſſe promitto.

III. ECCLESIASTICARUM Perſonarum & omnium Clericorum, & rerum eorum Juſtitiam & poteſtatem & diſtributionem bonorum Eccleſiaſticorum manu Epiſcoporum eſſe, perhibeo & confirmo.

IV. DIGNITATES Eccleſiarum, privilegiis earum confirmatas, & conſuetudines earum antiquo tenore habitas, inviolate manere concedo & ſtatuo.

V. OMNES Eccleſiarum poſſeſſiones, & tenuras, quas die illa habuerant, qua Willielmus Rex Avus meus fuit vivus & mortuus, ſine omnium calumniantium reclamatione eis liberas & abſolutas eſſe concedo.

VI. SI quid vero de habitis aut poſſeſſis ante mortem Regis, quibus modo careat, Eccleſia, deinceps repetierit, indulgentiæ & diſpenſationi meæ vel diſcutiendum, vel reſtituendum reſervo.

VII. QUÆCUNQUE vero poſt mortem Regis, liberalitate Regum, largitione Principum, oblatione, vel comparatione, vel qualibet tranſmutatione Fidelium collata ſunt confirmo.

VIII. PA-

VIII. PACEM meam & Juſtitiam in omnibus facturum & pro poſſe meo conſervaturum promitto.

IX. FORESTAS quas Willielmus Rex avus meus, & Willielmus Avunculus meus inſtituerunt & tenuerunt, mihi reſervo. Cæteras omnes, quas Henricus Rex ſuperaddidit, Eccleſiis & Regno quietas reddo & concedo.

X. SI quis autem Epiſcopus vel Abbas, vel alia Eccleſiaſtica Perſona ante mortem ſuam rationabiliter ſua diſtribuerit, vel diſtribuenda ſtatuerit, firmum manere concedo.

XI. SI vero morte præoccupatus fuerit, pro ſalute animæ ejus, Eccleſiæ conſilio eadem fiat diſtributio.

XII. DUM vero Sedes propriis fuerint Paſtoribus vacuæ & ipſæ & omnes, earum poſſeſſiones, in manu & cuſtodia Clericorum vel proborum hominum, ejuſdem Eccleſiæ committantur, donec Paſtor canonice ſubſtituatur.

XIII. OMNES Exactiones & Meſchenings, & Injuſtitias, ſive per Vice-Comites, vel per alios quoſlibet male inductas, funditus extirpo. Bonas leges & antiquas & juſtas conſuetudines in murdris, & Placitis & aliis cauſis obſervabo, & obſervari præcipio, & conſtituo: apud Oxenford anno incarnationis Domini 1136. Regni mei primo.

King John's Charter of Foreſts, as it is to be found in Matt. Paris, Fol. 259. N. 40. divided into Articles or Chapters.

JOHANNES Dei Gratia, Rex Angliæ, &c. Sciatis quod intuitu Dei & pro ſalute animæ noſtræ & animarum anteceſſorum & ſucceſſorum, ad exaltationem Sanctæ Eccleſiæ, & emendationem Regni noſtri; ſpontanea & bona voluntate noſtra dedimus, & conceſſimus pro Nobis & hæredibus noſtris, has libertates ſubſcriptas, habendas & tenendas in regno noſtro Angliæ in perpetuum.

I. IN primis omnes Foreſtæ quas Rex Henricus avus noſter afforeſtavit, videantur per probos & legales homines; & ſi Boſcum aliquem alium quam ſuum Dominicum, afforeſtaverit ad damnum illius cujus boſcus fuerit, ſtatim deafforeſtetur. Et ſi boſcum ſuum proprium afforeſtaverit, remaneat Foreſta, ſalva Communia de herbagio & rebus aliis in eadem Foreſta, illis qui eam prius habere conſueverunt.

II. HOMINES qui manent extra Foreſtam, non veniant de cætero coram Juſticiariis noſtris de Foreſta, per communes ſubmonitiones; niſi ſint in Placito, vel Plegii alicujus vel aliquorum qui attachiati ſunt propter Foreſtam: Omnes autem boſci qui fuerunt afforeſtati per Regem Richardum fratrem noſtrum, ſtatim deafforeſtentur; niſi fuerint Dominici boſci noſtri.

III. ARCHIEPISCOPI, Epiſcopi, Abbates, Priores, Comites, Barones, Milites, & Libere Tenentes, qui boſcos habent in Foreſta, habeant boſcos ſuos ſicut eos habuerunt tempore primæ Coronationis prædicti Regis Henrici avi noſtri; ita quod quieti ſint in perpetuum de omnibus Purpreſturis, Vaſtis & Aſſartis factis in illis boſcis poſt illud tempus, uſque ad principium ſecundi anni coronationis noſtræ. Et qui de cætero Vaſtum, Purpreſturam, vel Eſſartum facient ſine licentia noſtra in illis boſcis, de Vaſtis, Purpreſturis, & Aſſartis reſpondeant.

IV. REGARDATORES noſtri eant per Foreſtas, ad faciendum regardum, ſicut fieri conſuevit tempore primæ Coronationis prædicti Regis Henrici avi noſtri, & non aliter.

V. INQUISITIO vel viſus de expeditatione canum exiſtentium in Foreſta de cætero fiat, quando fieri debet Regardum; ſcilicet de tertio anno in tertium annum; & tunc fiat per viſum & teſtimonium legalium hominum, & non aliter. Et ille cujus canis inventus fuerit tunc non expeditatus, pro miſericordia det tres ſolidos; & de cætero nullus bos capiatur pro expeditatione. Talis autem expeditatio ſit per Aſſiſam communiter, quod tres ortelli abſcindantur de pede anteriori ſine poleta. Non expeditentur canes de cætero, niſi in locis ubi expeditari ſolent tempore primæ Coronationis prædicti Henrici Regis avi noſtri.

VI. NULLUS Foreſtarius vel Bedellus, faciat de cætero * Scotallum, vel colligat garbas, vel avenam, vel bladum aliud, vel agnos, vel porcellos, nec aliquam collectam faciat; & per viſum & ſacramentum duodecim duodecim Regardatorum, quando facient regardum, tot Foreſtarii ponantur ad Foreſtas cuſtodiendas, quot ad illas Cuſtodienas, rationabiliter viderint ſufficere.

VII. NULLUM Suanimotum de cætero teneatur in regno noſtro, niſi ter in anno; videlicet in principio quindecim dierum ante feſtum Sancti Michaelis, quando Agiſtatores veniunt ad Agiſtandum Dominicos boſcos, & circa feſtum Sancti Martini quando Agiſtatores noſtri debent accipere panagium ſuum. Et ad iſta duo Suanimota, convenient Foreſtarii, Viridarii, & Agiſtatores; & nullus alius per diſtrictionem. Et tertium Suanimotum teneatur in initio XV dierum ante feſtum Sancti Johannis Baptiſtæ pro fœnatione beſtiarum noſtrarum; & ad iſtum Suanimotum convenient Foreſtarii, Viridarii, & non alii per diſtrictionem.

VIII. ET præterea ſingulis quadraginta diebus, per totum annum convenient Viridarii & Foreſtarii ad videndum Attachiamenta de Foreſta tam de Viridi quam de Venatione, per præſentationem ipſorum Foreſtariorum, & coram ipſis attachientur: Prædicta autem Suanimota non teneantur, niſi in Comitatibus in quibus teneri conſueverunt.

IX. UNUSQUISQUE liber homo agiſtet boſcum ſuum in Foreſta pro voluntate ſua, & habeat pannagium ſuum.

X. CONCEDIMUS etiam quod unuſquiſque liber Homo poſſit ducere porcos ſuos per Dominicum boſcum noſtrum, libere & ſine impedimento; & ad Agiſtandum eos in boſcis ſuis propriis, vel alibi ubi voluerit. Et ſi porci alicujus liberi hominis una nocte pernoctaverint in Foreſta noſtra, non inde occaſionetur, ita quod aliquid de ſuo perdat.

XI. NULLUS de cætero amittat vitam vel membra pro Venatione noſtra; ſed ſi aliquis captus fuerit & convictus de captione Venationis, graviter redimatur, ſi habeat unde redimi poſſit; & ſi non unde redimi poſſit, jaceat in priſona noſtra per annum unum & unum diem. Et ſi poſt annum unum & unum diem Plegios invenire poſſit, exeat à priſona; ſin autem, abjuret regnum noſtrum Angliæ.

XII. QUICUNQUE Archiepiſcopus, Epiſcopus, Comes vel Baro veniens ad Nos per mandatum noſtrum, tranſierit per Foreſtam noſtram, licet illi capere unam vel duas beſtias per viſum Foreſtarii ſi præſens fuerit; ſin autem, faciat cornari, nè videatur hoc furtive facere: Item licet in redeundo idem eis facere, ſicut prædictum eſt.

XIII. UNUSQUISQUE liber homo de cætero ſine occaſione, faciat in boſco ſuo vel in terra ſua, quam habeat in Foreſta molendinum, vivarium ſtagnum, marleram, foſſatum vel terram arabilem, extra coopertum in terra arabili, ita quod non ſit ad nocumentum alicujus Vicini.

XIV. UNUSQUISQUE liber homo habeat in boſcis ſuis Ærias Accipitrum, Spervariorum, Falconum, Aquilarum & Heironum; & habeant ſimiliter mel quod inventum fuerit in boſcis ſuis.

XV. NULLUS Foreſtarius de cætero, qui non ſit Foreſtarius de feudo, reddens firmam Nobis pro balliva ſua, capiat Cheminagium, ſcilicet pro careta per dimidium annum, duos denarios; & per alium dimidium annum, duos denarios; & pro Equo, qui portat ſummagium, per dimidium annum, unum obolum; & per alium dimidium annum, unum obolum; & non niſi de illis, qui extra ballivam ſuam tanquam mercatores veniunt, per licentiam ſuam

ſuam in Ballivam ſuam, ad buſcam, meiremium, corticem, vel carbonem emendum, & alias ducendum ad vendendum ubi voluerint. Et de nulla careta alia, vel ſummagio, aliquod Cheminagium capiatur; non capiatur cheminagium, niſi in locis illis, ubi antiquitus capi ſolebat & debuit: Illi autem qui portant ſuper dorſum ſuum, buſcam, corticem vel carbonem ad vendendum, quamvis inde vivant, nullum de cætero dent Cheminagium de boſcis aliorum; nullum detur Cheminagium Foreſtariis noſtris præterquam de Dominicis boſcis noſtris.

XVI. OMNES Utlagati pro Foreſta a tempore Regis Henrici Avi noſtri, uſque ad primam Coronationem noſtram, veniant ad pacem ſine impedimento & Salvos plegios inveniant, quod de cætero non forisfacient nobis de Foreſta noſtra.

XVII. NULLUS Caſtellanus vel alius teneat Placitum de Foreſta ſive de Viridi ſive de Venatione; ſed quilibet Foreſtarius de feudo attachiat Placita de foreſta, tam de Viridi quam de Venatione, & ea præſentet Viridariis Provinciarum; & cum rotulata fuerint, & ſub ſigillis Viridariorum incluſa, præſententur capitali Foreſtario, cum in partes illas venerit ad tenendum placita foreſtæ, & Corona, eo terminentur.

XVIII. OMNES autem Conſuetudines prædictas & Libertates, quas Nos conceſſimus in Regno tenendas, quantum ad Nos pertinet erga noſtros, omnes de Regno noſtro, tam Laici quam Clerici obſervent, quantum ad ſe pertinet erga ſuos.

Hic eſt finis & concordia facta inter Henricum Regem Angliæ, & Dominum Lodovicum Primogenitum filium Philippi Regis Franciæ; ſub hac forma.

XXIV. NOTUM ſit tam præſentibus, quam futuris, quod hæc eſt forma pacis facta inter Dominum Regem Angliæ illuſtrem & Dominum Lodovicum, Domini Regis Franciæ Primogenitum: In primis quod omnes Homines & * Impriſii domini Lodovici, & Coadjutores ſui Angliæ, & alii qui terram tenuerunt in principio Guerræ in Regno Angliæ, habeant terras ſuas & ſaiſinas ſuas, quas habuerunt in initio guerræ, & rectas conſuetudines & Libertates Regni Angliæ; & ſi emendationes inde factæ fuerint, communes ſint tam illis quam aliis.

* i. e. Partakers.

ITEM dominus H. Rex Angliæ & omnes homines & Impriſii ſui, qui terram tenuerunt in initio guerræ in Regno Angliæ.

ITEM Civitas Londonienſis, & omnes aliæ Civitates & Burgenſes habeant ſuas rectas conſuetudines & libertates.

ITEM omnes Priſones qui capti fuerunt ex utraque parte, poſtquam dominus Lodovicus applicavit in Angliæ, deliberentur; De aliis vero qui capti fuerunt ante primum eius adventum in Angliæ, ſic erit, quod Conſilium Domini Regis Angliæ eligat tres de Conſilio Domini Lodovici, per quorum ſacramentum fiat inquiſitio, qui fuerint Homines vel Impriſii domini Lodovici die quo capti fuerint, & per ſacramentum prædictorum deliberentur.

ITEM de omnibus Priſonibus ſic erit, quod omne quod ſolutum eſt de redemptionibus illorum ſolutum ſit; & id quod ſolutum non eſt, unde termini tranſierunt, ſolvatur; & redemptionum reſiduum quietum ſit: & ſi contentio fiat, & dicatur quod termini de redemptionibus Priſonum præteriti ſint, Conſilium domini Lodovici eligat tres de Conſilio domini Regis Angliæ, per quorum ſacramentum declarentur; ſi termini de redemptionibus tranſierunt necne. Et ſi à die Martis proxima ante feſtum Exaltationis ſanctæ Crucis, aliqua deſtructio fieret priſonibus, de ſolutione redemptionum facienda, inde quieti ſint omnes Priſones & alii de Regno Angliæ, qui contra dominum Regem Johannem quondam Regem Angliæ fuerint, faciant per homagium ſecuritatem Domino H. Regi Angliæ ſecundum Legem ad conſuetudinem Regni Angliæ, & per ſacramenta & Cartas ſuas.

ITEM, dominus Lodovicus reddet omnes obſides illis, a quibus eos habuit, qui traditi fuerint pro pecunia, unde termini tranſierunt, ſolutâ pecuniâ liberabit.

ITEM, reddentur domino H. Regi Angliæ & ſuis, omnes civitates, Burgos, & caſtra & terras quæ occupatæ ſunt per Guerram iſtam in quocunque loco Regni Angliæ ſint.

ITEM, de Inſulis ſic fiet, Dominus Lodovicus mittet litteras ſuas patentes fratribus Euſtachii Monachi, præcipiens quod illas reddant domino H. Regi Angliæ; & niſi illas reddiderint, diſtringent illos dominus L. pro legale poſſe ſuo per feoda, & per terras eorum, quæ de de feodo ſuo movent ad illas reddendas, & ſi hæc facere noluerint, ſint extra pacem iſtam. De Rege Scotorum ſic fiat, Dominus L. mandet eis formam pacis factæ inter dominum Regem Angliæ & ipſum, & quod ſi noluerint eſſe in pace illa, reddant domino Regi Angliæ omnia Caſtra & Priſones, & terras quas occupavit occaſione hujus guerræ: Idem faciet dominus Rex Angliæ dicto Regi Scotorum; Eodem modo mandabit dominus prædictus, D. Lewellino & aliis Wallenſibus.

ITEM, dominus L. adquietabit omnes Barones & homines de Regno Angliæ ab omnibus homagiis, fidelitatibus, confederationibus & impriſiis; & de cætero nullam inibit confæderationem, unde malum vel damnum poſſit aliquo tempore evenire domino H. Regi Angliæ, vel hæredibus ſuis de Regno Angliæ occaſione hujus guerræ. Idem facient Barones Angliæ domino Henrico Regi Angliæ, quòd nullam facient prædicto Domino L. vel alicui alii confederationem, homagium, fidelitatem vel impriſiam contra dominum ſuum H. Regem Angliæ vel hæredes ſuos.

ITEM, dominus L. faciet Juramentum Corporale, & ſui cum eo & Cartas ſuas facient ſinguli, quos Conſilium Domini Regis voluerit, quod pacem præſcripram firmiter & fideliter tenebunt. Ad impetrandum ſuper hoc confirmationem Domini Papæ & Domini Legati apponet Legale poſſe ſuum per preces.

ITEM, de debitis, ſic fiat, quòd omnia debita quæ debentur domino L. unde termini tranſierunt, ei reddántur.

ITEM, notandum eſt quòd in primo capitulo ubi legitur, de Impriſiis domini L. intelligitur de Laicis tantùm; Clerici tamen Anglici, qui laica feoda habuerunt, habeant terras & ſaſinas ſuas, quas habuerunt in initio guerræ.

UT omnia prædicta perpetuam obtineant firmitatem, dominus Gualterius Tituli ſancti Martini Presbyter Cardinalis Apoſtolicæ ſedis Legatus; dominus H. Rex Angliæ, Willielmus Mareſchallus Comes Penbroc, H. de Burgo Juſtitiarius Angliæ, R. Comes de Ceſtria, Willielmus Comes Saresberii, Willielmus Comes de Warenne, Willielmus Comes de Arondel, Willielmus Aubenii, Willielmus Briwere, Willielmus Mareſchallus juvenis, Falcaſius de Breante, R. de Mortuo-mari, L. de Erdivert, R. de Veteri-Ponte, Gaufridus de Nova-villa, R. de Inſula, Philippus de Aubinie, * R. filius Regis, Huic ſcripto ſigilla ſua appoſuerunt.

tuerimus & ordinaverimus de his vel eorum aliquibus, ita tamen quod citra Pentecoſtem proximò venturam dicamus ſuper his Dictum noſtrum & ſuper omnibus, quæ ſuper Rebus in compromiſſum deductis, vel circa ipſius interim contingerit attemptari. Nos vero Partibus propter hoc convocatis Ambiani, dicto Rege perſonaliter & quibuſdam de Baronibus per ſe, & aliis per Procuratores comparentibus coram nobis, auditis hinc inde propoſitis, & etiam defenſionibus ac rationibus Partium pleniùs intellectis, Attendentes per Proviſiones, Statuta & Obligationes Oxonienſes, & per ea quæ ex eis & occaſione eorum ſubſecuta ſunt, juri & honori Regio plurimum fuiſſe detractum, Regni turbationem, Eccleſiarum depreſſionem, & deprædationem, & aliis perſonis ipſius Regni Eccleſiaſticis & ſæcularibus, Indigenis, & Alienigenis graviſſima diſpendia proveniſſe; & quod veriſimiliter timebatur ne graviora contingerent in futurum, Communicato Baronum & Magnatum Conſilio.

Sententia Regis Franciæ. IN nomine Patris, & Filii, & Spiritus Sancti, prædictas Proviſiones, Ordinationes, & Obligationes omnes quocunque modo cenſeantur, & quicquid ex eis vel occaſione eorum ſubſecutum eſt, per Dictum noſtrum ſeu Ordinationem noſtram caſſamus & irritamus, maxime cum appareat ſummum Pontificem eas per ſuas litteras caſſas & irritas nunciaſſe; ordinantes quod tam dictus Rex quam Barones & alii quicunque præſenti compromiſſo conſenſerunt, & de prædictis obſervandis ſe quoquomodo aſtrinxerunt, ſe de eiſdem quittent penitus & abſolvant.

ADJICIMUS etiam, quod ex vi, ſeu viribus prædictarum Proviſionum ſive Obligationum, ſeu Ordinationum, vel alicujus rei ſuper hoc conceſſæ poteſtatis à Rege, nullus nova ſtatuta faciat, nec jam facta teneat vel obſervat, nec propter non obſervantiam prædictorum debeat aliquis alterius capitalis, vel aliter Inimicus haberi, vel pœnam propter hoc aliquam ſuſtinere. Decernimus etiam, quod omnes litteræ ſuper præmiſſis Proviſionibus & earum occaſione confectæ, irritæ ſint & inanes; & ordinamus, quod ipſi Regi Angliæ reſtituantur a Baronibus & reddantur.

ITEM dicimus & ordinamus, quod caſtra quæcunque fuerint tradita cuſtodienda ad ſecuritatem, ſeu occaſione prædictorum & adhuc ſunt detenta, liberè à dictis Baronibus eidem Regi reddantur, tenenda ab eodem Rege, ſicut ea tenebat ante tempus prædictarum Proviſionum.

ITEM dicimus & ordinamus quòd liberè liceat prædicto Regi, Capitalem Juſtitiarium, Cancellarium, Theſaurarium Conſiliarios, Juſtitiarios minores, Vicecomites, & quoſcunque alios Officiales ac Miniſteriales Regni ſui ac domus ſuæ, præficere, inſtituere, deſtituere & amovere pro ſuo libito voluntatis, ſicut faciebat & facere poterat ante tempus Proviſionum prædictarum.

ITEM retractamus & caſſamus illud ſtatutum factum, quod Regnum Angliæ de cætero per Indigenas gubernetur, nec non ut exirent Alienigenæ non reverſuri, exceptis illis quorum moram Fideles Regni communiter acceptarent. Ordinantes per Dictum noſtrum, quod liceat Alienigenis morari in dicto Regno ſecurè ad concilium ſuum, quos viderit utiles & fideles, ſicut facere poterat ante tempus prædictum.

ITEM dicimus & ordinamus, quod dictus Rex plenam poteſtatem & liberum regimen habeat in Regno ſuo & ejus pertinentiis, & ſit sit in eo statu, & in ea plenaria potestate in omnibus & per omnia, sicut erat ante tempus prædictum.

NOLUMUS autem nec intendimus per præsentem Ordinationem, derogare in aliquo Regiis Privilegiis, Chartis, Libertatibus, Statutis, & Laudabilibus Consuetudinibus Regni Angliæ, quæ erant ante tempus Provisionum ipsarum: Ordinamus etiam quod Idem Rex prædictis Baronibus indulgeat, & remittat omnem rancorem, quem habet adversus eos occasione præmissorum; similiter Barones eidem. Et quod unus alterum occasione præmissorum, de quibus in nos extitit compromissum per se vel per alium de cætero non gravet in aliquo vel offendat.

HANC autem Ordinationem nostram seu Dictum nostrum protulimus Ambianis in crastino Beati Vincentii Martyris, Anno Domini millesimo ducentesimo sexagesimo tertio, mense Januario.

IN cujus rei Testimonium, præsentibus litteris nostrum opponi fecimus sigillum, Actum Anno, mense, die, & loco prædictis.

Corrigenda & Delenda.

UPON the Review of this Volume, ſince it came from the Preſs, I perceive I have committed ſome Miſtakes, which I deſire the Candid Reader to pardon, and thus rectify.

Book I. p. 22. Having followed the printed Copies of William of Malmesbury, concerning the Revolt of the City of Oxford from K. William I. I there mention'd that Story as I found it in my Author; but ſince, upon conſulting the Manuſcript Copies in the Cottonian and Bodleian Libraries, as alſo Cambden's * Britannia, I own I was under a Miſtake, for it was Exeter, and not Oxford, which then revolted: the nearneſs of the Latin names of thoſe two Places, viz. Exonia, and Oxonium, I ſuppoſe led the Tranſcribers of the Manuſcript Copies into that Error, and conſequently my ſelf into the ſame.

* In Devonſhire.

B. III. p. 145. over againſt theſe words, the King ſpent all this Year, &c. Add the Year of our Lord in the Margin, viz. Anno Dom. MCXII. which is there omitted.

B. III. P. 177. A. D. 1134. Whereas there is mention'd a terrible Fire in London, which is ſaid to have burnt down the greateſt part of that City; upon ſecond Thoughts, I am now ſatisfied that it was no other than what Florence of Worceſter, and Matt. Paris, mentioned two Years before, viz. A. D. 1132. and which I have ſet down under that Year, P. 175. tho it is moſt probable, that the Circumſtances of this Fire might be as the Manuſcript Author of the Annals of the City of London has related (tho falſly) under that Year (and who was the cauſe of my miſtake) but he flouriſhed not till towards the latter end of King Henry III.

B. VI. p. 475, 476. The Appeal of the Biſhops of Durham and Salisbury, againſt the Election of Geoffrey Archbiſhop of York being twice mention'd, dele the firſt Relation of it, it being overſeen.

B. VII. p. 771. l. 38, 39. dele theſe words, This preſent Charter made by the Popes, and for them read, that the ſame was ſoon after confirmed by the Pope's Bull.

B. VIII. p. 991. Over againſt the words, This Writ or Charter, beginning at the third Paragraph, add in the Margin; ſee the Charter in the Appendix, N. 10.

ADDENDA

ADDENDA.

THE Author, ſince the finiſhing of this Work, having found ſome things of Conſequence that he thought worthy to be added, deſires the Reader to inſert theſe following particulars, as he is here directed to, in their proper places.

Book I. P. 63. l. penult. Man-bote, that is, Amends for a Crime, from the Saxon word, Man, Crimen, Noxa, Peccatum, Nocumentum.

Book II. P. 89. under N° [5] after Malcolm, add this, "Yet he reigned but a Year and "a half, and was then treacherouſly ſlain by Donald's inſtigation, who again recovered the "Crown, and kept it for near four Years.

Id. P. 106. Under N° [5] after the laſt word of that Paragraph (viz. Death) inſert this, "And not long after Pope Urban himſelf deceaſed.

Book V. P. 308. In the beginning of the Year MCLXI. after the words this Year, add, "The King having kept his Chriſtmaſs at Bayeux, in the beginning of Lent, held a Great Coun-"cil of the Biſhops and Abbots at Roüen, after which he ſeized, &c.

Id. P. 371. L. 1. After Ireland, add this, "One of the moſt conſiderable "things that happ'ned there this Year * was, that Dermot Mac-Murrough King "of Leinſter, who deceaſed at Fernes about the end of April, being then well "ſtricken in Years. Sometime after which, whilſt, &c.

* Chron. Hibern.

Id. P. 379. At the end of the Paragraph under N° [5] after againſt their Father, inſert this, "† What Brompton in his Chronicle relates concerning this Affair "is very conſiderable, if it be true, viz. that upon this Quarrel the two young "Princes laſt mention'd, privately left the Court, but the Queen endeavouring to do ſo too, was "taken diſguiſed in a mean Habit; and being looked upon as the Contriver of all this Miſchief, "was kept Priſoner for moſt part of this King's Reign.

† Col. 1424.

Id. P. 449. l. 32. After Truce, add, "Nothing elſe fell out conſiderable in foreign Parts, ex-"cept the Death of William King of Sicily, who left his Queen Joan, Daughter to this King "Henry, beſides her Dower or Jointure, a great Legacy in Gold, Plate, and other rich Move-"ables; beſides what he bequeathed to the King his Father-in-Law, of which you will hear more "in the next Reign.

Book VII. P. 730. l. 44. Inſert this, next to hereafter, "Nothing elſe relating to Ec-"cleſiaſtical Affairs happened worth noting, but that John Ferentine, a Cardinal, came this Year "into England, and having amaſſed a mighty Sum of Money from the Clergy, held a Great "Council or Synod at Reading, wherein ſome Canons were made, and then preſently after re-"turned into Italy.
